After the coronation then of this new king, which was the ninth day of Aprill, called then passion Sunday, which was an exceeding stormy day, and so tempestuous, that many did wonder at the portent thereof: not long after the same, a parliament began to be called, and to be holden after the feast of Easter, at Westminster, an. 1413. At which time, Thomas Arundel the archbishop of Canturbury, collected in Pauls church at London, an vniuersall synod of all the bishops and clergy of England. In that synod among other weighty matters and ponderous, was determined; that the day of S. George, and also of S. Dunstan should be double feast, called Duplex Festum, in holy kitchen, in holy church I would say.

A synod called at London.

S. George and S. Dunstans day made double feast.

And because the order and maner of those pope-holy feasts, either yet is not sufficiently knowne to some rude and grosse capacities, or may peraduenture grow out of vse, and to be strange and vnknowne to our posterity hereafter: therefore to giue a little memorandum thereof (by the way for erudition of times hereafter to come) touching this mysticall science of the popes deepe and secret diuinity; here is to be noted, that the feasts of the popes holy mother catholike church, be diuided into sundry members: Like as a plentifull rote in a fruitfull field, riseth vp and burgeneth into manifold armes, and the armes againe doe multiply into diuers and sundry branches, out of the which moreouer, although no fruit doe come, yet both leaues and flowers do bud and blossome in most copious wise, right beautifull to behold: Euen so this Festum, containing a large matter of great variety of daies and feasts, groweth in it selfe and multiplieth, being thus diuided: First, into Festum duplex, and into Festum simplex, that is, into feast double, and to feast simple. Againe, this Festum duplex brancheth foure fold wise, to wit, into Festum principale duplex: into Maius duplex: into Minus duplex, and inferius duplex: that is, in principall double, in greater double, in lesser double, and inferior or lower double. Vnto these seuerall sorts of feasts what daies were peculiarly assigned, it were too long to recite. For this present purpose it shall suffice to vnderstand, that as vnto the principall double feast only belonged eight daies in the yeere; so the Maius duplex festum, had giuen vnto him by this conuocation, the day of S. George and of S. Dunstan, as is afore remembred: albeit by constitution it was so decreed, yet by custome it was not so vsed. Item, to be noted, that these two feasts, to wit, Principale duplex, and Maius duplex, did differ and were knowne from all other by foure notes; by seruice in the kitchen, and by seruice in the church, which was both double, by ringing in the steeple, which was with double peale: by copes in the quier, and by thurifying or censing the altars. For in these two principall and greater double feasts, the seuenth, eighth, and ninth lesson must bee read with silken copes. Also at the said feasts in the time of the lessons, the altars in the church must be thurified, that is, smoked with incense, &c. And likewise the Minus duplex, and Inferius duplex had also their peculiar seruice to them belonging.

The feast of the popes church described & diuided.

Festum duplex. Principale duplex, Maius duplex, Minus duplex, Inferius duplex.

Constitution against councels. Ex tab. festorum.

Secondly, the Simplex festum, which is the second arme springing of this diuision, is thus diuided: Either hauing a triple inuitory, or a double, or else a single inuitory. Of the which moreouer, some haue three lessons, some haue nine, &c.

Simplex festum in the popes church.

And thus much by occasion for popish feasts; not that I doe so much deride them, as I lament, that so much and manifest idolatry in them is committed, to the great dishonor of our Lord God, which is only to be honoured.

The trouble and persecution of the Lord Cobham.

The trouble of the lord Cobham. Ex Chron. Monast. Albanensis.

BVt to let this by-matter passe, againe to returne to the foresaid vniuersall synod assembled by Thomas Arundell at S. Pauls church in London, as is before remembred: the chiefe and principall cause of the assembling thereof (as recordeth the chronicle of S. Albons) was to represse the growing and spreading of the Gospell, and especially to withstand the noble and worthy lord Cobham, who was then noted to be a principall fauorer, receiuer, and maintainer of them, whom the bishop misnamed to be Lollards, especially in the dioceses of London, Rochester and Hereford, setting them vp to preach whom the bishops had not licensed, and sending them about to preach, which was against the constitution prouinciall, before remembred, pag. 483. holding also and teaching opinions of the sacraments, of images, of pilgrimage, of the keies and church of Rome, contrary and repugnant to the receiued determination of the Romish church, &c.

Vide pag. 483.

In the meane time, as these were in talke amongst them, concerning the good lord Cobham; resorted vnto them the 12. inquisitors of heresies (whom they had appointed at Orford the yeere afore, to search out heretikes, with all Wicklifes bookes) who brought 200. and 46. conclusions, which they had collected as heresies out of the said bookes. The names of the said inquisitors were these:

Walden. in fascic. zizaniorum Wicklefi.

1. John Witnam, a maister in the new Colledge.
2. John Langedon, monke of Christ church in Canturbury.
3. William Vfford, regent of the Carmelites.
4. Thomas Claxton, regent of the Dominicks.
5. Robert Gilbert.
6. Richard Earthisdale.
7. John Lucke.
8. Richard Snedisham.
9. Richard Fleming.
10. Thomas Rotborne.
11. Robert Ronbery.
12. Richard Grafdale.

These things thus done, and the articles being brought in, further they proceeded in their communication, concluding among themselues, that it was not possible for them to make whole Christs coat without seame (meaning thereby their patched popish synagogue) vnlesse certain great men were brought out of the way, which seemed to be the chiefe maintainers of the said said disciples of Wickliffe. Among whom this noble knight sir John Oldcastle the lord Cobham, was cõplained of by the generall prelates to be the chief principall. Him they accused, first, for a mighty maintainer of suspected preachers in the diocesse of London, Rochester, and Hereford, contrary to the minds of their ordinaries. Not only they affirmed him to haue sent thither the said preachers, but also to haue assisted them there by force of armes, notwithstanding their synodall constitution made afore to the contrary. Last of all, they accused him that he was far otherwise in beleefe of the sacrament of the altar, of penance, of pilgrimage, of image worshipping, and of the ecclesiasticall power, then the holy church of Rome had taught many yéeres before.

The lord Cobham accused for his christian beliefe.

Processe against him.

In the end it was concluded among them, that without any further delay, processe should be awarded out against him, as against a most pernitious heretike.

A spirituall practise.

Some of that fellowship which were of more crafty experience then the other, thought it not best to haue the matter so rashly handled, but by some preparation made thereunto before, considering the said Lord Cobham was a man of great birth, and in fauor at that time with the king; their counsell was to know first the kings mind to saue all things vpright. This counsell was well accepted, and thereupon the archbishop Thomas Arundell with his other bishops, and a great part of the clergy, went straightwaies vnto the king, then remaining at Kenningston, and there laid forth most grieuous complaints against the said Lord Cobham, to his great infamy and blemish, being a man right godly. The king gently heard those bloudthirsty prelats, and farre otherwise then became his princely dignitie: notwithstanding requiring, and instantly desiring them, that in respect of his noble stocke and knighthood, they should yet fauorably deale with him. And that they would, if it were possible, without all rigor or extreme handling, reduce him againe to the churches vnity. He promised them also, that in case they were contented to take some deliberation, his self would seriously commune the matter with him.

The king speaketh for him.

His gentle promise.

The kings admonishment to the L. Cobham.

Anon after, the king sent for the said Lord Cobham. And as he was come, he called him secretly, admonishing him betwixt him and him, to submit himselfe to his mother the holy church, and as an obedient child to acknowledge himselfe culpable. Unto whom the christian knight made this answer: Your most worthy prince, saith he, I am alwaies prompt and willing to obey, forsomuch as I know you a christian king, and the appointed minister of God, bearing the sword to the punishment of euill doers, and for safegard of them that be vertuous. Unto you (next my eternall God) owe I my whole obedience, and submit thereunto (as I haue done euer) all that I haue, either of fortune or nature, ready at all times to fulfill whatsoeuer ye shall in the Lord command me. But as touching the pope and his spiritualty, I owe them neither sute nor service, forsomuch as I know him by the scriptures to be the great antichrist, the sonne of perdition, the open aduersary of God, and the abomination standing in the holy place. When the king had heard this, with such like sentences more, he would talke no longer with him, but left him so vtterly.

The lord Cobham forsaken of the king.

And as the archbishop resorted againe vnto him for an answere, hee gaue him his full authority to cite him, examine him, and punish him according to their diuellish decrées, which they called the lawes of holy church. Then the said archbishop by the counsell of his other bishoppes and clergy, appointed to call before him sir John Oldcastle the Lord Cobham, and to cause him personally to appeare, to answere to such suspect Articles as they should lay against him. So he sent forth his chiefe Summoner, with a very sharpe citation vnto the castell of Cowling, where as he at that time dwelt for his solace. And as the said Summoner was come thither, he durst in no case enter the gates of so noble a man without his licence, and therefore hee returned home againe, his message not done.

Lord Cobham summoned by the archbishop.

Then called the archbishop one John Butler vnto him, which was then the doore keeper of the kings priuy chamber: and with him he couenanted through promises and rewards, to haue this matter craftily brought to passe vnder the kings name. Whereupon, the said John Butler toke the archbishops Sumner with him, and went vnto the said lord Cobham, shewing him, that it was the kings pleasure that he should obey that citation, and so cited him fraudulently. Then said hee to them in few words, that hee in no case would consent to those most diuellish practises of the priests. As they had informed the archbishop of that answer, and that it was for no man priuately to cite him after that, without perill of life, he decréed by and by to haue him cited by publike processe or open commandement. And in all the haste possible, vpon the wednesday before the natiuity of our Lady, in September, he commanded letters citatory, to be set vpon the great gates of the cathedrall church of Rochester (which was but three English miles from thence) charging him to appeare personally before him at Ledis the eleuenth day of the same month and yére, all excuses to the contrary set apart. Those letters were taken downe anon after, by such as bare fauor vnto the Lord Cobham, and so conueied aside. After that caused the archbishop new letters to be set vp on the nativity day of our Lady, which also were rent downe and vtterly consumed.

Then forsomuch as he did not appeare at the day appointed at Ledis (where he sate in consistory, as cruell as euer was Caiphas, with his court of hypocrits about him) he iudged him, denounced him, and condemned him of most déepe contumacie. After that, when he had béen falsly informed by his hired spies, and other glosing glauerers, that the said lord Cobham had laughed him to scorne, disdained all his doings, maintained his old opinions, contemned the churches power, the dignity of a bishop, and the order of priesthood (for all these was he then accused of) in his mody madnes without inst proue, did he openly excommunicat him. Yet was not with all this his fierce tyranny satisfied, but commanded him to be cited afresh, to appeare before him the saturday before the feast of S. Matthew the Apostle, with these cruell threatnings added thereunto, that if he did not obey at the day, he would more extremely handle him. And to make himselfe more strong towards the performance thereof, he compelled the lay power by most terrible menacings of curses and interdictions, to assist him against that seditious apostata, schismatike, and heretike, the troubler of the publike peace, that enemy of the realme, and great aduersary of all holy church; for all these hatefull names did he giue him.

This most constant seruant of the Lord, and worthy knight sir John Oldcastle, the Lord Cobham, beholding the vnpeaceable fury of antichrist thus kindled against him, perceiuing himselfe also compassed on euery side with deadly dangers; he toke paper & pen in hand, and so wrote a christian confession or reckoning of his faith (which followeth hereafter) both signing and sealing it with his owne hand. Wherein he also answered to the foure chiefest articles that the archbishop laid against him. That done, he toke the copie with him, and went therewith to the king, trusting to finde mercy and fauor at his hand. None other was that confession of his, then the common beléefe or sum of the churches faith, called the Apostles Créed, of all christian men then vsed, with a briefe declaration vpon the same, as here vnder ensueth.

I Beléeue in God the father almighty, maker of heauen and earth. And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, which was conceiued by the holy Ghost, borne of the virgin Mary, suffered vnder Ponce Pilat, crucified, dead and buried, went down to hell, the third day rose againe from death, ascended vp to heauen, sitteth on the right hand of God the father almighty, and from thence shall come againe to iudge the quicke and the dead. I beléeue in the holy Ghost, the vniuersall holy church, the communion of Saints, the forgiuenesse of sins, the vprising of the flesh, and euerlasting life, Amen.

A declaration of his beliefe.

And for a more large declaration (saith he) of this my faith in the catholike church, I stedfastly beléeue, that there is but one God almighty, in and of whose Godhead are these three persons, the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, and that those three persons are the selfesame God almighty. I beléeue also that the second person of this most blessed Trinity, in most conuenient time appointed thereunto afore, toke flesh and blood of the most blessed virgin Mary, for the sauegard and redemption of the vniuersall kind of man, which was afore lost in Adams offence.

Christ is the only head of his church.

Moreouer I beléeue, that the same Jesus Christ our Lord thus being both God and man, is the only head of the whole christian church, and that all those that haue been, or shall be saued, be members of this most holy church. And this holy church I thinke to be diuided into three sorts or companies:

The church diuided into three parts.

Whereof the first sort be now in heauen, and they are the saints from hence departed. These as they were here conuersant, conformed alwaies their liues to the most holy lawes and pure examples of Christ, renouncing satan, the world, and the flesh, with all their concupiscence and euils.

Contrary wrote hee, ad parliamentum Ex Waldens.

The second sort are in purgatory (if any such place be in the scriptures) abiding the mercy of God, and a ful deliuerance of paine.

The third sort are here vpon the earth, and be called the church militant. For day and night they contend against crafty assaults of the diuell, the flattering prosperities of this world, and the rebellious filthinesse of the flesh.

The church militant diuided in three.

This latter congregation by the iust ordinance of God is also seuered into three diuers estates, that is to say, into priesthood, knighthood, and the commons. Among whom the will of God is, that the one should aid the other, but not destroy the other. The priests first of all secluded from all worldlinesse, should conforme their liues vtterly to the examples of Christ and his Apostles. Euermore should they be occupied in preaching and teaching the scriptures purely, and in giuing wholesome examples of good liuing to the other two degrees of men. More modest also, more louing, gentle, and lowly in spirit, should they be, then any other sorts of people.

What the priests should be.

In knighthood are all they which beare sword by law of office. These should defend Gods lawes, and see that the gospell were purely taught, conforming their liues to the same, and secluding all false preachers: yea those ought rather to hazard their their liues, then to suffer such wicked decrées as either blemisheth the eternall Testament of God, or yet letteth the frée passage thereof, whereby heresies and schismes might spring in the Church. For of none other arise they, as I suppose, then of erroneous constitutions, craftily first creeping in vnder hypocriticall lies, for aduantage. They ought also to preserue Gods people from oppressors, tyrants and theeues, and to sée the clergie supported so long as they teach purely, pray rightly, and minister the Sacraments freely. And if they sée them do otherwise, they are bound by the lawe of office to compell them to change their doings; and to sée all things performed according to Gods prescript ordinance.

Marke here a most christian heart.

What the common people ought to doe.

The latter fellowship of this church, are the common people: whose duetie is, to beare their good mindes and true obedience, to the foresaid ministers of God, their kings, ciuill gouernours and Priests. The right office of these, is iustly to occupie euerie man his facultie, be it marchandise, handicraft, or the tilthe of the ground. And so one of them to bee as an helper to another, following alwaies in their sortes the iust commandements of the Lord God.

The first examination of the Lord Cobham.

SIr John, in the last generall conuocation of the clergie of this our Prouince, yee were detected of certaine heresies, and by sufficient witnesses found culpable. Whereupon yee were by forme of spirituall lawe cited, and would in no case appeare. In conclusion, vpon your rebellious contumacie, ye were both priuately and openly excommunicated. Notwithstanding wee neither yet shewed our selues vnreadie to haue giuen your absolution (nor yet doe not to this houre) would ye haue meekely asked it. Vnto this the L. Cobham shewed, as though he had giuen no eare, hauing his minde otherwise occupied, and so desired no absolution. But said he would gladly before him and his brethren make rehearsall of that faith which hee held and intended alwaies to stand to, if it would please them to license him thereunto. And then hee toke out of his bosome a certaine writing indented, concerning the articles whereof he was accused, and so openly read it before them, giuing it vnto the archbishop as hee had maue thereof an end. Whereof this is the copie.

Anselme was herein full power.

A signe of gods true seruant.

I John Oldcastle knight, L. of Cobham, will that all Christian men weet and vnderstand: that I clepe almighty God into witnesse, that it hath been, now is, and euer with the help of God, shall be mine intent and my will, to beleeue faithfully and fully all the Sacramentes that euer God ordained to bee doe in holy church: and moreouer to declare me in these foure points, I beleeue that the most worshipfull Sacrament of the aultar is Christes body in forme of bread, the same body that was borne of the blessed virgin our Lady Saint Mary, done on the crosse, dead and buried, the third day rose from death to life, the which body is now glorified in heauen.

The sacrament of the Lords bord.

Also as for the sacrament of penance I beleeue, that it is needefull to euery man that shalbe saued to forsake sinne, and doe due penance for sinne before done, with true confession, very contrition, and due satisfaction as Gods lawe limitteth and teacheth, and els may hee not bee saued: which penance I desire all men to doe.

Penance.

And as of Images, I vnderstand, that they be not of beleeue, but that they were ordained sith they beleeue was zeale of Christ, by sufferance of the Church, to be Calenders to lewd men, to represent and bring to minde the passion of our Lord Jesu Christ, and martyrdome and good liuing of other Saints: And that who so it be, that doth the worship to dead Images that is due to God, or putteth such hope or trust, in helpe of them, as hee should doe to G O D, or hath affection in one more then in an other, he doth in that the greatest sinne of mawmetrie.

Images.

Also I suppose this fully, that euery man in this earth is a pilgrime toward blisse, or toward paine: and that hee that knoweth not, ne will not know ne keepe the holy commandementes of God in his liuing here (albeit that he be go on pilgrimages to all the world, and hee die so) hee shalbe damned: he that knoweth the holy commandements of God, and keepeth them to his end, hee shalbe saued though hee neuer in his life go on pilgrimage, as men now vse to Canturbury or to Rome, or to any other place.

Pilgrimage.

This answer to his articles thus ended and read, he deliuered it to the Bishops as is said afore. Then counselled the Archbishop with the other two Bishops, and with diuers of the doctors, what was to be done in this matter: commanding him for the time to stand aside. In conclusion by their assent and information, hee said thus vnto him: Come hither sir John. In this your writing are many good things contained, and right catholicke also, wee deny it not: but yee must consider that this day was appointed you to answer to other points concerning those articles, whereof as yet no mention is made in this your bill. And therefore yee must yet declare vs your minde more plainely.

The answere examined.

Quarell picked where none was giuen.

And thus, whether that ye hold, affirme, and beleeue, that in the sacrament of the aultar, after the consecration rightly done by a priest, remaineth materiall bread, or not? Moreouer, whether ye do hold, affirme and beleeue, that as concerning the sacrament of penance (where as a competent number of priests are) euery christian man is necessarily bound to be confessed of his sinnes to a priest ordained by the church, or not.

The wolfe was hungry, he must needs be fed with blood.

After certaine other communication, this was the answer of the good Lord Cobham. That none otherwise would hee declare his minde, nor yet answere vnto his articles, then was expressly

The sacrament of the aultar.

Finally, this is my faith also, that God will aske no more of a christian beleeuer in this life, but onely to obey the precepts of that most blessed lawe. If any Prelates of the church require more, or els any other kinde of obedience, then this to be vsed: hee contemneth Christ, exalting himselfe aboue God, and so becommeth an open Antichrist. All the premisses I beleeue particularlie, and generally all that God hath left in his holy Scripture, that I should beleeue; instantly desiring you my liege Lord and most worthy king, that this confession of mine, may be iustly examined by the most godly wise and learned men of your realme. And if it be found in all points agreeing to the veritie, then let it be so allowed: and I thereupon holden for none other then a true christian. If it bee proued otherwise, then let it be vtterly condemned: prouided alwaies, that I be taught a better belieke by the word of God: and I shall most reuerently at all times obey thereunto.

This briefe confession of this faith, the L. Cobham wrote (as is mentioned afore) and so toke it with him to the court, offering it with all meekenesse vnto the king to reade it ouer. The king would in no case receiue it, but commanded it to be deliuered vnto them that should be his iudges. Then desired he in the kings presence, that an hundred knightes and esquires might be suffered to come in vpon his purgation, which hee knew would cleare him of all heresies. Moreouer hee offered himselfe after the lawe of armes, to fight for life or death with any man liuing, christian or heathen, in the quarrell of his faith, the king and the Lords of his counsell excepted. Finally with all gentlenesse hee protested before all that were present, that he would refuse no maner of correction that should after the lawes of God be ministred vnto him, but that he would at all times with all meekenesse obey it. Notwithstanding all this, the king suffered him to bee summoned personally in his own priuy chamber. Then said the L. Cobham to the king that he had appealed from the Archbishop to the pope of Rome, and therefore hee ought he said, in no case to be his iudge. And hauing his appeale there at hand readie written, hee shewed it with all reuerence to the king. Wherewith the king was then much more displeased then afore, and said angerly vnto him, that he should not pursue his appeale: but rather he should tarry in hold, till such time as it were of the Pope allowed. And then, would he, or nild he, the archbishop should bee his iudge. Thus was there nothing allowed that the Lord Cobham had lawfully afore required. But forsomuch as hee would not bee sworne in all things to submit himself to the church, and so take what penance the Archbishop would enioyne him: Hee was arrested againe at the kings commandement, and so led forth to the Tower of London, to keepe his day (so was it then spoken) that the archbishop had appointed him afore in the kings chamber.

Then caused hee the foresaid confession of his faith to bee copied againe, and the answere also (which hee had made to the foure articles propounded against him) to be written in maner of an Indenture in two sheets of paper: That when hee should come to his answer, he might giue the one copie vnto the archbishop, and reserue the other to himselfe. As the day of examination was come, which was the 23. day of September the Saterday before the feast of S. Matthew: Thomas Arundel the archbishop, sitting in Cayphas rowme in the Chapterhouse of Paules, with Richard Clifford Bishop of London, and Henry Bolingbroke Bishop of Winchester: sir Robert Morley knight and lieftenant of the Tower, brought personallie before him the said L. Cobham, and there left him for the time: vnto whom the archbishop said these words.

erpressely in his writting there contained. Then said the archb. againe vnto him: Sir Iohn, beware what yee doe. For if yee answere not clearely to those thinges that are here obiected against you (especially at the time appointed you only for that purpose) the law of holy church is, that compelled once by a iudge, we may openly proclaime you an heretick. Vnto whom hee gaue this answer: Doe as ye shall thinke best, for I am at a point. Whatsoeuer hee or the other bishops did aske him after that, he bad them resort to his bill: for thereby would he stand to the verie death. Other answere would hee not giue that day, wherewith the bishops and prelates were in a maner amased and wonderfully disquieted.

A tyrannous whore is that mother.

His answer not to their minds.

At the last the Archb. counselled againe with his other Bishops and Doctors, and in the end thereof declared vnto him, what the holy church of Rome (following the saying of S. Augustine, S. Hierome, S. Ambrose, and of other holy Doctors) had determined in these matters, no manner of mention once made of Christ. Which determination (saith he) ought all christian men both to beleeue and to follow.

Antichrist setteth men aboue God.

Then said the Lord Cobham vnto him, that he would gladly both beleeue and obserue whatsoeuer holy church of Christes institution had determined, or yet whatsoeuer God had willed him either to beleeue or to do. But that the pope of Rome with his Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and other prelates of that church had lawfull power to determine such matter as stood not with his word throughly: that would he not (he said) at the time affirme. With this the archb. bad him to take good aduisement till the munday next following (which was the 25. day of September) and then iustly to answere, specially vnto this point: whether there remained materiall bread in the sacrament of the aultar, after the words of consecration or not? He promised him also, to send vnto him in writing those matters clearely determined, that he might then bee the more perfect in his answere making. And all this was nought els, but to blinde the multitude with somewhat. The nert day following, according to his promise, the archbishop sent vnto him into the Tower, this folish and blaspheamous writing, made by him and by his vnlearned clergy.

The Lord Cobham resorteth vnto Christ.

What could be more reasonably said if they had reason to receiue it.

THe faith and determination of the holy Church touching the blissfull sacrament of the aultar, is this: that after the Sacramentall words be once spoken by a priest in his Masse, the materiall bread, that was before bread, is turned into Christes very body. And the materiall wine, that was before wine, is turned into Christes very blood. And so there remaineth in the sacrament of the aultar, from thenceforth, no materiall bread, nor materiall wine, which were there before the sacramentall words were spoken: How beleeue ye this article? Holy Church hath determined, that it is meritorious to a christian man, to goe on pilgrimage to holy places: and there specially to worship holy reliques and Images of saints Apostles, and Martyrs, Confessors, and all other Saints besides, approued by the church of Rome. How feele ye this article?

He seeth their ignorance and malice.

And as the Lord Cobham had read ouer this most wretched writing, he maruelled greatly of their madde ignorance. But that he considered againe, that God had giuen them ouer for their vnbeliefes sake, into most deep errours and blindnesse of soule. Againe, he perceiued hereby, that their vttermost malice was purposed against him, howsoeuer he should answere. And therefore hee put his life into the hands of God, desiring his onely spirit to assist him in his nert answer. When the said 25. day of Septemb. was come (which was also the munday before Michaelmas) in the said yeare of our Lord 1413. Thomas Arundell the Archbishop of Canturbury commanded his iudiciall seate to be remoued from the chapter house of Paules to the Dominicke Friers within Ludgate at London. And as hee was there set with Richard Bishop of London, Henry the Bishop of Winchester, and Bennet the bishop of Bangor: He called in vnto him his counsell and his officers, with diuers other Doctors and Friers, of whom these are the names here following, maister Henry Ware, the Officiall of Canturburie: Philip Morgan, Doctor of both lawes: Holwell Kiffin, Doctor of the Canon lawe: Iohn Kempe, doctor of the Canon lawe: William Carletan, doctor of the Canon law: Iohn Witnam, of the newe Colledge in Oxforde: Iohn Whithead, doctor in Oxford also, Robert Wombewell, vicar of S. Laurence in the Iewry: Thomas Palmer, the Warden of Minors: Robert Chamberlaine, Prior of the Dominickes: Richard Dodington, Prior of the Augustines: Thomas Walden, Prior of the Carmellites, all doctors of Diuinitie. Iohn Steuens also, and James Cole, both Notaries, appointed there purposely to write all that should be either said or done. All these with a great sort more of Priestes, Monkes, Canons, Friers, Parish Clarkes, Belringers, Pardoners, disdained him, with innumerable mockes and scornes, reckoning him to bee an horrible heretick, and a man accursed afore God.

Hee putteth his life in Gods hand.

A rable of Antichristes.

Anone the Archbishop called for a Masse booke, and caused all those prelates and doctors to sweare thereupon, that euerie man should faithfully doe his office and duetie that day. And that neither for fauour nor fear, loue nor hate of the one partie nor the other: any thing should there be witnessed, spoken or done, but according to the trueth, as they would answer before God and all the world at the day of dome. Then were the two foresaid Notaries sworne also, to write and to witnes the proces that there should be vttered on both parties, and to saie their mindes (if they otherwise knew) before they should register it. And all this dissimulation was but to colour their mischieues, before the ignorant multitude.

Concilium magnanimum.

For a false colour sweare they.

All done to deceiue the ignorant.

Consider herein (gentle reader) what this wicked generation is, and how far wide from the iuill feare of God, for as they were then, so are they yet to this day.

After that, came forth before them, sir Robert Morley knight and lieftenant of the Tower, and he brought with him the good L. Cobham, there leauing him among them as a lamb among Wolues, to his examination and answere.

Lord Cobham commeth again before them.

An other examination of the Lord Cobham.

Ex vetusto exemplari Londinensium.

THen said the archb. vnto him: Lord Cobham ye be aduised (I am sure) of the words and proces which wee had vnto you vpon Saterdaie last past in the chapterhouse of Paules: which proces were now too long to be rehearsed againe: I said vnto you then, that you were accursed for your contumacie and disobedience to holy church, thinking that yee should with meekenesse haue desired your absolution.

The curse of Antichrist.

Then spake the L. Cobham with a chearfull countenance, and said, God said by his holie Prophet, Maledicam benedictionibus vestris, which is as much to say as, I shall curse where you blesse.

Malachi 2.

The archb. made then as though hee had continued forth his tale and not heard him, saying: Sir, at that time I gently profered to haue assoiled you if you would haue asked it. And yet I doe the same if ye will humbly desire it in due forme and maner, as holy church hath ordained.

A wolfish offer of gentlenesse.

Then said the Lord Cobham. Nay forsooth will I not, for I neuer yet trespassed against you, and therefore I will not doe it. And with that he kneeled downe on the pauement, holding vp his hands towards heauen, and said: I shriue me here vnto thee my eternall liuing God, that in my fraile youth I offended thee (O Lord) most greeuously in pride, wrath, & gluttony: in couetousnesse, and in letcherie. Many men haue I hurt in mine anger, and done many other horrible sins, good Lord I aske thee mercie. And therewith weepingly hee stode vp againe and said with a mighty voice. Loe, good people, loe: For the breaking of Gods lawe and his great commandements, they neuer yet cursed me. But for their owne lawes and traditions, most cruelly doe they handle both me and other men. And therefore, both they and their lawes, by the promise of God, shall vtterly be destroied.

L. Cobham confesseth himselfe vnto God.

Mans lawe before Gods law preferred. Hiere. 51.

At this the archb. and his company were not a little blemished. Notwithstanding, hee tooke stomacke vnto him againe after certaine words had, in excuse of their tyrannie, and examined the Lord Cobham of his christian beleefe.

The true christian beliefe of the L. Cobham.

Whereunto the L. Cobham made this godly answere, I beleeue (saith he) fully and faithfully in the vniuersall lawes of God. I beleeue that all is true which is contained in the holy sacred scriptures of the Bible. Finally I beleeue, all that my Lord God would I should beleeue. Then demanded the archbishop an answere of that bill which he and the clergy had sent him into the Tower the day afore, in maner of a determination of the church concerning the foure articles whereof hee was accused, specially for the sacrament of the aultar, how hee beleeued therein.

Whereunto the L. Cobham said, that with that bill he had nothing to doe. But this was his beliefe (he said) concerning the sacrament. That his Lord and Sauiour Iesus Christ, sitting at his last supper with his most deare disciples, the night before hee should suffer tooke bread in his hand: And giuing thanks to his eternall father, blessed it, brake it, and so gaue it vnto them, saying: Take it vnto you, and eate thereof all, this is my body which shall be betraied for you: Doe this hereafter in my remembrance. This doe I throughly beleeue (saith he) for this faith am I taught in the Gospell of Mathew, in Mark, and in Luke, and also in the first Epistle of S. Paule to the Corinthians. chap. 11.

Math 26. Mark 14. Luke 22. 1. Cor. 11. Antichrist alloweth not this faith.

Then asked the Archbishop, if he beleeued that it were bread after after the consecration or sacramentall words spoken ouer it.

The lord Cobham said: I beleeue that in the sacrament of the altar is Christs very bodie in forme of bread, the same that was borne of the virgin Marie, done on the crosse, dead, and buried, and that the third day arose from death to life, which now is glorified in heauen.

The sacrament of the altar.

Then said one of the doctors of the law: After the sacramentall words be uttered, there remaineth no bread, but onely the bodie of Christ.

John Whitehead gone from his opinion.

The lord Cobham said then to one maister John Whitehead: You said once vnto me in the castle of Cowling, that the sacred host was not Christs bodie. But I held then against you, and proued that therein was his bodie, though the seculars and friers could not therein agree, but held each one against other in that opinion. These were my words then, if yee remember it.

All this would not helpe.

A blasphemous brood.

Then shouted a sort of them together and cried with great noise: We say all, that it is Gods bodie.

Quarel pickers

And diuers of them asked him in great anger, whether it were materiall bread after the consecration or not?

Then looked the lord Cobham earnestly vpon the archbishop, and said: I beleeue surely that it is Christs bodie in forme of bread. Sir beleeue not you thus?

And the archbishop said, yes mary doe I?

Then asked him the doctors, whether it were onely Christs bodie after the consecration of a priest, and no bread, or not?

The sacrament of Christs body is both the body and bread. Neither will scripture nor reason serue. This opinion hath S. Augustine.

And he said vnto them, it is both Christs bodie and bread; I shall proue it as thus: For like as Christ dwelling here vpon the earth, had in him both Godhead and manhood, and had the inuisible Godhead couered vnder that manhood, which was onely visible and seene in him: So in the sacrament of the altar, is Christs very bodie and bread also, as I beleeue the bread is the thing that we see with our eies, the bodie of Christ (which is his flesh and his blood) is there vnder hid, and not seene, but in faith.

Gelasius contra Eutychen.

And moreouer, to proue that it is both Christs bodie and also bread after the consecration, it is by plaine words expressed by one of your owne doctors writing against Eutyches, which saith: Like as the selfe same sacraments doe passe by the operation of the holy Ghost, into a diuine nature, and yet notwithstanding keepe the propertie still of their former nature: so, that principall mysterie declareth to remaine one true, and perfect Christ, &c.

The Popes diuinitie.

Then smiled they each one vpon other, that the people should iudge him taken in a great heresie. And with a great brag diuers of them said: It is a foule heresie.

Then asked the archbishop what bread it was? And the doctors also inquired of him whether it were materiall or not?

Materiall.

The lord Cobham said vnto them: The scriptures make no mention of this word materiall, and therefore my faith hath nothing to doe therewith. But this I say and beleeue, that it is Christs body and bread. For Christ said in the vi. of Johns Gospell, Ego sum panis viuus, qui de cœlo descendi: I which came downe from heauen, am the liuing and not the dead bread. Therefore I say now againe as I said afore, as our Lord Jesus Christ is very God, and very man, so in the most blessed sacrament of the altar, is Christs very body and bread.

John 6.

An heresie after the papists making.

Then said they all with one voice: It is an heresie.

1. Cor. 10.

One of the bishops stood vp by and by, and said: What? it is an heresie manifest, to say that it is bread after the Sacramentall words be once spoken, but Christs body onely.

The sacrament is called bread.

The lord Cobham said: S. Paul the Apostle was (I am sure) as wise as you be now, and more godly learned, and hee called it bread, writing to the Corinthians: The bread that we breake, saith he, is it not the partaking of the body of Christ? Lo, he called it bread and not Christs body, but a meane whereby we receiue Christs body.

Then said they againe: Paul must be otherwise vnderstood. For it is sure an heresie to say that it is bread after the consecration, but only Christs body.

The lord Cobham asked, how they could make good that sentence of theirs?

They answered him thus: For it is against the determination of holy church.

The determination of the Church must stand, whatsoeuer Paul saith.

Then said the Archbishop vnto him: Sir John, we sent you a writing concerning the faith of this blessed Sacrament, clearely determined by the church of Rome our mother, and by the holy Doctors.

A most christian answere.

Then hee said againe vnto him, I know none holier then is Christ and his Apostles. And as for that determination, I wote it is none of theirs: for it standeth not with the Scriptures, but manifestly against them. If it bee the Churches, as yee say it is, it hath beene hers onely since she receiued the great poison of worldly possessions, and not afore.

The iudgement of the Lord Cobham concerning the determination of the Church.

Then asked they him, to stop his mouth therewith: If hee beleeued not in the determination of the church?

The Doctors confounded in their owne question.

And he said vnto them: No forsooth, for it is no God. In all our creede, this word (in) is but thrice mentioned concerning beleefe: In God the Father, in God the Sonne, in God the holy Ghost, three persons and one God. The birth, the death, the buriall, the resurrection and ascension of Christ, hath none (in) for beleefe, but in him. Neither yet hath the Church, the sacraments, the forgiuenesse of sinne, the latter resurrection, nor yet the life euerlasting, nor any other (in) then in the holy Ghost.

Then said one of the Lawyers: Tush, that was but a word of office. But what is your beliefe concerning holy Church?

The lord Cobham answered: My beliefe is, (as I said afore,) that all the Scriptures of the sacred Bible are true. All that is grounded vpon them I beleeue throughly. For I know, it is Gods pleasure that I should so doe. But in your lordly lawes and idle determinations, haue I no beliefe. For yee be no part of Christs holy church, as your open deeds doe shew: But yee are very Antichrists, obstinately set against his holy law and will. The lawes that yee haue made, are nothing to his glory, but onely for your vaine glory and abominable couetousnesse.

The Lord Cobham beleeueth not in the pope.

This, they said, was an exceeding heresie (that in a great fume) not to beleeue the determination of holy Church.

An heresie after the papists.

Then the Archbishop asked him, what he thought of holy Church.

Holy Church defined.

He said vnto him, my beliefe is, that the holy church is the number of them, which shall be saued, of whom Christ is the head. Of this church, one part is in heauen with Christ, another in purgatorie (you say;) and the third is heere in earth. This latter part standeth in three degrees, in knighthood, priesthood, and the communalty, as I said afore plainely in the confession of my beliefe.

Consider him to be then in shiewd handling.

Then said the Archbishop vnto him: Can you tell me who is of this church?

The lord Cobham answered: Yea truely can I.

Then said Doctor Walden the Prior of the Carmelits: It is doubt vnto you who is thereof. For Christ saith in Matthew, Nolite iudicare, presume to iudge no man. If yee be heere forbidden the iudgement of your neighbour or brother, much more the iudgement of your superiour.

Walden contra Wicleuistas, li. ar. 2. Cap. 89.

How we may iudge or not iudge by the scriptures. Matth. 7.

The lord Cobham made him this answere: Christ saith also in the selfesame chapter of Matthew, that like as the euill tree is knowne by his fruit, so is a false Prophet by his works, appeare they neuer so glorious: But that yee left behind yee. And in John he hath this text: Operibus credite, beleeue you the outward doings. And in an other place of John: Iustum iudicium iudicate; when we know the thing to bee true, we may so iudge it, and not offend. For Dauid said also: Rectè iudicate filij hominum: Judge rightly alwaies yee children of men. And as for your superiorities, were yee of Christ, yee should be meeke ministers, and no proud superiours.

John 1. John 7. Deut. 16. Psal. 56.

Diuersitie of iudgements.

Then said Doctor Walden vnto him, Yee make heere no difference of iudgements: Yee put no diuersitie betweene the euill iudgements which Christ hath forbidden, & the good iudgements, which he hath commanded vs to haue. Rash iudgement, and right iudgement, all is one with you. So swift iudges alwaies are the learned scholars of Wickliffe.

A pertit answere. Esay 5. Esay 55.

Unto whom the lord Cobham thus answered: It is well sophistred of you forsooth. Preposterous are your iudgements euermore. For as the Prophet Esay saith, Yes iudge euill good, and good euill: and therefore the same Prophet concludeth, that your waies are not Gods waies, nor Gods waies your waies. And as for that vertuous man Wickliffe, whose iudgements yee so highly disdaine, I shall say heere of my part, both before God and man, that before I knew that despised doctrine of his, I neuer abstained from sinne. But since I learned therein to feare my Lord God, it hath otherwise I trust beene with me: so much grace could I neuer find in all your glorious instructions.

Walden in præfatione doctrinæ 7.

Then said Doctor Walden againe yet vnto him: It were not well with me (so many vertuous men liuing, and so many learned men teaching the Scripture, being also so open, and the examples of fathers so plenteous,) if I then had no grace to amend my life, till I heard the diuell preach. S. Hierome saith, that he which seeketh such suspected matters, shall not find the midday light, but the midday diuell.

Luke 11. Iohn 10.

The lord Cobham said: Your fathers the old Pharisies, ascribed Christs miracles to Belzebub, & his doctrine to the diuell. And you as their naturall children, haue still the selfe same iudgement concerning his faithfull followers. They that rebuke your vicious liuing must needs be heretickes, & that must your doctors proue, when you haue no scripture to doe it. Then said he to them all: to iudge you as you be, we neede no further goe then to your owne proper acts. Where doe yee find in all Gods law, that yee should thus sit in iudgement of any christian man, or yet giue sentence vpon any other man vnto death as yee doe heere daily? no ground haue yee in all the Scriptures so lordly to take it vpon you, but in Annas and Caiphas, which sat thus vpon Christ, and vpon his Apostles after his ascension. Of them only haue yee taken it to iudge Christs members as yee doe, and neither of Peter nor John.

Doctours when the scripture faile, they begin to raile.

The clergie to sit on life or death, hath no ground in the scriptures. Followers of Caiphas.

Then said some of the Lawyers: Yes forsooth sir, for Christ iudged Judas.

The Lord Cobham said: No, Christ iudged him not, but he iudged himselfe, and thereupon went forth, and so did hang himselfe: But indeede Christ said: Woe vnto him, for that coueteous act of his, as he doth yet still vnto many of you. For since the venime of him was shed into the Church, yée neuer followed Christ, neither yet haue yée stood in the perfection of Gods law.

Then the Archbishop asked him, what he meant by that venime?

The lord Cobham said: your possessions and Lordships. For then cried an Angell in the aire (as your owne Chronicles mention) Woe, woe, woe, this day is venime shed into the Church of God. Before that time, all the Bishops of Rome were Martyrs in a maner. And since that time, we read of very few. But indéede since that same time, one hath put down another, one hath poisoned an other, one hath cursed another, and one hath slaine another, and done much more mischiefe besides, as all the Chronicles tell. And let all men consider well this, that Christ was méeke, and mercifull; the Pope is proud, and a tyrant: Christ was poore and forgaue; the pope is rich and a malicious manslater, as his daily acts doe proue him. Rome is the very nest of Antichrist, and out of that nest commeth all the Disciples of him. Of whom, Prelates, Priests, and Monkes, are the body, and these pild Friers are the taile which couereth his most filthy part.

Then said the Prior of the Friers Augustines, Alack sir, why doe you say so? that is vncharitably spoken.

And the lord Cobham said: Not only is it my saying, but also the Prophet Esayas, long afore my time. The Prophet, saith he, which preacheth lies, is the taile behind. For as you Friers and Monkes be (like Pharisies) diuided in your outward apparell and vsages, so make yée diuision among the people. And thus, you with such other, are the very naturall members of Antichrist.

Then said he vnto them all: Christ saith in his Gospell, Woe vnto you Scribes and Pharisies, Hypocrites; for yée close vp the kingdome of heauen before men, neither enter yée in your selues, nor yet suffer any other that would enter into it, but yée stop vp the waies thereunto with your owne traditions, and therefore are yée the household of Antichrist; yée will not permit Gods veritie to haue passage, nor yet to be taught of his true ministers, fearing to haue your wickednesse reproued. But by such flatterers as vphold you in your mischiefes, yée suffer the common people most miserably to be seduced.

Then said the Archbishop: By our Lady sir, there shal none such preach within any dioces (and God wil,) nor yet in my iurisdiction (if I may know it) as either maketh diuision, or yet dissension among the poore commons.

The lord Cobham said: Both Christ and his Apostles were accused of sedition making, yet were they most peaceable men. Both Daniel and Christ prophecied that such a troublous time should come, as hath not béene yet since the worlds beginning. And this prophecie is partly fulfilled in your daies and doings; for many haue yée slaine alreadie, and more will yée slay hereafter, if God fulfill not his promise. Christ saith also, if those daies of yours were not shortned, scarcely should any fleth be saued: therefore looke for it iustly, for God will shorten your daies. Moreouer, though Priests and Deacons for preaching of Gods word, and for ministring the sacraments, with prouision for the poore, be grounded on Gods law, yet haue these other sects no maner of ground hereof, so farre as I haue read.

Then a Doctor of law, called master John Kempe, plucked out of his bosome a copy of the bill which they had afore sent him into the tower, by the Archbishops counsell, thinking therby to make shorter worke with him. For they were so amazed with his answeres (not all vnlike to them which disputed with Stephen) that they knew not well how to occupie the time, their wits and sophistrie (as God would) so failed them that day.

My Lord Cobham (saith this Doctor) we must briefely know your minde concerning these foure points here following. The first of them is this: And then he read vpon the bill: The faith and determination of holy Church touching the blessed sacrament of the altar is this: That after the sacramentall words be once spoken of a Priest in his masse, the materiall bread that was before bread, is turned into Christs very body: and the materiall wine is turned into Christs bloud. And so there remaineth in the sacrament of the altar from thencefoorth no materiall bread nor materiall wine, which were there before the sacramentall words were spoken. Sir beléeue yée not this?

The lord Cobham said: This is not my beliefe. But my faith is (as I said to you afore) that in the worshipfull sacrament of the altar, is Christs very bodie in forme of bread.

Then said the Archbishop: sir John yée must say otherwise.

The lord Cobham said: Nay, that I shall not, if God be vpon my side (as I trust he is,) but that there is Christs body in forme of bread, as the common beliefe is.

Then read the doctour againe.

The second point is this: Holy church hath determined, that euery Christian man liuing héere bodily vpon earth, ought to be shriuen of a Priest ordained by the church, if he may come to him. Sir what say you to this?

The lord Cobham answered and said: A diseased or sore wounded man, hath need to haue a sure wise Chirurgian and a true, knowing both the ground and the danger of the same: Most necessarie were it therefore to be first shriuen vnto God which only knoweth our diseases, and can helpe vs. I denie not in this the going to a priest, if he be a man of good life and learning: For the lawes of God are to be required of the priest, which is godly learned. But if he be an idiote, or a man of vitious liuing that is my Curate, I ought rather to flie from him then to séeke vnto him: For sooner might I catch euill of him that is naught, then any goodnesse towards my soules health.

Confession of sinne to God onely.

Malachi. 2.

Then read the doctour againe.

The third point is this: Christ ordained S. Peter the Apostle to be his vicar héere in earth, whose sea is the church of Rome. And he granted that the same power which he gaue vnto Peter, should succéed to all Peters successours, which we call now Popes of Rome. By whose spectall power in churches particular, be ordained prelates and Archbishops, parsons, curates, and other degrees more, vnto whom Christian men ought to obey after the lawes of the church of Rome. This is the determination of holy church. Sir beléeue yée not this?

The third article.

To this he answered and said: He that followeth Peter most nighest in pure liuing, is nert vnto him in succession: But your Lordly order estéemeth not greatly the lowly behauiour of poore Peter, what soeuer yée prate of him. Neither care yée greatly for the humble maners of them that succéeded him, till the time of Siluester, which for the more part were Martyrs, as I told you before. Yée can let all their good conditions goe by you, and not hurt your selues with them at all. All the world knoweth this wel enough by you, and yet yée can make boast of Peter.

Who is nert vnto Peter.

Succession not of place but of conditions, maketh Peters heire.

With that, one of the other doctors asked him; Then what do yée say of the Pope?

The lord Cobham answered: As I said before: He and you together maketh whole the great Antichrist. Of whom he is the great head, you bishops, priests, prelates, and monkes are the body, and the begging friers are the taile, for they couer the filthinesse of you both with their subtile sophistrie: Neither will I in conscience obey any of you all, till I sée you with Peter follow Christ in conuersation.

Antichrists head, bodie, and taile.

Then read the doctor againe.

The fourth point is this: Holy church hath determined, that it is meritorious to a christian man, to goe on pilgrimage to holy places, and there specially to worship the holy reliques and images of Saints, Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, and all other Saints besides, approued by the church of Rome. Sir what say yée to this?

The fourth article. Pilgrimage.

Whereunto he answered: I owe them no seruice by any commandement of God, and therefore I minde not to séeke them for your couetousnesse. It were best ye swept them faire from cop webs and dust, and so laid them vp for catching of scathe: or else to burie them faire in the ground as ye doe other aged people which are Gods images.

What is to be done with Images.

It is a wonderfull thing, that Saints now being dead, should become so couetous and needy, and thereupon so bitterly beg, which all their life time hated all couetousnesse and begging. But this I say vnto you, & I would all the world should marke it, that with your shrines and idols, your fained absolutions and pardons, yée draw vnto you the substance, wealth, and chiefe pleasures of all christian Realmes.

Saints are become now couetous beggers.

Why sir (said one of the clerkes) will ye not worship good images?

A whelpe of the same haire.

What worship should I giue vnto them? said the lord Cobham.

Images not to be worshipped.

Then said Frier Palmer vnto him: Sir, will ye worship the crosse of Christ, that he died vpon?

Where is it, said the lord Cobham?

The Frier said: I put you the case sir, that it were heere euen now before you.

The lord Cobham answered: This is a great wise man, to put me an earnest question of a thing, and yet he himselfe knoweth not where the thing it selfe is. Yet once againe I aske you, what worship I should doe vnto it?

The crosse, whether it is to be worshipped.

A clerke said vnto him: Such worship as Paul speaketh of, and that is this: God forbid that I should ioy, but only in the crosse of Jesu Christ.

Galat. 6.

Then said the Lord Cobham, & spread his armes abroad: This is a very crosse, yea, and so much better then your crosse of wood, in that it was created of God: Yet will not I séeke to haue it worshipped.

Then said the Bishop of London: Sir, yée wote well that he died on a materiall crosse.

The lord Cobham said: Yea, and I wote also that our saluation came not in by that materiall crosse, but alone by him which died thereupon. And well I wote, that holy Saint Paul reioiced in none other crosse, but in Christs passion and death only, and in his owne sufferings of like persecution with him, for the selfesame veritie that he had suffered for afore.

The materiall crosse is not materiall to our faith. What it is to reioice in the crosse of Christ.

Another clerke yet asked him: Will yée then doe none honour to the holy crosse?

He answered him: Yes, if it were mine owne, I would lay him vp honestly, and see vnto him that he should take no more more scath abroad, nor be robbed of his goods, as he is now a daies.

Slandered with the truth.

Then said the archbishop vnto him: Sir John, ye haue spoken heere manie wonderfull words to the slanderous rebuke of the whole spiritualtie, giuing a great euill example vnto the common sort heere, to haue vs in the more disdaine. Much time haue we spent heere about you, and all in vaine so far as I can see. Well, we must now be at this short point with you, for the day passeth away: Ye must otherwise submit your selfe to the ordinance of holie church, or else throw your selfe (no remedie) into most deepe danger. See to it in time, for anon it will be else to late.

These men seeme to stand only vpon their estimation amongst the people.

The lord Cobham said, I know not to what purpose I should otherwise submit me. Much more haue you offended me, then euer I offended you, in thus troubling me before this multitude.

A wolfish offer of gentlenesse.

Then said the archbishop againe vnto him, We once againe require to remember your selfe well, and to haue none other manner opinion in these matters, then the vniuersall faith and belefe of the holie church of Rome is. And so like an obedient child returne againe to the vnitie of your mother. See to it I say in time, for yet ye may haue remedie, whereas anon it will be to late.

The lord Cobham said erpresse before them all; I will none otherwise beleeue in these points, then that I haue told you here afore. Do with me what ye will.

Bloodie murtherers.

Finallie, then the archbishop said; Well, then I see none other but we must needs do the law: we must proceed forth to the sentence definitiue, and both iudge you, and condemne you for an heretike.

And with that, the archbishop stood vp, and read there a bill of his condemnation, all the clergie and lattie hailing their bonets. And this was the tenor thereof.

¶ The definitiue sentence of his condemnation.

Suffered of God as a plague.

An heretike for confessing of Christ.

IN the name of God: So be it. We Thomas by the sufferance of God, archbishop of Canturburie, Metropolitan, and primate of all England, and legat from the apostolike See of Rome, willeth this to be knowne vnto all men. In a certaine cause of heresie and vpon diuers articles, whereupon sir Iohn Oldcastle knight, and lord Cobham, after a diligent inquisition made for the same, was detected, accused, and presented before vs in our last conuocation of all our prouince of Canturburie, holden in the cathedrall church of Pauls at London: At the lawfull denouncement and request of our vniuersall clergie in the said conuocation, we proceeded against him according to the law (God to witnesse) with all the fauour possible. And following Christs example in all that we might, which willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he be conuerted and liue: we tooke vpon vs to correct him, and sought all other waies possible to bring him againe to the churches vnitie, declaring vnto him what the holy and vniuersall church of Rome hath said, holden, determined, and taught in that behalfe. And though we found him in the catholike faith farre wide, and so stifnecked, that he would not confesse his error, nor purge himselfe, nor yet repent him thereof: We yet pitying him of fatherlie compassion, and entirely desiring the health of his soule, appointed him a competent time of deliberation, to see if hee would repent and seeke to be reformed: but since that time we haue found him worse and worse. Considering therefore, that he is not corrigible, we are driuen to the verie extremitie of the law, and with great heauinesse of heart, we now proceed to the publication of the sentence definitiue, against him.

Ezech. 18. Ezech. 35.

The wolfe would appeare charitable.

See, if they shew not themselues.

¶ Then brought he forth another bill, containing the said sentence, and that he read also in his beggerlie Latine. Christi nomine inuocato, ipsumq; solum præ oculis habentes. Quia per acta inactitata, and so forth. Which I haue also translated into English, that men may vnderstand it.

Ex magno processu Thomæ Arundeli.

¶ Christ we take vnto witnesse, that nothing else we seeke in this our whole enterprise, but his only glorie. For as much as we haue found by diuers acts done, brought forth and exhibited by sundrie euidences, signes and tokens, and also by manie most manifest proofes, the said sir Iohn Oldcastle knight, and lord Cobham, not only to be an euident heretike in his owne person, but also a mightie maintainer of other heretikes against the faith and religion of the holie and vniuersall church of Rome: namely about the two Sacraments (of the altar, and of penance) besides the popes power, and pilgrimages: And that hee as the child of iniquitie and darknesse, hath so hardened his heart, that he will in no case attend vnto the voice of his pastor: Neither will he be allured by strait admonishments, nor yet be brought in by fauourable words: The worthinesse of the cause first weighed on the one side, and his vnworthinesse againe considered on the other side, his faults also aggrauated or made double through his damnable obstinacie (wee being loth that he which is nought should be worse, and so with his contagiousnesse infect the multitude) by the sage counsell and assent of the very discreet fathers, our honorable brethren and lords, bishops heere present, Richard of London, Henrie of Winchester, and Bennet of Bangor, and of other great learned and wise men heere, both doctors of diuinitie, and of the lawes canon and ciuill, seculars and religious, with diuers other expert men assisting vs: we sententially and definitiuely by this present writing, iudge, declare and condemne the said sir Iohn Oldcastle, knight, and lord Cobham, for a most pernicious and detestable heretike, conuicted vpon the same, and refusing vtterly to obey the church againe, committing him heere from henceforth as a condemned heretike to the secular iurisdiction, power and iudgement, to do him thereupon to death. Furthermore, we excommunicate and denounce accursed, not onlie this heretike heere present, but so many else besides, as shall hereafter in fauour of his error, either receiue him or defend him, counsell him or helpe him, or any other way maintaine him: as verie fautors, receiuers, defenders, counsellers, aiders, and maintainers of condemned heretikes.

As Caiphas did Christ.

Christ is condemned in his faithfull members.

And that these premisses, may be the better knowne of all faithfull christian men: we commit it here vnto your charges, and giue you strait commandement thereupon by this writing also: That ye cause this condemnation and definitiue sentence of excommunication, concerning both this heretike and his fautors; to bee published throughout all dioceses, in cities, townes and villages by your curats and parish priests, at such times as they shall haue most recourse of people. And see that it be done after this sort: As the people are thus gathered deuoutly together, let the curat euerie where goe into the pulpit, and there open, declare, and expound, this excesse in the mother tongue, in an audible and intelligible voice, that it may be perceiued of all men: and that vpon the feare of this declaration also, the people may fall from their euill opinions conceiued now of late by seditious preachers. Moreouer we will, that after wee haue deliuered vnto each one of you bishops which are heere present, a copie hereof, that ye cause the same to be written out againe into diuers copies, and to be sent vnto the other bishops and prelats of our whole prouince, that they may also see the contens thereof solemnely published within their dioceses and cures. Finally, we will that both you and they signifie againe vnto vs seriously and distinctly by your writings as the matter is, without fained colour in euerie point performed; the day whereon ye receiued this processe, the time when it was of vs executed, and after what sort it was done in euerie condition, according to the tenour hereof; that we may know it to be iustly the same.

How spirituall these fathers are.

Keepe the sepulchre neuer so much, yet Christ will rise.

None office left vndone pertaining to Antichrist.

What care is heere to hold vp their popery?

A copie of this writing sent Thomas Arundell the archbishop of Canturburie afterward from Maidstone the tenth day of October, within the same yeere of our Lord 1413. vnto Richard Clifford the bishop of London, which thus beginneth: Thomas permissione diuina, &c.

Tho. Walden. in fasciculo Zizaniorum Wicleui.

The said Richard Clifford sent another copie thereof, enclosed within his owne letters, vnto Robert Waschall a Carmelite frier, which was then bishop of Hereford in Wales, written from Haddam the 23. day of October in the same yeere, and the beginning thereof is this: Reuerende in Christo pater, &c.

Richard Clifford.

This Robert Waschall directed another copie thereof from London the 27. day of Nouember in the same yeere, inclosed in his owne commission also, vnto his archdeacon and deanes in Hereford and Shrewsburie. And this is thereof the beginning: Venerabilibus & discretis viris, &c. In like manner did the other bishops within their dioceses.

Robert Waschall.

After that the archbishop had thus read the bill of his condemnation, with most extremitie before the whole multitude; the lord Cobham said with a most cheerefull countenance: Though ye iudge my bodie which is but a wretched thing, yet am I certaine and sure, that ye can do no harme to my soule, no more then could Satan vpon the soule of Iob. He that created that, will of his infinite mercie and promise saue it, I haue therein no maner of doubt. And as concerning these articles before rehearsed, I will stand to them euen to the verie death, by the grace of my eternall God.

Matth. 10. Iob 1.

And therewith he turned him vnto the people, calling his hands abroad, and saying with a verie loude voice: Good christian people, for Gods loue be well ware of these men, for they will else beguile you, and lead you blindling into hell with themselues. For Christ saith plainly vnto you: If one blind man leadeth another, they are like both to fall into the ditch.

Matth. 15.

After this, he fell downe there vpon his knees, and thus before them all prayed for his enemies, holding vp both his hands and his eies towards heauen and saying: Lord God eternall, I beseech thee of thy great mercies sake, to forgiue my pursuers, if it be thy blessed will. And then he was deliuered to sir Robert Morlie, and so led forth againe to the tower of London. And thus was there an end of that daies worke.

He prayeth for his enemies.

While the lord Cobham was thus in the Tower, he sent out priuilie vnto his friends. And they at his request wrote this little bill heere following, causing it to be set vp in diuers quarters of London, that the people should not beleeue the slanders and lies that his enemies the bishops seruants and priests had made on him abroad. And thus was the letter.

and slandered among the common people by his aduersaries, that he should otherwise both thinke and speake of the Sacraments of the church, and specially of the blessed Sacrament of the altar, then was written in the confession of his beliefe, which was indented and taken to the clergie, and so set vp in diuers open places in the citie of London: knowne be it heere to all the world, that he (neuer since) varied in any point therefro, but this is plainlie his beliefe, that all the sacraments of the church be profitable and expedient also to all them that shall be saued, taking them after the intent that Christ and his true church hath ordained. Furthermore he beleeueth, that the blessed sacrament of the altar is verilie and truly Christs bodie in forme of bread.

To stop lying lips. A rehearsall of his belieke. In forme of bread, but not without bread he meaneth.

After this, the bishops and prelats were in much great discredit both with the nobilitie and commons, partlie for that they had so cruelly handled the good lord Cobham: and partlie againe, because his opinion (as they thought at that time) was perfect concerning the sacrament. The prelats feared this to grow to further inconuenience towards them both waies, wherefore they drew their heads together, and at the last consented to vse another practise somewhat contrarie to that they had done afore. They caused it by and by to be blowne abroad by their fed seruants, friends, and babling sir Johns, that the said lord Cobham was becomen a good man, and had lowlie submitted himselfe in all things vnto holy church, vtterly changing his opinion concerning the sacrament. And thereupon, they counterfeited an abiuration in his name, that the people should take no hold of that opinion by any thing they had heard of him before, and so to stand the more in awe of them, considering him so great a man, and by them subdued.

The clergie in hate of the people. A practise of false prelats. These are their common feats.

This is the abiuration (say they) of sir John Oldcastle knight, sometime the lord Cobham.

Walden. in fasciculo zizaniorum Wicleui.

IN Dei nomine: Amen. I John Oldcastle denounced, detected and conuicted, of and vpon diuers articles sauouring both heresie and errour, before the reuerend father in Christ and my good lord, Thomas by the permission of God, lord archbishop of Canturburie, and my lawfull and rightfull iudge in that behalfe, expresselie grant and confesse, that as concerning the estate and power of the most holy father the pope of Rome, of his archbishops, his bishops, and his other prelats, the degrees of the church, and the holy sacraments of the same, specially of the sacraments of the altar, of penance, and other obseruances besides of our mother holie church, as pilgrimages and pardons: I affirme (I saie) before the said reuerend father archbishop and elsewhere, that I being euill seduced by diuers seditious preachers, haue grieuoulie erred, and hereticallie persisted, blasphemoulie answered, and obstinatelie rebelled. And therefore I am by the said reuerend father, before the reuerend fathers in Christ also, the bishops of London, Winchester, and Bangor, lawfullie condemned for an hereticke.

Marke from whence this geare commeth. Fine workmanship I trow.

Neuertheless, yet I now remembring my selfe, and coueting by this meane to auoid that temporall paine which I am worthie to suffer as an heretike, at the assignation of my most excellent christian prince and liege lord, king Henrie the fifth, now by the grace of God most worthie king both of England and of France: minding also to preferre the wholesome determination, sentence and doctrine of the holie vniuersall church of Rome, before the vnwholesome opinions of my selfe, my teachers, & my followers, I freelie, willinglie, deliberatelie, and throughlie confesse, grant, and affirme, that the most holie fathers in Christ, Saint Peter the Apostle and his successors bishops of Rome, specially now at this time, my most blessed lord pope John, by the permission of God, the three and twentith pope of that name, which now holdeth Peters seat (and each of them in their succession) hath full strength and power to be Christs vicar in earth, and the head of the church militant. And that by the strength of his office (what though he be a great sinner, and afore knowne of God to be damned:) he hath full authoritie and power to rule and gouerne, bind and lose, saue and destroy, accurse and assoyle all other christian men.

Alas good man thou art slandered.

And agreeably still vnto this, I confesse, grant, and affirme all other archbishops, bishops, and prelats in their prouinces, diocesse, and parishes (appointed by the said pope of Rome, to assist him in his doings or businesse) by his decrees, canons, or vertue of his office; to haue had in times past, to haue now at this time, and that they ought to haue in time to come, authoritie and power to rule and to gouerne, bind and lose, accurse and assoyle the subiects or people of their aforesaid prouinces, diocesse, and parishes, and that their said subiects or people ought of right in all things to obey them. Furthermore, I confesse, grant, and affirme, that the said spirituall fathers, as our most holie father the pope, archbishops, bishops, and prelats, haue had, haue now, and ought to haue hereafter, authoritie and power for the estate, order and gouernance of their subiects or people, to make lawes, decrees, statutes and constitutions, yea and to publish, command, and compell their said subiects and people to the obseruation of them.

How prone ye that by the Scriptures?

Moreouer, I confesse, grant, and affirme, that all these foresaid lawes, decrees, statutes and constitutions made, published and commanded, according to the forme of spirituall law, all christian people, and euerie man in himselfe is straitly bound to obserue, and meekelie to obey, according to the diuersitie of the foresaid powers. As the lawes, statutes, canons and constitutions of our most holie father the pope, incorporated in his Decrees, Decretals, Clementines, Codes, Charts, Rescripts, Sextiles, and Extrauagants ouer all the world: and as the prouinciall statutes of archbishops in their prouinces, the Synodall acts of bishops in their diocesse, and the commendable rules and customes of prelats in their Colledges, and curats in their parishes, all christian people are both bound to obserue, and also most meekelie to obey. Ouer and besides all this, I John Oldcastle vtterlie forsaking and renouncing all the aforesaid errors and heresies, & all other errors and heresies like vnto them, lay my hand here vpon this booke or holie Euangelie of God, and sweare, that I shall neuer more from henceforth hold these aforesaid heresies, nor yet anie other like vnto them wittinglie. Neither shall I giue counsell, aid, helpe, nor fauour at anie time, to them that shall hold, teach, affirme, or maintaine the same, as God shall helpe me, and these holie Euangelies.

No Scripture haue they to shew. Intollerable pokes lay they. Neuer made he such an oath.

And that I shall from henceforth faithfully obey and inuiolablie obserue all the holie lawes, statutes, canons, and constitutions of all the popes of Rome, archbishops, bishops, and prelats, as are contained and determined in their holie Decrees, Decretals, Clementines, Codes, Charts, Rescripts, Sextiles, Summs papall, Extrauagants, statutes prouinciall, acts synodall, & other ordinarie regules and customes constituted by them, or that shall chance hereafter directlie to be determined or made. To these and all such other, will I my selfe with all power possiblie applie. Besides all this, the penance which it shall please my said reuerend father the lord archbishop of Canturburie hereafter to enioyne me for my sinnes, I will meekelie obey and faithfullie fulfill. Finallie, all my seducers and false teachers, and all other besides, whom I shall hereafter know suspected of heresie or errors, I shall effectuallie present, or cause to be presented vnto my said reuerend father, lord archbishop, or to them which haue his authoritie, so soone as I can conuenientlie do it, and see that they be corrected to my vttermost power and clergie: that it was almoſt impoſſible to amend the hole of our Lords coat which was without ſeame, but that firſt of all certaine nobles of the realme, which are authors, fauourers, protectors, defenders, and receiuers of theſe heretikes called Lollards, were ſharpely rebuked, and if need were by the cenſures of the church, and the helpe of the ſecular power, they be reuoked from their errors. And afterward hauing made diligent inquiſition in the conuocation amongſt the proctors of the clergie and others which were there in great number out of euery dioceſſe of our prouince: it was found out amongſt others, that ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle knight, was and is the principall receiuer, fauourer, protector and defender of them, and that ſpecially in the dioceſſe of London, Rocheſter, and Hereford, he hath ſent the ſaid Lollards to preach, not being licenced by the ordinaries and biſhops of the dioceſſe or places, contrary to the prouinciall conſtitutions in that behalfe made, and hath been preſent at their wicked ſermons, grieuouſly puniſhing with threatnings, terrors, and the power of the ſecular ſword, ſuch as did withſtand him: alleaging and affirming amongſt others, that we and our fellow brethren, Suffragans of our prouinces, had not, neither haue any power to make any ſuch conſtitutions. Alſo he hath holden, and doth hold opinion, and teach as touching the Sacraments of the altar, of penance, of pilgrimage, of the worſhipping of Saints, and of the keyes, contrarie to that which the vniuerſall church of Rome doth teach and affirme.

A thing thought right neceſſarie that the lord Cobham ſhould be made out of the way, or elſe not poſſible for papiſtrie to flouriſh.

Wherefore, on the behalfe of the ſaid prelats, and clergie, we were then required that we would vouchſafe to proceed againſt the ſaid ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle vpon the premiſſes. Notwithſtanding, for the reuerence of our lord the king, in whoſe fauour the ſaid ſir Iohn at that preſent was, and no leſſe alſo for honor of his knighthood: we with our fellow brethren, and ſuffragans then preſent, with a great part of the clergie of our prouince, comming perſonallie before the preſence of our lord the king, being then at his Manor of Kenington, put vp againſt the ſaid ſir Iohn, a complaint, and partlie reciting the defaults of the ſaid ſir Iohn. But at the requeſt of our lord the king, we deſiring to reduce the ſaid ſir Iohn to the vnitie of the church, without any reproch, we deferred all the execution of the premiſſes for a great time. But at the laſt, for ſo much as our ſaid lord the king, after his great trauels taken about the conuerſion of him, did nothing at all profit, as our ſaid lord the king vouchſafed to certifie vs both by word and writing: Wee immediatlie decreed to call forth the ſaid ſir Iohn perſonally to anſwere before vs at a certaine time alreadie paſſed, in and vpon the premiſſes, and ſent our meſſengers with theſe our letters of citation to the ſaid ſir Iohn, then being at his caſtle of Cowling, vnto the which meſſenger we gaue commandement that he ſhould in no caſe go into the caſtle, except he were licenſed. But by the meane of one Iohn Butler, porter of the kings chamber, he ſhould require the ſaid ſir Iohn, that he would either licenſe the ſaid meſſenger to come into the caſtle, or that he would cite him, or at the leaſt that he would ſuffer himſelfe to be cited without his caſtle. The which ſir Iohn openly anſwered vnto the ſaid Iohn Butler, declaring the premiſſes vnto him on the behalfe of our lord the king: that hee would by no meanes be cited, neither in anie caſe ſuffer his citation. Then we being certified of the premiſſes, lawfully proceeded further.

Sir Iohn Oldcaſtle in fauour with the king.

First, hauing faithfull report made vnto vs, that he could not be apprehended by perſonall citation, we decreed to cite him by an edict, to be openly ſet vp in the porches of the cathedrall church of Rocheſter next vnto him, little more then three Engliſh miles diſtant from the ſaid caſtle of Cowling. As we had thus cauſed him to be cited, and our edict aforeſaid to bee publikely and openly ſet vpon the porches of the ſaid church, that he ſhould perſonally appeare before vs the eleuenth day of September laſt paſt to anſwere vnto the premiſſes, and certaine other things concerning hereſie: The which day being come, wee ſitting in the tribunall ſeat in our greater chapell within the caſtle of Leeds of our dioceſſe, the which we then inhabited, and where as we then kept reſidence with our court, and hauing taken an oth which is requiſite in the premiſſes, and the information by vs heard and receiued, as the common report goeth: In the parts where as the ſaid ſir Iohn dwelleth (fortifying himſelfe in his ſaid caſtle, defending his opinions manifoldlie, contemning the keyes of the church and the archbiſhops power:) We therefore cauſed the ſaid ſir Iohn cited, as is aforeſaid, to be openly with a loud voice called by the crier: and ſo being called, long looked for, and by no meanes appearing, we iudged him (as he was no leſſe worthie) obſtinate, and for puniſhment of his ſaid obſtinacie, we did then and there excommunicat him. And for ſo much as by the order of the premiſſes, and other euident tokens of his doings, we vnderſtand that the ſaid ſir Iohn for the defence of his error doth fortifie himſelfe, as is aforeſaid, againſt the keyes of the church, by pretence whereof, a vehement ſuſpition of hereſie and ſchiſme riſeth againſt him: We haue decreed, if he may be apprehended, againe perſonally to cite him, or elſe, as before, by an edict, that he ſhould appeare before vs the Saturday next after the feaſt of Saint Matthew the Apoſtle and Euangeliſt next comming, to ſhew ſome reaſonable cauſe if he can, why we ſhould not proceed againſt him, to more grieuous puniſhment, as an open heretick, ſchiſmatike, and open enemie of the vniuerſall church. And perſonally to declare why he ſhould not be pronounced ſuch a one, or that the aid of the ſecular power ſhould not be ſolemnely required againſt him. And further to anſwere, do, and receiue as touching the premiſſes, whatſoeuer iuſtice ſhall require. The which time being come, that is to ſay, the Saturday next after the feaſt of Saint Matthew being the 24. day of September, ſir Robert Morley knight, Lieftenant of the tower of London, appeared perſonally before vs, ſitting in the chapter-houſe of the church of Saint Paul at London, with our reuerend fellow brethren and lords, Richard by the grace of God biſhop of London, and Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter, and brought with him ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle knight, and ſet him before vs (for a little before he was taken by the kings ſeruants, and caſt into the Tower:) vnto which ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle ſo perſonally preſent, we rehearſed all the order of the proceſſe, as it is contained in the acts of the day before paſſed, with good and modeſt words and gentle meanes: That is to ſay, how he the ſaid ſir Iohn was detected and accuſed in the conuocation of the prelats and clergie of our ſaid prouince, as is aforeſaid, vpon the articles before rehearſed, and how he was cited, and for his contumacie excommunicat. And when we were come to that point, we offered our ſelues readie to abſolue him. Notwithſtanding, the ſaid ſir Iohn, not regarding our offer, ſaid, that he would willingly rehearſe before vs, and my ſaid fellow brethren, the faith which he held and affirmed. So he hauing his deſire, and obtaining licence, tooke out of his boſome a certaine Schedule indented, and there openly read the contents of the ſame, and deliuered the ſame Schedule vnto vs, and the Schedule of the articles whereupon he was examined, which was as in forme following.

The lord Cobham excommunicates.

The lord Cobham caſt into the Tower.

The teares of the Crocodile.

Popiſh abſolution neglected.

❧ The catholike faith and confeſſion of the lord Cobham.

I John Oldcaſtle knight, Lord of Cobham, deſire to make manifeſt vnto all chriſtians, and God to be taken to witneſſe, that I neuer thought otherwiſe or would thinke otherwiſe (by Gods helpe) then with a ſtedfaſt and vndoubted faith to embrace all thoſe his Sacraments which he hath inſtituted for the vſe of his church.

The Sacrament of the altar.

Furthermore, that I may the more plainly declare my mind in theſe foure points of my faith: Firſt of all I beleeue the Sacrament of the altar to be the bodie of Chriſt vnder the forme of bread, the verie ſame bodie which was borne of his mother Marie, crucified for vs, dead and buried, roſe againe the third day, ſitteth on the right hand of his immortall father, now being a triumphant partaker with him of his eternall glorie.

Of penance.

Then as touching the Sacrament of penance, this is my beliefe, that I do thinke the correction of a ſinfull life to be moſt neceſſarie for all ſuch as deſire to be ſaued, and that they ought to take vpon them ſuch repentance of their former life by true confeſſion, vnfained contrition, and lawfull ſatisfaction, as the word of God doth preſcribe vnto vs: otherwiſe, there will be no hope of ſaluation.

Of images.

Thirdly, as touching images, this is my opinion, that I do iudge them no point of faith, but brought into the world after the faith of Chriſt by the ſufferance of the church, and ſo growne in vſe, that they might ſerue for a kalendar for the lay people and ignorant. By the beholding whereof they might the better call to remembrance the godly examples and martyrdome of Chriſt and other holy men: but if any man doe otherwiſe abuſe this repreſentation, and giue the reuerence vnto thoſe images, which is due vnto the holy men whom they repreſent, or rather vnto him whom the holy men themſelues giue all their honor, ſetting all their truſt and hope in them which ought to be referred vnto God: or if they be ſo affected toward the dumbe images, that they be in any behalfe addict vnto them, either be more addicted vnto one Saint then another, in my mind they do little differ from idolatrie, grieuouſly offending againſt God the author of all honor.

Laſt of all, I am thus perſwaded, that there be no inhabitants heere in earth, but that we ſhall paſſe ſtraight either to life or puniſhment: for whoſoeuer doth ſo order his life that he ſtumble at the commandements of God, which either he knoweth not, or he will not be taught them, it is but in vaine for him to looke for ſaluation, although he ran ouer all the corners of the world. Contrariwiſe, he which obſerueth his commandements cannot perith, although in all his life time he walked no pilgrimage, neither to Rome, Canturburie, nor Compoſtella, or to any other place, whither as the common people are accuſtomed to walke.

This Schedule with the articles therein contained being read (as is aforeſaid) by the ſaid ſir John, we with our fellow brethren aforeſaid, and many other doctors and learned men had conference vpon the ſame, and at the laſt by the counſel and conſent of them, we ſpake theſe words following vnto the ſaid ſir John there preſent. Behold ſir John, there are many good and catholike things contained in this ſchedule. But you haue this time to anſwere vnto other matters which ſauor of errors and hereſies. Whereunto, by the contents of this ſchedule, it is not fully answered, and therefore you must answere thereunto, and more plainelie expresse and declare your faith and opinions as touching those points in the same bill. That is to say, whether you hold, beleeue and affirme, that in the Sacrament of the altar, after the consecration rightlie done, there remaineth materiall bread or not.

See whether these men picke quarels where they need not.

Item, whether you hold, beleeue and affirme, that it is necessarie in the Sacrament of penance for a man to confesse his sinnes vnto a priest appointed by the church.

The which articles in this maner delivered vnto him, amongst manie other things he answered plainelie, that he would make no other declaration or answere thereunto then was contained in the said Schedule. Whereupon we favoring the said sir John, with benigne and gentle means we spake vnto him in this manner. Sir John take heed, for if you doe not plainly answere to these things, which are obiected against you within a lawful time now granted you by the Judges, we may declare you to be an heretike: but the said sir John persevered as before, and would make no other answere. Consequentlie notwithstanding, we together with our said fellow brethren, and others of our counsell take advice, and by their counsell declared vnto the said sir John Oldcastle, that the said holy church of Rome in this matter following the saying of blessed S. Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose and other holie men, hath determined, the which determinations euery catholike ought to observe.

Here is no mention made of the word of God.

Whereupon the said sir John answered, that he would beleeue and observe whatsoeuer the holy church determined, and whatsoeuer God would he should observe and beleeue. But that he would in no case affirme that our lord the pope, the cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, or other prelats of the church haue anie power to determine any such matters. Whereunto, we yet favouring him, vnder hope of better aduisement, promised the said sir John, that we would give him in writing certaine determinations vpon the matter aforesaid, whereunto he should more plainly answere, written in Latine, & for his better vnderstanding translated into English: whereupon we commanded, and heartily desired him, that against monday next following, he should give a plaine and full answere; the which determinations we caused to be translated the same day, and to be deliuered vnto him the Sunday next following. The tenor of which determinations here follow in this maner.

Wolues clothed in sheeps skins.

The faith and determination of the holy church vpon the holy Sacrament of the altar is this: That after the consecration done in the Masse by the priest, the materiall bread shall be changed into the materiall bodie of Christ, and the materiall wine into the materiall blood of Christ; therefore after the consecration there remaineth no more any substance of bread and wine, which was there before. What doe you answere to this article?

The summe of the popish belefe.

Confession.

Also the holy church hath determined, that euery christian dwelling vpon earth, ought to confesse his sinnes vnto a priest ordained by the church, if he may come vnto him. How thinke you by this article?

Christ ordained S. Peter his Vicar in earth, whose seat is in the church of Rome, giving and granting the same authoritie which he gaue vnto Peter, also to his successours which are now called popes of Rome, in whose power it is to ordaine and institute prelats in particular churches, as archbishops, bishops, curats and other ecclesiasticall orders, vnto whom the christian people owe obedience, according to the tradition of the church of Rome. This is the determination of the holie church. What thinke you by this article?

Besides this, the holy church hath determined, that it is necessarie for euery christian to go on pilgrimage to holy places, and there specially to worship the holy reliques of the apostles, martyrs, confessors, and all saints, whomsoeuer the church of Rome hath allowed. What thinke you of this article?

Pilgrimage.

Upon which monday being the 25. day of the said moneth of September before vs and our fellow brethren aforesaid, hauing also taken vnto vs our reuerend brother, Benedict by the grace of God, bishop of Bangor, and by our commandement our counsellers and ministers, master Henrie Ware officiall of our court of Canturburie, Philip Morgan Doctor of both lawes, Howel Kiffin Doctor of the decretals, John Kemp, and William Carlton, doctors of law, John Witnam, Thomas Palmer, Robert Wombewell, John Withe, and Robert Chamberlaine, Richard Dotington, and Thomas Walden, professors of Diuinitie: Also James Cole, and John Steuens our notaries appointed on this behalfe. They all and euerie one being sworne vpon the holy Gospell of God, laying their hands vpon the booke, that they should giue their faithful counsell in, and vpon the matter aforesaid, and in euery such cause, and to the whole world. By and by appeared sir Robert Morley knight, Lieutenant of the tower of London, and brought with him the foresaid sir John Oldcastle, setting him before vs. Vnto whom, we gently and familiarly rehearsed the acts of the day before passed. And as before we told him that he both is and was excommunicate, requiring and intreating him that hee would desire and receiue in due forme the absolution of the church. Vnto whom the said sir John then and there plainly answered, that in this behalfe he would require no absolution at our hands, but only of God. Then afterward by gentle and soft meanes we desired and required him to make plaine answere vnto the articles which were laid against him. And first of all, as touching the Sacrament of the altar. To the which article, besides other things he answered and said thus: That as Christ being here on earth had in him both Godhead and manhood: notwithstanding, the Godhead was couered and inuisible vnder the humanitie, the which was manifest and visible in him: so likewise in the Sacrament of the altar there is the verie bodie and verie bread, bread which we do see, the bodie of Christ hidden vnder the same which we do not see. And plainly denied, that the faith as touching the said Sacrament determined by the Romish church and holy Doctors, and sent vnto him by vs in the said Schedule, to be the determination of the holy church. But if it be the determination of the church, he said that it was done contrarie vnto the Scriptures, after the church was endowed, and that poison was powred into the church, and not afore. Also, as touching the Sacrament of penance and confession, he plainly said and affirmed then and there, that if any man were in any grieuous sinne, out of the which he knew not how to rise, it were expedient and good for him to go vnto some holy and discreet priest to take counsell of him: But that he should confesse his sin to any proper priest, or to any other, although he might haue the vse of him, it is not necessarie to saluation, for so much as by only contrition such sinne can be wiped away, and the sinner himselfe purged. As concerning the worshipping of the crosse, he said and affirmed, that the only bodie of Christ which did hang vpon the crosse is to be worshipped. For so much as that bodie alone was and is the crosse, which is to be worshipped.

The Sacrament both body and bread in diuers respects.

How confession is to be allowed.

And being demanded what honor he would do vnto the image of the crosse: Hee answered by expresse words that hee would only do it that honor that he would make it cleane and lay it vp safe. As touching the power and authoritie of the keies, the archbishops, bishops and other prelats, he said that the pope is very Antichrist, that is, the head; the archbishops, bishops, and other prelats to be his members, and the friers to be his taile. The which pope, archbishops and bishops, a man ought not to obey, but so far forth as they be followers of Christ and of Peter, in their life, maners, and conuersation, and that he is the successor of Peter, which is best and purest in life and maners. Furthermore, the said sir John spreading his hands, with a loud voice said thus to those which stood about him: These men which iudge and would condemne me, will seduce you all and themselues, and will lead you vnto hell; therefore take heed of them. When he had spoken those words, we againe as oftentimes before with lamentable countenance, spake vnto the said sir John, exhorting him with as gentle words as wee might, that he would returne to the vnitie of the church, to beleeue and hold that which the church of Rome doth beleeue and hold. Who expresly answered that he would not beleeue or hold otherwise then he had before declared. Wherefore, we perceiuing, as it appeared by him, that we could not preuaile, at the last with bitternesse of heart, we proceeded to the pronouncing of a definitiue sentence in this maner.

What honor is to be done to the crosse.

The pope is Antichrist, the bishops are his members, and friers his taile.

The bold talke of the lord Cobham.

¶ In the name of God, Amen: We Thomas by the permission of God archbishop and humble minister of the holy church of Canturburie, primat of all England, and legat of the apostolike see, in a certaine cause or matter of heresie vpon certaine articles, whereupon sir Iohn Oldcastle knight, lord Cobham, before vs in the last conuocation of our clergie of our prouince of Canturburie, holden in the church of S. Paul in London after diligent inquisition thereupon made, was detected and accused, and by our said prouince notoriously and openly defamed. At the request of the whole clergie aforesaid thereupon made vnto vs in the said conuocation, with al fauor possible that we might (God we take to witnesse) lawfully proceeding against him, following the footsteps and example of Christ, which would not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be conuerted and liue, we haue indeuoured by all waies and meanes we might or could to reforme him, and rather reduce him to the vnitie of the church, declaring vnto him what the holy vniuersall church of Rome doth teach, hold and determine in this behalfe. And albeit that we found him wandring astray from the Catholike faith, and so stubborne and stifnecked, that he would not confesse his error or cleare himselfe therof, to detest the same; Notwithstanding, we fauouring him with a fatherly affection, and hartily wishing and desiring his preseruation, prefixed him a certaine competent time to deliberate with himselfe, and if he would, to repent and reforme himselfe. And last of all, for so much as we perceiued him to be vnreasonable, obseruing chieflie those things which by the law are required in this behalfe, with great sorow and bitternes of heart, we proceeded to the pronouncing of the definitiue sentence in this manner.

They call themselues humble which rule ouer kings, and exercise the tyrannie of the world.

Following Christs footsteps cleane contrarie.

The vniuersall church, meaning by a figure the part for the whole.

The name of Christ being called vpon, setting him onlie before our eyes. For so much as by acts enacted, signes exhibited, euidences and diuers tokens, besides sundrie kind of proofes, we find the said sir Iohn to be, and haue been an heretike, and a follower of heretikes in the faith, and obseruation of the sacred vniuersall church of Rome, and specially as touching the sacraments of the Eucharist and of penance. And that as the sonne of iniquitie and darknesse hee hath so hardened his heart, that hee will not vnderstand the voice of his shepheard, neither neither wil be allured with his monitions, or couerted with any faire speech. Hauing first of all searched and sought out, and diligently considering the merits of the cause aforesaid, and of the said sir Iohn, his deserts and faults aggrauated through his damnable obstinacie: Not willing that hee that is wicked, should become more wicked and infect other with his contagion, by the counsell and consent of the reuerend men of profound wisdome and discretion, our brethren the lords, Richard bishop of London, Henrie bishop of Winchester, and Benedict bishop of Bangor, and also of many other doctors of diuinitie, the decretals and ciuill law, and of many other religious and learned persons our assistants; we haue iudged and declared sententially, and definitiuely condemned the said sir Iohn Oldcastle knight, lord Cobham, being conuict in and vpon that most detestable guilt, not willing penitently to returne vnto the vnitie of the Church, and in those things which the sacred vniuersall Church of Rome doth hold, teach, determine, and shew forth. And specially as one erring in the articles aboue written, leauing him from henceforth as an heretick vnto the secular iudgement.

Like will to like.

So did the Phærisies deliuer Christ vnto Pilate.

Moreouer, we haue excommunicated, and by these writings doe pronounce and excommunicate him as an heretike, and all other which from henceforth in fauour of his error, shall receiue, defend, or giue him counsell, or fauour, or helpe him in this behalfe, as fauourers, defenders, and receiuers of heretikes. And to the intent that these premises may be knowne vnto all faithfull Christians, we charge and command you, that by your sentence definitiue you doe cause the Curates which are vnder you, with a loud and audible voice in their Churches, when as most people is present, in their mother tongue, through al your cities and diocesse to publish and declare the said sir Iohn Oldcastle as is before said, to be by vs condemned as an heretick, schismaticke, and one erring in the articles aboue said: and all other which from henceforth in fauour of his errors shall receiue or defend him, giuing him any counsell, comfort, or fauor in this behalfe, to bee excommunicate as receiuers, fauourers, and defenders of heretikes: As is more effectually contained in the proces. That by such meanes the erroneous opinions of the people (which peraduenture hath otherwise conceiued the matter) by those declarations of the truth, how the matter is, may be cut off. The which thing also we will and command to bee written and signified by you, word for word, vnto al our fellow brethren: that they all may manifest, publish, and declare throughout all their cities and diocesse, the manner and forme of this our processe, and also the sentence by vs giuen, and all other singuler the contents in the same. And likewise cause it to bee published by their Curates which are vnder them as touching the day of the receit of these presents, and what you haue done in the premisses, how you and they haue executed this our commandement. We will that you and they duly and distinctly certifie vs the businesse being done, by you and their letters patents, according to this tenour. Dated in our manor of Maidstone, the 10. of October an. 1413. and in the 18. yeere of our translation.

Thus haue you here the iudiciall processe of the bishops against this most noble christian knight, described by their owne letters and stile. After all this, the sentence of death being giuen, the lord Cobham was sent away, sir Robert Morley carrying him againe vnto the tower: where as after he had remained a certaine space, in the night season, (it is not knowne by what meanes) he escaped out and fled into Wales, where as he continued by the space of foure yeeres.

Sir Robert Morley.

The lord Cobham returned againe to the tower.

A defence of the Lord Cobham, against Nicolas Harpsfield, set out vnder the name of Alanus Copus.

AS I was entring into this storie of the lord Cobham, after the tractation of all the former histories hitherto passed, hauing nert to set vpon this present matter, luckilie, and as God would, in such opportunitie of season, as may seeme, God to worke himselfe for defence of his Saints; commeth to my hands a certaine booke of new found dialogues, compiled in Latine by Nicolas Harpsfield, set out by Alanus Copus, an English man, a person to me vnknowne, and obscure hitherto vnto the world, but now to purchase himselfe a name with Erostratus, or with the sonnes of Enachim, commeth out not with his fiue egges, but with his fire railing dialogues. In the which dialogues the said Alanus Copus Anglus (whether hee vnder the armor of other, or other vnder title of his name, I know not, nor passe not) vncourteously behauing himself, intemperately abusing his time, studie, and pen, forgetting himselfe, neglecting all respect of honestie, and milde modestie, neither dreading the stroke of God, nor passing for shame, neither fauouring the liuing, nor sparing the dead, who being alius as they neuer offended him, so now cannot answere for themselues being gone: thus prouoking both God and man against him, after an vnseemely sort, and with a foule mouth, and a stinking breath, rageth and fareth against dead mens ashes, taking now the spoile of their good name, after their bodies lie slaine in the field. His gall and choler being so bitter against them, that he cannot abide any memorie after them to remaine vpon earth. In so much that for the hatred of them, he spurneth also against me, and fleeth in my face, for that in my Acts and Monuments, describing the history of the church, I would say any thing in the fauor of them, whom the Romish Catholikes haue so vnmercifully put to death. The answer to whose booke although it would require a seuerall tractation by it selfe (as if Christ grant space and leisure, hereafter it shall not be forgotten) yet because such opportunitie of the booke is offered to me at this present comming now to the matter of the lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton and other, with whom he first beginneth to quarrell, it shall be requisite a little by the way to cope with this Cope, what soeuer he be, so much as truth shall giue me for their defence to say something. And here to cut off all the offalles of his railing talke and vnhonest rebukes, which I leaue to scolds and men of his profession against they list to braule, let vs briefly and quietly consider the matter, for discussing of the truth. Wherein first I shall desire the Reader with equalitie and indifferencie to heare both the parties to speake, as well what the Martyrs hence gone and slaine could say for themselues, if they were present, as also what this man here doth obiect against them now being gone. And so according to the same to iudge both vpon them as they deserue, and of me as they shall please.

Answere to Alanus Copus.

Indifferencie of the reader craued.

Now to the scope of maister Copes matter, which is this: whether this foresaid sir Iohn Oldcastle, lord Cobham (first to begin with him) is rather to be commended for a Martyr, or to be reproued for a traitor. And whether that I in writing of him, and of Sir Roger Acton, with other moe in my former edition, haue dealt fraudulently, and corruptly in commending them in these Acts and Monuments or no. Touching the discussion whereof, first I trust the gentle maister Cope my friend, neither will, nor well can deny any part of all that hitherto, touching the storie of the lord Cobham, hath been premised; who yet all this while was neither traitor to his countrie, nor rebell to his prince, as by the course of his history hitherto the reader may well vnderstand. First, in the time of king Henry the fourth, hee was sent ouer to France to the duke of Orliance; he did obey. Afterward king Henry the fift, comming to the crowne, he was of him likewise well liked and fauoured, vntill the time that Thomas Arundell with his clergy complaining to the king, made bate betweene them. Then the lord Cobham being cited by the archbishop, at his citation would not appeare. But sent for by the king, he obeied and came. Being come, what lowly subiection he shewed there to the king, the pag. 514. declareth. After he yeelded an obedient confession of his faith; it would not be receiued. Then did he appeale to the bishop of Rome, for the which the king tooke great displeasure with him, and so was he repealed by the king to the archbishop, and committed to the tower; which also he did obey. From thence he was brought to his examination once or twice: there like a constant martyr, and witnesse of the truth, hee stood to his confession, and that vnto the very sentence of death defined against him. If this be not the effect of a true Martyr, let Alanus Copus say what he will, or what he can: This I say, at least I doubt, whether the said Alanus Copus Anglus, put to the like triall himselfe, would venture so narrow a point of martyrdome for his religion, as this Christian knight did for his. Certes it hath not yet appeared.

Whether the lord Cobham be to be iudged a traitor or a martyr.

The lord Cobham true and obedient to king Henry the 4.

The lord Cobham in the beginning fauoured of king Henry the 5.

The kings displeasure procured against the lord Cobham by popish prelates.

The lord Cobham obedient to the king.

The lord Cobham constant in his faith to the sentence of death.

To proceede, after this deadly sentence was thus awarded against him, the said lord Cobham was then returned againe vnto the tower; which he with patience and meekenesse did also obey: from the which tower if hee afterward by the lords prouidence did escape, whether hath Alanus Copus, herein more to praise God for offering to him the benefit, or to blame the man for taking that which was offered. What catholike in all Louen hauing his house ouer his head on fire, will not be glad to haue if he might, the doore set open to flee the perill: or else why did Alanus Copus flie his countrie, hauing so little need, if this man, bleeding almost vnder the butchers axe, might not enioy so great an offer of so luckie deliuerance?

Thus hitherto I trust, the cause of the lord Cobham standeth firme and strong against all danger of iust reprehension. Who being (as ye haue heard) so faithfull and obedient to God: so submisse to his king: so sound in his doctrine: so constant in his cause: so affected for the truth: so readie and prepared to death: as we haue sufficiently declared, not out of vncertaine and doubtfull chronicles, but out of the true originals and instruments remaining in ancient records: What lacketh now or what should let to the contrarie, but that he declaring himselfe such a martyr, that is, a witnes to the veritie (for the which also at last hee suffered the fire) may therefore worthily be crowned with the title of a martyr, which is in Greeke as much as a witnesse bearer.

But here now steppeth in dame Nasbia, with her colen scold Alecto, &c. who neither learning to hold her tongue, nor yet to speake well, must needs find here a knot in a rush, and beginning now to quarrell inferreth thus: But after (saith hee) that the lord Cobham was escaped out of the tower, his fellowes and confederates conuented themselues together, seditiously against the king, and against their countrie. A great crime no doubt maister Cope, if it be true; so if it be not true, the greater blame returneth vnto your selfe, so to enter this action tion of such slander, vnlesse the ground whereupon yée stand, be sure. First, what fellowes of the lord Cobham were these you meane of? Sir Roger Acton yée say, master Browne and J. Beuerly, with 36. other hanged and burned in the said field of S. Giles. A maruellous matter, that such a great multitude of 20000. specified in storie, should rise against the king, and yet but 3. persons only knowne and named. Then to proceede further, I would aske of master Cope what was the end of this conspiracie, to rebell against the king, to destroy their countrie, and to subuert the Christian faith, for so purporteth the storie. As like true the one as the other. For euen as it is like, that they being Turkes, went about to destroy the faith of Christ wherein they died, and to subuert their country wherein they were bred: euen so like it is that they went about to destroy the king, whom God and their conscience taught to obey.

Sir Roger Acton knight, maister John Browne esquire, John Beuerley preacher.

Yet further procéedeth this summe promoter in his accusation, and saith moreouer: that these foresaid fellowes and adherents of the lord Cobham, were in the field assembled and there incamped in a great number against the king: and how is this prooued? by Robert Fabian. Which appeareth to be as true, as that which in the said Robert Fabian followeth, in the same place where affirmeth that John Cledon, and Richard Turmin, were burnt in the same yéere, being 1413. When indéed by the true Registers, they were not burnt before the yéere of our Lord, 1415. But what will maister Cope say, if the originall copie of the inditement of these pretensed conspirators do testifie, that they were not there assembled or present in the field as your accusation pretendeth? But they purposed (will you say) and intended to come. The purpose and intent of a mans mind is hard for you and me to iudge, where as no fact appeareth. But giue their intent was so to come: Yet might they not come to those thickets néere to the field of S. Giles, hauing Beuerley their preacher with them (as yée say your selfe) as well to pray and to preach in that woodly place, as to fight? Is this such a strange thing in the Church of Christ, in time of persecution, for Christians to resort in desolate woods, and secret thickets, from the sight of enemies, when they would assemble in praying and hearing the word of God? In Quéene Maries time was not the same colour of treason obiected against George Egle and other moe, for frequenting and vsing into backsides and fields, and suffered for that, whereof hee was innocent and guiltlesse? Did not Adam Damlipe die in like case of treason, for hauing a French crowne giuen him, at his departure out of Rome, by Cardinal Pole? What cannot cankred Calumnia inuent, when she is disposed to cauill? It was not the Cardinals crowne that made him a traitour, but it was the hatred of his preaching, that stirred vp the accuser.

Robert Fabian proued with an vntruth.

An vntruth in Alanus Copus.

Praying and preaching in back corners, a common thing in time of persecution.

Ill will taketh all things to worst meaning.

In France what assemblies haue there been in late yéeres of good and innocent Christians, congregating together in backe fields and couerts in great routs to heare the preaching of Gods holy word, and to pray: yea and not without their weapon also, for their owne safegard, and yet neuer intended nor minded any rebellion against their king? Wherefore in cases of Religion it may and doth happen many times that such congregations may méet without intent of any treason ment. But howsoeuer the intent and purpose was of these foresaid confederates of the L. Cobham, whither to come, or what to do (séeing this is plaine by records, as is aforesaid, that they were not yet come vnto the place) how will master Cope now iustifie his words, so confidently affirming, that they were there assembled seditiously together in the field of Saint Giles against the king? And marke here I beséech thée (gently Reader) how vnlikely and vntidely the points of this tale are tied and hang together (I wil not say without all substance of truth, but without all fashion of a cleanly lie); wherein these accusers in this matter séeme to me, to lacke some part of Sinons art, in conueying their narration so vnartificially. First (say they) the king was come first with his garrison, vnto the field of S. Giles. And then after the king was there incamped, consequently the fellowes of the lord Cobham (the captaine being away) came and were assembled in the said field where the king was, against the king: and yet not knowing of the king, to the number of xx. thousand: and yet neuer a stroke in that field giuen. And furthermore of all this xx. thousand aforesaid, neuer a mans name knowne, but onely three, to wit, sir Roger Acton, sir John Browne, and John Beuerley, a preacher. How this geare is clampered together let the Reader iudge, and beléeue as he séeth cause.

An vnlikely tale.

But giue all this to be true, although by no demonstration it can be proued, yet by the popes dispensation (which in this earth is almost omnipotent) be it granted: that after the king had taken S. Giles field before, the companions of the L. Cobham afterward comming and assembling in the thickets néere to the said field, to fight seditiously against the king, against their countrie, and against the faith of Christ, to the number of xx. thousand, where no stroke being giuen, so many were taken, that all the prisons of London were full, and yet neuer a mans name knowne of all this multitude, but onlie three: All this, I say, being imagined to be true, then followeth to be demanded of M. Cope, whether the Lord Cobham was here present with this company in the field, or not? Not in person (saith Cope) but with his mind and with his counsell hee was present, and addeth this reason, saying: And therefore he being brought againe, after his escape, was conuict both of treason and heresie, and therefore sustaining a double punishment was both hanged and burnt for the same, &c. And how is all this proued? By Robert Fabian, he saith: Whereunto briefly I answer, that Robert Fabian in that place maketh no such mention of the lord Cobham assisting or consenting to them either in mind or in counsell. His words be these: That certaine adherents of Sir John Oldcastle assembled in the field néere to S. Giles, in great number: of whom was sir Roger Acton, sir John Browne, and John Beuerley. The which with 36. moe in number were after conuict of heresie and treason, and for the same were hanged and burnt, within the said field of S. Giles, &c. Thus much in Fabiã touching the commotion and condemnation of these men: but that the lord Cobham, was there present with them in any part, either of consent or counsell, as Alanus Copus Anglus pretendeth, that is not found in Fabian but is added of his liberall cornu copiæ, whereof he is so copious and plentifull, that he may kéepe an open shop of such vnwritten vntruths, which he may afford very good cheap I think, being such a plentifull artificer.

The lord Cobham no traitor.

Alanus Copus pag. 833. lin. 1.

Alanus Copus taken with an other vntruth.

But here will be obiected against me the words of the statute made the second yéere of king Henry the fift, whereupon this aduersarie triumphing with no little glorie, ὡσπερ πεῖσμα περίκειται, thinketh himselfe to haue double vantage against me: first, in proouing these foresaid complices and adherents of the L. Cobham, to haue made insurrection against the king, and so to be traitors. Secondly, in conuicting that to be vntrue, where as in my former booke of Acts and Monuments I doe report: how that after the death of sir Roger Acton, of Browne and Beuerley, a Parliament was holden at Leicester, where a statute was made to this effect: that all and singuler, such as were of Wickliffes learning, if they would not giue ouer (as in case of felony and other trespasses, losing all their goods to the king) should suffer death in two maner of kinds, that is, they should first be hanged for treason against the king, and then be burned for heresie against God.

Ex statut. Reg. Hen. 5. an. 2. cap. 7.

The former edition of Acts and Monu. pag. 175.

Whereupon, remaineth now in examining this obiection and answering to the same, that I purge both them of treason, and my selfe of vntruth, so far as truth and fidelitie in Gods cause shall assist me herein. Albeit in beginning first my history of ecclesiastical matters, wherein I hauing nothing to do with debatement of causes iudicial, but only following the simple narration of things done and executed; neuer suspected that euer any would be so captious with me, or so nice nosed, as to presse me with such narrow points of the law, in trying and discussing euery cause and matter so exactly, and straining (as yée would say) the bowels of the statute law so rigorously against me. Yet for so much as I am thereunto constrained now by this aduersarie, I will first lay open all the whole statute made the second yéere of this foresaid Henrie the fifth, after the death of the foresaid sir Roger Acton and his fellowes, at the Parliament holden at Leicester, an. 1415. That done, I will note vpon the words thereof, so as by the circumstances of the same may appeare what is to be concluded, either for the defence of their innocencie, or for the accusation of this aduersarie. The tenor and purport of the statute here vnder ensueth.

The words and contents of the statute made an. 2. Henrici 5. cap. 7.

The preface or preamble of the statute.

FOr so much as great (A) rumors, congregations, and insurrections here in England by diuers of the king his maiesties léege people haue bin made here of late, as well by those which were of the sect of heresie called Lollardie, as by other of their confederation, excitations, and abetment: to the intent (B) to adnull and subuert the christian faith and the law of God within the same Realme, as also to (C) destroy our soueraigne lord the king himselfe, and (D) all manner of estates of the same his Realme, as well spirituall as temporall (E) and also all maner policy, and the lawes of the land: Finally the same our Lord the king, to the honour of God, in conseruation and fortification of the Christian faith, and also in saluation of his royall estate, and of the estate of all his Realme, willing to prouide a more open and more due punishment against the malice of such heretikes and Lollards, then hath been had or vsed in that case heretofore, so that for the feare of the same lawes and punishment, such heresies and Lollardies may the rather cease in time to come.

Here it appeareth at whose sute and supplication this statute was set forward, as also the cause why.

By the aduice and assent aforesaid, and at the prayer of the said commons hath ordained and established: that especiallie the Chancellor, the Treasurer, the Iustice of the one bench and of the other, Iustices of Assise, Iustices of peace, Sheriffes, Maiors, and Bailiffes of cities and townes, and all other officers, hauing the gouernment of people either now present or which for the time shall be, doe make an oth in taking of their charge and offices, to extend their whole paine and diligence, to put out, to doe to put out, cease and destroy, all manner of heresies and errors commonly called Lollardies within the places in which they exercise their charges and offices, from time to time, with all their power: and that they assist, fauor, and maintaine the ordinaries and their commissaries so often as they or any of them shall be thereunto required by the said ordinaries or their commissaries: So that the said officers and ministers, when they trauell or ride to arrest any Lollard, or to make any assistance at the (F) instance and request of the ordinaries or their commissaries, by vertue of this statute: that the same ordinaries and commissaries doe (G) pay for their costs reasonably. And that the seruices of the king (vnto whom the officers be first sworne) be preferred before all other statutes for the libertie of holy Church and the ministers of the same: And especially for the correction and punishment of hereticks and Lollards, made before these daies and not repealed, but being in their force. And also that all persons conuict of heresie, of whatsoeuer estate, condition or degree they be, by the said ordinaries or their commissaries left vnto the secular power according to the lawes of holy Church, shall lese and forfeite all their lands and tenements, which they haue in fee simple, in manner and forme as followeth: That is to say, that the king shall haue all the lands and tenements, which the said conuicts haue in fee simple and which be immediatlie holden of him, as forfeited: And that the other lords of whom the lands and tenements of such conuicts be holden immediatly, after that the king is thereof seized and answered of the (H) yeere, day, and waste: shall haue liuerie thereof out of the hands of the king of the lands and tenements aforesaid, so of them holden, as hath been vsed in case of attainder of felonies, except the lands and tenements, which be holden of the ordinaries or their commissaries, before whom any such impeached of heresie be conuict, (I) which lands and tenements shall wholly remaine to the king as forfeit. And moreouer, that all the goods and cattels of such conuicted, be forfeit to our right soueraigne lord the king, so that no person conuict of heresie, and left vnto the the secular power (according to the lawes of holie Church) doe forfeit his lands before that hee bee dead. And if any such person so conuicted bee enfeoffed, whether it be by fine, or by deed, or without deed, in lands and tenements, rents, or seruices, in fee or otherwise in whatsoeuer maner, or haue any other possessions or cattels by gift or grant of any person or persons, to the vse of any other then only to the vse of such cõuicts: That the same lands, tenements, rents, nor seruices, nor other such possessions, nor cattels shall not be forfeit vnto our soueraigne lord the king in no manner wise.

And moreouer, that the iustices of the kings bench, the Iustices of peace, and iustices of Assise, haue full power to inquire of all such, which hold any errors or heresies, as Lollards, and who bee their maintainers, receiuers, fautors, and sustainers, common writers of such bookes, as well of their sermons as scholes, conuenticles, congregations and confederacies, and that this clause bee put in the commissions of the Iustices of peace. And if any persons be indited of any points aboue said, that the said Iustices haue power to award against them a Capias, and that the Sheriffe be bound to arrest the person or persons so indited as soone as hee can find them, either by himselfe, or by his officers. And for so much as the cognisance of heresies, errors, or Lollardies, appertaine to the iudges of holie Church, and not vnto the secular Iudges; that such persons indited (K) be deliuered vnto the Ordinaries of the places, or to their commissaries by Indentures betweene them to bee made, within ten daies after their arrest, or sooner if it may bee done, to be thereof acquitted, or conuict by the lawes of holy church in case such persons be not indited of any other thing, the cognisance whereof appertaineth to the iudges and secular officers, in which case after they shall be acquitted, or deliuered before the secular Iudges of such things as appertaineth to the secular iudges, they shall be sent in safe custodie vnto the said Ordinaries, or their commissaries, and to them to be deliuered by Indentures, as is aforesaid, to be acquitted or conuicted of the same heresies, errors and Lollardies, as is aforesaid, according to the lawes of holy Church, and that within the terme abouesaid. Prouided, that the said inditements bee not taken (L) in euidence (L) but only for information before the iudges spirituall, against such persons indited: but that the Ordinaries begin their processe against such persons indited, in the same manner, as though no such iudgement were, hauing no regard to such inditements. And if any bee indited of heresie, error, or Lollardie, and taken by the Sheriffe, or any other officer of the king, he may be let to mainepryse within the said ten daies, by good suretie, for whom the said Sheriffes, or other officers will answere, so that the person so indited bee readie to be deliuered vnto the said Ordinaries, or to their commissaries, before the end of the tenth day aboue here recited, if hee may by any meanes for sicknesse. And that euery Ordinarie haue sufficient commissaries or commissarie, abiding in euery Countie in place notable, so that if any such person indited bee taken, that the said commissaries, or commissarie may bee warned in the notable place of his abiding, by the Sheriffe, or any of his officers to come vnto the kings gaile within the said Countie, there to receiue the same person so indited by Indenture, as is aforesaid: And that in the Inquests in this case taken, the Sheriffes and other officers vnto whom it appertaineth, do impanell good and sufficient persons, not suspected, nor procured, that is to say, such as haue at the least, euery one of them that shall bee so impanelled in such inquests, within the realme, a hundred shillings by the yeere of lands, tenements, or of rent, vpon paine to lese to the kings vse xx. pound. And that those which shall be impanelled vpon such inquests at sessions and gailes, haue euery one of them to the value of xl. shillings by the yeere. And if any such person arrested, whether it be by the Ordinaries, or the officers of the king, (M) either escape or breake prison before hee be thereof acquit before the Ordinarie: that then all his goods and cattels, which hee had at the day of such arrest, shall bee forfeit to the king: And his lands and tenements which he had the same day, be seised also into the kings hands, and that the king haue the profits thereof from the same day vntill he render himselfe to the said prison from whence hee escaped. And that the aforesaid iustices haue full power to enquire of all such escapes and breaking of prisons, and also of the lands, tenements, goods, and cattels of such persons indited. Prouided, that if any such person indited, doe not returne vnto the said prison, and dieth (not being conuict); that then it shall bee lawfull for his heires, to enter into the lands and tenements of his or their ancestor without any other sute made vnto the king for this cause. And that all those which haue liberties, or franchises royall in England, as the County of Chester, the Countie and libertie of Durham, and other like: And also all the lords which haue iurisdictions and franchises roiall in Wales where the kings writs doe not run, haue like power to execute and put in execution in all points, these articles by them or by their officers in like maner, as doe the Iustices and other the kings officers aboue declared. Notes touching the statutes prefixed.

Thus hauing recited the words of the statute, now let vs consider the reasons and obiections of this aduersarie, who grounding peraduenture vpon the preface or preamble of this foresaid statute; will proone thereby the lord Cobham, and sir Roger Acton, with the rest of their abettours, to haue been traitors to their king and their countrie. Whereunto I answere, first in generall, that although the face or preface prefixed before the statute, may shew and declare the cause and occasion originall why the statute was made, yet the making of the statute importeth no necessarie probation of the preface alwaies to bee true that goeth before; which being but a colour to induce the making thereof, giueth no force materiall thereunto, nor is any necessarie part of the body of the said statute: But onelie adhereth as a declaration of the circumstance thereof, and sometime is cleane omitted and differeth much from the substance of the same. For as statutes in ciuill policie most commonlie doe tend to a publike end and are generall; so prefaces before statutes, which most commonly declare the cause or beginning thereof, are priuate: and doe stand onely but vpon particular facts, which either of ill will and displeasure may bee suggested, or by colour may be exaggerated, or for feare may be beleeued, at least suspected, as many suspitions doe oft times rise in princes heads, through false surmises, and malitious complaints of certaine euill disposed about them, whereby many cruell lawes rising vpon a false ground, are promulgate to the ruine of much innocent blood. Example whereof we haue not onlie in this present statute, an. 2. Reg. Hen. 5. but also in the like statute, commonly called the statute Ex officio vel de comburendo, made by this kings father and predecessor, an. 2. Henr. 4. cap. 5. In the preface of which bloudie statute, is contained another like complaint of the prelates and clergie, not so hainous, as also most shamefullie false and vntrue against the poore Lollards, as by the words of the complaint may appeare, beginning; Excellentissimo & Gratiosiss. principi, &c. Wherein, most falsly they slander and misreport the true seruants of Christ to bee Lollards, hereticks, subuerters of the common-wealth, destroyers of the Christian faith, enemies to all good lawes, and to the Church of Christ. The words of which statute proceeding much after the like course as doth this present statute, may easilie bewray the vntruth and false surmise thereof, if thou please (gentle reader) to marke and conferre the words according as they are there to be read and seene, as followeth: Conuenticulas & confœderationes faciunt, scholas tenent & exercent, libros conficiunt atque scribunt, populum nequiter instruunt & informant, & ad seditionem seu insurrectionem excitant, quantum possunt, & magnas dissensiones in populo faciunt, & alia diuersa enormia auditui horrenda in dies perpetrant, in fidei cathol. & ecclesiæ subuersionem, diuinique cultus diminutionem, ac etiam destructionem status, iurium, & libertatum dictæ ecclesiæ Anglic. And after a few words: Ad omnem iuris, & rationis ordinem atque regimen, penitus destruendum &c. He that is or shall bee acquainted with old histories and with the vsuall practises of Satan the old enemie of Christ, from the first beginning of the primitiue Church vnto this present time, shall see this to bee no newes, but a common and (as ye would say) a quotidian feuer among Christs children, to bee bered with false accusations, and cruell slanders.

Memelion the Egyptian, and true martyr of Christ, was he not first accused to be a felon? And when that could not bee proued, he was condemned at the same iudgement for a Christian: and therefore being taken into bands, was scourged, by the Lawes and statutes grounded vpon false causes against the Christians.

To consider the lawes and statutes made by tyrants and Emperors in the first persecutions of the primitiue Church, against the innocent seruants of Christ, and to compare the same with the lawes and statutes in this latter persecution vnder antichrist: a man shall find, that as they agreed all in like crueltie, so was there no great difference in false forging of pretensed causes and crimes deuised. For as then, the Christians were wrongfully accused of the Gentiles for insurrections and rebellions against the emperors and empire, for being enemies to all mankind, for murdering of infants, for worshipping the sunne (because they prayed toward the east) for worshipping also the head of an asse, &c. vide pag.48.34. vpon the rumors wherof, diuers and sundry lawes and statutes were enacted, some engrauen in brasse, some otherwise wrote against them: so in this foresaid statute, an.2.Hen.5.cap.7. also an.2.Hen.4.cap.15. and in such other statutes or inditementes made and conceiued against the Lollards: the case is not so strange, but it may credibly be supposed, that the making therof did rise rather vpon malice and hatred against their religion conceiued, then vpon any iust cause minister of their parts, whom they did wrongfully charge and accuse. Like as in the time of Domitianus, for feare of Dauids stocke, all the nephewes of Iude the lords brother in flesh, were accused to the emperor, pag.33. And also the like feare and hatred stirred vp other Emperours, and the Senat of of Rome, to proceed with persecuting lawes against the Christian flocke of Christ: Euseb.lib.5.cap.21. whereupon, rose vp those malitious slanders, false surmises, infamous lies, and wrongfull accusations against the Christians: so that what crimes soeuer either malice could inuent, or rash suspition could minister, that was imputed against them: vide pag.34.

The persecuting statutes in the primitiue church & of the latter church compared.

Feare and hatred causers of persecution.

Vide supra. pag.34.

Not vnlike also it may seeme, that the pope with his Prelates fearing and mistrusting lest the proceeding of the Gospell preached by these persons should ouerthrow the state of their maiestie: did therefore by sinister accusations inflame the harts of princes against them, and vnder some coloured couert, to shadow their cloked hatred, deuised these and other like crimes which were not true, but which might cleanly serue their purpose.

This hitherto haue I said as in a generall summe, answering to the preamble of the foresaid statute, for the defence of Sir John Oldcastle, and sir Roger Acton, and other, not as defining precisely what was or was not (for here I may say with Hall, that as I was not present at the deed doing, so with him I may also leaue the same at large:) But as one by tracing the footsteps of the truth, as by all coniectures hunting out in this matter, what is most like, would but only say my minde sine strepitu (as lawyers say) & sine figura iudicij.

The matter debated by records, whether the L. Cobham and sir Roger Acton were traytors or not.

Now consequentlie it followeth, that we descend to the speciall points and particulars of the foresaid preamble: to consider what thereof may be collected, or necessarilie is to bee iudged, either for proofe or disproofe, of this foresaid sir John Oldcastle and his fellowes.

A Rumors. Congregatiõs. Insurrections.

(A) And first, where the proeme of this statute beginneth with rumors, congregations, and insurrections, &c. As it is not like, that if these men had intended any forceable entrees or rebellion against the king, they would haue made anie rumors thereof before the deed done: so is it more credible to be supposed, all these flourishes of words to bee but words of course, or of office, and to sauor rather of the rankenesse of the inditers pen, who disposed either per amplificationem rhetoricam to shew his copie, or else per malitiam papisticam, to aggrauate the crime, and to make mountaines of molehils, first of rumors maketh congregations, and from congregations riseth vp to insurrections; whereas in all these rumors, congregations, and insurrections, yet neuer a blow was giuen, neuer a stroke was stricken, no blood spilt, no furniture nor instruments of warre, no signe of battell, yea no expresse signification either of any rebellious word, or malious fact described, neither in records, nor yet in any chronicle. Again, if these rumors were words spoken against the king, as calling him a tyrant, an vsurper of the crowne, the Prince of priests, &c. why then be none of these words expressed in their inditements, or left in Records? Doth M. Cope thinke for a man to be called a traitor, to be enough to make him a traitor, vnlesse some euident proofe be brought for him to bee so in deed, as he is called? Rumors (saith he) congregations and insurrections were made. Rumours are vncertaine: congregations haue been and may be among christian men in dangerous times for good purposes, and no treason against their princes meant. The terme of insurrections may be added ἐν τῷ πλείονι by practise, or surmise of the prelats and pen men, who to bring them the more in hatred of the king, might adde this rather of their owne gentlenesse, then of the others deseruing. Certaine it is and vndoubted, that the prelats in those daies being so mightily inflamed against these Lollards, were not altogether behind for their parts, nor vtterlie idle in this matter, but practised against them what they could, first to bring them into hatred, and then to death.

Examples of which kind of practise among the popish clergie, haue not lacked neither before, nor since. Moreouer, if these men had made such a rebellious insurrection against the king, as is pretended in the preamble before this statute, which were a matter of high treason: how chanceth then, that the whole bodie of the statute following after the said preface or preamble, runneth in all the parts or branches therof both in maner of arrest, of inditement, information, request, allowance of officers, cognisance of ordinaries, of the forefact, &c. vpon cases of heresie and not of treason, as by particular tractation shal be (Christ willing) declared?

Insurrection of the Lollards against the king not likely.

And for so much as these men be so grieuously accused of Alanus copus, for congregating and rising against their king, and the whole realme, if I had so much leasure to defend, as he hath pleasure to diffame: Heere might be demanded of him, to keepe him some further pley (touching this mightie insurrection, where as they came in number twentie thousand against the king) in what order of battell raie they marched, what captaines, vnder-captaines, and petie captaines they had to guide the wings, and to leade the armie: whether they were horsemen, or footmen. If they were horsemen (as is pretensed) what meant they then to resort to the thickets neere to Saint Giles field, which was no meet place for horses to stirre? If they were footmen; how standeth that with the author, which reporteth them to be horsemen? Moreouer, is to be demanded, what ensignes or flagges, what shot, what powder, what armor, weapons, and other furniture of war: also what treasure of money to wage so manie, to the number of twentie thousand, what trumpets, drums, and other noise necessarie for the purpose they had? All these preparations for such an enterprise is requisite and necessarie to bee had. And peraduenture, if truth were well sought, it would be found at length, that in stead of armies and weapon, they were comming onlie with their bookes, and with Beuerlay their preacher, into those thickets. But as I was not there present at the fact (as is before said) so haue I neither certainely to define vpon their case, nor yet master Cope to exclame against them, vnlesse peraduenture he taking an occasion of the time, will thus argue against them: that because it was the hote moneth of Januarie, the 2. day after the Epiphanie, therefore it is like, that sir John Oldcastle with twentie thousand Lollards camped together in the fields in all the heate of the weather, to destroy the king and all the nobles, and to make himselfe Regent of England. And why not as well the king, as Regent of England, seeing all the nobles should haue bene destroyed, and he onely left alone to reigne by himselfe?

(B) A slander of the lord Cobham that he intended to destroy christian faith.

It followeth more in the preamble of the foresaid statute, (B) to adnull, destroy, and subuert the christian faith, and the law of God, and holy church, &c. Yee that was the forger and inuenter of this report (as it appeareth to procede from the prelats) seemeth no cunning Dædalus, nor halfe his crafts master in lying for the whetstone. Better he might haue learned of Sinon in Virgil, more artificially to haue framed and conueied his narration. Which although in no case could sound like any truth, yet some colour of probabilitie should haue beene set vpon it, to giue it some countenance of a like tale. As if he had first declared the lord Cobham, to haue bin before in secret confederacie with the great Turke, or if hee had made him some termagant or Mahound out of Babylonia, or some Herode of Iudea, or some antichrist out of Rome, or some grandpanch epicure of this world: and had shewed, that he had receiued letters from the great Soldan, to fight against the faith of Christ and law of God; then had it appeared somewhat more credible, that the said sir John Oldcastle with his sect of heresie, went about to adnull, destroy, and subuert the christian faith, and law of God within the realme of England, &c.

But now, where will either he or master Cope find men so mad to beleeue, or so ingenious that can imagine this to bee true, that the lord Cobham (being a christian) and so faithfull a christian, would or did euer cogitate in his mind to destroy and adnull the faith of Christ in the realme of England? Whatsoeuer the report of this pursuant or preface saith, I report me vnto the indifferent Reader, how standeth this with any face of truth? That he which before through the reading of Wickliffes workes, had beene so earnestly conuerted to the law of God, who had also approued himselfe such a faithfull seruant of Christ, that for the faith of Christ he being examined and tried before the prelats: pag.518. not onely ventred his life, but stood constant vnto the sentence of death, defined against him; being a condemned and a dead man by law; Et qui quantum tum ad eius deuotionem pertinet & timorē, passus sit, quicquid pati potuit, who had as much as to deuotion & feare appertained, suffered alreadie what he might or could suffer, as Cyprian said by Cornelius. That he (I say) which a little before in the moneth of September, stood so constant in defence of Christs faith, would now in the moneth of Januarie rise to destroy, annull, and subuert Christs faith, and the law of God, and holy church within the realme of England?

How can it be, not like only but possible to be true, that he which neuer denied the faith: which euer confessed the faith so constantly: which was for the same faith condemned: yea and at last also burned for the faith, would euer fight against the faith and law of God, to annull and to subuert it? Let vs proceed yet further, and see when that he should haue so destroyed and annulled the Christian faith and law of God in England, what faith or law then could he, or did he intend to bring into the realme of England: The Turks faith? or the Iewes faith? or the popes faith? or what faith else I pray you? For hee that will be an enemie to the faith of Christ, and will show himselfe friend to no other faith beside, I account him not out of his right faith, but out of his right wits.

(C) The lord Cobham falsly slandered for intending to destroy the king.

(C) And therefore euen as it is true, that Sir John Oldcastle with his confederats and abettours were vp in armes to subuert and extinguish the faith of Christ and law of God in the realme of England: so by the like truth it may be esteemed, that the same persons rose also to destroy their Soueraigne Lord the king and his brethren. First, thankes bee to God, that neither the king, nor any of his brethren had any hurt by him. But his intent, saith the preface, was to destroy his Soueraigne Lord the king. Whereunto I answere, with this interrogatorie, whether his intent was priuilie to haue destroyed him, or by open force of armes? If priuilie, what néedeth then such a great army of xx. thousand men to atchieue that secret feat? Rather I would thinke, that he néeded more the helpe of such as were neere about the king: as some of the kings priuie chamber, or some of his secret counsell: whereof, neither Chronicle nor record doth insinuate any mention. If his intent was openly to inuade the king: You must vnderstand (maister Cope) that to withstand a king in his owne realme, many things are required, long time, great preparation, many friends, great assistance, and aid of kindred, monie, horse, men, armour, and all other things appertaining for the same.

How vnlike it is, that the lord Cobham did rise against the king.

Earle Godwin of Westsaxe, who had married Canutus daughter, being a man both ambitious, and as false a traitor, for all his fire sonnes, and great alliance; yet durst not set vpon king Edward to inuade him within his Realme, although he sought many occasions so to doe, yet neuer durst enterprise openlie, that which his ambition so greedilie presumed vnto: pag. 147.

Examples what an hard matter it is to rise against the king.

In the time of king Henrie the third, Simon Montford earle of Glocester, Gilbert Clare earle of Leicester, Humfry Bone earle of Ferrence, with a great number of lords and barons, thought themselues to haue great right on their sides; yet durst not for all their power openly assaile the king in his Realme, before great debatement and talke first had betweene: pag. 299.

The nobles against king Henry 3.

Likewise what murmuring and grudging was in the realme against king Edward the second, among the peeres and nobles, and also prelats (only Walter bishop of Couentrie except) first for Gauestон, then for the Spencers, at what time Thomas earle of Lancaster, Guido earle of Warwike, with the most part of all other earles and barons concordly consenting together to the displacing first of Gauestон, then of the Spencers, yet neither rashly nor without great feare durst stirre vp warre in the land, or disquiet or vexe the king, but first by all meanes of moderate counsell, and humble petition, thought rather to perswade, then to inuade the king: pag. 337.

The nobles against king Edward 2.

In like maner, and with like grudging minds, in the raigne of king Richard 2. Thomas Woodstocke duke of Glocester the kings vncle, with the earles of Arundell, of Warwicke, and Darby, with the power almost of the whole commons, stood vp in armes against the king: and yet notwithstanding all their power ioyned together, being so great, and their cause seeming to them so reasonable, yet were they not so hardy, straightwaies to flie vpon the king, but by way of Parliament thought to accomplish that which their purpose had conceiued, and so did, without any war striking against the king: pag. 472.

The nobles against king Richard 2.

After king Richard 2. was deposed, and was in prison yet liuing, diuers noble men were greatly inflamed against king Henry the fourth, as Sir John Holland earle of Huntington, Thomas Spencer earle of Glocester, the earles likewise of Kent, and of Salisburie, with Sir John Cheiney and other mo, whereof diuers had been dukes before, and now deposed by king Henry 4. although they had conceiued in their hearts great grudge and malice against the said king Henry: yet had they neither heart nor power openly with mans force to assaile the king, but secretly were compelled to atchieue their conceiued intent, which notwithstanding they could not accomplish. Ex hist. D. Alban.

The nobles against king Henry 4.

Thus, you may see, maister Cope, or else maister Harpsfield, or whatsoeuer ye bee, to gainstand a king, and with open force to encounter with him in his owne land, and in his owne chamber of London, where hee is so sure and strong, what a matter of how great cheuance it is, wherein so many and so great difficulties do lie, the attempt so dangerous, the chances so vncertaine, the furniture of so many things required, that scarce in any kings daies heretofore, any peeres or nobles of the Realme, were they neuer so strongly assisted with power, wit, or counsell, yet either were able, or else well durst euer enterprize vpon the case so dangerous, notwithstanding were they neuer of themselues so farre from all feare of God, and true obedience. And shall we then thinke, or can we imagine (maister Cope) that Sir John Oldcastle, a man so well instructed in the knowledge of Gods word, being but a poore knight by his degree, hauing none of all the peeres and nobles in all the world to ioyne with him, being prisoner in the Tower of London a little before in the moneth of December, could now in the moneth of Januarie, so suddenly, in such an hot season of the yeere start vp an armie of xx. thousand fighting men to inuade the king, to kill two Dukes his brethren, to annull Christian faith, to destroy Gods law, and to subuert holy Church? And why doth not he adde moreouer, to set also all London on fire, and to turne all England into a fish pole? Belike these men which giue out these figments of Sir John Oldcastle, did thinke him to bee one of Deucalions flocke, who casting of stones ouer his shoulder, could by and by make men at his pleasure, or els that he had Cadmus teeth to sow, to make so many harnest men to start vp at once.

The insurrection of the lord Cobham against the king iudged by circumstance.

A rebellion to be of 20. thousand, and yet no countrie to be knowne from whence they came, it is not like.

But let vs consider yet further of these xx. thousand souldiers so suddenly without wages, without victuall, or other prouision congregated together, what they were, from whence, out of what quarter, countrie, or countries they came. In other kings daies, whensoeuer any rebellion is against the king moued by the Commons; as when Jack Straw and Wat Tiler of Kent, and Essex rose in the time of king Richard the 2. When William Mandeuill of Abington, Jacke Cade of Kent, in the time king Henry the 6. In the time of king Henry the 8. when the commotion was of rebels in Lincolneshire, then in Yorkeshire. When in king Edward the 6. time Humfrey Arundell in Deuonshire, Captaine Kyte in Northfolke made stirre against the king, the countrie and parts from whence these rebels did spring, were both noted and also diffamed. In this so traiterous commotion therefore let vs now learne, what men these were, and from what countrie or Countries in all England they came. If they came out of any, let the Chroniclers declare what countries they were. If they came out of none (as none is named) then let them come out of Utopia, where belike this figment was first forged, and inuented. Wherefore seeing neither the countries from whence they came, nor yet the names of any of all these xx. thousand doe appeare that they were either in Chronicle or in record, but remaine altogether vnknowne, I leaue it (gentle Reader) to thy iudgement, to thinke thereupon, as thy wisdome shall leade thee.

Neuer was any rebellion of Commons in England, but the speciall countrie from whence they came was noted and knowne.

(D) Another false report of Sir John Oldcastle, that he intended to kill al manner of estates in the realme.

(D) It followeth more in the foresaid preface: And to destroy all other manner of estates, of the same Realme of England, as well spirituall as temporall, &c. By the course of this preamble it appeareth, that the said Sir John Oldcastle, was a wonderfull cruell tyrant and murderer, who being not yet satisfied with the bloud of the king, nor of the two dukes his brethren, would also make hauocke and sweepestake, of all manner of estates in the realme of England. What, and leaue no manner of estate aliue? No, neither lord spirituall nor temporall, but all together should bee destroyed. And what had all these estates done, thus so miserablie to bee destroyed? Although percase the mode of this man might haue been incensed and kindled against the king, and the lords spirituall, by whom hee had been condemned, as is aforesaid: yet why should all other maner of other estates both spirituall and temporall bee killed? If none of all the estates in England, neither duke, earle, baron, lord, knight, or other gentleman had been his friend, but all his enemies, how then is it like, that he hauing all the estates, peeres, nobles, and gentlemen of the realme against him, and none to stand with him, either could or durst attempt any commotion against the whole power of the land, he being but one gentleman only with sir Roger Acton, and maister Browne left alone? At least, good reason yet would, that those hundred knights should haue been spared out of this bloudy slaughter, whom he offered to produce vnto the king before, for his purgation, pag. 515. And finallie, if this was his purpose, that all these estates both spirituall and temporall should haue been cut downe, what néeded then that he should haue made himselfe a Regent, when hee might as well haue made himselfe a king, or what else hee would, being left then prince alone?

(E) An hard matter to destroy all policie and lawes of a land.

(E) The preamble as it began with vntruth, and continued in the same figure, heaping one vntruth vpon another: so now endeth with another misreport as vntrue as the rest, shewing and declaring, the intent of sir John Oldcastle was also to destroy all manner of policie, and finallie the lawes of the land, &c. We reade of William Conquerer, otherwise named William

William Bastard: who being a puissant duke in his countrie, when that the crowne of England was allotted to him, and he comming ouer with all his peeres, nobles, and barons of his whole land, into this Realme, and had with great difficultie obtained victorie against king Harold: yet to alter and destroy the policie and the lawes of the land, it passed his power. Insomuch that it had not been permitted vnto him to haue proceeded so farre as he did, vnlesse he had first sworne to the nobles of this land, to retaine still the lawes of king Edward, as he found them. And albeit he afterward forswore himselfe, breaking his oth in altering and changing many of the foresaid lawes, yet wild he, nild hee, could not so destroy them all (for the which, much warre and great commotions endured long after in the Realme) but that hee was constrained, and also contented to allow and admit a great part of the said lawes of king Edward, pag. 154. And if he being king and conqueror, with all his strength of Normands and Englishmen about him, was too weak and insufficient to destroy all maner of policie and lawes of this land, which he had conquered: how much lesse then is it to be supposed, ỹ Sir John Oldcastle being but a priuat subiect, and a poore knight, and a condemned prisoner, destitute and forsaken of all lords, earles and barons, who to saue his owne life, had more to do, then he could wel compasse, would either take in hand, or conceiue in his head any such exploit, after the subuersion of Christian faith, and law of God, after the slaughter of the king and all manner of estates, as well spirituall as temporall, in the Realme of England, after the desolation of holy Church, to destroy also all manner of policie, and finally, the lawes of the land? Which monstrous and incredible figment, how true it may seeme to master Cope, or to some other late Chronicles of the like credulitie, I cannot tell: Certainly to me, and as I think to all indifferent readers, it appeareth as true, as is the verse of the Satyre, wherewith it may well be compared:

Nil intra est oleam, nil extra est in nuce duri.

Obiection. But here will be said again perhaps, that the matter of such preambles and prefaces being but pursuants, of statutes, and containing but words of course, to aggranate, and to giue a shew of a thing, which they would haue to seeme more odible to the people, is not so precisely to bee scand or exquisitely to bee stood vpon, as for the ground of a necessarie cale of truth.

Answere. This is it (M. Cope) that I said before, and now do well grant and admit the same, that such preambles or forefaces lined with a non sequitur, containing in them matter but of surmise, and words of course (and rather monsters out of course) and many times rising vpon falle information, are not alwaies in themselues materiall, or necessarie probations in all points to be followed: as appeareth both by this statute, and also by the statute of this kings father, an. 2. Hen. 5. chap. 15. beginning, Excellentissimo, &c. And yet notwithstanding out of these same preambles, and forefronts of statutes, and other inditements, which commonly rising vpon matter of information, run onely vpon words of course, of office, and not vpon simple truth, a great part of our Chroniclers do often take their matter, which they insert into their stories, hauing no respect or examination of circumstances to be compared, but only following bare rumors, or else such words as they see in such fabling prefaces, or inditements expressed. Whereby it commeth so to passe, that the younger Chronicler following the elder, as the blind leading the blind, both together fall into the pit of errour. And you also (master Cope) following the steps of the same, doe seeme likewise to erre together with them, for good fellowship. And thus concerning the face of this statute hitherto sufficiently.

Ex originali statut. Hen. 4. ca. 15.

The reason and cause, how chroniclers oft times be deceiued.

Alanus Copus deceiued by his Chroniclers.

Now let vs consider and discusse in like maner, first the coherence, then the particular contents of the said statute. As touching the which coherence, if it be well examined, a man shall finde almost a Chimera of it. In which neither the head accordeth with the bodie, nor yet the branches of the statute well agree with themselues. Wherein he that was the drawer, or first informer thereof, seemeth to haue forgot his verse and art Poeticall:

Horat. art. Poet.

Atque ita mentitur, sic veris falsa remiscet,
Primum ne medio, medium ne discrepet imo.

For whereas the preface of the statute standeth onely vpon matter of treason, conceiued by false suggestion and wrong information; the bodie of the said statute which should follow vpon the same, runneth only vpõ matter of heresie, pertaining to the ordinaries, as by euery branch thereof may appeare.

(F) The bodie of the statute an. 2. Reg. Hen. 5. ca. 7. examined.

(F) For first where he saith, at the instance and request of the ordinaries or their commissaries, &c. Hereby it appeareth, this to be no cause of treason, nor felonie. For that euery man of dutie is bound, and by the lawes of the realme may arrest and apprehend a traitour, or a felon, if he can: where otherwise by this statute an officer is not bound to arrest him which offendeth in case of this statute, without request made by the ordinaries or their commissaries; and therefore this offence seemeth neither to be treason nor felonie.

(G) Secondly, where it followeth, that the same ordinaries and commissaries doe pay for their costs, &c. This allowance of the officers charges in this sort, proueth this offence neither treason nor felonie.

(H) Thirdly, where the statute willeth the king to bee answered of the peere, day, and waste, &c. by this also is proued the offence not to be treason. Or else in cases of treason, the whole inheritance (I trow, master Cope, speaking as no great skilfull lawyer) is forfait to the prince. (H)

(I) The fourth argument I take out of these words of the statute, whereas such lands and tenements which bee holden of the ordinaries are willed wholly to remaine to the king as forfait, &c. Whereby it is manifest, that the prelates (for their matter of Lollardie onely) were the occasioners and procurers of this statute: and therefore were barred of the benefit of any forfeit rising thereby, as good reason was, they should. And thus it is notorious, that the preface running specially and principally vpon treason, and the statute running altogether vpon points of heresie, doe not well cohere nor ioyne together. (I)

(K) Fiftly, in that such persons indited, shall bee deliuered vnto the ordinaries of the places, &c. it cannot be denied, but that this offence concerneth no maner of treason: forsomuch as ordinaries cannot bee iudges in cases of treason, or felonie, by the lawes of our realme. Bracton, in fine 1. libri. (K)

(L) Sixtly, by the inditements prouided not to be taken in euidence, but only for information, before the iudges spirituall, &c. it is likewise to be noted; to what end these inditements were taken, to wit, only to informe the ordinaries, which cannot be in cases of treason. (L)

(M) Lastly, where it followeth toward the end of the statute touching escape or breaking of prison, &c. by this it may lightly be smelt, whereto all the purpose of this statute driueth, that is, to the speciall escape of the Lord Cobham out of the tower, to this end, to haue his lands and possessions forfeit vnto the king. And yet the same escape of the Lord Cobham in this statute considered, is taken by Master Iustice Stanford in lib. primo of the pleas of the crowne cap. 33. to be an escape of one arrested for heresie, where hee speaketh of the case of the lord Cobham. (M)

Iustice Stanford of the pleas of the crowne, lib. 1. cap. 33.

Moreouer, as touching the parts of this foresaid statute, how will you ioyne these two branches together, whereas in the former part is said, that the lands of such persons conuict, shall be forfait to the king, not before they be dead: And afterward it followeth, that their goods and possessions shall be forfeit at the day of their arrest, to the king. But herein standeth no such great doubt nor matter to be weighed. This is without al doubt, and notoriouslie, euidently, and most manifestlie may appeare, by all the arguments and whole purport of the statute: that as well the preamble and preface thereof, as the whole bodie of the said statute was made, framed, and procured onely by and through the instigation, information, and excitation of the prelates, and the popish clergie, not so much for any treason committed against the king: but onely for feare and hatred of Lollardie, tending against their law, which they more dreaded and abhorred, then euer any treason against the prince. And then to set the king and all the states against them, whereby the more readily to worke their dispatch, they thought it best, and none so compendious a policie, as pretily to ioyne treason together with their Lollardy. Wherein the poore men being once intangled, could no waies escape destruction. Papæ concilium callidum.

The first procurers of this statute.

Practise of prelates to couple treason with heresie.

This M. Cope, haue I said, and say againe, not as one absolutely determining vpon the matter. At the doing whereof as I was not present my selfe, so with your own Hall, I may and do leaue it at large, but as one leading the reader by all coniectures and arguments of probabilitie and of due circumstances, to consider with themselues, what is further to bee thought in these old accustomed practises and procedings of these prelates. Protesting moreouer (M. Cope) in this matter to you, that those Chroniclers which you so much ground vpon, I take them in this matter, neither as witnesses sufficient, nor as iudges competent. Who as they were not themselues present at the deed done, no more then I, but onely following vncertaine rumors, and words of course and office, bringing with them no certaine triall of that which they do affirme, may therein both be deceiued themselues, and also deceiue you, and other which depend vpon them.

And hitherto concerning this statute enough. Out of which statute you see (M. Cope) that neither your Chroniclers, nor you can take any great aduantage, to proue any treason in the lord Cobham or in his fellowes, as hath been hitherto abundantly declared in the premisses.

It remaineth further, that forasmuch as you in your sixth dialogue with your author Edward Hall, do alleage the records Et publica iudicij Acta, to diffame these men for traitors (although what records they be, you bring forth neuer a word) I therefore in their defence doe answere for them, which cannot now answere for themselues. And because you, to accuse them doe mention a certaine record, and yet doe not shew vs what record it is, and peraduenture cannot, if ye would: I haue taken the paines therfore, for the loue of them whom you so hate, to search out such Records, whereby any occasion can be raised against them. And first will declare the commission granted, then the inditement commenced against them.

Alanus Copus pag. 833. lin. 4.

The which commission, and inditement, albeit in countenance stance of words will seeme to minister much suspition against them, to the simple Reader, before he be better acquainted with these subtill dealings and practises of Prelats: yet trusting vpon the goodnesse of the cause, which I see here so fairly and sleightly to be handled, I nothing feare nor doubt, to produce the same out of the records in Latine as they stand: to the intent that when the crafty handling of the aduersaries shall be disclosed, the true simplicitie of the innocent, to the true hearted Reader, shall the more better appeare. The words first of the Commission here follow vnder written: which when thou shalt heare, let them not trouble thy mind, gentle Reader, I beseech thee, before thou vnderstand further, what packing and subtill conueyance lieth couered and hid vnder the same.

In cuius, (B) &c. T. R. apud Westm. (B) x. die Ianuarij. Per ipsum Regem.

By these high and tragicall words in this commission sent downe against the lord Cobham, sir Roger Acton, and their fellowes: it may peraduenture seeme to the ignorant and simple Reader, some hainous crime of treason to rest in them, for conspiring against God, the church, the king and their countrey. But what cannot the ketching practise of the Romish prelats bring about, where they haue once conceiued a malice? Wherefore marueil not (good Reader) at this, nor iudge thou according to the words which thou hearest. But suspend thy iudgement a while, till the matter be more opened vnto thee. Examples of like handling be not so rare, but thou maist some iudge by other times the like also of these. George Egle, of whom mention was made before, did but preach in time of quéene Marie, and yet commission was directed against him, as in case of raising vp a commotion against the quéene. Adam Damlip in Calice did but preach, and the receiuing of one penie crowne two yéeres before at Rome was enough to make him a traytor. In the time of king Henrie the eight one Cingleton chaplaine to quéene Anne, the quéenes Maiesties mother that now is, did but preach the Gospell, moued by zeale (as I haue credible witnesse of his owne scholar that heard him speake it being with him) and yet by vertue of commission it was obiected to him: for raising vp commotion against the king, yea and also for killing of Pakington, and suffered for the same as a traytor. So heere, what matter or marueil is it, if the king incensed, or rather circumuented by the wrong information of the prelats (whom he beléeued) gaue out his commission, against things neuer wrought nor thought?

Examples of diuers falsly accused for treasons.

Wherefore I exhort thée (christian Reader) as I said before, iudge not by and by the truth, by the words of the commission: but iudge the words rather of the commission by the truth. Neither measure thou the line by the stone: but the stone rather by the line. At least yet deferre thy sentence, till both the Commission and the inditement being laid together, thou maist afterward sée and perceiue more, what is to be iudged in the case.

(A) In the meane season marke well these words of the king in this commission, (A) Cum nos plenius informemur, &c. By the which words it is easie to be vnderstood, that the king himselfe had no certaine knowledge thereof, but only by information of others (of bishops no doubt and prelats) and thereupon gaue forth his commission aforesaid. And then how will this stand with our chroniclers and other epitomes and summaries, whom master Cope doth alleage? for if it be certaine that Robert Fabian saith, that the king himselfe being in the field tooke certaine of them, as sir Roger Acton, master Browne, and John Beuerley, and your owne Edward Hall, also and your Epitome agréeth to the same, and saith moreouer that they were brought before the kings presence: Thomas Couper also whom you alleage, addeth further and saith, that the king there by strength did take them:

Our English chronicles examined by the words of the Commission.

I pray you (master Cope) what néeded the king to write this by information, when as he both himselfe was present at the fact, was the taker of them, and a witnesse of the déed? The which and if it be true, that the king heard this but by way of information, how will you then defend your Chronicos & your Epitomas? But herein I will neither greatly sticke with you, nor contend with them: Desiring the Reader this only to beare in mind, the date of this present commission when it was giuen, (B) which is vnderstood to be the tenth day of Ianuarie, and afterward to compare the same with the date of the inditement heere vnder following, which I will (the Lord willing) also hereunto anner, leauing nothing out: yea rather ministring to the aduersaries all maner of helpes, whatsoeuer they can séeke or require for their most aduantage in this matter, to be desired. So sure and confident I am in the innocent cause of these good men, nor fearing whatsoeuer blind malice can cauill against them.

Notes or considerations vpon the inditement and commission aboue prefixed.

(A) The first note concerning the date and day both of the commission and of the verdict of Iurers concurring on one day.

(A) Die Mercurij proximo post festum Epiphaniæ, &c. ¶ First heere is to be noted and considered (good Reader) the day and date of giuing out the commission, and then of the verdict presented by the Iurers, which was both in one day, that is, on the Wednesday next after the Epiphany, in the first yeer of the raigne of king Henrie the fifth, which was the tenth day of the month of Januarie (as the date of the commission saith) an. 1413. after the vse of England, or after the Romish vse, anno 1414. So that after the vse euer we count whether it be anno 1413. or else an. 1414. the Dominicall letter beginning at the first day of Januarie to change, must needs be G. for the yeere, and so necessarily make Wednesday next after the Epiphanie, to be the tenth day of the said moneth of Januarie. Thus then this present Wednesday, which was the tenth day of the moneth, being well noted and borne in mind, on the which day both the commission was directed, and also the verdict presented, let vs now proceed further in the foresaid inditement. It followeth.

(B) Per sacramentum xij. iuratorum extitit præsentatum, &c. ¶ If there had been true dealing in this, the Iurers should haue been named. But it is not like, that there was euer any such inditement found by any Iurers, and therefore they did best, not to name the Iurers, lest they would haue denied this inditement to be their act. It followeth more in processe of the inditement.

(C) The third argument, by making a Regent, the king being not yet gone ouer.

(C) Et dictum Ioan. Oldcastle Regentem Eiusdem regni constituere, &c. ¶ If there were no other argument, this were sufficient to disproue the manifest vntruth of this surmised inditement. When as the king was not yet gone to France, nor determined to go. how could they conspire then to make a Regent? For the king went in July following, viz. the second yeere of his raigne, leauing behind him the queene his mother in law, for Regent; whereby it may be gathered, that this matter was vntruly entred and stollen into the records with an antedate, or else at the least, there appeareth manifest vntruth, that they should conspire to make a Regent, when a Regent was not thought vpon, vnlesse it were already ruine into the heads of the clergie, who shortly after fearing their temporalties (as Caxton saith) perswaded the king to make wars in France. This word Regent therefore procedeth of the secret spirit of the clergie, and maketh the whole matter very suspitious, to be grounded altogether vpon the malice of the clergie, and their vntrue surmises. It followeth moreouer.

(D) The fifth argument by contrarietie.

(D) Quasi gens sine capite in finalem destructionem, &c. ¶ How doth this stand with that goeth before, that they conspired to make a Regent, except you will say that to make a Regent, is to be a people without an head? It followeth:

(E) The sixth argument by the persons vnknowne.

(E) Cum quampluribus rebellibus dicti regis ignotis ad numerum viginti millium hominum, &c. ¶ A strange matter that they should know of the conspiracie of twentie thousand, and yet know of no more names of the rebels, but the lord Cobham only, or one or two mo. And all the rest were ignoti.

(F) The seuenth argument by the vnskilfull penning.

(F) Priuatim insurgentes, &c. ¶ This smelleth of the clergies owne penning, without any great aduice of learned counsell: for otherwise such as had been herein skilfull, would neuer haue put in priuatim insurgentes.

(G) The eight argument by the date and time.

(G) Die Mercurij proximo post festum Epiphaniæ Anno R. R. prædicto, &c. This Wednesday next after the Epiphanie, was the tenth day of the month of Januarie, and the same day when both the conspiracie was put in execution, and the same day when the commission was giuen out to enquire, also when the fact was by inquirie presented. Whereby it may seeme a strange thing that so great a conspiracie knowen beforehand, was not suppressed nor inquired of by any commission but only by a commission bearing date of the same daie, vpon which day by the purport of the inditement, the conspiracie should haue been put in execution, by open rebellion, as it is afforesaid.

(H) The ninth argument by error and wrong naming the Dukes.

(H) Prædictum Dnostrum Regem fratres suos, videl. Thomam Ducem Clarentiæ, Ioannem de Lancastrē, et Humfredum de Lancastre, &c. ¶ If the kings learned counsell had dealt in this inditement, as in case of treason they should haue done, if it had been a matter of truth, they would neuer haue handled it so slenderly, and wrongly, as to name the dukes of Bedford, and of Gloceſter; John of Lancaster, and Hunfrey of Lancaster, who were made dukes in the thirteenth yeere of the raigne of king Henrie the fourth their father, as appeareth by Caxtones chronicle.

(I) The tenth note or argument by the absence of the partie.

(I) Et ibidem versus campum prædictum, modo guerrino arriati proditorie modo insurrectionis, contra ligeantias suas equitauerunt ad debellandum dictum D. nostrum regem, &c. ¶ This is falsified by plaine euidence of histories. And Cope himself confesseth no lesse. For he so saith & confesseth, pag. 833. lin. 12. That sir John Oldcastle was not there in person, but onlie, that his consent and good will was there.

The eleuenth note or argument.

Againe, seeing this equitation or riding toward Saint Giles field was vpon the Wednesday next after the feast of Epiphanie (as in this inditement and processe of outlawrie is aboue testified) which was the tenth day of Januarie, and commission also the same day was charged, and the iurie moreouer impanelled the same day, and yet no Iurer named: Item, the verdict the same day presented; how all these can concur together, and all in one day, let the Reader after he haue well considered the matter, vse his iudgement therein, not only whether it be like, but also whether it be possible.

The twelfth note or argument. The lord Cobham, sir Roger Acton, &c. proued no traitors.

Ouer and beside all this it is to be noted, that if this matter had been truly and duely handled, as touching the treason, then had it not been needful to haue brought sir John Oldcastle into the Parliament house, before the lords to haue had his iudgement. For by the outlawrie (if it had been true) he was attainted, and without any more ado should haue had iudgement in the kings Bench as a traytour. But the chiefe Iustice knowing the handling of the matter, durst not belike enterprise so farre. Wherefore it was deuised, that he should certifie the record into the parliament, which he did together with the bishops sentence filed to the record, which was verie strange.

And thereupon the lords gaue such a iudgement, as was not due for a traytour. For that they gaue no iudgement, that he should be drawen, hanged, and let downe aliue, and then bowelled and quartered, which is the iudgement of a traytour. And albeit the parliament might haue attainted him without anie more adoe: And by the same act of attainder haue ordained a speciall iudgement, as they should thinke good: yet when he was before attainted by the outlawrie, they could not lawfullie varie from the common iudgement of treason. At least how could or should the iudgement of Sir Roger Acton, maister Browne, and John Beuerley, who were iudged in the Guildhall before and without the parliament, varie from the said common iudgement of Traytours, if they had truelie committed, and been conuicted of such high treason?

The thirteenth note or argument.

Adde this moreouer to the foresaid notes: that if sir John Oldcastle after his escape out of prison, had been culpable and so attainted of that high treason, whereby his lands had been immediatly forfeit vnto the king by the processe of his outlawrie: What needed the king then in the second yeere of his raigne, in the parliament after holden at Leicester, haue made that prouiso to haue his land forfeit to him by vertue of parliament, vpon his escape on the day of his arrest: when as the lands and cattel of his had been forfeit before, by the processe of the outlawrie, as is before specified?

Thus you see (maister Cope) how little aduantage you can wrest out of this commission and enditement against the lord Cobham and his fellowes, to proue them traytours. And admit the said lord Cobham was attainted of treason by the act, and that the king, the lords, and the commons assented to the Act: yet it bindeth not in such sort (as if in deed he were no traitour) that any may not by search of the truth vtter and set forth sincerely and iustly the very true cause whereby his death hapt and followed.

Answere to the allegations of Fabian, Polydore, and Hall, &c.

¶ Thus then hauing sufficiently cleared the lord Cobham and his partners, from all that you can obiect vnto them out of records and statutes: let vs now come to your English chronicles, wherewith you seeme to presse me, and to oppresse them, whom ye name to be Robert Fabian, Edward Hall, Polydor Virgilius, Thomas Cooper, Richard Grafton, with other briefe Epitomes and Summaries, &c. Concerning which authors, as I haue not to saie, but to their commendation in this place: so if that you had auouched the same, to the commendation rather then to the reproofe of other, I would better haue commended your nature, and beleeued your cause. But now like a spidercatcher sucking out of euery one, what what is the worst, to make vp your leyksall, you heape vp a dunghill of dirtie Dialogues containing nothing in them but malitious railing, virulent slanders, manifest vntruthes, opprobrious contumelies, and stinking blasphemies, able almost to corrupt and infect the aire. Such is the maladie and cacoethes of your pen, that it beginneth to barke, before it hath learned well to write. Which pen of yours notwithstanding I doe not here reprooch nor contemne, as neither doe I greatly feare the same. God of his mercie kéepe the sword out of the Papists hand, it is not the pen of the Papists I greatly passe vpon, though twentie copes, and so many surpleses, were set against the booke of Monuments, were I so disposed (maister Cope) to dallie, or as the Grécke doe say παιζειν, and to repay againe as I am prouoked. But in despitefull railing, and in this satyricall sort of barking I giue you ouer, and suffer you therein to passe not onely your selfe, but also Cerberus himselfe if yée will, the great bandog of Pluto. Mildnesse and humanitie rather beseemeth and is the grace of the Latine phrase. If yée could hit vpon the vaine thereof, it would win you much more honestie, with all honest men. But the Lord hereafter may call you, which I beséech him to doe, and to forgiue you that you haue done.

Modestie commended in writers.

In the meane time séeing this your prattling penne must néeds be walking, yet this you might haue learned of these your owne authors whom you alleage, more ciuillie to haue tempered your fume, in exclaiming against them, whose cause is to you not perfitly knowne. And now briefly to answere to these your foresaid writers, as witnesses produced against these men: there be two things (as I take it) in these chronicle-writers to be considered: First the grounds which they follow: secondly in what place they serue.

Two things to be obserued in story-writers.

As touching the order and ground of writting among these Chronicles, yée must consider, and cannot be ignorant, that as none of all these by you forenamed, was present at the deed, nor witnesse of the fact, so haue they nothing of themselues herein certainly to affirme, but either must follow publicke rumor and hearesay for their author, or else one of them must borrow of another. Whereof neither séemeth to me sufficient. For as publike rumor is neuer certaine: so one author may some deceiue another.

The ground of histories to be considered.

By reason whereof it commeth oft to passe, that as these story-writers hit many times the trueth, so againe all is not the gospell that they doe write. Wherefore great respect is here to be had, either not to credite rashly euery one that writeth stories, or else to sée what grounds they haue whom we doe follow.

All things not true, that be found in stories.

Now to demand (Master Cope) of you, what authoritie or foundation hath your Robert Fabian, hath Polydore Virgil, Edward Hall, and other of your authors, to proue these men to be traitors? What authoritie doe they auouch? what acts, what registers, what records, or out of what court doe they shew? or what demonstration doe they make? And doe you thinke it sufficient, because these men do onely affirme it, without any further probation, with your αὐτοψιαν, therefore we are bound to beléeue it? Take me not so (M. Cope) that I doe here diminish any thing or derogate from the credite of those writers you alleage, whose labors haue deserued well, and serue to great vtilitie: but comming now to triall of a matter lying in controuersie betweene vs, we are now forced to séeke out the fountaine and bottome of the trueth, where it is not enough to say, so it is, but the cause is to be shewed, why it is so affirmed. And what though Robert Fabian, Polydore Virgil, and Edward Hall, should all together (as they doe not) agrée in the treason of sir John Oldcastle and of the rest: yet neither is this any sufficient surety to proue them traitors. Considering that writers of stories for most part following either blind report: or else one taking of another, vse commonly all to sound together after one time, tanquam Dodonæi lebetes, so that as one saith, all say, and if one erre, all doe erre. Wherefore you sée M. Cope, how it is not sufficient nor sure to sticke onely to the names and authorities of Chronographers, vnlesse the ground be found substantiall whereupon they stand themselues. Which yet in none of these whom you haue produced, doth appeare.

Words without probation are not sufficient in story matters.

Secondly, in alleaging and writing of chronicles is to be considered to what place and effect they serue. If yée would shew out of them the order and course of times, what yéeres were of dearth and of plenty, where kings kept their christmas, what conduites were made, what Maiors and Sheriffes were in London, what battailes were fought, what triumphes and great feasts were holden, when kings began their raigne, and when they ended, &c. In such vulgar and popular affaires, the narration of the chronicler serueth to good purpose, and may haue his credit, wherein the matter forceth not much, whether it be true or false, or whether any listeth to beléeue them. But whereas a thing is denied, and in cases of iudgement, and in controuersies doubtfull, which are to be decided and boulted out by euidence of iust demonstration: I take them neither for Iudges of the bench, not for arbitrers of the cause, nor as witnesses of themselues sufficient necessarily to be sticked vnto. Albeit I deny not but histories are taken many times, and so termed for witnesses of times, and glasses of antiquitie, &c. yet not such witnesses, as whose testimonie beareth alwaies a necessary truth and bindeth beliefe.

Chroniclers how far, and to what effect they serue.

The two witnesses which came against Susanna, being seniors both of ancient yéeres, bare a great countenance of a most euident testimonie, whereby they almost both deceiued the people, and oppressed the innocent: had not young Daniel by the holy spirit of God, taken them aside, and seuerallie examining them one from the other, found them to be false liers both; leauing to vs thereby a lesson of wholsome circumspection, not rashly to beléeue euery one that commeth: and also teaching vs how to trie them out. Wherefore (M. Cope) following here the like example of Daniel in trying these your records whom yée infer against these men, we will in like manner examine them, seuerally one from another, and sée how their testimony agreeth: first beginning with your Robert Fabian. Which Robert Fabian being neither in the same age, nor at the déede doing, can of himselfe giue no credite herein, without due proofe, and euidence conuenient.

Hillarius not rashly to be beleeued.

How then doth Robert Fabian proue this matter of treason true? what probation doth he bring? what authoritie doth he alleage? And doth Robert Fabian thinke, if he were not disposed to conceiue of the lord Cobham, and those men a better opinion but to be traitors, that men are bound to beléeue him onely at his word, without any ground or cause declared, why they should so doe, but onely because he so saith and pléased him so to write? And if yée thinke (M. Cope) the word onely of this witnesse sufficient to make authoritie speaking against the lord Cobham, and proouing nothing which followed so many yéeres after him: Why may not I as well and much rather take the word and testimonie of Richard Welward a Northfolke man and of the towne of Crikam, who liuing both in his time, and possible knowing the partie, and punished also for the like trueth, is not reported, but recorded also in the registers of the church of Norwich, to giue this testimonie among other his articles, for the foresaid lord Cobham, that is, that sir John Oldcastle was a true catholike man and falsely condemned, and put to death without a reasonable cause, &c. Ex Regi-stro Noruic.

The testimonie of Fabian against the lord Cobham examined.

The testimonie of Richard Welward for the lord Cobham.

Ex Regist. Epis. Noruic.

Against this man if you take exception, and say, that one heretike will hold with another: why may not I with the like exception replie to you againe, and say as well, one papist hold with another, and both conioure together, to make and say the worst against a true Protestant.

Further, yet to examine this foresaid Fabian, witnesse against sir John Oldcastle, as Daniel examined the witnesses against Susanna: I will not here aske vnder what trée these adherents of sir John Oldcastle conspired against the king, and subuersion of the land, but in what time, in what yéere and moneth this conspiracy was wrought: Fabian witnesseth that it was in the moneth of Ianuarie. Contrariwise Edw. Hall and other our abridgementers following him, doe affirme that they were condemned in the Guildhall the 17. of December, and that their execution vpon the same was in Ianuarie following, so that by their sentence the fact was done either in the moneth of December, or else before; and so Fabianus mentitus est in caput suum, vt cum Daniele dicam: or if it were in the moneth of Ianuarie, as Fabian saith, then is Hall and his followers deceiued, testifying the fact to be done in the moneth of December.

Witnesses against the lord Cobham agree not together.

And yet to obiect moreouer against the said Fabian, for so much as he is such a rash witnes against these burned persons, whom he calleth traitors: it would be demanded further of him, or in his absence of maister Cope, in what yeare this treason was conspired? If it were in the same yeare (as he confesseth himselfe) in which yéer John Cleidon the Skinner, and Richard Tarmine Baker were burned, then was it neither in ỹ moneth of Ianuarie, nor in the first year of king Henry the fifth. For in the Register of Canturbury it appeareth plaine, that John Cleydon was condemned neither in the time of Thomas Arundell archbishop, nor yet in the first nor second yéere of king Henry the 5. but was condemned in the second yéer of the translation of Henry Chichesly, archbishop of Canturbury, the 17. day of August, which was the yéer of our Lord, 1415. So that if this conspiracy was in the same yéer (after the witnesse of Fabian) in which yéer John Cleidon was burned, then doth the testimony of Fabian neither accord with other witnesses, nor with himselfe, nor yet with truth. And thus much concerning the witnesse of R. Fabian.

Fabian conflicted of a manifest vntruth in his story of the lord Cobham.

Fabian, pars. 7. in vita Henr. 5. pag. 390.

Ex Regist. Archiepisc. Cant.

Let vs next proceed to Polydore Virgil, whose partiall and vntrue handling of our history in other places of his books, doth offer vnto vs sufficient exceptiõ not to admit his credit in this. And yet because we will rather examine him, then exclude him, let vs heare a little what he saith, and how he faileth, and in how many points, numbring the same vpon my fiue fingers.

The testimonie of Polydore examined.

First ending with the life of king Henry 4. hée saith that hée reigned 14 yéeres and 6. moneths, and 2. daies, Angl. hist. lib. 21. which is an vntruth, worthy to be punished with a whole yeeres banishment (to speake after the maner Apuleius) when as truth is, he reigned by the testimony of the story of saint Albons, of Fabian, of Hall, of our old English chronicle, and of Scalamundi, but 13. and 6. moneths, lacking, as some say, 5. daies, Hall saith he reigned but 12. yéers.

5. Untruths of Polydore noted in one story.

1. Untruth.

2. Untruth. The second vntruth of Polydore is this, whereas he speaking of this sedition of sir John Oldcastle and his adherents, affirmeth the same to be done after the burning of John Hus, and of Hierome of Prage, which was (saith he) An. 1415. in which yeare (saith he) Thomas Arundell died. His words be these: In eodem concilio damnata est Ioh. Wicliffi hæresis, ac Ioan. Hus, & Hieronymus Pragensis in ea vrbe combusti sunt. Quod vbi reliquis consocijs, qui etiam tunc in Anglia erant, patefit, tanquam furijs agitati primùm coniurationes in omnes sacerdotes, deinde in regem, &c. In which words hee not onely erreth, falsly assigning the cause and occasion of this sedition to the death of John Hus, and of Hierome, but also misseth as much in the order & computation of the yers. For neither was sir Roger Acton with his foresaid fellowes aliue at the time of the councell; neither doth hee agrée therein with any of our English writers, except onely with Hall, who also erreth therein as wide as he.

3.4. Untruth. For the third and fourth vntruth I note this, where he adeth and saith, that after this rebellion raised against the king, the said sir John Oldcastle being there present himselfe, was taken and prisoned in the Tower, and afterward escaped out of the said Tower by night: wherein is contained a double vntruth. For neither was sir John Oldcastle there present himselfe, if we beleeue Fabian and Cope, Dial.6.pag.833, lin.11. neither yet did he euer escape out of the Tower after that conspiracie, if euer any such conspiracie was.

Copus pag.833. lin.11.

5. Untruth. His v. but not the last vntruth in Polydore is this, that hee saith, Tho. Arundell to haue died in the same yeare, noting the yeare to be Anno 1415. whereas by the true registers he died Anno 1413.

Another vntruth in Polydor noted. To this vntruth an other also may be ioyned, where he erring in the computation of the yeare of the said Tho. Arundell archbishop of Canturburie, reporteth him to sit 22. yeares. Who was there archbishop but onely 18. yeares, as is to bee seene in the records of Cant. The words of Polydor be these: Thomas Arundellius Cantuariensis antistes annum iam tunc sedens tertium & trigesimum è vita excessit, lib. 22. Ang. hist. Albeit in this I doe not greatly contend with Polydore, and peraduenture the aduersarie will find some ealle shift for this matter.

The testimonie of Hall against the L. Cobham examined. But let vs now passe from Polydore, not (as they say) out of the hall into the kitchin, but out of the kitchin vnto the hall, examining and perpending what saith Edward Hall an other witnes in this matter: vpon whom master Cope bindeth so fast, that he supposeth his knot is neuer able to be loosed. And moreouer so treadeth me downe vnder his feet in the dirt (as a man would thinke him some dirtdaubers sonne) so that the spots therof, he saith, will neuer be gotten out while the world standeth, and a day longer. Notwithstanding I trust M. Cope that your dirtie pen with your cockish brags hath not so bedaubed and bespotted me, nor yet conuicted me to be such a deprauer of histories, but I hope to spunge it out. At least way, with a little asperges of the popes holy water, I trust to come to a dealbabor, well enough.

But certes, M. Cope, your maistership must first vnderstand, that if ye thinke so to deprelle, and disproue mee of vntruth in my history, you must go more roundly to worke, and bring against me other authors then Edward Hall. You must consider (M. Cope) if you will be a controller in storie matters, it is not enough for you to bring a railing spirit, or a mind disposed to carpe and cauill where any matter may be picked: diligence is required, and great searching out of bookes and authors not onely of our time, but of all ages. And especially where matters of religion are touched pertaining to the church; it is not sufficient to see what Fabian, or what Hall saith, but the records must be sought, the registers must be turned ouer, letters also and ancient instruments ought to bee perused, and authors with the same compared; finally, the writers among themselues one to be conferred with another. And so with iudgement to be waighed, with diligence to be laboured, and with simplicitie pure from all addiction and partialitie to be vttered.

Thus did Auentinus, thus did Sleidanus write. These helps also the eldest and best historicians seemed to haue, both Titus Liuius, Salustius, Quintus Curtius, and such like, as by their letters and records inserted may wel appeare. The same helps likewise both in your Fabian and in your Edward Hall were to be required, but especially in you (M. Cope) your selfe, which take vpon you so cockishly (rather then wisely) to bee a controller and master moderator of other mens matters. In which matters (to say the truth) you haue no great skill, and lesse experience, neither haue you either such plentie of authors méete for that purpose, nor yet euer trauelled to search out the origens and grounds of that whereof ye write. But onely contented with such as commeth next to hand, or peraduenture receiuing such almose as some of your poore friends bestow vpon you, thinke it sufficient if you can alledge Fabian and Hall for your purpose.

Cope a carper of stories wherof he hath no skill.

Now what purpose and affection herein doth leade you, or rather doth driue you to the carping and barking against the history of these good men, that be hence gone and had their punishment, all men may see it to bee no simple sinceritie of a mind indifferent, but the zeale onely of your sect of poperie, or rather of furie, which setteth your railing spirit on fire. But now out of the fierie kitchin, to come to the hall againe, let vs see what matter lieth in the testimonie of Edward Hall, to proue these men to be traitors. And here for so much (master Cope) as you seeme neither sufficiently acquainted with this your own master and author master Hall, nor yet well experienced in the searching out of histories, I will take a little paines for you, in this behalfe, to certifie you concerning the storie of this author, whereof percase you your selfe are ignorant.

Answere to Edward Hall.

The trueth whereof is this, that as the said Edward Hall, your great master and testis, was about the compiling of his storie, certaine there were which resorted to him, of whom some were drawers of his petigree and vineat, some were grauers, the names of whom were John Bets, and Tyrrall, which be now both dead. And other there were of the same sodalitie, who be yet aliue, and were then in the house of Richard Grafton, both the Printer of the said booke, and also (as is thought) a great helper of the penning of the same. It so befell that as Hall was entring into the storie of sir John Oldcastle, of sir Roger Acton, and their fellowes, the booke of John Bale touching the storie of the lord Cobham, was the same time newly come ouer. Which booke was priuilie conueyed by one of his seruants into the studie of Hall, so that in turning ouer his bookes, it must needs come to his hands. At the sight whereof, when he saw the ground and reasons in that booke contained, he turned to the authors in the foresaid booke alleaged, whereupon within two nights after, moued by what cause I knowe not; but so it was, that he taking his pen, raced and cancelled all that he had written before, against sir John Oldcastle and his fellowes, and was now ready to goe to the print, containing neere to the quantitie of three pages. And lest (M. Cope) you, or any other should thinke me to speake beside my booke, be it therefore knowne both to you and to all other, by these presents, that the very selfe same first copie of Hall raced and crossed with his own pen, remaineth in my hands to be shewed and seene, as need shall require. The matter which he cancelled out came to this effect. Wherein he following the narration of Polydore, began with like words, to declare how the Sacramentaries here in England, after the death of John Hulle, and Hierome of Prage, being pricked, as he saith, with a demoniacall sting, first conspired against the priests, and after against the king, hauing to their Captaines sir John Oldcastle the lord Cobham, and sir Roger Acton knight, with many mo words to the like purpose and effect, as Polydore and other such like Chroniclers doe write against him. All which matter notwithstanding, the said Hall with his pen at the sight of John Bales booke, did vtterly extinct and abolish. Adding in the place thereof the words of master Bales booke, touching the accusation and condemnation of the said lord Cobham, before Thomas Arundell archbishop of Canturburie, taken out of the letter of the said archbishop, as is in his owne storie to bée seene: In vita Hen.5.pag.2.lin.30.

Hal. in vita Hen.5.pag. 2.b.lin.30.

And thus Edward Hall your author, reuoking and casting backe all that he had deuised before against the lord Cobham (whereof I haue his owne hand to shew, and witnesse substantiall vpon the same) in his printed booke recordeth of him no more, but only sheweth the processe betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and him for matters of religion. And so ending with sir John Oldcastle, proceedeth further to the assemblie of sir Roger Acton (whom he falsely calleth Robert Acton) John Browne, and Beuerley, the narration whereof he handleth in such sort, that hee neither agreeth with the record of other writers, nor yet with trueth it selfe. For where hée excludeth the lord Cobham out of that assembly, he discordeth therein from Polydore and other: And where he affirmeth the fact of that conspiracie, to be wrought before, or at the twelfth day of December: that is manifestly false, if the records before alleaged be true. And where he reporteth this assembly to be after the burning of John Hulle, and of Hierome of Prage, therein he accordeth with Polydore, but not with the trueth. Moreouer, so doubtfull he is and ambiguous in declaration of this storie, that no great certaintie can be gathered of him.

Hall in the story of the lord Cobham, and sir Roger Acton, agreeth not with other stories.

Untrueth in Hall noted.

First, as touching the confession of them, he confesseth himselfe, that he saw it not, and therefore leaueth it at large. And as concerning the causes of their death, he leaueth the matter in doubt, not daring (as doth M. Cope) to define or pronounce any thing therof, but onely reciteth the surmises and mindes of diuers men diuerslie, some thinking it was for conueying the lord Cobham out of the tower, some that it was for treason and heresie; and here commeth in the mention onely of a record, but what record it is neither doth he vtter it, nor doth hee examine it: other some againe affirming (as he saith) that it was for fained causes surmised by the spiritualtie, more of displeasure then trueth. And thus your author Hall, hauing recited the varietie of mens opinions, determineth himselfe no certaine thing therof, but as one indifferent, neither bound to the coniectures of all men, nor to the writings of all men, referreth the whole iudgement of the matter free vnto the Reader. And so concluding his narration, forsomuch as he was neither a witnesse of the fact, nor present at the deede, he ouerpasseth the storie therof.

Hall doubtfull in the storie of sir R. Acton, &c.

Hall no witnes in sir Roger Actons case.

And

And what witnes then will you, or can you (maister Cope) take of Edward Hall, which denieth himselfe to be a witnesse? Will you compell him to say that he saw not? and to witnesse that he cannot? Wherefore like as Sulanna, in the storie of Daniel was quit by right iudgement in the case of adulterie, because her accusers and testes being examined asunder, were found to varie and halt in their tale, and not to agree in the two trees: So why may not in like case of treason, sir Roger Acton, sir John Oldcastle, Browne with the rest, claime the same priuiledge? seeing among the testes and witnes produced against them, such discord is found, and such halting among them, that neither do they agree in place, person, yeere, day, nor moneth.

Repugnance noted in the witnesse against the lord Cobham and sir Roger Acton.

1. Repugnance in the place.

1 For first where Fabian and his fellowes say: that they were assembled together in a great companie, in the field neere to S. Giles, the forged inditement aboue alleaged, saith, they were but riding toward the field.

2. Repugnance in the person. Ala. Copus pag. 833. lin. 12.

2 Secondly, where the foresaid inditement and Polydore, giue the lord Cobham to be present personally in that assemblie, Hall, and Alanus Copus Anglus, do exclude his personall presence from thence: and so doth Fabian also seeme to agree, speaking only of the adherents of sir John Oldcastle.

3. Repugnance in the yeere.

3 Thirdly, where Hall and Polydorus report this assemblie to be after the burning of John Hus, and of Hierome at the councell of Constance, which was An. 1413. that cannot be, but if there were any such conspiracie in the first yeere of Henrie the fifth, it must needs be an. 1413. And heere by the way, why doe certaine of your Epitome writers, speaking of the lord Cobham committed first to the tower for heresie, refer the said imprisonment to the yeere 1412. whereas, by their owne count, reckoning the yeere from the Annunciation, it must needs be an. 1413. being done in haruest time?

4. Repugnance in the month.

4 Fourthly, where Hall with his followers affirme that sir Roger Acton, Browne and Beuerley were condemned the twelfth day of December, the record is euident against it, which holdeth the fact to be in working the tenth day of Januarie.

5. Repugnance in the day.

5 Fifthly, whereas the foresaid record of the inditement giueth the Wednesday next after the Epiphanie, which was the tenth day of Januarie that present yeere, both the fact to be committed the same day, the Commission also to be granted and deliuered to the Commissioners the same day: the said Commissioners to sit in Commission the same day: the sheriffs of Middlesex to returne a iury out of the body of Middlesex the same day: and the Iurers to find the inditement the same day, and yet no iurer in the inditement named the same day:

Item, the lord Cobham the same day to be found conspiring to make himselfe Regent, when as the king, that day and yeere, was not yet passed into France: how all these can concurre and hang together and all in one day; I suppose it will cost you two daies, before you, with all your learned counsell will studie it out. And when you in your vnlawfull assemblies haue conspired and conferred together all ye can, yet will yee make it (as I thinke) three daies, before you honestly dispatch your hands of the matter.

And where ye thinke, that you haue imprested in me such a foule note of lying, neuer to be claimed off while the world standeth, yet shall the posteritie to come iudge betweene you and me, whether shall appeare more honest and true, my defence for that worthie lord, then your vncourteous and viperous wrangling against him, moued with no other cause, but onlie with the peeuish spirit of poperie, which can abide nothing, but that sauoureth of your owne sect. For else how manie loud lying legends, yea what legion of lies are daily bled and receiued in the popish church? What doltish dreames? what fained miracles? what blasphemous tales and frierlie fables, and idle inuentions, fighting against the sincere religion, doctrine and crosse of Christ? And could you hold your pen from all these, and find nothing else to set your idlenesse on worke, but onlie to write against the lord Cobham, sir Roger Acton, Browne, Onley, Colbrige, with a few other, whom with much ado, at length you haue sought out, not so much for anie true zeale to rebuke iniquitie, as craftilie seeking matter by these to deface and blemish the booke of Acts and Monuments? Which seemeth belike to make you scratch there, where it itcheth not. And if I should after the like dealing take in hand your popish portues, and with like diligence excuse euerie popish Martyr and Saint there canonized: thinke you maister Cope, I could not make you out halfe a dosen as ranke traitours and rebels to their kings and princes, as euer were anie of these of your picking out? What pope almost hath there been these last 500. yeeres, which hath not been a traitour to his emperour and prince, and to his countrie? either openlie rebelling against them, or priuilie conspiring their destruction, or proudlie setting their feet vpon their neckes, or spurning their crownes off from their heads, or making the sonne to fight against the father? how manie haue they deposed, and set vp other in their seats? how manie emperours and kings haue they wrongfullie cursed? what Consuls of Rome haue they resisted, deposed, and put to death? What warres haue they raised vp against their owne countrie of Rome? Yea the continuall holding of the citie of Rome, from his lawfull emperour, what is it but a continuall point of treason?

Papists cannot see great beams in their owne eyes, which spie small motes in other.

Popes traitors to their emperours and princes.

What will you answere me (maister Cope) to the pope, which conspired to let fall downe a stone vpon the emperours head, kneeling at his praiers? pag. 160.

And though this treacherie being as big as a millstone, seemed but a small mote in your eie, that it could not be espied: yet what will you say by the monke of Swinsted, that poisoned king John, who was both absolued by his abbat before his treason committed, and after his treason had a perpetuall Masse sung for him, to helpe him out of purgatorie?

The popes saints and confessors many were traitors.

And what thinke yee in your conscience is to be said of Thomas Becket, who did enough, and more then became him, to set the French king, and the king of England together by the eares? Of Anselme likewise, and of Stephen Langton, who departed both out of the realme to complaine of their princes and soueraignes? the like may be said also of John Peckham. John Stratford archbishop of the same see, notoriouslie resisted the kings commandement, being sent for by king Edward the third, to come to the parliament at Yorke, through the default of whose comming, the present opportunitie of getting of Scotland was the same time lost.

Richard Scrope archbishop of Yorke, was openlie in armes to rebell and fight against king Henrie the fourth, for the which he was condemned and put to death. And yet notwithstanding commission was sent down from the pope shortlie after, to excommunicat them which put him to death, his treason notwithstanding. Reade the storie sincerelie of pope Benedict the twelfth, and of pope Clement the sixth. And see how the traiterous rebellion of these two popes against Ludouicus their rightfull emperour can be defended: which emperour at last was also empoisoned, and that not without the practise of pope Clement, as doth Hieronymus Marius crediblie witnesse.

Rich. Scrope archbishop of Yorke traytor, and yet counted a holy man.

Popes commonly traytors.

In the raigne of king Edward the second, mention was made before of Thomas earle of Lancaster. Who with a great number of other nobles and barons of the realme, rose in armour against their prince, and therefore at length were put to death as traitors. And yet notwithstanding this treason committed (maister Cope) if you be so ignorant in our stories, that you know it not; set your setters on to search, and you shall find it true, that certaine noble men went vp to Rome, for the canonizing of the said Thomas of Lancaster to be made a Saint, and obtained the same. In so much that in a certaine old Calendar, the name of the said S. Thomas of Lancaster is yet extant to be seene.

Tho. Lancaster a traitor, and yet made a saint by the pope.

In the former booke of the Acts and Monuments aboue, about the pag. 353. & 354. mention was made of Edmund of Abbenden archb. of Canturb. whom although I do not disprooue, but rather commend in my history, for his bold and sage counsell giuen vnto king Henrie the third: and also for offering the censure of excommunication against the king in so necessary a cause: yet notwithstanding the same Edmund afterward about his latter end, went vp with a rebelling mind to complaine of his king vnto the pope, and in his iourney died, before his returne: who afterward for the same, was canonized by the pope, & now shineth among the Saints in the popes Calendar.

Edmund archbishop of Canturburie rebelled against his prince, and yet made a saint by the pope.

Let vs come more neere to these daies and times, and consider the doings of Thomas Arundell archbishop of Canturburie, who being first deposed and exiled for his contemptuous deserts against the king, and afterward comming in with Henrie Bolinbroke duke of Hereford, in open armes and with maine force rose against his naturall and lawfull king: thinke you (maister Cope) this is not as great a point of treason, as that which was done in Thickets fields? and though he be not placed among the portuous Saints, yet I thinke nothing contrarie, but in your heart you will not greatly sticke to say, Sancte Thoma ora pro nobis.

Thomas Arundell a ranke traytor against his king, and yet a great pillar counted in the popes church.

All these things well considered, tell me (M. Cope) I pray you, is treason such a strange and vnsoth thing in your popecatholike church, that your burning zeale of obedience to kings and princes, cannot reade the storie of the lord Cobham and sir Roger Acton, but your pen must needs be inflamed to write against them, and yet so many traitors in your owne Calendars neither seene, nor once spoken of? And if the traiterous conspiracie and rebellion of so manie your Calendar saints committed against emperours, kings and princes, cannot stir your zeale, nor moue your pen: Nor if the treason of pope Gregorie the ninth raising war against his owne citie of Rome, and causing thirty thousand citizens in one battel to be slaine, pag. 256. deserueth not to be espied, and accused as much as this treason of the lord Cobham: yet what will you or can you answere to me (maister Cope) as touching the horrible treason of pope Gregorie the seuenth, committed not against emperour nor king, nor any mortall man, but against the Lord himselfe, euen against your God of your owne making, being therein as you say no substance of bread, but the verie personall bodie, flesh, blood, and bones of Christ himselfe; which bodie notwithstanding the foresaid pope Gregorie the seuenth tooke and cast with his owne hands into the burning fire, because he would not answere him to a certaine doubt or demand? Ben. Card. pag. 160. Sothly, if sir John Oldcastle had taken the bodie of king Henrie 5. and throwne him into the fire, the fact being so notoriouslie certaine as this is, I would neuer haue bestowed any word in his defence. And could this, and so many other hainous treasons passe through your fingers (M. Cope) and no other to sticke in your pen but the lord Cobham?

Finally and simplie to conclude with you (M. Cope) and not to flatter you, what is the whole working, the proceedings, actions and practises of your religion, or hath been almost these fiue hundred yeeres, but a certaine perpetuall kind of treason, to thrust downe your princes and magistrates, to derogate from their right and iurisdiction, and to aduance your owne maiesties and dominations, as hath been sufficiently aboue proued and laid before your faces in a parliament holden in France, by the lord Peter de Cugnerijs? vide pag. 324. Wherefore if the assemblie of these forenamed persons, either within or without S. Giles field be such a great mote of treason in your eyes, first looke vpon the great blockes and millstones of your owne traytors at home, and when you haue well discussed the same, then after powre out your wallet of your triseling dialogues or trialogues if ye list against vs, and spare vs not.

Vide supra, pag. 324.

Not that I so thinke this to be a sufficient excuse to purge the treason of these men, if your popish calendars and legends be found full of traytors, Multitudo enim peccatorum non parit errori patrocinium: But this I think, that the same cause which made them to suffer as traytors, hath made you also to raile against them for traytors, that is, meere hatred only against their religion, rather then any true affection you haue to your princes and gouernors. Who if they had been as feruent in your poperie, and had suffered so much for the holy father of Rome, or for the liberties of the holy mother church of Rome, I doubt not, but they as holy children of Rome had been rung into your Romish calendar with a festum duplex, or at least with a festum simplex of nine lessons, also with a vigil peraduenture before them.

Religion commonly maketh treason among the papists.

Now because they were of the contrarie profession, and enemies to your Magna Diana Ephesiorum, you play with them as the Ephesian caruers did with Saint Paul and worse. You thrust them out as seditious rebels, not only out of life and bodie, but also cannot abide them to haue any poore harbour in their owne friends houses, among our Acts and Monuments to be remembred. In the which Acts and Monuments, and if gentle master Ireneus, with his fellow Critobulus in your clerkly Dialogues, wil not suffer them to be numbred for martyrs: yet speake a good word for them (M. Cope) they may stand for tokes or witnesse bearers of the truth. And thus much for defence of them.

Answere to the second part of Copes accusation concerning his untrue charging of the booke of Acts and Monuments.

Now to the other part of his accusation, wherein this Alanus Copus Anglus in his ἑπταπλᾶ, or sirfold dialogues contendeth and chafeth against my former edition, to proue me in my historie to be a lier, forger, imprudent, a misreporter of truth, a deprauer of stories, a seducer of the world, and what else not: whose virulent words and contumelious termes, how well they become his popish person, I know not. Certes for my part I neuer deserued this at his hands wittingly, that I do know. M. Cope is a man whom yet I neuer saw, and lesse offended, nor euer heard of him before. And if he had not in the front of his booke intituled himselfe to be an English man, by his writing I would haue iudged him rather some wilde Irishman, lately crept out of S. Patrikes purgatorie, so wildely he writeth, so fumishly he fareth.

But I cease heere, and temper my selfe, considering not what M. Cope deserueth to be said vnto, nor how farre the pen heere could runne if it had his scope, but considering what the tractation rather of such a serious cause requireth. And therefore seriously to say vnto you (M. Cope) in this matter, where you charge my historie of Acts and Monuments so cruelly, to be full of vntruthes, false lies, impudent forgeries, deprauations, fraudulent corruptions, and fained fables; briefly, and in one word to answere you, not as the Lacones answered to the letters of their aduersarie, with ſi, but with ὁ ſi: Would God (M. Cope) that in all the whole booke of Acts and Monuments, from the beginning to the latter end of the same, were neuer a true storie, but that all were false, all were lies, and all were fables. Would God the crueltie of your catholikes had suffered all them to liue, of whose death ye say now that I do lie. Although I denie not but in that booke of Acts and Monuments containing such diuersitie of matter, some thing might ouerscape: yet haue I bestowed my poore diligence. My intent was to profit all men, to hurt none.

The booke of Acts and Monuments too true, if it had pleased God otherwise.

If you (master Cope) or any other can better my rude doings, and find things out more finely or truly, with all my heart, I shall reioyce with you and the Common wealth, taking profit by you. In perfection of writing, of wit, cunning, dexteritie, fineneſſe or other indiuments required in a perfect writer, I contend neither with you, nor any other. I grant that in a laboured storie, such as you seeme to require, containing such infinite varietie of matter, as this doth, much more time would be required: but such time as I had, that I did bestow, if not so laboriously as other could, yet as diligently as I might.

But heere partly I heare what you will say: I should haue taken more leasure and done it better. I grant and confesse my fault, such is my vice, I cannot sit all the day (master Cope) smoothing and minsing my letters, and combing my head, and smoothing my selfe all the day at the glasse of Cicero: Yet notwithstanding doing what I can, and doing my good will, me thinkes I should not be reprehended, at least not so much be railed on at master Copes hand. Who if he be so pregnant in finding fault with other mens labours (which is an easie thing to do) it were to be wished, that he had enterprised himselfe vpon the matter, and so should haue proued what faults might haue been found in him. Not that I herein do vtterly excuse my selfe, yea rather am readie to accuse my selfe, but yet notwithstanding thinke my selfe vngently dealt withall at master Copes hand: Who being mine owne countriman, an English man as he saith, also of the same Vniuersitie, yea Colledge and schole that I was of: knowing that the first edition of these Acts and Monuments was begun in the far parts of Germanie, where few friends, no conference, small information could be had: And the same edition afterward translated out of Latine into English by others, whiles I in the meane time was occupied about other regesters. And now the said Cope hearing moreouer and knowing that I was about a new edition of the same Acts and Monuments, at this present time to be set forth, for the amending of diuers things therein to be reformed: if he had knowen any fault needfull to be corrected, he might gently by letters haue admonished me thereof; gentlenesse would so haue required it, time would well haue suffered it. Neither was he so far off, but might sooner haue written a letter to me, then a booke against me. Neither was I so ingratefull and inhumane, but would haue thanked him for his monition: neither yet so obstinate, but being admonished, would haue corrected willingly where any fault had been committed.

Vngentlenesse noted in Cope.

But herein your nature (master Cope) doth right well appeare. First in the said booke of Acts and Monuments, where manie other good things be contained, not vnfruitfull nor vnprofitable peraduenture for the instruction of your conscience, and wherein my labours perhaps might haue deserued your thankes, all that you dissemble and passe ouer, only scraping those matters which make for cauillation. Thus the blacke spider out of pleasant flowers sucketh his poyson. And what booke is so pleasant or fruitfull, though it were the popes owne Decretues, yea his owne Decretals, yea his owne verie Masse booke, to the reading whereof if I brought the like mind so disposed to cauill, as you bring to the reading of my historie, but I could find out twice as many mendacia, maculas, impudentias, dolos malos, fabulas, fucos, as you haue done in these Acts and Monuments? And yet you haue done prettily well.

The nature of the spider.

Besides all this, yet better to marke the goodnesse of your gentle nature: Be it so I had been in some piece of my story deceiued, as I do not iustifie my selfe in all points therein: yet you vnderstanding that I was about the correction of my booke againe, might either haue taken the best, and left the worst: or else gently haue taken the paines to haue aduertised me of such notes as you had, without further exclamation, or at least might haue deferred your dialogues for a time, till the comming out of my booke, to see first what would in the latter edition be altered. But belike your gall was full, your halke could not tarie, your venim must needs burst out:

Et si non aliquà nocuisses mortuus esses.

Seeing therefore the order of your doings to be such, and disposition of your nature so far from all humanitie, dealing with me so extreamely, if I thus prouoked with your extremitie againe, should now after this your currish nature shape you a name accordingly, and in stead of Cope godfather you to be a perpetuall sycophant, could you much blame me? and doth not your sycophanticall booke well deserue it? or thinke you I could not repay you againe with like extremitie as you bring, and dresse your drowsie or rather lousie Dialogues, in their right colours, if I were so disposed? But my purpose is with patience to spare you, and rather to pray for you; God make you a good man. Peraduenture hee may hereafter call you. And rather had I to win you, then to sting you. Leauing therefore the consideration of your ingratefull doings, I will now consider only the points wherein you charge me in your booke, answering briefly vnto the same. Briefly, I say, because the greatnesse of this volume, and abundance of other more fruitfull matter, giueth me little leasure at this present to stand about brawling words.

Copus Sycophanta.

First he seemeth highly to be grieued with me, for my calendar prefixed before the booke of Monuments. Wherein he hath no cause either to be offended with me, or to chafe with himselfe. As touching which calendar I haue sufficiently and expressely declared before so much, as might quickly satisfie this scruple of master Cope, if he either would haue taken the paines, or else had had the leasure to reade the words contained in the Latine preface before the booke prefixed, which are thus: Quanquam à me quidem non aliter Calendarium hoc institutum est, nisi vt pro Indice duntaxat suum cuiusque Martyris mensem & annum designante, ad priuatum lectoris seruiret vsum, &c. In which words preuenting before the cauilling obiection of the aduersarie, I forewarned the Reader afore hand, touching the calendar, wherefore it was ordained and prefixed; for no other purpose, but to serue the vse only of the reader, reader, in stead of a table, shewing the yeere and moneth of euery martyr, what time he suffered, &c. What hurt I pray you is in this calendar prefixed before the book of Monuments, more then in the table of maister Copes booke, set after his Dialogues? But maister Cope had no leisure to peruse this place: it made not for his humour.

But this grieueth him in the Calendar, and that very sore: For that I place in this Calendar, sir John Oldcastle, sir Roger Acton, Browne, Beuerlie, and other for martyrs, and displace for them, other holy ancient martyrs and saints, as Anatholius, Sother, Dorothe, Clarus, Lucianus, Seuerinus, &c.

Obiection for martyrs in the calendar.

Answere.

Answere: If maister Cope cannot abide the lord Cobham, sir Roger Acton, Browne and Beuerleie, which were hanged (as he saith for treason) to haue the name of martyrs, then let them beare the name of witnesse bearers, or testes of the truth, because they were also burned for the testimonie of their faith. Seeing there is no difference in the said names, all is one to me by which they are called.

And where he chargeth me for thrusting and shouldring out the old and ancient holy saints aforenamed out of this calendar, and placing other new come saints in their roomes: this is not the first vntruth that maister Cope hath made in his dialogues, nor yet the least. Vnto whom I might therfore fitly answere againe with his owne familiar phrase, or rather the phrase of Cicero, which hee doth so much affectate: Quod nimirum hic ipse Alanus Copus Anglus, vnde me mendacij coarguit, inde sibi ipsi sempiternam ac ineluibilem turpissimi mendacij, ac singularis impudentiæ notam inurat. For why haue not I as iust cause to say this to him, as he to mee? For somuch as in the first beginning and preface of the said booke of Acts and Monuments, I so diligently and expressely doe warne all men before, first that I make here no calendar purposely of any saints, but a table of good and godly men that suffered for the truth, to shew the day and moneth of their suffering. My words be extant and eudent, which are these: Neque verò ideo inter diuos à me referuntur isti, quòd inseruntur in calendarium, &c. And declaring afterward how the said calendar doth stand but in stead of a table, my words doe follow thus: Haud aliter calendarium hoc institutum est, nisi vt pro Indice duntaxat suum cuiusque Martyris mensem & annum designante, Lectori ad vsum atque ad manum seruiat, &c.

In præfatione ad dict. lectorem. li. Acts and Mon.

Againe, neither did I receiue these men into that calendar, that holy Anatholius, Sother, Dorothea, with other ancient holy Saints should be remoued out, as you doe falsly and vntruely affirme, but because the course of that storie reaching but 500. yeeres, did not comprehend those former times of such ancient Martyrs, but only of such as suffered in these latter dates: therefore requisite it was that in the table such should be placed chiefly, of whom the whole booke did then principally and onely entreat, to demonstrate thereby the time and day of their martyrdome. Neither yet were the other excluded out of this new calendar, which were neuer inserted in the same before, but only because both together could not there haue standing, necessitie so required these in no case to be omitted, and yet no iniurie meant to the other to bee excluded out of their owne calendars, whereto properly they did pertaine. As for this calendar or this table, because they were not pertinent vnto it, they could not therein, neither was it necessarie they should be included. And yet neither did I (M. Cope) without due and solemne protestation omit the same in my foresaid catalogue, to preuent and stop all cauilling mouthes: As by speciall words in the said proeme of my booke vnto the reader doth appeare, following in this wise: Interim nullius ego boni sanctique viri (modo qui verè sanctus sit) causam lædo, nec memoriam extinguo, nec gloriam minuo. Et si cui hoc displiceat calendarium, meminerit, non in templis à me collocari, sed domesticæ tantum lectioni præparari, &c. And where is now (maister Cope) this your reiecting, expelling, remouing, expulsing, exempting, deturbating and thrusting out of Anatholius, Sanct Dorothe, and other holy saints out of Catalogues, fasts, and calendars? Or what man is that, or where dwelleth hee, Qui veros Christi martyres è cœlo ad tartara deturbat? That is, Which tumbleth downe true martyrs frō heauen into hel? Which if yee mean by me: In one word I answere, yee falsly belie me M. Copus, I had almost called you maister Capus, so like a capon yee speake. Neither haue you nor any other euer heard me so say. Neither haue I euer heard of any so mad to play so the giants with their mountaines to clime the heauens, to tumble downe Gods true and holy martyrs out of heauen, downe into hell, vnlesse it were your selfe (as yet yee are, yee may be better) and such other of your gilde and popish fraternitie, which make of Gods true saints, stinking dunghils, (for so ye terme them in your bookes) and not only thrust into heauen your Pseudosanctos, saints of your owne making, whom God by his word doth not allow: but also depulse downe from heauen, and make dunghils of Gods welbeloued seruants, his faithfal people, and blessed martyrs, which haue died for the word of God. And what maruell then, if in your blasphemous books, ye cast down from heauen to hell, the poore saints of Christ, when in effect you deiect also the bloud and crosse of the son of God, Christ Iesus himselfe, setting vp in his office and place, tu per Thomæ sanguinem, quem pro te impendit, fac nos Christe scandere, quò Thoma ascendit. Say, maister Cope, your conscience indifferently, set all popish partialitie apart, where as the scripture teacheth vs simply: Quòd citra sanguinem nulla sit remissio. i. Without bloud there is no remission; whether yee thinke, by this bloud of the new Testament is meant the bloud of Christ alone, or the bloud of other more besides? If the bloud of one must stand alone, why doe yee then with the giants build vp your mountaines, and make a ladder of Beckets popish bloud, for men to scale the heauens? Or in so doing, how can you, but either with the Protestants wipe out of your calendar, Thomæ sanguinem, or else demolish from heauen Sanguinem Christi, with the Papists?

The papists would thrust downe Gods true saints out of heauen to hell.

Becketts bloud set vp, to the iniury of Christs bloud.

And here by the way, I cannot but muse, why you are so deuout in setting vp the crosse of Christ in your Church, which are such enemies to the true crosse of Christ to stand in heauen. Looke vpon this (M. Cope) and tell mee, vtra pars verius veros Christi martyres è cœlo in tartara detrudat? And therefore as you falsly belye me in this, for detruding and tumbling out of heauen Anatholius, Iulianus, Clarus, Lucianus, Agatha, Dorothea and other, against whom I neuer yet spake any reproching word, but rather in this my volume haue set forth their commendation: so is it vntrue likewise, where you affirme, that in this my calendar I make an ἀπόθεωσιν, or canonisation of false martyrs. I told you before when yee were in England, I tell you again, being now in your transmigration, in words as plaine as I could: Hanc ego Apotheosin mihi nunquam sumpsi, quam sibi tam confidenter sumpsit Gregorius nonus. Were not these words of my protestation manifest enough? were they not sufficient to satisfie a reasonable Momus? And to make the matter more plaine, did I not adde moreouer as followeth: Porrò neque cò spectat hoc calendarium, vt nouam aliquam festorum dierum legem prescribam ecclesiæ, &c. And not contented with this, foreseeing before such wrangling spirits to come, as now I see in you: I shewed also the cause why I needed not so to do. My words were these: Festorum dierum iam plus satis erat in mundo, &c. And yet further, because no cauiller should take hold here of any iniurie done to the holy saints, either old or new in the church, therefore in expresse words I remoued away all suspition of any iniurie, preuenting the obiection of the aduersary in these words: Habeat & Ecclesia suos sanctos, tum recentes, tum veteranos, modò probatos, modò interim ijdem ne adorentur, modò quàm sint vetusti, tam etiam verè sancti sint, &c.

Papists verdone to set vp Christs crosse in earth: but enemies to Christs crosse in heauen.

A double vntruth in Copus.

Copus pag. 820.

These places of my booke, if ye did see; why do you dissemble them? If ye had not so much leisure to read them; how had you so much leisure to write against any mans book, not knowing what is in the book contained? and how stands it then with truth, that so like a Mome ye crie out so in your booke, against these new made martyrs, qui non possunt nisi per aliorum iniuriam crescere? &c. And againe, where you exclaime against me, and say that I thrust out the ancient martyrs out from their seat and possession, and place new in their roomes, &c.

Also where you continuing yet still in your common place of lying (out of which you cannot digresse) doe charge me farther, that I doe appoint out holy daies and working daies by colours of red and blacke, in my foresaid calendar to be obserued: these leaud notes of yours, if they had been picked out of my calendar by you, without mine owne speciall declaration before made to the contrary, they might seeme to haue some blush of credit. Now what will the reader say, or what may he iudge, considering and conferring this your cauilling with the matter of my premonition made before, but that you are altogether set to play the perpetuall Syc. I had almost called you by your right name maister Cope. But God make you (as I said) a good man. Reading further in your book I could not but smile and laugh at this your ridiculous and most loud lying Hyperbolismum: where as you comparing my making of saints, with the popes making, can find (as yee say) in the pope no such impudent arrogancie in presuming, as yee find in me, &c. If the pope had not abused his arrogant iurisdiction in canonising and deifying his saints, more then I haue done: the yeere should not bee cumbred with so many idle holy daies, nor the calendars with so many rascall saints, some of them as good, as euer were they that put Christ to death.

But where will you find (Maister Cope) any man to beleeue this your hyperbolicall comparison to be true, which seeth and knoweth the infinit and vnmeasurable excesse of the popes arrogancie, not only in shrining such a rabble of blind saints of his owne creating: but also in prescribing the same to bee receiued vniuersally in the whole world, and not to bee receiued only, but also to bee inuocated for gifts and graces: also to be worshipped for aduocates and mediatours, wherin riseth a double abomination of the pope, the one for his idolatrous making and worshipping of saints: the other for his blasphemous iniurie and derogation to Christ, in repulsing him out of his office of mediation, and placing other mediatours of his owne making. And now to consider what Saints these were, or what were the causes of their Sainctiing: what saint almost among all the Popes Saints shall you find (maister maister Cope) made within these fiue hundred yéeres, but commonlie hee was either some pope, or some rich bishop and prelate, or some fat abbat, or some blind frier, some monke, or Nun, some superstitious regular, or some builder of monasteries, or some giuer and benefactor to the popish clergie, or maintainer agonizing for the dignities and liberties of the popish Church? What poore lay man or lay woman, were their liues neuer so Christian, their faith and confession neuer so pure, their death neuer so agonizing for the witnesse of Christ, and truth of his word, shall find any place or fauour in al the popes μαρτυρολογιε, that is in the popes calendar, either in red colour, or else in blacke?

The great god-maker of Rome.

But here (maister Cope) if ye had the wit, so much to defend as yée haue ta ouerthwart, you might take me with the manner, and replie againe for the defence of your great saint-maker, or rather god-maker of Rome: that he maketh mo martyrs and saints of these foresaid poore lay men, and lay women, then euer hee did of any other. For he burneth them, hee hangeth them, hee drowneth them, imprisoneth and famisheth them, and so maketh truer martyrs of Christ, then any other of his new shrined saints, whom he hath so dignified in his calendar. For the one hee doth rubricate, only with his red letters, the other he doth rubricate with their owne bloud. And therefore to answer you (M. Cope) to your comparison made betweene the pope and me, for making of holy martyrs and saints: Briefly I say, and report me to all the world, that herein is no comparison. For if yée speake of true martyrs, who doth make them, but ẏ pope: if yée speake of false martyrs, who doth make them, but the pope? And further more, to compare together the causes of these martyred saints in my calendar, with them which shine shrined in the popes calendar (taking the same proportion of time as I doe, within these last 500. yéeres) why may not I haue as good cause to celebrate these in my calendar, which lost their liues and were slaine, principally for the cause of Christ and of his word: as the pope hath to celebrate his double and simple feasted saints in his calendar, who in their doings, doctrine and life, as they séemed rather to serue the pope, then Christ the lord: so in their death appeared no such cause, why they should be sanctified in the church beyond all other? Let not the church of Christ (M. Cope) be deluded with hypocriticall names, nor fained apparitions, and fabulous miracles, neither bee you deceiued your selfe, but let vs resort sincerely to the word of God. What was in saint Francis (look vpon his superstitious life, & presumptuous testament, wrought no doubt by Satan, to diminish and obscure the Testament of Jesus Christ) why he should be made a saint, and not an enemie rather of Christ?

No cause why the popes new saints should be put in the calendar.

What was likewise in frier Dominicke, who before Francis ten yéeres together persecuted the poore Waldenses to death and destruction? why should he stand a saint and a piller of the Church? I pray you what sée you in Thomas Becket, but that he died for the ambitious liberties of the popish church? what in Aldelmus, and in Anselmus, but only that they chased away married priests from the churches, and planted in idle monks in their stead? The like also did Dunstanus, who was rubricated with a duplex festum. Elizabeth who was the wife of the marquesse of Thuring, when shee had with much perswasions got out her husband to fight against the Turks, and was there slaine, she afterward encloystered her selfe, and was made a Nun. And doe yée thinke these causes to be sufficient why they should bee made saints, worshipped in Churches, and set in calendars? Long it were to make rehearsall of all this riffraffe, and almost infinit. One example may suffice for many. S. Gilbert of Sempringham, was the sonne of Jocelin a knight, who for his deformity of his body was set to learning, and afterward made canon, and was author of the Gilbertines, in the time of king John.

Tho. Becket. Aldelmus. Anselmus.

Dunstanus. S. Elizabeth.

The canonization of S. Gilbert of Sempringham.

This Gilbert after he had erected 13. monasteries of his order of Sempringham, was afterward laboured for vnto the pope to be made a saint: Who hearing of his miracles, wrote his letters to Hubert archbishop of Canturbury, in the behalf of the foresaid Gilbert, willing and commanding per apostolica scripta, that the feast of the said Gilbert should be solemnised through all the prouince of Canterb. Vt meritis nimirum eius & precibus apud misericordissimum iudicem misericordiam consequamur, &c.

Ex lib. de vita S. Gilberti confessoris.

Whereupon Hubert the archbishop directeth downe his writings to all the bishops within his prouince, the contents of which his writings doe follow: Hubertus Dei gratia Cant. Archiepiscop. totius Angliæ primas, dilectis in Christo frat. Episco. per prouinciam Cant. Sal. grat. & benedictionem. D. Papa, sicut ex literis ipsius manifestè perpenditur, de conuersatione, meritis, & moribus b. Gilberti magistri ordinis de Sempringham. & miraculis à Deo per eum factis per testes & testimonia sufficienter instructus, de consilio fratrum Cardin. ipsum mag. Catalogo sanctorum decreuit ascribi, solemnitatem eius constituit & mandauit per Cant. prouinciam solemniter celebrari. Insuper & corpus eius cum requisiti fuerimus præcepit ad honorem Dei & gloriam eleuari. Vestra igitur Vniuersitas huic mandato cum deuotione congaudeat, & secundum formam in ipso mandato præscriptam, prædicti confessoris domini depositionem annuam faciatis cum reuerentia & solemniter obseruari: vt apud Dominum & ab illo vestra debeat & possit deuotio commendari, nec non & ipsius sancti supplex intercessio vobis proficiat ad salutem. Valete.

The popes letter and the archbishops for the canonising of saint Gilbert.

The summe of the which writting of the archbishop tendeth to this effect: That forsomuch as the pope hearing of the life and miracles of Gilbert, maister of the order of Sempringham, by sufficient witnesse and testimonies, hath in his letters commanded him by the aduice of his cardinals, that the said Gilbert should be canonized and ascribed in the catalogue of saints, and that his solemnitie should be celebrate solemnelie throughout all the prouince of Canturbury. And also his bodie to be taken vp and shrined to the honour and glorie of God: He therefore at the popes commandement writing vnto them, willeth all the suffraganes within his prouince of Canturburie, yéerely to solemnize and cause to be solemnized reuerentlie the deposition of the said saint Gilbert confessor: to the intent that their deuotion may be commended of the Lord, and of him. And also, that the humble intercession of the said saint, may profit them to their saluation.

Is this good doctrine M. Cope, in the popes canonization?

Furthermore, for the more ful canonising (canonising I had almost said) of this new made saint, the said pope Innocent writing to Hubert aforesaid, adioyneth withall a collect of his owne making, which is this: Plenam in nobis æterne saluator tuæ virtutis operare medelam, vt qui præclara beati Gilberti confessoris tui merita veneramur, ipsius adiuti suffragijs à cunctis animarum nostrarum languoribus liberemur: Qui viuis & regnas, &c. That is: Worke in vs O eternall Sauiour full remedie of thy vertue, that wee which worship the worthie merits of blessed Gilbert thy confessor, being succoured by his suffrages, may be deliuered from all languors and diseases of our soules; who liuest and raignest, &c.

The blasphemous collect of the popes making for Saint Gilbert.

The consecration of this one saint (who perhaps was not the worst) I thought here to commemorate, to the intent that the reader measuring by this one the canonisation of all the rest, may iudge the better vpon this comparison of maister Cope, whether of vs doth vendicate more impudent authoritie, the pope in his calendar, or I in mine: or to make the comparison more fit, whether is more impudent, the pope in his calendar, or else maister Cope in his dialogues more doltish.

Copus pag. 219. lin. 7.

But briefly to make an end of this matter with you; to canonise or to authorise any saints, for man it is presumptuous: to prescribe any thing here to bee worshipped, beside God alone, it is idolatrous: to set vp any mediatores but Christ onlie, it is blasphemous. And whatsoeuer the pope doth or hath done in his calendar, my purpose in my calendar, was neither to deface any old saint, or to solemnise any new. In my bookes of Acts and Monuments entreating of matters passed in the Church, these latter fiue hundred yéeres, I did regulate out a calendar, not for any canon to constitute saints, but onlie for a table of them which within the same time did suffer for the testimonie of the word, whom I did and doe take to bee good and godly men. If any haue other iudgement of them, I binde no man to my opinion, as the pope doth to his. The day will come which shall iudge both them and you. In the meane season it shall be best for you (maister Cope) in my iudgement to keepe a good tongue in your head, and to quiet your railing mood. A hard thing it is to iudge before the Lord. Mans iudgment may faile and is vncertaine, the iudgement of God is alwaies sure. Best it is therefore either to be sure by the word and iudgement of God before, what you doe say, or else to say the best. Of such slanderous and intemperat railing, can come no good, neither to them whom yée raile vpon: nor to your selfe which raileth: nor to the church of God that heareth you raile. For them you cannot hurt, they are gone. To your selfe, and though your matters be true, yet little honestie it will bring, to bee counted a railer; and if it bee vncertaine, your state is dangerous; and if it bee false, most miserable: And as to the Church, what great edification can proceed of such contentious brawling and barking one against another, I doe not greatlie sée. And if the zeale of the bishop of Romes Church haue so much swallowed you vp, that yée cannot but stampe and stare at traytours when yée sée them put in calendars: (first maister Cope) be yée sure first that they bee traitours (wisdome would) whom you call traitors. And if yée can so proone them (as yée haue not yet) then let your Irenæus, or Critobulus tell me, why doth not this flagrant zeale of yours as hot as Purgatorie burne out, and flame as well against your owne traitors, hauing so many in your owne Calendar and Church at home?

Copus counselled to cease his railing.

No good commeth of railing.

And if there be such a chatholike zeale in you, that hath set your gentle breast on such a pelting chafe, why then is not this your Catholike zeale equallie indifferent? Why take yée on so fell on the one side against sir John Oldcastle, sir Roger Acton, M. Browne, &c? A man would thinke you plaied Hercules furens in Orchestra. On the other side againe ye are Oleo tranquillior. What indifferencie (maister Cope) call you this? Or what zeale make you this to be? Albeit, your zeale I iudge not, as I know it not. Swift iudgement shall not become mee, which goe about to correct the same in you. But this I exhort you, to beware (maister Cope) that by your owne fruits and doings euident, yée doe not bewray this zeale in you to be Non secundum scientiam, nor such a zeale as fighteth fighteth Pro domo Dei, sed pro domo Pontificis. As I said, I iudge you not. You haue your iudge to whom ye stand or fall. My counsell is, that yée doe not so zeale the bishop of Rome, that for his sake yée lose your owne soule. Yée remember the old vulgar voice, it is not good Ludere cum sanctis; worse it is Illudere: worst of all it is Debacchari in immerentes: Because that Deus ipse vltionum Dominus, many times taketh their cause in hand, according as it is written: Opprobria opprobrantium tibi ceciderunt in me.i. The rebukes of thy rebukers fell vpon me. And seldome haue I séene any such blasphemous railers against the end or punishment of Gods saints and seruants, without great repentance, to come to any good end themselues.

The zeale of Maister Cope, expended.

And admit this (as granted vnto you maister Cope) that these men had been traitors, which yée are not able to prooue. Well, they had their punishment therefore, the world can go no further, and what would you haue more? who and if they repented, why may they not haue as good part in Christs kingdome as your selfe? Now forsomuch as the said persons also suffring a double punishment were so constant in the way of truth, and most principally for the same were persecuted, and chiefly therefore brought to their death: that part of example, because I saw it pertaine to the profit of the church, why might I not insert it with other church stories in my booke? Let the church take that which belongeth to the Church. Let the world take that, which to the world pertaineth, and goe no further. And if yée thinke it much, that I would exemplifie these whom you call traitors in the booke of Martyrs: first yée must vnderstand, that I wrote no such booke bearing the title of the booke of martyrs: I wrote a booke called the Acts and Monuments, &c. of things passed in the Church, &c. Wherein many other matters be contained beside the martyrs of Christ. But this peraduenture moueth your choler, that in the Calendar I name them for martyrs. And why may I not in my Calendar call them by the name of martyrs, which were faithfull witnesses of Christs truth and Testament, for the which they were also chiefly brought vnto that end? Or why may I not call them holy Saints, whom Christ hath sanctified with his blessed bloud? And what if I should also call the théefe and murderer hanging on the right side of the Lord, by the name of a holy Saint and confessor, for his witnessing of the Lord, what can maister Cope say against it?

The name of martyrs in the Calendar defended.

What is a martyr.

Holy saints of Christ.

Martyrs in the calendar coloured with red.

And as for colouring the names of certain martyrs in the said calendar in red or Scarlet letters (although that pertaineth nothing to me, which was as pleased the Painter or Printer) yet if that be it that so much breaketh patience, why rather doth he not expostulate in this behalf with the great saintmaker of Rome, who hath redded them much more then euer did I? For he did red and die them with their owne bloud, whereas I did but only colour them with red letters. And thus for matter of my Calendar enough.

The painter coloureth with red.

The pope coloureth with bloud.

Proceeding now out of the calendar vnto the booke, where he chargeth mee with so many lies, impudencies, vanities, deprauations, and vntruths, it remaineth likewise I cleare my selfe, answering first to those lies and vntruths, which to the storie of sir Roger Acton, and sir John Oldcastle doe appertaine. And after to other particulars, as in order of my booke doe follow. And first where he laieth against me whole heapes, and cartlodes, I cannot tell, how many of lies and falsities: I here briefly answer maister Cope againe (or what English Harpesfield else soeuer lieth couered vnder this English Cope) that if a lie be (after the definition of Saint Augustine) whatsoeuer thing is pronounced with the intent to deceiue another: then I protest to you maister Cope, and to all the world, there is neuer a lie in all my booke. What the intent and custome is of the papists to doe, I cannot tell: for mine owne, I will say, although many other vices I haue, yet from this one I haue alwaies of nature abhorred, wittingly to deceiue any man or child, so néere as I could, much lesse the Church of God, whom I with all my heart doe reuerence, and with feare obey. And therefore among diuers causes, that haue withdrawne my mind from the papists faction, almost there is none greater then this, because I see them so little giuen to truth, so farre from all serious feeling and care of sincere religion, so full of false pretensed hypocrisie and dissimulation, so little regarding the church of Christ in their inward hearts, which they so much haue in their mouthes: so, as vnder the title thereof they may hold vp their owne estate. Otherwise so little reuerence they yéeld to the true and honorable Church of Iesus the son of God, that what vnworthie and rascall ministers they take into it they passe not, what fictions, what lies and fables, what false miracles and absurd forgeries they inuent to delude it, they care not. I speake not of all.

The author cleareth himself of lies and vntruths laid against him.

Some there bee of that sect vnfained in consciences, and more religious, and better disposed natures, only of simple ignorance deceiued. But such commonlie haue been and be the chiefe guides and leaders of the papists Church, that little true care and small zeale hath appeared in them, toward the Church of Christ, not much regarding what corruption increased therin, so that their commodities might not decrease. Thus out of this fountaine haue gushed out so many prodigious lies in Church Legends, in Saints liues, in monkish fictions, in fabulous miracles, in false and forged reliques, as in péeces of the holy crosse, in the bloud of Hales, in our Ladies milke, in the nailes of Christ, which they make to a great number. Likewise in their false and blind errours, corrupt doctrines, absurd inuentions, repugnant to the truth of the word. Item in their ballard bookes, forged Epistles, their Apocrypha, and Pseudopigrapha. Here commeth in their forged canons, their foisting and cogging in ancient councels and decrées, as in ὡς ἀπὸ ἑμοῦ πέτρου, in Canons of the Apostles (if those canons were the Apostles) Excepta Romana sede, foisted into the decrées by Gratianus, also the cogging in a false canon to the councell of Nice for the maintenance of the sea of Rome, as appeareth in the sixth Synod of Carthage.

The lies and fictions innumerable in the popes Church.

Heere commeth in also the epistles of Clement, and other sundrie epistles Decretall, which as they are no doubt falslie inserted by other, so are they the well-head of many superstitious traditions, oppressing this day the Church of Christ. To speake moreouer of the liturgies of Saint James, of Chrysostome and other, of the first masse said by Saint Peter at Rome, and that Saint Peter sate 25. yéeres bishop of Rome. To speake also of the workes of Augustine, Ambrose, Hierome, and Gregorie, what Doctor or famous writer hath there been in the Church, vnder whose name some counterfaited bookes haue not falslie been fathered, and yet stand still authorised vnder their patronage, to the great detriment of the Church? What should I speake of Abdias, Amphilochius, Dionysius Areopagita: The Dialogues of Gregorie, which falslie to this day haue been ascribed to Gregorie the first, where indeed they were first written in Greeke, by Gregorie the third, and afterward translated out of Greeke into Latine by pope Zacharie? vide supra, pag. 116. Likewise that worthy and Imperiall sermon intituled, Eusebij Pamphili Sermo ad Conuentum sanctorum, hath to this day wrongfullie borne the name of Eusebius. Whereas in very truth it was made by the good Emperour Constantinus himselfe, in his owne heroicall stile in Latine, and afterward translated out of Latine into Greeke by Eusebius, as hee himselfe confesseth in his worke De vita Constant. lib. 4. But as touching this sermon, although the name be changed, so godly and fruitfull it is, that it mattereth not much vnder whose name it bee read, yet worthie to be read vnder the name of none so much, as of the emperor Constantine himselfe, who was the true author and owner thereof.

Sermo ad Conuentum sanctorum, in fine Eusebij, made by Constantine the emperour.

Briefly, except it be the bookes only of the new Testament, and of the old, what is almost in the popes Church, but either it is mingled or depraued, or altered, or corrupted, either by some additions interlaced, or by some diminution mangled and gelded, or by some glosse adulterate, or with manifest lies contaminate? So that in their doctrine standeth little truth, in their legends, portues, and masse bookes, lesse truth, in their miracles and reliques least truth of all. Neither yet doe their sacraments remaine cleare and void of manifest lies and corruption. And specially here commeth in the maister Bée, which bringeth in much swéete honie into popes hiues, the maister lie I meane of all lies, where the pope leauing not one crum of bread, nor drop of wine in the reuerend communion, vntrulie and idolatrouslie taketh away all substance of bread from it, turning the whole substance of bread into the substance of Christs owne bodie: which substance of bread, if the pope take from the sacrament, then must he also take the breaking from it: for breaking and the bodie of Christ, can in no wise stand literally together by the Scripture. Thus then as this is proued by the word of God to be a manifest lie: so think not much (good reader hereat) as though I passed the bounds of modestie in calling it the arch lie, or maister lie of all lies. Because vpon this one, an infinite number of other lies and errors in the popes church, as handmaids doe wait and depend.

But forsomuch as I stand here not to charge other men so much, as to defend my selfe, ceasing therefore, or rather deferring for a time to stir this stinking puddle of these wilfull and intended lies and vntruths, which in the popes religion and in papists bookes bée innumerable, I will now returne to those vntruths and impudent lies which maister Cope hath hunted out in my history of Acts and Monuments, first beginning with those vntruths which he carpeth in the storie of the foresaid sir John Oldcastle, and sir Roger Acton, Browne and the rest.

And first, where he laieth to my charge, that I call them martyrs, which were traytors and seditious rebels against the king, and their countrie: to this I haue answered sufficientlie before.

Now here then must the Reader néeds stay a little at M. Copes request, to sée my vanitie and impudencie yet more fullie and amplie repressed in refuting a certaine place in my Latine storie, concerning the kings statute made at Leicester, which place and words by him alleaged, be these, pag. 107. Quocirca Rex indicto Leicestriæ concilio (quod fortassis Londini ob Cobhami fautores non erat tutum) proposito edicto immanem denunciat pœnam his, quicunque deinceps hoc doctrinæ genus sectarentur, vsque adeo in eos seuerus, vt non modo hæreticos, sed perduelliones etiam haberi, ac proinde gemino mino eos ſupplicio, ſuſpendio ſimul & incendio afficiendos ſtatuerit,&c. Et mox: Adeo ille vires, rationeſque intendebat omnes aduerſus Wickleuianos. Wicleuiani id temporis dicebantur,quicunque Scripturas Dei ſua lingua lectitarent,&c.

Upon theſe words out of my foreſaid Latine booke alleaged, maſter Cope perſwadeth himſelfe, to haue great aduantage againſt me,to proue me a notorious lier, in three ſundrie points. Firſt,in that, whereas I ſay that the king did hold his Parliament at Leiceſter, adding this by the way of parentheſis (quod fortaſſis Londini ob Cobhami fautores non erat tutum,&c.) here hee concludeth thereby, ſimpliciter and preciſely, that the lord Cobham and ſir Roger Acton with his fellowes, were traytors, &c. Whereby a man may ſone ſhape a cauiller, by the ſhadow of maſter Cope. For whereas my Dialyſis out of the text ſpeaketh doubtfully, and vncertainely, by this word (fortaſſis) meaning indeed,the king to be in feare of the Goſpellers, that hee durſt not hold his Parliament at London, but went to Leiceſter: he argueth preciſely therfore, that the lord Cobham,ſir Richard Acton, and his fellowes went about to kill the king. Secondly, where I affirme that the king in that Parliament made a grieuous law againſt all ſuch as did hold the doctrine of Wickliffe, that they ſhould bee taken hereafter,not for heretiks,but alſo for fellons,or rebels,or traitors, and therefore ſhould ſuſtaine a double puniſhment, both to be hanged,and alſo to be burned,&c. Here commeth in maſter Momus, with his Cope on his backe, and prouing me to be a liar,denieth plainely that the king made any ſuch ſtatute: vide pag. 835. line 6. where his words be theſe: Atqui quod hæretici pro perduellionibus,& deinceps geminatas pœnas ſuſpendij & incendij luerent, vt nugatur Foxus, nullo modo illic traditur, &c.

Firſt here would be aſked of maſter Cope,what he calleth patriæ hoſtes,& proditores? If hee call theſe traitors, then let vs ſee whether they that followed the ſect of Wickliffe, were made traitors and heretikes by the kings law, or not. And firſt let vs heare what ſaith Polydore Virgil, his owne witnes in this behalfe, whoſe words in his xxij. booke,pag.441. bee theſe: Quare publice edixit, vt ſi vſpiam deinceps reperirentur,qui eam ſequerentur ſectam,patriæ hoſtes haberentur,quo ſine omni lenitate ſeuerius ac ocyus de illis ſupplicium ſumeretur,&c. That is, wherefore it was by publike ſtatute decreed, that whoſoeuer were found hereafter to follow the ſect of Wickliffe, ſhould be accounted for traitors, whereby without all lenitie, they ſhould bee puniſhed more ſeuerely and quickly,&c.

The ſect of Wickliffe made hereſie and treaſon by king Henrie 5.
Polyd. Virg. lib.22.

Thus haue you (maſter Cope) the plaine teſtimonie of Polydore with mee. And becauſe ye ſhall further ſee your ſelfe more impudent in carping, then I am in deprauing of hiſtories,you ſhall vnderſtand moreouer and heare, what Thomas Walden, one of your owne catholike brotherhood, and who was alſo himſelfe aliue, and a doer in the ſame Parliament, being the prouinciall of the Carmelites, ſaith in this matter writing to pope Martin, whoſe very words in Latine here follow,written in his prologue to the ſaid Martin,in this wiſe: Nec mora longa proceſſit, quin ſtatutum publicum per omne regni concilium in publico emanauit edicto, quod omnes Wicleuiſtæ ſicut dei proditores eſſent,ſic proditores regis,proſcriptis bonis cenſerentur & regni, duplici pœnæ dandi, incendio propter deum, ſuſpendio propter regem, &c. That is: And it was not long after, but a publike law and ſtatute came out, by the common aſſent of the generall parliament of the whole realme, that all Wickleniſts, as they were traitors to God, ſo alſo ſhould bee counted traitors to the king and to the realme, hauing their goods loſt and confiſcat vnto the king. And therefore ſhould ſuffer double puniſhment, as to be burnt for God, and to be hanged for the king,&c. And thus haue you (M. Cope) not only my ſentence, but alſo the very words of my ſtorie confirmed by this author: becauſe ye ſhall not thinke me to ſpeake ſo lightly or impudently without my booke. And moreouer to confirme the ſaid ſentence of Thomas Walden, it followeth alſo in another place of the foreſaid author: Tom.1. lib. 2. De doctrinali fidei Eccleſiæ Cathol. cap.46. where hee writeth in theſe words: Et tamen iam cum regnare cœpiſſet Illuſtris rex Henricus 5. qui adhuc agit in ſceptris, & de eorum perfidia per catholicos bene doctos, legem ſtatui fecit, vt vbique per regnum Wickleuiſta probatus, vt reus puniretur de crimine læſæ maieſtatis,&c. That is: And yet when the noble K. Henrie the fifth, who as yet doth liue and raigne, began firſt to raigne,began to ſet forth a law,by his learned catholikes which were about him, againſt the falſeneſſe of theſe men, ſo that whoſoeuer was proued to be a Wickleuiſt, through the whole Realme, ſhould bee puniſhed for a traytor, &c. What words can you haue maſter Cope, more plaine then theſe? or what authoritie can you require of more credit, which liued in the ſame time, and both did ſee and heare of the ſame things done? who alſo writing to pope Martine, was by the ſaid pope Martine allowed, approued, and ſolemnlie commended, as appeareth by the popes epiſtle to him, wherin the pope declareth,how he cauſed his bookes, Per ſolennes viros videri, & examinari: That is, by ſolemne perſons to be ſeene and examined,&c. So that you muſt nees grant either this to be true, that Walden writeth, or elſe that the pope (tanquam papa) in allowing his writings, may erre and be deceiued. Chuſe ye (maſter Cope) of theſe two options whether you will take.

And if yee thinke this my aſſertion yet not ſufficiently relieued with theſe authorities aforeſaid, I will alſo hereunto adioyne the teſtimonie of another writer named Roger Wall, who writing De Geſtis Henric.5. and ſpeaking of the ſaid ſtatute of this parliament ſomething more plainely then the reſt, hath theſe words: In hoc etiam Parliamento nobilitas regia hoſtes Chriſti ſibi reputans proditores, volens dare intelligere vniuerſis,quod ipſe abſque cuiuſcunque fluctuationis dubio, quam diu auras hauriret vitales, verus & perfectus Chriſtianæ fidei æmulator exiſteret: ſtatuit & decreuit, vt quotquot ipſius ſectæ,quæ dicitur Lollardorum,inuenirentur æmuli & fautores eo facto rei proditorij criminis in maieſtatem regiam haberentur,&c. In English: Alſo in this parliament, the noble king reputing Chriſts enemies to be traitors to himſelfe, to the intent that all men ſhould know without all doubt, that ſo long as he liued,he would be a true and perfect follower of Chriſtian faith: did enact and decree, that whoſoeuer ſhould be found followers and maintainers of this ſect, which is called the Lollards ſect, Ipſo facto, ſhould be counted and reputed guiltie of treaſon againſt the kings maieſtie,&c.

Roger Wallus lib. de geſtis Hen.5. fol.10.

By theſe hitherto alleaged, if M. Cope will not be ſatisfied, yet let the reader indifferent iudge: Vtrum in hac re magis nugatur Foxus, an Copus calumniatur. And yet moreouer to make the matter more certaine, marke the clamation of the ſaid Roger Walle, added to the end of thoſe words aboue recited,whereby we haue to vnderſtand more clearely both what were the procedings of the king in the ſaid Parliament, and alſo what was the blind affection of monks and prieſts at that time toward their king and prince (which was then called princeps ſacerdotum) in condemning and deſtroying the poore Lollards. The words of the monke be theſe: O verus amicus, qui amico illatam iniuriam ſibi inferri conſimiliter arbitratur, præiudicium illi intentum reputat eſſe ſuum, & ad eius onera conferenda,auxiliationis humeros ſupponere non veretur, &c. That is: O true friend, who taketh and reckoneth that iniurie no leſſe done to himſelfe which is done to his friend: and that preiudice which is intended againſt him, reputeth to bee as his owne; and to beare together the burdens of his friend ſticketh not to lay to his owne ſhoulders,for the eaſing and helping of him,&c.

King Henry the fifth called Princeps ſacerdotum.
Roger Wallus, ibid.

How can it now be denied (maſter Cope) in reading theſe authors, and ſeeing their teſtimonies, but that Lollarderie in this Parliament was made both treaſon and hereſie, and had therefore a double iudgement of puniſhment annexed,to bee hanged for the one, and to bee burned for the other, according as in my former Latine ſtorie I recorded, and yet I truſt, I trifled not?

And where the lord Cobham (for whoſe cauſe ſpecially this ſtatute ſeemed to be made) did ſuſtaine afterward both hanging and burning by the vigor of the ſame ſtatute,what is here contained, but a double penaltie? And

And therefore here is noted in the margent Foxi dolus malus, but let master Cope take heed, he deceiue not himselfe and other. For my part I remember no such place in this my Latine storie where I so say. Only my words bee these, added in the latter end of the place aboue recited: Wicleuiani verò dicebantur quicunque id temporis scripturas Dei sua lingua lectitarent, &c. That is: They were called Wickleuists, whosoeuer at that time read ỹ scripture in English, or vulgar tongue, &c. I say not, that for the scriptures being read in the English tongue, therfore the law was enacted, but so is master Cope disposed to construe it. What law and statutes were made against writing, or reading of any booke in English, or in any other tongue contrary to the catholike (that is, the Romish) faith, or to the determination of the holy Church (that is, of Rome) reade I beseech thee the bloudie statute made anno 2. Hen. 4. chap. 15. aboue specified pag. 482. Also read the constitution prouinciall of Thomas Arundell aboue mentioned, pag. 484. col. 1. line 39. Where it was decreed, that the text of holy scripture should not bee had, or read in the vulgar tongue from the time of master John Wickliffe, for euer after, vnlesse the said translation be approued first by the ordinarie, or by prouinciall councell, vnder paine and punishment of heresie. Now let the Reader iudge whether the reading of Scripture bookes in the English tongue, by the making or translating of Wickliffe, or from the time of Wickliffe downeward, be counted heresie, or not. As for the approuing of the ordinarie, or of the prouinciall councell added in the end of the said constitution, it maketh more for a shew, or pretence, then for any iust exception, or any true intention. For what man hauing those scriptures translated in English, would either present them to their ordinaries being so set against the reading of such bookes: or what ordinarie would or did euer yet since Arundels time approue any such translation, presented vnto them: Or else why did the good martyrs of Amersam suffer death, in the beginning of king Henry the eight, for hauing and reading certaine bookes of Scripture, which were (as is said) only foure epistles of saint Paul, with certaine other prayers: And the other which heard them but only read, did beare faggots: and the same time, the children were compelled to set faggots vnto their fathers; at which time Longland being then bishop of Lincolne, and preaching to them at the stake, said: that whatsoeuer they were, that did but moue his lips in reading those chapters, were damned for euer: as when we come to that time, by the grace of Christ, shall hereafter more amplie and notoriouslie appeare. And where then is this Dolus malus Foxi, margined against me, for craftie dealing in my storie?

Moreouer, where master Cope proceeding farther in this matter, asketh me: how was the lord Cobham obedient to the king, when as for the feare of him, the king durst not then keep his Parliament at London? To whom I answer again, asking likewise of master Cope, how was the king then afraid to hold his Parliament at London for the lord Cobham, when the lord Cobham at that time was in Wales? And here master Cope thinking to haue me at a narrow straitt, and to hold me fast, biddeth me tell him, how it could be otherwise, but the lord Cobham must needs haue fautors? And who should these fautors be (saith he) but sir Roger Acton, Browne and their fellowes? The which mightie question of master Cope, I answer againe: how could sir Roger Acton, Browne and their fellowes bee then fautors of the lord Cobham, for whom the king durst not hold his Parliament at London, when as the said Roger Acton, Browne, and the rest were put to death, a whole yeere almost before the Parliament at Leicester began?

And now as I haue hitherto briefly, and truly answered your askings (master Cope;) let me be so bold with you againe, to propound to you likewise another question, for so much as you haue put me to the searching of the statutes in this matter, wherewith before I was not much acquainted. Now out of the same statutes riseth a double scruple, or question, worthie to be solued. The case is this, That forasmuch as so many good martyrs and saints of God hitherto in this realme of England, haue been burned from the time of king Henrie the fourth, Henry the fifth, Henrie the sixth, Henrie the eighth, to the time, and in the time of Queene Mary; my question is, that you, with all your learned counsell about you will tell me, by what law, or statute of the realme were these men burnt? I know the ancient custome hath been, that heretikes conuicted by a prouinciall councell, were wont to be left to the secular power. But how will yee proue mee, these heretikes were either conuict by such prouinciall councell, or that these secular men ought to be your butchers in burning them, whom ye haue committed to them? If yee alleage the three articles made in the raigne of king Henrie the eighth: those articles neither did serue before the time of king Henry the eighth, neither yet were they reuiued after his time. If ye alleage the statute made anno 5. Rich. 2. cap. 5. In that statute (I answer) is contained no matter of burning, but onely of arrest to bee done at the certifications of the prelats, without any further punishment there mentioned. To conclude, if yee alleage the statute made an. 2. Hen. 4. cha. 15. and reuiued in the raigne of Queene Mary, mentioned before pag. 482. To that statute I answer, that although the pretensed statute appeareth in forme of words in the printed booke to giue vnto the temporall officers authoritie to bring them to the stake, and to burne them, whom the bishop deliuereth: yet is it not to be proued, either by you, or any other, that statute to bee law, or warrant sufficient to burne any person or persons committed to the secular power by the clergie. And that I proue thus; for although the same statute of king Henrie the fourth in the bookes printed, appeare to haue law and authoritie sufficient, by the full assent both of the king, of the lords, and of the commons: yet being occasioned by master Cope to search further in the statutes, I haue found that in the rolles and first originals of that Parliament, there is no such mention either of any petition or else of any assent of the commons annexed, or contained in that statute, according as in the printed bookes vsuall in the lawyers hands two craftilie and fallie is foisted in, as by the plaine words thereof may well appeare.

For where the said statute, an. 2. Hen. 4. chap. 15. being thus intituled in the roles: Petitio cleri contra hæreticos, and assented vnto in this forme: hath these words:

Stat. an. 2. Henri. 4. cap. 15. Intituled in the Rolle thus: Petitio Cleri contra hæreticos, and assented vnto in this forme.

QVas quidem petitiones prælatorum & cleri superius expressatas dominus noster Rex, de consensu magnatum & aliorum procerum regni sui, in præsenti Parliamento existentium concessit, & in omnibus & singulis iuxta formam & effectum eorundem ordinauit & statuit de cætero firmiter obseruari, and so forth according to the petition: and moe words, are there not in the statute roll. Wherefore where as the statute booke printed hath thus: Super quibus quidem nouitatibus & excessibus superius recitatis (videlicet, in the petition of the prelats and clergie) prælati & clerus supradicti ac etiam communitates dicti Regni in eodem parliamento existen. dicto Domino Regi supplicarunt, &c. Qui quidem Dominus Rex, &c. ex assensu magnatum & aliorum procerum eiusdem Regni, &c. concessit, ordinauit, &c. These words, &c etiã communitates dicti Regni, &c. are put in further then the roll doth warrant, and seemeth to be the practise of the clergie, to make that as an act of Parliament, and to seeme to haue the force of a law, which was neuer assented vnto by the commons.

And thus you see how this forsaid statute, printed both in English and in Latine among the prouinciall councels of Oxford (by the vertue whereof so many good men haue been burned so long in England) doth vtterlie ouerthrow it selfe, for that it swerueth from the record both in forme and in matter, and lacketh the assent of the commons. Which doubt I thought at this present to propound vnto you (master Cope) for that you haue so vrged me to the searching out of the statutes, by your declaiming against the lord Cobham.

Moreouer vnto this statute aforesaid, ioyne also withall another Memorandum of like practise done, an. 5. Rich. 2. In the which yeere, where as a statute was concluded in the Parliament an. 5. Rich. 2. chap. 5. against certaine preachers specified in the same statute, which going about in certaine habits from place to place, did draw the people to sermons: And commissions were made and directed in the said Parliament to the sheriffes, to arrest all such preachers, and to imprison the same, at the certifications of the prelates. Here is then to be noted, that the same statute, an. 5. Rich. 2. chap. 5. was reuoked by the king in the parliament, an. 6. Rich. 2. vpon the words of the commons being these, videl. Forasmuch as the same statute was neuer assented, ne granted by the commons, but that which therein was done, was done without their assent, and now ought to be vndone, for that it was neuer their meaning to be iustified and to bind themselues and their successors to the prelates no more, then their ancestors had done before them. Ex Rotul. And yet this foresaid reuocation notwithstanding in Queene Maries time, they inquired vpon that statute.

In searching of these statutes, as you haue occasioned me to find out these scruples: so being found out, I thought here not to dissemble them, forsomuch as I see & heare many now a daies so boldly to beare themselues vpon this statute, and thinking so to excuse themselues do say, ỹ they haue done nothing but the law, the law: to the intent that these men seeing now how inexcusable they be both before God and man, hauing no law to beare them out, may the sooner repent their bloudie and vnlawfull tyrannie, exercised so long against Gods true seruants, yet in time before that the iust law of God shall find out their vniust dealings, which partly he beginneth already to do, and more no doubt will doe hereafter.

In the meanie time this my petition I put vp to the commons, and to all other which shall hereafter put vp any petition to the Parliament: that they being admonished by this abuse, will shew themselues hereafter more wise and circumspect both what they agree vnto in parliaments, and also what commeth out in their name. And as these good commons in this time of king Henry 4. would not consent nor agree to this bloudie statute, nor to any other like: For so we read that the commons in that bloudie time of king Hen. 4. when another like cruell bill was put vp by the prelates in an. 8. Henry 4. against against the Lollards, they neither consented to this, and also ouerthrow the other: so in like maner it is to bee wished, that the commons in this our time, or such other that shall haue to doe in parliaments hereafter following the steps of these former times, will take vigilant heed to such cruell billes of the popes prelacie, being put vp, that neither their consent doe passe rashly: nor that their names in any condition bee so abused: Considering with themselues that a thing once being passed in the parliament, cannot afterward bee called backe: And a little inconuenience once admitted, may grow afterward to mischiefes that cannot be stopped. And sometime it may so happen, that through rash consent of voices, the end of things being not well aduised, such a thing may be granted in one day, that afterward many daies may cause the whole realme to rue. But I trust men are bitten enough with such blacke parliaments to beware of afterclaps. The lord Jesus onely protector of his Church, stop all crafty deuices of subtill enemies, and with his wisedome direct our parliaments, as may be most to the aduantage of his word, and comfort of his people, Amen, Amen.

And thus much hauing said for the defence of the lord Cobham, of sir Roger Acton knight, maister John Browne Esquier, John Beuerlie preacher, and of other their fellowes against Alanus Copus Anglus, here I make an end with this present Interim, till further leisure serue me hereafter (Christ willing) to pay him the whole interest which I owe vnto him. Adding this in the meane time, and by the way: that if maister Cope had been a Momus any thing reasonable, hee had no great cause so to wrangle with mee in this matter, who as I did commend the lord Cobham, and that worthily, for his valiant standing by the truth of his doctrine before Thomas Arundell the archbishop: so touching the matter of this conspiracie, I did not affirme or define any thing thereof in my former history so precisely, that he could well take any vantage of against me, who in writting of this conspiracie laid against sir Roger Acton, and sir John Oldcastle, doe but disiunctiuely or doubtfully speake thereof, not concluding certainely this conspiracie either to be true, or not true, but only proouing the same not to be true at that time, as Polydore Virgil, and Edward Hall in their histories doe affirme: which say that this conspiracie began after the burning of John Husse and Hierome of Prage: Which could not be. And thereto tendeth my assertion. My words are plaine, and are these: pag. 174. col. line 13. Wherefore it is euident that there was either no conspiracie at all against the king: or else that it was at some other time, or done by other captaines, &c.

Lib. Act. & Mon. 174.

These be my words with other moe, pag. col. and line aboue noted. In the which proposition disiunctiue, if either part bee true, it is enough for me. His part it was to refell both, which he hath not done. But onely standing fast vpon the one part, dissimuleth the other. And this is Alanus Copus Anglus, who by that he shall come from Rome (whither he is now gone as I heare say) I trust he will returne a better Logician home againe in suam Angliam.

But to the truth of our matter; as I said before, so I say againe, whatsoeuer this worthie, noble, vertuous knight, Sir Roger Acton was otherwise, this is certaine, that he was alwaies of contrary mind and opinion to the bishop of Rome, and to that kind of people, for the which cause he had great enuie and hatred at their hands, and could as little beare it: neither doe I greatly dissent from them, which do suspect or iudge that the lord Cobham, by his friendly helpe escaped out of the Tower, and that peraduenture was the cause why hee was apprehended and brought to trouble, and in the end came to his death. Other causes also there might be, that these good men percase did frequent among themselues some conuenticles, (which conuenticles was made treason by the statute aforesaid) either in those thickets or in some place else, for the hearing of Gods word, and for publike prayer: and therefore had they this Beuerlie their preacher with them.

Sir Roger Acton contrarie to the bishop of Rome.

Causes coniecturall why sir Roger Acton with the rest, were put to death for traitors and Lollards.

But to conclude, whatsoeuer this sir Roger Acton was, this is the truth, which I may boldlie record, as one writing the Acts and things done in the church, that he was at length apprehended, condemned and put to death or martyrdome 3. yeares and more before the lord Cobham died. Likewise maister John Browne, and John Beuerlie the preacher, suffered with him the same kind of death (as some say) in the field of saint Giles, with other moe, to the number of 36. if the stories bee true. Which was in the moneth of Januarie, an. 1413. after the computation of our English stories, counting the yeare from the annunciation, but after the Latine writers counting from Christs natiuitie, an. 1414. according as this picture is specified.

These men, as is said, suffered before the lord Cobham about three yeares, of whose death diuers doe write diuerslie. Some say they were hanged and burnt in S. Giles field; of whom is Fabian, with such as follow him. Other there be which say that some of them were hanged and burnt. Polydorus speaking onlie of their burning maketh no mention of hanging. Another certaine English chronicle I haue in my hands borrowed of one M. Bowyer, who somwhat differing from the rest, recordeth thus of sir Roger Acton, that his iudgement before the iustice was thus, to be drawne through London to Tiborn, and there to bee hanged, and so hee was naked, saue certaine parts of him couered with a cloth, &c. And when certaine daies were past (saith the author) a trumpeter of the kings called Thomas Cliffe gat grant of the king to take him downe, and to bury him, and so he did, &c. And thus haue you the storie of sir Roger Acton, and his fellow brethren. As touching their cause, whether it were true, or else by error or mistaken of the king, or by the fetch of the bishops surmised, I refer it to the iudgement of him which shall iudge both the quicke and dead, & seculum per ignem. The death of Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canturbury. Exhist. S. Alba.

Gods workes and punishments to be noted.

After the decease or martyrdom of these aboue mentioned, who were executed in the moneth of Januarie, an. 1414. in the next moneth following, and in the same yeere, the 20. day of Februarie, God tooke away the great enemie of his word, and rebell to his king Thomas Arundell archbishop of Canturburie. Whose death following after the execution of these good men aboue recited, by the maruellous stroke of God so suddenly, may seeme somewhat to declare their innocency, and that he was also some great procurer of their death, in that God would not suffer him longer to liue, striking him with death incontinently vpon the same. But as I did the other before, so this also I doe referre, to the secret iudgement of the Lord, who once shall iudge all secrets openly.

In the meane time this may seeme strange, that the same Thomas Arundell, who a little before sitting vpon iudgement against the lord Cobham, and pronounced sentence of death vpon him, did himselfe feele the stroke of death, and the sentence of God executed vpon him before the other. Who would haue thought that the lord Cobham being so cast and condemned definitiuely by the archbishops sentence, but that hee should haue died long before the archbishop? But such be the works of Gods almightie hand, who so turned the wheele that this condemned lord suruiued his condemner 3. or 4. yeeres.

Thomas Arundell giueth sentence against the lord Cobham: and God giueth sentence against Thom. Arundel.

The condemned man ouerliueth his condemner.

In the death of this archb. first Polydor Virgil is deceiued, who in his 22. book, pag. 441. affirmed his death to be an. 1415. and in the second yeere of king Henry 5. also after the beginning of the Councell of Constance, who in deed neuer reached the beginning thereof, nor euer saw the second yeere of that king (vnlesse ye count the first day for a yeere) but died before, an. 1414. Feb. 20. Ex hist. S. Albani & multis. Furthermore concerning the death of this Arundell, and the maner thereof, who had been so heauie a troubler of Christs saints in his time, because the thing seemeth worthie of noting, to behold the punishment of God vpon his enemies, this is the report, as I haue found it alleaged out of Thomas Gascoin in Dictionario Theologico: Whose plaine words be these: An. 1414. Tho. Arundel Cant. Archiepiscop. sic lingua percussus erat, vt nec deglutire, nec loqui per aliquot dies ante mortẽ suam potuerit, diuitis epulonis exemplo, & sic tantum obijt. Atque multi tunc fieri putabãt, quia verbũ alligasset, ne suo tempore prædicaretur. That is, Thomas Arundel archb. of Cant. was so stricken in his tongue, that neither he could swallow nor speake for a certaine space before his death, much like after the example of the rich glutton, and so died vpon the same. And this was thought of many to come vpon him, for that hee so bound the word of the Lord, that it should not be preached in his daies, &c. Which if it be true, as it doth well here appeare, these and such other horrible examples of Gods wrath may be terrible spectacles for such as occupie their tongues and braines so busilie to stop the course of Gods word, striuing but against the streame; against the force whereof, neither they are able to resist, and many times in resisting are ouerturned themselues & drowned therein. And thus much for the death of Thomas Arundell, who continued archbishop in the see of Cant. the space of 18. yeares.

The marueilous hand of God vpon Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canturbury.

It is in vaine to gainestand Gods word.

After this Arundell, succeeded next in the said see of Cant. Henry Chichellie, made archb. An. 1414. and sate 25. yeares. This Henry following likewise the steps of his predecessour, shewed himselfe no small aduersarie against the fauourers of the truth. In whose time was much trouble and great affliction in the church. For as the preaching and teaching of the word did multiplie and spread abrode daily more and more, so on the contrarie side, more vigilant care and strait inquisition followed and encreased against the people of God, by reason whereof diuers did suffer, and were burned, some for feare fled the countrie: many were brought to examination, and by infirmity constrained to abiure. Of whom hereafter (Christ willing) particularly in order of their times we will entreat.

Henry Chichellie archbishop of Cant.

As true pietie, and sincere preaching of Christs word began at this time to decay: So idle monkerie and vaine superstition in place thereof began to increase. For about the same yeare the king began the foundation of two monasteries, one of the one side of Thames of friers obseruants, the other on the other side Thames called Shene and Sion, dedicated to Charter house monks, with certaine Bridgit nuns or recluses, to the nũber of 60. dwelling within the same precinct, so that the whole number of these with priests, monks, deacons, and nunnes, should equall the number of 12. apostles and 72. disciples. The order of these was according to the description of S. Paul the apostle, Col. 1. Eate not, taste not, touch not, &c. to eate no flesh, to weare no linnen, to touch no money, &c.

Sion & Bethleem builded.

About Michaelmas, the same yeer the king began his parliament at Leicester, aboue mentioned. In the which parliament the commons put vp their bill againe, which they had put vp before, An. 11. Hen. 4. that temporalties disorderly walked by men of the church, might be conuerted and imployed to the vse of the king, of his earles and knights, and to the releefe of the poore people, as is before recited, page 513. In feare of which bill, lest the king would giue thereunto any comfortable audience (as testifieth Rob. Fabian and other writers) certaine of the prelats and other headmen of the church put the king in mind to claime his right in France. Whereupon Henry Chichellie archbishop of Canturburie made a long and solemne oration before the king to perswade him to the same, offering to the king in the behalfe of the clergy great and notable sums. By reason whereof (saith Fabian) the bill was againe put off, and the king set his mind for the recouery of the same: so that soone after hee sent his letters and messengers to the French king concerning that matter, and receiued from him againe answere of derision, with a pipe of tennis balles (as some record) sent from the Dolphin, for him to play with at home. Whereby the kings mind was incensed the more towards that voiage. Who then furnishing himselfe with strength and armour, with powder and shot, and gunstones to play with in France, and with other artillery for that purpose conuenient, so set ouer into France, where hee got Hareflew with diuers other townes and castles in Normandie and Picardy, and at Agyncourt had a great victorie ouer the French armie, they being counted but 7. thousand, by pricking sharpe stakes before them, &c. After that hee wanne Caen, Towke, Rowan with other townes moe, as Meldune, or Melione, and married with Katharine the French kings daughter. And yet notwithstanding the third time hee made his voyage againe into France, where at length at Bloys he fell sicke and died: concerning al which voyages, because they are sufficiently discoursed in Fabian, Hal, and other Chronographers, referring therfore the reader vnto them, I will returne my storie to other matters of the church more effectuall.

The entrie of the storie of the Bohemians.

I Declared a little before how by the occasion of Quéen Anne, which was a Bohemian and maried to king Richard 2. the Bohemians comming thereby to the knowledge of Wickliffes bookes here in England, began first to tast and sauour Christs Gospell, till at length by the preaching of John Hus, they encreased more and more in knowledge. Insomuch that pope Alexander the 5. hearing thereof, began at last to stirre coales, & directeth his bull to the archbishop of Swinco, requiring him to looke to the matter, and to prouide that no person in churches, schooles or other places should maintaine that doctrine, citing also John Hus to appeare before him. To whom the said John answering againe, declared that mandate or bull of the pope vtterly to repugne against the manifest examples and doings both of Christ and of his apostles, and to be preiudiciall to the libertie of the Gospell, in binding the word of God not to haue free recourse. And therefore from this mandate of the pope he appealed to the same pope better aduised. But while he was prosecuting his appeale, pope Alexander died, as is afore said, pag. 510. After whom succeeded pope John the three and twentith, who also playing his part here in this matter like a pope, sought by all meanes possible how to represse and keepe vnder the Bohemians, first beginning to worke his malice vpon the foresaid John Hus their preacher. Who at the same time preaching at Prage in the temple of Bethleem, because hee seemed rather willing to teach the Gospell of Christ, then the traditions of bishops, was therefore accused of certaine to the forenamed pope John the three and twentith for an heretick. The bishop committed the whole matter vnto cardinall de Columna; who when he had heard the accusation, he appointed a day to John Hus, that he should appeare in the court of Rome: which thing once done, Wenceslaus king of the Romans and of Boheme, at the request specially of his wife Sophia, and of the whole nobilitie of Boheme, as also at the earnest suite and desire of the towne and Vniuersitie of Prage: He sent his embassadors to Rome, to desire the bishop to quit and clearely deliuer John Hus from that sentence and iudgement; and that if the bishop did suspect the kingdome of Boheme to bee infected with any heretical or false doctrine, that he should send his embassadors, the which might correct and amend the same, if there be any errour or fault in them. And that all this should be done at the onely costs and charges of the king of Boheme, and to promise in his name that he would aid and assist the bishops legats with all his power and authoritie, to punish all such as should be taken or found in any erroneous doctrine. In the meane season also John Husse before his daie appointed, sent his lawfull and meeke procurators vnto the court of Rome, and with most firme and strong reasons, did proue his innocencie; whereupon he trusted so, that he thought he should haue easily obtained that he should not haue beene compelled, by reason of the great danger, to appeare the day appointed. But when as the Cardinall de Columna, (vnto whose will and iudgement the whole matter was committed) would not admit no defence or excuse: John Hulle his procuratours appeared vnto the high bishop: yet notwithstanding, this last refuge did not so much preuaile with cardinall de Columna, but that he would openly excommunicate John Hus as an obstinate hereticke, because he came not at his day appointed vnto Rome.

Notwithstanding forsomuch as his procurators had appealed vnto the high bishop, they had other iudges appointed vnto them, as cardinall Aquileianus and cardinall Venetus with certaine others. The which iudges after they had prolonged and deferred the matter by the space of one yeare and a halfe, at last they returned to the sentence and iudgement of cardinall de Columna, and confirming the same, commanded John Hus his procurators that they should leaue off to defend him any more, for they would suffer it no longer. Whereupon when his procurators would not cease their instant sute, certaine of them were cast into prison, and grieuously punished, the other leauing their busines vndone, returned into Boheme.

The Bohemians notwithstanding little cared for all this, but continuing still as they grew more in knowledge, so the lesse they regarded the pope, complaining daily against him and the archbishop for stopping the word of God, and the Gospell of Christ to be preached, saying that by their indulgences and other practises of the court of Rome, and of the bishops consistorie, they sought their owne profit, and not of Iesus Christ: that they pluckt from the sheepe of Christ the woll and milke, and did not feed them, neither with the word of God nor with good examples. Teaching moreouer and affirming, that the commandements of the pope and prelats are not to be obeyed, but so farre as they follow the doctrine and life of Christ and of his apostles, and that lay men ought to iudge the workes of prelats as Paul iudged the workes of Peter in correcting him: Gal. 2. Furthermore, they had amongst them certaine notes and obseruations, whereby they might discerne how far and wherein they might obey their prelats: they derided also and scorned the popes iurisdiction, because of the schisme that was then in the church, when there were three popes together one striuing against another for the papacy.

2. Doubts of John Hus propounded.

Ouer and besides this, at the same time John Hus did propound publikely, and by the notaries caused to bee written 3. doubtfull questions, the tenor whereof followeth here word for word, and is this. Forasmuch, saith he, as it is good for men being in doubt to aske counsell, wherby al dubitation remoued, they may be able the more firmely to adhere to the truth, three doubts here arise to be solued. The first doubt is, whether we ought to beleeue in the pope. The second, whether it be possible for any man to be saued, which confesseth not with his mouth vnto a mortall priest. The third doubt is, whether any of the Doctors do hold or say that some of Pharaos host being drowned in the red sea, & of ỹ Sodomites being subuerted, be saued.

As concerning the first, he did hold negatiuely, alledging the saying of Bede vpon this place of the apostle: To him that beleeueth vpon him which iustifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed to righteousnes: Rom. 4. Vpon this place saith Bede: Aliud est credere in deum, aliud credere deo, aliud credere deum, &c. The second doubt, saith hee, the master of the sentences doth answere, lib. 4. dist. 17. cap. 11. in these words: What is then to be holden or said herein? Certes, that without the confession of the mouth, and allowing of the outward paine, sins be forgiuen through contrition and humilitie of the heart, &c. For the third doubt he brought in the words of S. Hierom vpon the prophet Nahum, speaking of the Egyptians destroyed in the sea, and of the Sodomites destroyed with fire, and of the Israelites destroyed in the desert. Know you (saith Hierome) that God therefore punished them for their sinnes here temporally, because they should not be punished hereafter perpetually, and therefore because they were here punished, they shall not be punished hereafter, for else the Scripture should lie, which is not to bee granted. These 3. questions belike John Hus did bring in to declare how the Doctors do not agree in all things neither with the church of Roume, neither are to be followed in all points of all men.

Counsell of the prelats of Prage against the Gospellers.

It followeth moreouer after the death of the archbishop Swinco aboue mentioned, that one named Conradus was placed by the pope there to bee chiefe generall, which Conradus conferring with the diuines and Doctors of the Vniuersitie of Prage, required their aduices and counsels, what way they might best take to allwage the dissension and discords betweén the clergie and the people. Wherupon a certaine councell was deuised to be holden after this sort and maner as followeth.

1 First, that all Doctors and masters of the Vniuersitie of Prage should be assembled in the court of the archbishop and in his presence, that euery doctor and master should sweare, not to hold or maintaine any of the 45. articles of John Wickliffe before condemned.

2 Item, concerning the 7. Sacraments of the Church the keyes and censures of the church, the maners, rites, ceremonies, customes, and liberties of the church, concerning also the worshipping of reliques and indulgences, the orders and religions of the church, that euery one shall sweare that hee doth hold, beleeue and maintaine, and will maintaine, as doth the church of Rome and no otherwise, of the which church of Rome the pope is the head, and the colledge of cardinals is the body: who are the true and manifest successors of blessed S. Peter prince of the apostles, and of the colledge of the other apostles of Christ.

3 Item that euery one shall sweare, that in euery catholicke matter belonging to the church, that he will stand to the determination of the apostolicall sée, and that hee will obey the prelats in all maner of things whersoeuer, the thing, which is pure good, is not forbidden: or that which is mere ill, is not commanded: but is meane and indifferent betweéne both. Which meane or indifferent thing, yet notwithstanding by circumstances of time, place or person, may be either good or euill.

Purum bonum, Purum malum, Medium.

4 Item, that euery one shall sweare and confesse by his oth, that the opinions of Wickliffe and others, touching the 7. Sacraments of the church and other things aboue notified, being contrarie to the said church of Rome, be false.

5 Item that an oth be required of them all, that none of them shall hold, defend or maintaine any of the 45. articles of John Wickliffe aforesaid, or in any other matter catholicke, and especially of the 7. Sacraments and other articles aboue specified, but only as doth the church of Rome, and no otherwise.

6 Item, that euery ordinarie in his diocesse shall cause the said premisses contained in the 1. 2. 3. 4. articles aforesaid, to bee published in his Synods, and by his preachers to bee declared to the people in the kingdome of Boheme.

7 Item, that if any clerke, student, or lay man shall withstand any of the premisses, that the ordinarie haue authoritie if he be conuicted thereof, to correct him according to the old lawes and canons, and that no man shall defend such one by any meanes, for none but the ordinarie hath power to correct such a man, because the archbishop is chancellor both of the kingdome and Vniuersitie of Prage.

8 Item, that the songs lately forbidden, being odious, slanderous and offensiue to others fame, bee not sung neither in streets, tauernes, nor any other place.

9 Item, that master John Hus shall not preach so long as he shall haue no absolution of the court, neither shall hinder the preaching in Prage by his presence: that by this, his obedience to the apostolicall sée may be knowne.

10 Item, that this councell doth appeare to be good and reasonable for the putting away of ill report and dissension that is in the kingdome of Boheme.

11 Item, if master John Hus, with his complices will performe this, which is contained in the 4. former articles, then we will be ready to say as they would with vs and haue vs, whensoeuer neede shall require, that we do agrée with them in matter of faith: otherwise if they will not so doe, wee in giuing this testimony should lie greatly vnto our lord the king and to the whole world. And moreouer, wee will be content to write for them to the court of Rome, and do the best we can for them, our honours saued. This counsell and deuice being considered amongst the head of the Vniuersitie of Prage, the foresaid administrator named Conradus, presented vnto the king and to the barons of the realme, and also to the Senate of Prage. Whereof as soone as word came to John Hus and his adherents, they likewise drew out other articles in maner and form of a councell as followeth:

For the honor of God and the true preaching of his Gospel, for the health of the people, and to auoide the sinister and false infamie of the kingdome of Boheme, and of the Marquesship of Morauia, and of the citie and Vniuersitie of Prage, and for the reforming of peace and vnitie betweene the clergie and the scholars of the Vniuersitie:

1 First let the right and full decreement of the princes and of the kings counsell, be holden and stand in force, which betweéne the lord archbishop Swinco on the one partie, and betweéne the rector and master John Hus on the other partie, was made, proclaimed, sealed, and solemnly on both parts receiued and allowed in the court of our souereigne lord the king.

2 Item, that the kingdome of Boheme remaine in his former rites, liberties, and common customes, so as other kingdomes and lands do enioy, that is, in all approbations, condemnations, and other acts concerning the holy mother vniuersall church.

3 Item, that master John Hus, against whom the foresaid lord Swinco, could obiect no crime before the councell, that the said John Hus may be present in the congregation of the clergy, and there whosoeuer will obiect to him either heresie or errour, let him obiect, binding himselfe to suffer the like paine, if he do not proue it.

4 Item, if no man will set himselfe on the contrarie part against him, then let the commandement be made by our souereigne lord the king through all his cities, and likewise let it be ordained and proclaimed through all villages and townes, that master John Hus, is ready to render account of his faith, and therefore if any will obiect vnto him any heresie or errour, let him write his name in the chancerie of the lord archbishop, and to bring forth his probations openly before both the parties.

5 Item, if none such shalbe found to obiect, or which will write his name, then let them bee called for, which caused to bee noised and rumored, in the popes court, that in the kingdome of Boheme

Boheme in the city of Prage, and in the Marquesdome of Moraua, many there be whose hearts be infected with heresie and errour, that they may proue who they be: and if they be not able to proue it, let them be punished.

6 Item, that commandement be directed to Doctors of Diuinity and of the canon law, and to the chapter of cathedrall churches, and that it be required of them all and of euery one particularly, that they will bring forth his name, if they know any such to be an hereticke or erroneous, and if they denie to know any such, then let them make recognition therof, before the publike notary, confirming the same with their seales.

7 Item, these things thus done and premised, then that our soueraigne lord the king, and also that the archbishop will giue commandement vnder paine, that no man shall call one another hereticke or erroneous, vnlesse he will stand to the probation of that heresie or error, as it becommeth him.

8 Item, after these things obtained, that our soueraign lord the king, with the consent of his barons, will then lende a subsidie, or collect of the clergie, and direct an honest ambassie to the popes court; with the which ambassadors, let them also goe vpon their owne proper charges or expences for their purgation, which haue caused this kingdome falsly and grieuously to be infamed in the apostolicall court.

9 Item, in the meane season for the presence of maister John Hus no Interdict ought to bee made, as it was made of late contrary to the order and determination of our holy mother church, &c.

As this matter was thus in altercation betweene the two parts, the one obiecting, the other answering in articles, as is aforesaid; in the meane time it happened by the occasion of Ladislaus king of Naples, who had besieged the popes townes and territories, that pope John raising vp warre against the said Ladislaus, gaue full remission of sinnes to all them which would warre of his side to defend the church. When this bull of the popes indulgence was come to Prage, and there published, the king Wenceslaus, who then fauoured that pope, gaue commandement that no man should attempt any thing against the said popes indulgences. But Hus with his followers, not able to abide the impiety of those pardons, began manifestly to speake against them: of the which company were 3. certaine artificers, who hearing the priest preaching of these indulgences, did openly speake against them, and called the pope Antichrist, which would set vp the crosse to fight against his euenchristened. Wherfore they were brought before the senate, and committed to ward. But the people ioyning themselues together in armes, came to the magistrates, requiring them to be let loose. The magistrates with gentle words and faire promises satisfied the people, so that euery man returning home to his owne house, the tumult was asswaged. But the captiues being in prison, notwithstanding were there beheaded, whose names were John, Martine, and Stalcon. The death and martyrdome of these three being knowne vnto the people, they toke the bodies of them that were slaine, and with great solemnity brought them vnto the church of Bethlem. At whose funerall diuers priests fauouring that side, did sing on this wise: These be the saints which for the Testament of God gaue their bodies, &c. And so their bodies were sumptuously interred in the church of Bethlem, John Hus preaching at the same funerall, much commending them for their constancie, & blessing God the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which had hid the way of his verity so from the prudent of this world, & had reuealed it to the simple lay people and inferior priests, which chose rather to please God then men.

The pope maketh warre.

John. Martine. Stalcon. Martyrs.

Thus this city of Prage was diuided. The prelates with the greatest part of the clergie, and most of the barons, which had any thing to lose, did hold with the pope, especially Steuen Paletz, being the chiefest doer on that side. On the contrary part, the commons, with part of the clergie and students of the vniuersity went with John Hus. Wenceslaus the king fearing lest this would growe to a tumult, being moued by the doctors, prelats, and counsell of his barons, thought best to remoue John Hus out of the city, who had beene excommunicated before by the pope: And further, to cease this dissension risen in the church, committed the matter to the disposition of the doctors and the clergie. They consulting together among themselues, did set forth a decree, ratified and confirmed by the sentence of the king, containing the summe of 18. articles for the maintenance of the pope and the see of Rome, against the doctrine of Wicklisse and John Hus. The names of the Doctors of diuinity were these: Steuen Paletz, Stanislaus de Znoyma, Petrus de Ikoyma, Ioannes Heliæ, Andreas Broda, Iohannes Hildesen, Matthæus Monachus, Hermannus Heremita, Georgius Bota, Simon Wenda, &c. John Hus thus departing out of Prage, went to his countrie, where he being protected by the lord of the soile, continued there preaching; to whom resorted a great concourse of people; neither yet was hee so expelled out of Prage, but that sometimes hee resorted to his church at Bethlem, and there also preached vnto the people.

Steuen Paletz a great enemy to I. Hus.

John Hus banished out of Prage.

Moreouer, against the said decree of the Doctors, John Hus with his company replied againe, and answered to their articles, with contrary articles againe, as followeth.

The obiections of Iohn Hus and of his part, against the decree of the Doctors.

FIrst, the foundation of the Doctors whereupon they found all their writings and councels is false: which foundation is this, whereas they say that part of the clergy in the kingdome of Boheme is pestilent and erroneous, and holdeth falsly of the Sacraments.

2 The Doctors hereby do defame the kingdome of Boheme, and do raise vp new discords.

3 Let them shew therefore those persons of the clergie, whom they call pestilent, and so let them verifie their report, binding themselues to suffer the like paine, if they be not able to proue it.

4 False it is that they say, the pope and the cardinals to be the true and manifest successors of Peter and of the apostles, neither that any other successors of Peter and of the apostles, can be found vpon the earth besides them. Whenas no man knoweth whether he be worthie of hatred or of fauor. And all bishops and priests be successors of Peter and of the apostles.

5 Not the pope, but Christ onely is the head: and not the cardinals, but all Christs faithfull people be the body of the catholicke church, as all holy Scripture and decrees of the holy fathers do testifie and affirme.

6 And as touching the pope, if he bee a reprobate, it is plaine that hee is no head, no nor member also of the holy church of God, but of the diuell, and of his synagogue.

7 The clergie of the Gospellers agreeing with the saying of saint Austen which they alledge, and according to the sanctions of the fathers, and determinations of the holy mother church, do say and affirme laudablie: that the condemnation and prohibition of the 45. articles is vnlawfull, and vniust, and rashly done: for that not onely because the Doctors, but also all bishops and archbishops, in such great causes, namely, touching faith (as these articles doe) haue no authority at all, as appeareth, De baptismo et eius effectu, cap. Maiores. Et in Can. 17. dist. cap. Hinc sedi, &c.

8 The second cause of the discord which they alledge, also is most false: seeing the faith of whole Christendome concerning the church of Rome, is diuided into 3. parts by the reason of 3. popes, which now together do reigne: and the 4. part is neutrall. Neither is it true, that we ought to stand in all things to the determination of the pope, and of the cardinals, but so farre forth as they do agree with the holy Scripture of the old & new Testament, from whence the sanctions of the fathers, did first spring, as is euident, De accusationibus cap. qualiter, &c.

9 In the 4. article they brast out into a certaine dotage, and are contrary to themselues. By reason that they dotishly haue reprehended the Gospellers, who in all their doings receiue the holy Scripture (which is the law of God, the way of truth and life) for their iudge and measure: and afterward they themselues do alledge the Scripture, Deut. 17. where al iudges both popes and cardinals are taught to iudge and discerne betweene leper and leper, and in euery ecclesiasticall cause, onely after the rule of Gods law. And so are they contrary vnto their second article, wherein they say: that in euery catholike matter we must run to the pope: which is contrary to the foolish condemnation of the articles aforesaid.

10 Consequently, like idiots they doe most fallie alledge for their purpose the canon, vnder the name and authority of Hierome, written 24. q. 1. Hæc est fides papæ, &c. where they do aplie the words of Hierome most impertinently to the pope of Rome, which he writeth to S. Austen, calling him a most blessed pope.

24. q. 1. Hæc est fides. Austen called pope.

11 By which place of Hierome, it is manifest that the first article of those Doctors is false. Forasmuch as by these words appeareth that other besides the bishop of Rome and his cardinals are called blessed popes, holding the faith and seate of Peter, and are successors of the apostles as was Austen and other holy bishops moe.

12 Whereof it followeth moreouer, that the church of Rome is not that place, where the Lord did appoint the principall see of his whole church. For Christ which was the head priest of all, did first sit in Jerusalem, and Peter did sit first in Antioch, and afterward in Rome. Also other popes did sit some in Bonony, some at Perusium, some at Auinion.

13 Item, the forsaid prelats are falsifiers of the holy Scriptures and canons, and therefore are worthie to bee punished: Which affirme and say, that we must obey the pope in al things.

14 For why? it is knowne that many popes haue erred, and one pope was also a woman. To whom not onely it was not lawfull to giue obedience, but also vnlawfull to communicate with them. As all Rubrices, and infinite canons do declare.

Pope Ioane a woman.

14 Item, their 6.7.8.9.10.11. articles do stand and are grounded vpon vntrue and false persuasions. And therefore are to be reiected and detested like the other before: Seeing they doe induce not to peace and verity, but to dissension and falsitie.

15 It is manifest also to the laity, that this dissension among the clergie, riseth for no other cause, but only for the preaching of the Gospell, which reprehendeth such Simoniaks, and such heretickes in the church of God, as namely haunt the court of Rome, spreading out their branches abrode into all the world. Who deserue to be removed and extirpate not only of the clergy gospellers, but also of the secular power. And so these three vices, to wit, simony, luxurie, and auarice (which is idolworship) be the causes of all this dissension among the clergy in the kingdome of Boheme, and not the other, which they falsly ascribe to the gospellers of Prage. These three vices being removed, peace & vnity would soone be reformed in the clergy.

16. Moreouer, their last article is too grosse, and not onely is without all law, but also without all colour of law: whereas they fondly and childishly doe argue thus: that the processes made against M. John Hus ought to bee obeyed, because forsooth the common sort of the clergie of Prage, hath receiued them. By the same reason they may argue also, that wee must obey the diuell, for our first parents Adam and Eue obeyed him. Also our forefathers before vs were Pagans, wherefore we must obey them, and play also the Pagans.

17. But let this friuolous opinion goe: this is certaine truth, that the said processes made against M. John Hus, by law are none. Forsomuch as they were obtained, drawn, wrought, and executed contrary to the commission of the pope, against the determination of the holy mother church, as appeareth Cap. Sacro de Sententia excom. and a thousand other lawes besides.

18. Finally, whosoeuer wittingly and obstinately doe defend & execute (the said processes made) or consenteth vnto them, are all to be counted as blasphemers, excommunicate, and hereticks, as hath beene afore written and exhibited to the lord generall bishop Olomucense. And more shall be declared and proued, if audience may be giuen openly before all the Doctors. Ex Aenea Sylui. & Cochleo.

¶ Vnto these obiections of I. Hus and his part, the catholike Doctors again did answere in a long tedious processe: The scope whereof principally tended to defend the principality of the pope, and to maintaine his obedience aboue all other potentates in the world: affirming & contending, that although Christ is the head alone of the whole multitude of them that are sleeping in purgatorie, and which are labouring in the church militant, and which are resting in heauen: yet this letteth not, but the pope is head of the church here militant, that is, of all the faithfull, which here in this world liue vnder his office. Like as Christ is king of all kings, and yet Charles may bee the king of France: so say they, Christ may bee the vniuersall head, and yet the pope may bee head vnder him of the whole church. And thus concluded they that the pope is the head, and that the colledge of cardinals is the body of the Romish church; which church of Rome is placed in the ecclesiasticall office here ouer the earth, to know and define vpon euery ecclesiasticall and catholike matter; to correct errors, and to purge them; and to haue care vpon all such vniuersall matters, and cure vpon all vniuersall churches, and vpon the vniuersall flocke of faithfull christians. Forasmuch as in the regiment of the church thorough the vniuersall world, there must needs remain in such office alwaies some such manifest and true successors of Peter, prince of the apostles and of the colledge of the other apostles of Christ: neither can there be found or giuen vpon earth any other successors, but only the pope which is the head, and the colledge of cardinals, which is the body of the foresaid church of Rome. And although the whole vniuersall multitude of the faithfull do make the body of Christ, yet the same body of Christ is not placed here in office to exercise such authority vpon earth. Because that vniuersall multitude was neuer yet, nor euer can be congregate together.

As Charles may be king of France: so also we grant, the pope may be bishop of Italy, and so it is a good consequet. He may so be if God had so appointed him, but where doth he so appoint?

Ex Cochleo in hist. Hussit. Catholicke, that is, vniuersall.

If ye go to humane policy, who euer saw any vniuersall case of England brought to the emperors court to be decided? If ye go to Gods policy, tye shew Gods word for it.

And therfore necessary it is, that some such true and manifest successors and iudges be appointed, to whom recourse must be had, in all such catholike and ecclesiasticall matters determinable. For like as in earthly regiments, euery cause of discord is brought before his iudge, and hath his place alligned where to bee decided: so like reason would require, that in principall matters and controuersies of faith, some such presidents and places be limited for the purpose to haue such doubts resolued. And this being granted, then the Doctors proceed, and here must needs conclude (say they) that there cannot be giuen in all the world any other place, but only the church of Rome: the head whereof is the pope, and the body is the colledge of cardinals. For like as Christ departing out of this world in his corporall presence, left his body here with vs vnder the Sacrament in an other forme, wherby he remaineth with vs (according to his promise, Mat vlt.) vnto the consummation of the world: euen so while Christ walked here on earth in his bodily presence, he was pope himselfe and chiefe bishop, and so head of the church here militant in earth, corporally conioyned with the same, as the head is to his body. But after that he departed out of the world, because his body, which is the church militant vpon the earth, should not be headlesse, therefore he left Peter and his successors to his church, for an head in his place, vnto the consummation of the world, saying to him: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my church, &c. Mat. 16. And againe he saith, Feede my sheep: Ioan vlt. That is to say, be thou Peter the head ouer thy brethren.

The promise of Christ doctorly applied.

Deepe diuinity of these Doctors.

Vide Aeneam. Silui. & Cochlei. De Hist. Hussit. lib. 1.

Tedious it were to recite all the bibble babble of these doctors in this their long rehearsal. Whoso listeth to see the bottom of their profound writing & knowledg, may resort either to the history of Siluius, or else to M. Cochleus, in his 1. booke De hist. Hussit.

Thus then M. John Hus being driuen out of Prage (as is afore touched) by the motion of these Doctors, and moreouer being so excommunicate, that no masse nor other musk bee said there where he was present: the people beganne mightily to grudge and to cry out against the prelats & other popish priests, which were the workers thereof, acculing them to be Simoniacks, couetous, whoremasters, adulterers, proud, sparing not to lay open their vices to their great ignominy and shame. And much crauing reformation to be had of the clergie.

The king seeing the inclination of the people, being also not ignorant of the wickednesse of the clergie, vnder pretence to reforme the church, began to require greater exactions vpon such priests and men of the clergie, as were knowne & accused to be wicked liuers. Wherupon they on the other part, that fauoured John Hus, taking that occasion present, complained of all, accused many, and spared none, whomsoeuer they knew to bee of the catholick faction, or enemies to I. Hus. By reason whereof the priests of the popish clergy were brought, such as were faulty, into great distresse, and such as were not faulty, into great feare. Insomuch that they were glad to fall in, at least not to fall out with the protestants, being afraid to displease them. By this meanes M. Hus began to take some more liberty vnto him, and to preach in his church at Bethleem, and none to controll him: by the same meanes the people also receiued some comfort, and the king much gaine and money by that reason.

The priests of Boheme disliked and taxed for their ill life.

And thus the popish clergy, while they went about to persecute I. Hus, were inwrapped themselues in great tribulation, and afflicted on euery side, as well of lay men, as of learned men of the clergie. Insomuch that women also and children were against them. And by the same reason, wherewith they thought to entangle him, they were ouerthrowne themselues. For the doctors which before condemned this doctrine in I. Hus, for intollerable heresie, and cried out so much against him, for teaching that temporall lords might take away temporall liuings from the clergy sinning habitualiter, that is, lying & continuing stil in the custom of iniquity: now when the K. and the lords temporall beganne to mearse them and bereaue them of their temporalties for their transgressions, the said doctors did keepe silence and durst speake neuer a word. Againe, where the foresaid doctors before could not abide in John Hus, that tithes were to be counted for pure almes, now coming to the Guildhal, were faine to entreat for their temporall goods, not to be taken from them, pleading the same temporalties to bee mere almes & deuotion of good men, giuen vnto the church. Ex Cochl.

The popish doctors & priests ouerthrowne in their owne reason.

And thus now did they themselues grant the thing, which before they did condemne. The more that the popes clergie was pinched, the more grudge and hatred redounded to John Hus, although he was in no cause thereof, but only their owne wicked deseruings. For the which cause Steuen Paletz, & Andreas de Broda, beeing the chiefe champions of that faction, though they could not remedie the cause, yet to ease their minds, wrote sharpe and cruell letters to master Hus. And to helpe the matter forward, the pope also here must helpe at a pinch, who likewise writeth his letters to Wencellaus king of Boheme, which was brother to Sigismund emperor, for the suppressing of John Hus and of his doctrine. Which was in the fifth and last yeere of his popedome, An. 1414. The tenor of whose letters to king Wencellaus in this wise proceedeth.

The letter of pope Iohn to king Wencellaus.

The letter of pope Iohn to king Wencellaus.

IOhn bishop seruant of Gods seruants, to his welbeloued son in Christ Wencellaus, king of Romanes and of Boheme, greeting and apostolicall benediction. Among other desires and delights of our heart; who, although vnworthy, represent the roome of Christ here in earth; this doth chiefly redound to our singular comfort, so often as we doe heare of the brotherly entreatie of peace and of concord (by which concord kingdoms doe encrease, as contrary by discord they are diminished) which is between your honor, & our welbeloued son in the Lord, Sigismund your brother germaine and cosin, for the noble king of the Romanes, &c. And furthermore it followeth in these words: And as we haue cause to ioy at the premisses: so likewise againe the heauie rumors which are here, doe trouble and dampe our minds: For wee heare, that in diuers places vnder your dominion, there be certaine which doe follow and leane to the errors of that archhereticke Wickliffe, whose bookes haue bene long since condemned in the general Romane councell, to be erroneous, hereticall, and swaruing from the catholicke faith. And furthermore, which is worst of all, the said persons cleauing to the opinions of the hereticks (lest they should be corrected of their superior powers for their excesse, to couer their naughtines and stubbornes in despising the commandements of the apostolicall seat) do openly teach disobedience and contempt of the keyes and ecclesiastical censure, to the subuersion of the apostolicall dignity, setting at nought the decrees of the holy fathers, and canons. Wherefore we do exhort your worship for the mercy of our God, as hartily as we may or can, that it would please you, as we desire & hope you wil (so effectuously) to shew forth your regall power, both for the glory of God, and defence of the catholike faith (which you go about to defend) and for the conseruation of your kingly name, state and honor, for the prosperous & safe gouernment of your kingdom and dominions, as it becommeth a catholick prince, wherby this blot blot of hereſie (which doth ſo lamentablie and miſerably ſpring and creepe in thoſe parts, and doth ſo infect the minds of mortall men, to the deſtruction of their ſoules, and doth ſequeſter them from the congregation of the pure and catholike faith and truth) may be rooted out, &c. Giuen at Bononia in the Ides of Iune, in the fifth yeere of our popedome, &c.

In this epiſtle of pope Iohn aboue preſtred, forſomuch as mention is made of a certaine councel before holden at Rome (which was foure yéeres before) againſt the articles and bookes of Iohn Wickliffe: it ſhall not be impertinent nor out of purpoſe to repeate a certaine merry hiſtory, and worthy otherwiſe to be noted at, written by Nicolas Clemangis of a certaine ſpirit, which ruled the popiſh councels: his words are theſe.

The ſame pope called a councel at Rome about foure yéers before, at the earneſt ſuite of diuers men. And a maſſe of the holy Ghoſt being ſaid at the entrance into the ſaid councell, (according to the accuſtomed maner) the councell being ſet, and the ſaid Iohn ſitting higheſt in a chaire prepared for him for that purpoſe: Behold an vglie and dreadfull Owle, or as the common prouerbe is, the euill ſigne of ſome miſchance of death to follow, comming out of the backe halfe of him, flew to and fro, with her euill fauoured voice, and ſtanding vpon the middle beame of the church, call her ſtaring eyes vpon the pope ſitting. The whole companie began to marueil, to ſee the night Crow, which is wont to abide no light, how hee ſhould in the mid day come in the face of ſuch a multitude, and iudged (not without cauſe) that it was an ilfauoured token. For behold, ſaid they, (whiſpering one in an others eare) the ſpirit appeareth in the ſhape of an Owle. And as they ſtood beholding one an other, and aduiſing the pope, ſcarcely could keepe their countenance from laughter. Iohn himſelfe, vpon whom the Owle ſtedfaſtly looked, bluſhing at the matter, began to ſweat and to fret and fume with himſelfe, and not finding by what other meanes he might ſalue the matter, being ſo confuſed, diſſoluing the councell, roſe vp and departed. After that there followed another ſeſſion: in the which the Owle againe, after the maner aforeſaid, although, as I beléeue, not called, was preſent, looking ſtedfaſtly vpon the biſhop; whom hee beholding to be come againe, was more aſhamed then hee was before (and iuſtly;) ſaying he could no longer abide the ſight of her, and commanded that ſhee ſhould be driuen away with battes and ſhoutings: but ſhee being afraid neither with their noiſe, neither of any thing elſe, would not away, vntill that with the ſtrokes of the ſticks, which were throwne at her, ſhe fell downe dead before them all. This I learned of a faithfull friend, who at the ſame time came to Rome: the which thing I ſcarcely crediting for the rareneſſe of the matter, he affirmed by his oth, that it was moſt certaine and true: adding moreouer, that all there preſent were much offended, and did greatly deride that councell called for ſuch a purpoſe, and by little and little the councell was diſſolued, nothing done there, as he ſaith. Although it hath not beene alwaies ſéene that ſuch ſpirituall Doues haue béene preſent with popes and their councels, and gouerned them: yet their euill doctrine declareth no leſſe. Reade, gentle Reader, the booke of Clemangis, and thou ſhalt not thinke thy labour euill beſtowed. For hee hath both learnedly, truely, fréely, and godly bewraied the filthines of Antichriſt, and his miniſters, their wickednelſe, impietie and cruelty, and the miſerable ſtate and face of the church, &c. And thus much for pope Iohn.

The Councell of Conſtance.

The councel of Conſtance.

HEre by the way is to be noted and vnderſtood, that during all this time of pope Iohn, there were 3. popes raigning together, neither was yet the ſchiſme ceaſed, which ſo long time had continued, the ſpace (as I ſaid) of 29. yéeres. By the reaſon whereof a generall councell was ordained and holden at Conſtance in the ſame yeere, Anno 1414. being called by Sigiſmund the emperour, and pope Iohn the three and twentith, for the pacifying of the foreſaid ſchiſme, which was then betwéene three popes, ſtriuing for the popedome: The firſt whereof was Iohn, whom the Italians ſet vp: The ſecond was Gregorie, whom the Frenchmen ſet vp: The third was Benedict, whom the Spaniards placed. In this ſchiſmaticall ambitious conflict, euery one defended his pope, to the great diſturbance of chriſtian nations. This councell endured foure yéeres long, wherein all their matters were decided moſt by foure nations, to ſay, the Engliſh, Germaine, French, and Italian nation. Out of which foure nations were appointed and choſen foure Preſidents to iudge and determine the matters of the councell. The names of which Preſidents were theſe; Iohn the Patriarke of Antioch for France, Anthonie archbiſhop of Rigen for Italy, Nicolas archbiſhop of Geneſuenſis for Germanie, and Nicolas biſhop of Bathe for England; by whom many great and profitable things to the glorie of God, and publike profit, might haue beene concluded, if the rotten fleſh of the churchmen could haue bidden the ſalt of the Goſpell, and if they had loued the truth: But as Gregorius Nazianzenus writeth, there lightly come few generall councels, but they end more with diſturbance, then tranquillitie. So it happened in this councell: for whereas Iohn the 23. in the firſt Seſſion exhorteth them by theſe words taken out of the 8. of Zacharie: Veritatem diligite: that is to ſay: Loue the truth; further, monithing them, and ſpecially the Diuines, euery man to do his endeauour for the vnitie of the church, and to ſpeake their mind fréely: but how ſoone this his exhortation was forgotten, it appeared ſhortly after by the deſpiſing of the prophets, and persecuting of Christ in his members, as by the grace of Christ shall appeare hereafter in the processe of this storie. First this John did resigne his papacie, the emperor giuing him thankes kissed his feet.

Afterward the said John repenting him that he had so done, sought meanes to flee; whereunto Fredericke Duke of Austrich did assist him; for he changing his garments, fled by night with a small companie. And when hee was now come vnto Schaffe house to goe into Italy, the emperor pursuing, tooke him, and proclaimed Fredericke traitour, and for that cause tooke away certaine cities from him. At the last the matter was appealed vnder this condition, that Fredericke should require grace of the emperor, and resigne all his possessions vnto him. Whereupon the emperour receiued him againe into fauor, and restored him to his dukedome. This pope being thus deposed, was committed vnto the county Palatine, and by him caried to the castle of Manheime, where he was kept prisoner by the space of three yeres. Afterward hee was againe by pope Martine admitted to the number of cardinals.

Duke Fredericke of Austrich proclaimed a traitor.

Pope John taken and cast into prison.

This pope John was deposed by the decree of the councell, more then 40 most grieuous and hainous crimes being obiected and proued against him: as that hee had hired Marcilus Vermensis a physition, to poyson Alexander his predecessour. Further, that he was an heretick, a simoniake, a liar, an hypocrite, a murtherer, an inchanter, a diceplayer, an adulterer, and a Sodomite; and finally what crime is it, that he was not infected withall?

Marke the good qualities of pope John.

And now to returne vnto the councell, first we will declare the order of their Sessions, with things therein concluded, in general: then we will (Christ willing) adioyne the speciall tractation of such matters, as pertaine to the storie of the Bohemians, and John Hus, and Hierome of Prage, who in the same vngodly councell were condemned and burned.

This councel therfore of Constance, which was summoned by the emperour Sigismund, and pope John 23, about the natiuitie of our Lord Jesus, An. 1414, began the same yere to be assembled about the latter end of the yere. Which first beginning as the maner is, with a masse of the holy Ghost, as they were singing according to their custome their Hymne, Veni sancte spiritus, there was at the same time a certaine bill set vp in the church by some well disposed man, as it seemed, wherin was contained these words following: Alijs rebus occupati nunc adesse vobis non possumus; That is to say: We are otherwise occupied at this time, we cannot intend to come to you. Here is also to bee remembred the worthie saying of the emperor Sigismund, when talke was ministred as touching the reformation of the spiritualtie, and some said, quòd oporteat incipere à Minoritis, that is, the reformation ought first to begin at the Minorites; the emperour answering againe: Non à Minoritis, sed à Maioritis, that is, not with ỹ Minorites, saith hee, but with the Maiorites. Meaning, the reformation ought first to begin with the pope, cardinals and bishops, and other superiour states of the church; and so to descend after to the inferiours. This much by the way, and now to the purpose and order of the Sessions as wee promised. The which councell continued, as is afore said, by the space of foure yeeres, and had in it 45. Sessions, wherein many things were concluded, the which all together were too long to be recited in this place: as the deposition of three seuerall popes, which were before spoken of, the hearing of certain legats. Yet I mind to make some briefe recapitulation of the most principall matters there done in the Sessions orderly ensuing.

A writing set vp how the holy Ghost had no leisure to come to the councell of Constance.

The worthie answere of the emperor touching the order of reformation.

1 In the first Session chiefly was concluded, first that this councell was lawfully congregate.

Note by this example, the authority of councels preferred before the pope.

2 Item, that the going away of the pope should bee no let or stay, but the councell might proceed.

2 Wherein note (gentle Reader) that the authority of the generall councell is aboue the pope, contrarie to their owne doctrine.

3 3 Item, this councell should not be dissolued before the church were reformed, as well in the superiours, as inferiours.

4 In the 4. Session amongst other things, this was first concluded: That a Synode congregate in the holy Ghost, making a generall councell, representing the whole catholike church here militant, hath power of Christ immediately, to the which power euery person, of what state or dignitie soeuer he be, yea being the pope himselfe, ought to be obedient in all such things as concerne the generall reformation of the church, aswell in the heads, as in the subiects.

{Anno 1415}

Item, the said pope should not translate the court of Rome and the officers of the same court, from the city of Constance. And that all his censures, doings and workings after the time of his departure, whatsoeuer he should enterprise to doe to the preiudice of this councell, should be of no effect.

5 In the 5. Session the same articles were repeated and concluded againe.

6 In the 6. Session procuration and citation was sent out against the pope.

Commissioners appointed to heare John Hus.

Item, commissioners were appointed out of the foure nations for the hearing of John Hus, which shall be hereafter mentioned in his storie following.

Item, the memorie of John Wickliffe was condemned, and the sentence giuen in the councell holden at Rome vpon the condemnation and burning of Wickliffes bookes, was there confirmed.

Item, in the same Session, citation was sent out against Hierome of Prage, the tenor whereof followeth after in the storie of the said Hierome. Citation granted against Ieroome of Prage.

Item, in this session was decreed against libels of infamy.

In the 7. session nothing was handled, but that the tenour of the citation against pope John was recited. 7

In the 8. Session, the sentence and condemnation of John Wickliffe, and his 45. articles was recited, and sentence giuen against his memorie and bones to bee burned. The tenor whereof is rehearsed in the historie of John Wickliffe before passed, fol. 413. 8 Sentence giuen for the burning of Wickliffes bones.

In the 9. Session, the matter and cause of pope Iohn was againe intreated, and commissioners appointed to enquire vpon his cause, and iudges for the same. 9

In the 10. Session, suspension was giuen out and read against the said pope. 10

In the 11. and 12. Sessions, notaries were assigned and definitiue sentence giuen against the said pope: where also was decreed that none of them that contended before for the papacy, should be chosen pope. 11 12

In the 13. Session was decreed, Quod nullus presbyter sub poena excommunications communicet populo sub vtraque specie panis & vini: That is, that no priest vnder paine of excommunication shal communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds of bread and wine. 13 The people of Christ excommunicated from the communion of the holy cup.

In the 14. Session, came in the resignation of pope Gregory the 12, which was one of the 3. before mentioned, striuing for the papacy, with certaine other articles concerning the election of the bishop of Rome, and the ratification of their resigning, which gaue ouer the papacy. 14

Then ensueth the 15. Session, in the which silence was commanded on all parts vnder paine of excommunication, and the great curse, that no person or persons high or low, of what estate or degree soeuer he were, emperour, king, cardinall, or other, should disturbe the said session with any maner of noise, either by hand, foote or voice. This being done, the sentence and condemnation against John Hus, was read and published, which after in the storie of John Hus, followeth to be seene more at large. 15 The solemne publishing of the sentence of condemnation against John Hus.

In the 16. Session, ambassadors were assigned by the councell to go into Arragon to Benedictus the 13. to intreate with him for the resignation of his papacie, as the other two had done before. 16

Item, power was giuen to iudges, to cite vnder paine of deprivation, all such as priuily departed away from the councell: in the which session also the sentence against John Hus was confirmed and ratified.

In the 17. Session, the emperour tooke vpon him a iourney to the king of Arragon, to entreate with pope Benedictus. An excommunication denounced against all such as should go about to empeach the emperours iourney about that matter, &c. 17 The emperors iourney into Arragon.

Item, praiers and processions were determined to be made by the councell, euery Sunday for the same cause, with an hundred daies of pardon giuen to them that would be present thereat; and that all prelats should be present at euery of these said masses and processions in their pontificalibus. Granting besides to euery priest that said one masse, for the same a 100. daies of pardon. And to all other that once a day should say one Pater noster, and one Aue, for the safety of the emperour, fortie daies of pardon. Pardons were here vngood cheape.

In the 18. Session, certaine iudges were assigned for the hearing of matters, which the councel had no leisure to heare. 18

It was there also decreed, that such letters and buls as were written in the name of that councell, should bee receiued with no lesse credit and authoritie, then the buls proceeding from the see apostolicall, and that the falsifiers of the same should incurre no lesse penaltie, then the falsifiers of the other. Legates also and ambassadors were sent into Italie.

In the 19. Session, which was the same yeer in the moneth of September, Hierome of Prage, who was cited, as is before said, was accused of heresie, and cast into prison by the said councell, and constrained to abiure. The which his abiuration hereafter followeth to be seene in his historie. 19

Item, it was decreed: Quod non obstantibus saluis conductibus Imperatoris, Regum, &c. possit per iudicem competentem de hæretica pravitate inquiri, &c. That is, notwithstanding the safe-conduct giuen by the emperor and kings, &c. inquirie may be made against a man for heresie by a sufficient iudge, and processe to be made according to the law. Concilium infringum.

The causes of heresies were committed to certaine iudges and deputies.

Item, the Chart called Carolina, and diuers other Charts and constitutions concerning the liberties of the church of Rome, being brought forth were approued and confirmed. And how certeth it that the Chart of Constantines donation, is not here mentioned.

In the 20. Session, letters and instruments were made, and set vpon church doores, to require and admonish Duke Fredericke to restore againe vnto George bishop of Austrich, such lands, rents, and reuenues as hee detained and withheld 20 Prouide that the churchmen withheld, vnder paine of interdittement, suspending and excommunication.

During the time of this session, the ambassadors returned out of Arragon frō pope Benedict, and were heard with great audience; where as certaine articles and conditions betweene the pope and the councell were brought forth and agreed vpon, to the number of twelue.

21 Anno 1416

In the yeere of our Lord 1416, was the 21 session, beginning after their manner with a masse of the holy Ghost, with processions, and such other rites; in the time of which masse, James bishop of Londy made a sermon, taking for his theme these words, Exprobrauit Deus incredulitatem eorum & duritiam: That is, the Lord rebuked their misbeliefe and hardnesse, &c. This sermon being ended, Jerome of Prage which had abiured, as is said, the yeere before, being present thereat, stood vp vpon a certaine bench or forme, replying against the foresaid James and his sermon, alleadging and preaching diuers and sundry things, whereupon the Patriarch of Constantinople, one of the commissioners, proceeded against him, pronouncing the sentence definitiue, which hee had in writing against the said Jerome; which sentence being read and approued by the councell (the tenth whereof insueth in his history) the said Jerome was deliuered vnto the secular power, and burned.

Jerome of Prage replied against the sermon of the bishop of Londy.

22. 23 The 22. and 23. sessions containe no worthy matter, but only the placing of the ambassadors of Alphonsus king of Arragon: and graunting them voices in the Councell.

24 In the 24. session, citation was giuen out against Benedict, keeping with Alphonsus king of Arragon.

25 The 25. session containeth nothing but a certaine Commendam giuen to the church of Dlemicensis.

26 The 26. session there was nothing else handled, but the vniting and incorporating of the ambassadors of the king of Nauarre into the Councell, and also concerning the derogation of the priority of voices.

27. 28 Anno 1417

After this, followed the 27. and 28. sessions, which were in the yeere 1417. Wherein was intreated the relation and declaration concerning the cause betwixt duke Fredericke and the bishop of Trident, and processe giuen out against the said duke, accusing him of sacriledge, and also excommunicating him for not obeying the admonition of the Councell, concerning the vsurpation and detaining of the city of Trident, and other possessions from bishop George, as is afore specified.

29. 30 In the 29. and 30. sessions, protectors and notaries were giuen out in the cause against pope Benedict, and order decreed vpon his obstinacy; wherein also the withdrawing of the king of Arragon from the same pope, was recited and approued by the Councell.

31 In the 31. session, certaine instruments and speciall letters monitory were directed from the Councell to a certaine earle of Italy named Comes virtutum, for laying violent hands vpon Albert bishop of Alce, and for bringing him to prison; requiring the said earle, vnder paine of interdiction excommunication, to set the said bishop at liberty. Also, another decree was set forth for the restoring againe the liberties of the church of Baron.

32. 33 Pope Benedict accused. In the 32. and 33. sessions, the accusation of pope Benedict was renewed, and his obstinacie accused, and witnesse brought in; at which thing doing, the emperor Sigismund was present.

34 In the 34. session, the cause of the foresaid pope was heard, and processe giuen out against him.

35 In the 35. Session, the ambassadors of the king of Castile were brought in, and vnited to the Councell, and instruments thereof made and read. Also, that notwithstanding the othes made to the foresaid pope, men might lawfully forsake his obedience.

36 The pope excuseth the councell. In the 36. session, a certaine citation was made and read against the pope, containing his deprivation, and the sentence against him, and instruments made vpon the same. And whereas this pope had thundred out his curses, deprivations and excommunications against them; the said synod did annihilate all his doings.

37 The 37. session did renew againe the accusation of the foresaid pope, and the sentence definitiue against him was published.

38 In the 38. session certaine decrees were made touching the annihilating of the penalties of the ambassadors of king Henrie, sonne of Alphonsus king of Arragon. Also, another decree was made touching the reuocation of the voices granted to the ambassadors of the king of Arragon.

Thus pope Benedict being deposed and excommunicated, as is aforesaid, in the next sessions following they addressed themselues to the election of a new pope, beginning first in the 39 Decrees for generall councels. 39. session, to giue out decrees concerning generall Councels, and prouision for the auoiding of such like schismes hereafter. Decreeing euery tenth yeere to haue a generall Councell, after the two Councels that should follow immediatly after this; of the which, the one should bee kept within fiue yeeres then next following; and the second within seuen yeeres after that.

Item, in the same session was drawne out a forme touching such things as the pope should professe and bind himselfe to obserue at the time of his election, of the which forme the order and tenor is this.

The profession which the pope is bound to.

I. N. elected for pope, professe with heart and mouth vnto almighty God, whose church I take vpon me to gouerne by his helpe, and to blessed Saint Peter the prince of the Apostles, so long as I shall endure in this fraile and brittle life, firmely to beleeue and hold the holy catholike faith after the traditions of the Apostles, of generall Councels, and of other holy fathers, and namely of the eight generall Councels, Nicene the first, the second of Constantinople, Ephesine the third, Chalcedone the fourth, the fifth and sixth of them in Constantinople, the seuenth of Nice, the eighth of Constantinople. And also of the generall Councels of Lateran, Lions, and Vienne, willing to obserue the same faith vnviolate euen to the vttermost, and to preach and defend the same, euen to the spending of my life and bloud, and also by all meanes possible to prosecute and obserue the rite of the sacraments canonically deliuered to the catholike Church. And this my profession and confession, by my commandement being written out by the Notary of the arches of the holy Church of Rome, I haue subscribed with mine owne hand, and sincerely with a pure mind and deuout conscience, I offer it vnto the Almighty God vpon such an altar, &c. In the presence of such witnesse, &c. Peuen, &c.

It was also decided in this session, that no prelats should be translated against their wils.

The third of the same month and the same yeere, followed the 40. session, wherein certaine decrees were constitute and read, as touching reformations to be made through the whole church by the pope that next should be, with the Councell, before this synod should breake vp. 40

Item, that they should so proceed to the election of the bishop of Rome, notwithstanding the absence of those Cardinals which were with pope Benedict in Spaine. This done, the order and manner was decreed for the election of the pope.

After these things thus decreed, in the next session, which was 41. the constitution of Clement the sixth was read, concerning the order and diet of the cardinals being then in the conclaue about the chusing of the pope; and vpon the same, oathes were ministred vnto the cardinals and other electors, binding them to obserue and keepe all such things as they should bee bound to, during the time of the election. 41

The order and maner of the conclaue in chusing the pope.

First, that they should enter into the conclaue within ten daies after the fortith session, which was this present day after supine set.

Secondly, that euery cardinall should haue but two seruitors attending vpon him at the most, either of the laity or clergie, as they would themselues.

Thirdly, that they should remaine together in the said conclaue, without any wall betwixt them, or any other couer, saue only bare curtaines, if any were disposed to sleepe.

Fourthly, that the conclaue should so be shut vp, and the entrie to the priuy chamber to be kept so straitly, that none of them should come in or out, nor any to haue recourse vnto them to talke with them priuily or apertly, nor they to admit any man to come to them, except by the consent of them all certain should be called about matters concerning the election.

Fifthly, that no man should send to them either messenger or writings.

Sixthly, that a competent window should be assigned vnto them to receiue in their victuals, but that no person might come in thereat.

Seuenthly, that no day after their first ingresse into the conclaue, beside bread, wine, and water, they should haue any more dishes but one of one onely kind, either of flesh or fish, egges, pottage, made of fish or flesh, not after the daintiest sort, beside salades, cheese, fruit, and confections, wherein there shall be no principall messe made but for sauce and taste.

Eighthly, that not one should be compelled to goe into the conclaue: but if they did all refuse to goe in, then they should be compelled thereunto.

Ninthly, that such as would goe out, might; but if they would all goe out before the pope were elect, they should be compelled to goe in againe, except such whom infirmity did excuse; but without the excuse of infirmitie, if any went out, he should no more be admitted, except they went all out together.

Tenthly, that such as went out by reason of infirmity, for to bee absent, and returne before the election be determined, may be admitted againe into the conclaue in the same state wherein they shall finde the election to stand.

Further and besides, the keepers of the conclaue should also be sworne to see all these premisses obserued and kept without fraud or guile, and that they should not straiten the cardinals and other electors aboue the order here taken.

And if the king be there himselfe, sitting in his throne of estate, he should receiue the same oth of the cardinals.

Vpon this, such as should be electors beside the cardinals, were chosen.

Furthermore, for as much as the goods and substance of such as were elect, were accustomed to be giuen and granted vnto

These were wise cardinals as they would vnto such as could catch them: whereupon vnder the pretence of the same, many did inuade the goods of the cardinals, and others which were in the conclaue, falsly saining them to be elected which were not to be elected. To stop the greedy rauening of such, a decree also was published in the same session.

These things thus prepared and set in order, the Patriarch of Constantinople, with the cardinals and other archbishoppes, bishoppes, abbats, priors, deanes, archdeacons, doctors, with other electors entring into the conclaue vpon munday, on thursday after they had hatched out a pope, being Saint Martins euen, whereupon they named him Martin. This Martin thus being elected, was straightway brought in by the Emperor and the Councell into the church of Constance, and there inthronised for pope, not without great solemnity and triumph. The twenty one day of the said moneth, this foresaid Martin, according to their accustomed pompe, was honorably brought in to bee crowned with sumptuous procession from the high church of Constance, vnto the monasterie of Saint Austin: the Emperor on foote, leading his horse by the bridle on the right hand, and the Marquesse of Bradenburge prince elector, likewise leading his horse on the left hand; the pope himselfe riding in the middest vpon his palfrey.

Pope Martin hatched.

The emperor leadeth the popes horse by the bridle on the right hand. The prince elector leadeth the popes horse on the left hand.

And thus being brought into the monastery aforesaid, and so reduced round about againe from thence to the high church of Constance, was there crowned with all magnificence.

Notwithstanding all this, yet all the trifling and fond vanity of this Councell more great then wise, did not end thus: for in the next session, which was the forty two, came out a decree in the name of the pope and the councell, discharging the bond of the emperor and the county Palatine, touching the safe custody of pope Iohn, who was by bond committed vnto them to be kept in safety.

In the 43. session, certaine other decrees and statutes were made by pope Martin in the said synod: annullating and reprouing all the acts and procedings of the other popes before, during the time of the schisme from the time of Gregory the eleuenth. As in matters concerning exemptions, vnions, fruits and profits of the church, benefices, simony, dispensations, tithes, and other burdens of the church. Also concerning the apparell of the clergy, and such other things.

43

Apparell of the clergy.

In the 44. session, the sage fathers of this councell were occupied about the determining in what place the next councell should be kept in. The forty fiue session brake vp and dissolued this synod.

44

Now to finish our tedious rehearsall of this synod: The cardinall Iordan by the commandement of the pope and the councell, with a high and loud voice pronounced these words, Dominii ite in pace; which is, Lords depart in peace: whereunto the standers by answered, Amen.

45

Thus the councell being dissolued, frier John bishoppe of Catthan, by the consent and commandement of the pope and the councell, went vp into the pulpit to make a sermon, taking for his theame: Vos autem tristitiam habetis: iterum autem videbo vos, & gaudebit cor vestrum: You are now in sadnesse, I will see you againe, and then your hearts shall reioyce. The which collation being ended, another cardinall named Anthony, was sent vp by the pope and the councell, with this proclamation. First, to dismisse the synod, and to giue euery man leaue to depart home. Also to declare the popes indulgence vnto them, who by the authority of God almighty, had granted to them all and euery one present at that councell, full absolution once in their life; so that euery one within two moneths after the hearing of this indulgence, should procure the same in forme of writing. Also, another indulgence was granted in like manner of plenary remission at the houre of death, and that was vnderstood as well of the houshold, as of the maisters themselues. But vnder this condition, that from the time of notification of the same, they should fast by the space of one whole yeere euery friday, for the absolution in their life time. And for the absolution at the houre of death, to fast the same Friday another yeere, except they had some lawfull impediment to the contrary, so that after the second yeere, they should fast vnto their liues end, or else to doe some other good worke. The which being in this maner proclaimed, the synod brake vp, and euery man departed home.

So that the whole multitude which were viewed to be in the towne of Constance betweene Easter and Whitsontide, were numbred to be 60500, strangers and forreners at that councell.

60500. strangers at the councell of Constance.

Here is to be noted that in this councell of Constance, nothing was decreed or enacted worthy of memory, but this onely, that the popes authority is vnder the councell, and that the councell ought to iudge the pope.

The generall councell aboue the pope.

And as touching the communion in both kinds, although the councell did not denie, but that it was vsed by Christ and his Apostles; yet notwithstanding by the same councell it was decreed to the contrary.

Communion in both kinds denied by this councell.

Hitherto we haue comprehended the order and discourse of this councell, with the acts and sessions concerning the same: which councell, although it was principally thought to be assembled, for quieting of the schisme betweene the three popes; yet notwithstanding, a great part thereof was for the cause of the Bohemians, and especially for Iohn Hus, as appeared by their preparation before the councell. For before the councell began, the emperor Sigismund aforesaid, sent certaine gentlemen Bohemians, which were of his own houshold, giuing them in charge to bring Iohn Hus, bachelar of Diuinitie, vnto the said councell; and that vnder his safe-conduct. The meaning and intent thereof was, that Iohn Hus should purge and cleere himselfe of the blame which they had laid against him: and for the more better assurance, the emperor did not onely promise him safe-conduct, that he might come freely vnto Constance, but also to returne againe into Boheme, without fraud or interruption: he promised also to receiue him vnder his protection, and vnder safegard of the whole empire. For the same only cause the emperor sent him afterwards the said safe-conducts double written, both in Latin and Almaine, the forme whereof doth hereafter ensue.

¶ Sigismund by the grace of God king of the Romans, of Hungary and Denmarke, Croatia, &c. To all princes as well ecclesiasticall as secular, dukes, marquesses, and earles, barons, captaines, borowmasters, iudges and gouernours, officers of townes, bourgages and villages, and vnto all rulers of the communalty, and generally to all the subiects of our empire, to whom these letters shall come, grace, and all goodnesse.

The safe-conduct giuen to maister Iohn Hus.

We charge and command you all, that you haue respect vnto Iohn Hus, the which is departed out of Boheme, to come vnto the generall councell, the which shall be celebrate and holden very shortly at the towne of Constance. The which Iohn Hus we haue receiued vnder our protection and safegard of the whole empire, desiring you that you will cheerfully receiue him when he shall come towards you, and that you intreat and handle him gently, shewing him fauor and good will, and shew him pleasure in all things, as touching the forwardnesse, ease, and assurance of his iourney, as well by land as by water.

Moreouer, we will that he and all his company, with his carriage and necessaries, shall passe throughout all places, passages, ports, bridges, lands, gouernances, lordships, liberties, cities, townes, bourgages, castels and villages, and all other your dominions, without paying of any manner of imposition or dane mony, peage, tribute, or any other manner of tolle whatsoeuer it be. We will also that you suffer him to passe, rest, tary, and to soiourne at liberty, without doing vnto him any manner of impeachment, or vexation, or trouble; and that if need shall so require, you doe prouide a faithfull company to conduct him withall, for the honor and reuerence which you owe vnto our Imperiall Maiesty. Yeuen at Spire the 18. of October, in the yeere of our Lord God 1414.

¶ By this it may appeare, that this safe-conduct was granted not in the time of the councell by the bishops, but before the councell by the emperor: who was or ought to bee the principall ordainer and director of the councell vnder God. Now whether the bishops in breaking and annulling this promise of the emperor, against the emperors mind, because the discussion thereof belongeth Ad materiam iuris, non facti, being a matter rather of law then of story, I will defer to reason this case with maister Cope, to such time as may be more conuenient to the full tractation thereof.

Ala. Copus. pag. 929.

Notwithstanding, briefly to touch and passe, let vs consider part of the reasons of the said Cope, how friuolous and false they be, and easie to be refelled. What (saith he) if he preached by the way comming vp? First, that it is false, vide infra page. What (saith he) if he stood obstinate in his heresie? What if hee sought to escape away after his comming vp? To this the lords of Boheme doe answere, that this safe-conduct was broken, and he imprisoned, not onely before he attempted to escape, or before he was condemned for an heretike, but also before hee was heard of the councell what he was. Vide infr. page.

Answere to Ala. Copus.

Further, where Cope saith, that the generall councell was aboue the emperor, and hath power in case of heresie to breake publike leagues and grants: to that I say, that this safe-conduct stood not only vpon the emperor, but also vpon the consent of the pope himselfe. Vide infr. page.

And admit that to be true, that the councell had power to make this decree, to breake promise with heretikes: yet this cannot bee denied, but that Iohn Hus was condemned and iudged iudged before that decree in the nineteenth session was made. Finally, when Cope hath proued by what scripture the councels haue power to defeat the authority of their emperors in such secular causes touching safe-conducts, and outward safety, then will I answere him more fully herein. But to the purpose againe of the story.

Iohn Hus taketh the emperors safe conduct.

Iohn Hus seeing so many faire promises, and the assurance which the emperor had giuen vnto him, sent answer vnto the emperor, that he would come vnto the councell. But before he departed out of the realme of Boheme, and specially out of the towne of Prage, hee did write certaine bils long enough afore, as well in Latine as in the Bohemian language, and Almaine, and caused them to be set and fastned vpon the gates of the cathedrall churches and parish churches, cloisters and abbies, signifying vnto them all, that he would goe to the generall councell at Constance; wherefore if any man haue any suspition of his doctrine, that he should declare it before the lord Conrade, or bishoppe of Prage, or if hee had rather, at the generall councell, for there hee would render and giue vp vnto euery one, and before them all, an account and reason of his faith. The example of his letters and intimations set vp were these, the copie whereof heere followeth.

¶ The letters of Iohn Hus set vp in common places of the citie of Prage.

Letters of Iohn Hus set vp.

MAster Iohn Hus, Bachelar of Diuinity, will appeare before the most reuerend father the lord Conrade, archbishop of Prage, and legat of the apostolike seat, in the next conuocation of all the prelats and clergy of the kingdome of Boheme, being ready alwaies to satisfie all men which shall require him to giue a reason of his faith and hope that he holdeth. And to heare and see all such as will lay vnto his charge either any stubbornnes of error or heresie, that they should write in their names there, as is required both by Gods law and mans. And if so be that they could not lawfully proue any stubbornnes of error or heresie against him, that then they should suffer the like punishments that he should haue had; vnto whom all together he wil answer at the next general councell at Constance, before the archbishop and the prelats, and according to the decrees and canons of the holy fathers, shew forth his innocency in the name of Christ. Dated the Sunday next after the feast of Saint Bartholomew.

The Intimations following, were drawne out of the Bohemian tongue.

Another intimation of Iohn Hus set vp for his going to Constance.

MAster Iohn Husinetz, doe signifie vnto all men, that I am ready to come and stand before the face of my lord the archbishop, and to answere to all things whereof I am falsly accused, in the next conuocation of Bachelars; and chiefly to this point, that in many places they doe report me an heretike, not hauing respect vnto iustice or to law, neither yet to my merits or deserts. Therefore, since that you which doe neuer cease to slander and backbite me with your words, doe vnderstand and know these things, come forth openly before the face and presence of the lord archbishop, and with an open mouth, declare and shew forth what false doctrine or other things ye haue heard me teach contrary to the catholike faith; and if that I shall be found faulty in neuer so small a matter, contrary or against the faith of Christ, or in any false doctrine, and that I doe chuse that or other things contrary to the faith of Christ, then I will hold my peace, and suffer punishment as an heretike. And if there be no man that will resist against me, or accuse me in this point, once againe I say vnto you, that I am ready to appeare at Constance in the famous congregation, to the end that I may stand in the company of the Diuines, euen before the face of the pope. Therefore whosoeuer knoweth any false doctrine contrary to the faith of Christ in me, let him come thither and shew it forth boldly, if he haue any thing to lay against me, and for my part I will not be slacke, if I may vnderstand or know it, to answere as well to small as great, as touching the truth which I haue receiued of God, and desire to be defended. All you good men therefore which loue the truth, say now whether by these my words I doe thinke or goe about any thing, either contrary to the law of God or man. If I be not admitted then to be heard, bee it knowne and manifest vnto all men, that it happeneth not through my fault the same day.

The offer of Iohn Hus to his enemies.

❧ This Epistle which followeth, was set vpon the gates of the kings palace, translated into Latin, out of the Bohemian tongue.

A writing of Iohn Hus at the kings gates.

VNto the Kings maiesty; the Queene, and to all such as are of his counsell, and to all other rulers and magistrates, which now are in the kings court, I Iohn Hus doe signifie and publish, that I haue vnderstood, not by any vaine rumor or tale, that there be letters brought from the pope to the kings maiesty, the contents whereof is this; That the kings maiesty should bring to passe, that the heretikes which were now lately sprung vp in his kingdome and dominions, should not take any firme or strong root. For so much as without any desert, as I trust by Gods grace, the fame or noise is sprung and blowne abroad: it shall be our part to foresee and take heed, that neither the kings maiesty, neither the noble kingdome of Boheme, should be driuen to beare or suffer any reproch or slander for me. Wherefore now of late I haue sent my letters to and fro, which I haue with great labour and diligence, caused to be openly set vp, to this intent, that I might thereby cause the archbishoppe to be carefull and diligent about the matter, signifying openly, that if there were any man in all Boheme, which did know me to bee a follower of any false or corrupt doctrine, that he should professe his name in the archbishoppe his court, and there to shew forth and declare what he thought. And forasmuch as there would none bee found or come forth, which would accuse me, the archbishop commanded me and my procurers to depart in peace. Wherefore I require and desire the kings maiesty, which is the defender of the truth, also the Queene, and their counsellers, and all other rulers and magistrates, that they would giue me a faithfull testimoniall of this matter. Forsomuch as I haue oftentimes willed and attempted this, and no man hath either accused me or troubled me: I doe it moreouer to be knowne vnto all Boheme, and to all nations, that I will bee present euen at the first time before the councell of Constance, in the most famous place, in the presence of the pope, the pope being president: and finally, in the presence of all others which will come to that most famous place; and that whosoeuer hath any suspition of me, that I haue either taught or defended any thing contrary vnto the faith of Christ, let him come thither also, let him declare there before or in the presence of the pope, and all the doctors of Diuinity, what erroneous or false doctrine I haue at any time followed or holden. More, if hee shall conuince me of any error, or proue that I haue taught any thing contrary vnto the christian faith, I will not refuse to suffer whatsoeuer punishment shall bee due for an heretike. But I hope and trust euen from the bottome of my heart, that God will not giue the victory to vnfaithfull and vnbeleeuing men, the which doe willingly kicke and spurne against the truth.

The same time Iohn Hus sent his procurers to the lord bishop of Nazareth, ordained by the Apostolike Sea Inquisitor of heresie of the citie and diocesse of Prage, requiring him, that if he had found any error in him, he would declare it openly. But the said bishoppe before the said procurer, and the publike Notary, with many other credible witnesses, answered, that he had often talked with Iohn Hus, and that he neuer knew any thing in him, but as becometh a godly and faithfull man; and this his testimony of Iohn Hus, hee approoued by his letters, the copie whereof is heere vnder written.

The testimony of the good bishop of Nazareth.

WEe Nicolas by the grace of God Bishop of Nazareth, and Inquisitor, specially deputed by the Apostolike seat, for heresies both of the citie and diocesse of Prage, by these presents we doe it to be knowne vnto all men, that wee in times past haue often communed and talked with that honourable man, master Iohn Hus, Bachelar of Diuinity, of the famous Vniuersitie of Prage, and haue had diuers and sundry conferences with him, both of the Scriptures and diuers other matters, and in all his sayings, doings, and behauiour, we haue proued and found him to bee a faithfull and a catholike man, finding no manner of euill, sinister, or by any meanes erroneous doings in him vnto this present. We doe witnesse and protest moreouer, how the said Iohn Hus, of late, in the cathedrall church of Prage, and in other both colleglate and parish churches, and in the Colledges of the Vniuersitie of Prage, and in the gates and porches of the most noble prince and lord, the Lord Wenceslaus king of Romans and of Boheme: also in the gates of the reuerend father the lord Conrade, archbishoppe of Prage, legat of the Apostilike see, and chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Prage, and of other princes and barons, then beeing in the citie of Prage, hath set vppe his letters written both in Latine, and in the Bohemian tongue, containing sententially in effect, how the foresaid master Iohn Hus would appeare before the reuerend father the lord Conrade, the foresaid archbishoppe of Prage, and all the prelates and clergie of the kingdome of Boheme, that shall bee congregated and called together by the said archbishoppe, at the day appointed in the said citie of Prage, ready alwaies to satisfie euery man that shall desire and require him to shew a reason of his faith and hope that hee holdeth, and to see and heare all and euery one which could proue any obstinacie of error or heresie lawfully against him, vnder the paine to receiue the like punishment: vnto whom all together hee would by Gods help, answere in the councell of Constance, which was now at hand, before the said lord archbishoppe and vs, with all other prelats, and there in Christs name, according to the decrees and canons of the holy holy fathers, to declare and shew forth his innocency. After the which letters, as is aforesaid, by the said master Iohn Hus openly set vp, there did no man appeare before vs, the which would accuse the said master Iohn Hus of any error, either of any heresie. For the euident witnes of all which things, we haue commanded these present letters to be made, and confirmed the same with the setting to of our seale. Dated in Prage xxx. of August, an. M.iiij.C.xiiij.

Upon which matter also, a publike instrument was drawn, testified with the hand and seale of the publike Notary, named Michael Puthatietz. The copy of which instrument here vnder followeth.

¶ An Instrument of Recognition, or protestation of the Lord inquisitor of Heresies.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the yeere of his natiuity, 1414. the thirtith of August, in the fifth yeere of the bishopricke of the most holy Father in Christ, Iohn, by the grace of God Pope, the three and twentith of that name, in the vppermost parlor of the house of the famous man the Lord Peter of Zwogsta, called Znirglits, master of the mint, of the most famous prince and lord, the lord Wenceslaus, king of the Romans and of Boheme, in the greater citie of Prage, about the abby of Saint Iames the Apostle, in the presence of me the publike Notary here vnder written, and certaine witnesses here within written, specially called for that purpose. There was personally present master Iohn Iessenitz, master of Art, procurer in the name of the honourable man, master Iohn Hus, Bachelar, formed in Diuinity of the Vniuersitie of Prage. Hee most humbly and earnestly required the reuerend father in Christ and Lord, Nicolas bishop of Nazareth, Inquisitor of Heresies for the citie and dioceese of Prage, specially appointed by the apostolike Sea, being there also present, saying: Reuerend father, doe you know any error or heresie in master Iohn Husnetz, otherwise called Hus? The which said Lord Nicolas, not compelled or constrained, but of his owne will and accord, freely and openly did there recognise, saying these or the like words in the Bohemian tongue:

I haue often and many times been conuersant with master Iohn Hus, and haue eaten and drunke with him: also I haue been often present at his sermons, and diuers of his collations which he hath made vpon diuers places of the scripture, and I neuer found or perceiued in him any error or heresie, but in all his words and deeds I haue found him alwaies a true and a catholike man, neither haue I found any thing that doth sauor of any error or heresie.

Againe, the said master Iohn his procurer, in the behalfe as aboue, required and asked the said lord Nicolas, Bishop and Inquisitor, whether any man haue accused the said master Iohn Hus of any heresie before him, being inquisitor for heresie, and hath conuicted him of heresie. He answered, that since the time he knew Iohn Hus, and that he was made inquisitor for heresie in the citie and dioceese of Prage (as is afore said) neuer any man accused, either conuinced the said master Iohn Hus of any heresie before him vnto this present time. Adding moreouer, that he the said master Iohn Hus did openly set vp his letters patents this present yeare aforesaid, in the said moneth of Aug. vpon the porches of the cathedrall church of Prage, and other collegiate and parish churches of the citie of Prage, and vpon the gates of our said lord, our lord the king, and the archbishop of Prage, containing in them this effect, how that he would appeare before Conrade archbishop of Prage, and all the prelats and clergy of the kingdome of Boheme, which should be congregated and called together at a certaine day of the month aforesaid, ready alwaies to satisfie all men as touching the faith and hope which he held, and to see and heare all or singuler that would lay any obstinacy of error or heresie vnto him, that they should determine themselues there, to suffer the like punishment, according to the extremity both of Gods law and mans law, vnto whom altogether hee would answere in his owne right before the said archbishop of Prage, and the said lord Nicolas, bishop and inquisitor aforesaid, and the prelats, euen in the next generall councell of Constance, and there according vnto the canons and decrees of the holy Fathers, declare and shew foorth his vprightnesse and innocency, vpon all and singuler: which proceedings, master Iohn de Iesenitz procurer, and in the procurers name or behalfe as afore, required and desired, that he might haue one or many publike instruments made vnto him by me the publike Notary here vnder written. These things were done the yeere, indiction, day, moneth, houre, place, and bishopricke, as is afore said, in the presence of these noble & famous men, the L. William de Zwirgelitz, Baron of the kingdome of Boheme, Peter his sonne, the lord Hlawaczion de Renow, likewise Baron, Wenceslaus de Lunarx, Vnssone de Miekoniz, Burgraue of the castell of Liechetenburg, Czitborius de Bodanetz Esquier, and William de Dupore, Knight of the said dioceese of Prage, with manie other worthy and credible witnesses, which were specially desired and required vnto the premisses. And I Michael, sometimes the sonne of Nicolas de Prachatitz, of the dioceese of Prage, and by the imperiall authority, publike Notary, was present, with the witnesses aforenamed, at the affaires aforesaid, at the request, demand, answere, and petition, and all and singuler the doings within written, and did see and heare all these things to be done in the foresaid manner and forme. But being busied with other matters, I haue caused this to be faithfully drawne and written, and subscribing the same with mine owne hand, haue published and reduced it into this forme, and haue signed it with my seale and name, accustomed, being called and required to beare witnes of all and singuler the premisses.

After this, as all the barons of Boheme were assembled in the abby of Saint Iames, about the affaires of the realme, where as the archbishoppe of Prage was also present; there the said Iohn Hus presented Supplications: by the which hee most humbly desired the barons, that they would shew him this fauor towards the said archbishop, that if the said archbishoppe did suspect him of any error or heresie, that he would declare it openly, and that he was ready to endure and suffer correction for the same at his hands. And if that he had found or perceiued no such thing in him, that hee would then giue him a testimoniall thereof, through the which he being as it were armed, hee might the more freely goe vnto Constance. The said archbishop confessed openly before all the assembly of Barons, that he knew not that the said Iohn Hus was culpable or faulty in any crime or offence; and this was his onely counsell, that the said Iohn Hus should purge himselfe of the excommunication hee had incurred: this report, which the archbishoppe had giuen of Iohn Hus, doth appeare by the letters which the barons of Boheme sent vnto the emperor Sigismund by the said Hus, in the towne of Constance.

Conrade the archbishop cleareth Iohn Hus.

Finally, all the prelats and clergy assembled together in the towne of Prage, in the archbishoppe his court, where as appeared personally the worshipfull master Iohn Iesenitz, doctor of decretals and procurer, in the name and behalfe of the honourable man master Iohn Hus, requiring that either the said master Iohn Hus, or that he in the name and behalfe of him, might be suffered to come into ẏ said archbishops court, to the presence of the archbishop, and the prelats which were there congregated together, for so much as master Iohn Hus is ready to satisfie all men which shall require him to shew any reason of his faith or hope which he holdeth, and to see and heare all and singuler which were there gathered together, that is to say, the lord archbishop and prelats, or any of them, which would lay any manner of obstinacy, or error, or heresie vnto him, that they should there write in their names, and according both vnto Gods law and mans, and the canon law, prepare themselues to suffer like punishment, if they could not lawfully proue any obstinacy of error or heresie against him: vnto whom altogether he would, by Gods helpe, answere before the said archbishop and the prelats in the next generall councell holden at Constance, and stand vnto the law, and according to the canons and decretals of the holy fathers, shew forth and declare his innocency in the name of Christ: Vnto the which master Iohn of Iesenitz doctor, one called Ulricus Swabe of Swabenitz, Marshall of the said archbishoppe, comming forth of the said court, did vtterly deny vnto the said master doctor and his party, all manner of ingresse and entrance into the court, and to the presence of the archbishoppe aforesaid, and of the prelats there gathered together. Pretending that the archbishoppe, with the prelats aforesaid, were occupied about the kings affaires, requiring the said master doctor, that hee would tarie in some place without the said Court, that when the archbishoppe and the prelats had finished the kings affaires, hee might then returne, and haue liberty to come into the court there. The said master Iohn Hus, and the doctor of law tarried a while, intreating to be admitted into the archbishoppes court: but seeing hee could preuaile nothing, he made there a solemne protestation of his request, that both he, and also master Iohn Hus and his part, could not be suffered to come into the archbishops court, to the presence of the archbishop and the prelats. Requiring of the foresaid Notary, publike instruments to be made of the same, which also was done.

Iohn Hus requireth to giue testimony of his faith, and could not be admitted.

And these were the things which were done, before Iohn Hus tooke his iourney to the generall councell of Constance, the which I minded briefly to rehearse, whereunto I will also anner somewhat, as touching his iourney thitherwards.

About the Ides of October, 1414. Iohn Hus being accompanied with two noble Gentlemen, that is to wit, Wencelat of Duba, and Iohn of Clum, he parted from Prage, and toke his iourny towards Constance. And in euery place as he passed, he notified his presence by his letters which he sent abroad, and especially in euery good towne or citie of name, the tenor whereof ensueth.

Iohn his iourney to Constance.

The letters which Iohn Hus set vp in cities as he passed to Constance.

MAster Iohn Hus goeth now vnto Constance, there to declare his faith which he hath hitherto holden, and euen at this present doth hold, and by Gods help will defend and keepe euen vnto death. Therfore euen as he hath manifested throughout all the kingdome of Boheme by his letters and intimations, willing before his departure to haue satisfied and giuen an account of his faith vnto euery man, which should obiect or lay any thing against him in the generall conuocation holden in the archbishop of Prages court: So likewise he doth manifest and signifie, that if there be any man in this noble and imperiall citie, the which will impute or lay any error or heresie vnto him, that hee should prepare himselfe to come vnto the councell, for so much as the said master Iohn Hus is ready to satisfie euery man at the said councell, which shall lay any thing vnto his charge as touching his faith.

How Iohn Hus was receiued by the way, going vp to the councell.

In all cities as he passed by, and principally when he was parted out of Boheme, and entred into Almaine, a great number of people did come vnto him, and he was very gently receiued and entertained of his hosts through all the townes of Germany, and specially of the citizens and burgesses, and oftentimes of the curats. Insomuch as the said Hus did confesse in a certain epistle, that he found in no place so great enemies as in Boheme. And if it happened that there were any brute or noise before of his comming, the streets were alwaies full of people, which were desirous to see Iohn Hus and gratifie him:

and amongst all other, specially at Nurremberge, whereas certaine merchants which went before, certified the cittizens of his comming. In the same citie there were many curats which came vnto him, desiring that they might talke with him secretly apart: vnto whom hee answered, that he loued much rather to pronounce and shew forth his mind and opinion openly before all men, then in hugger mugger, for he would keepe nothing close nor hidden. So after dinner, vntill it was night, he spake before the priests and senators, and diuers other cittizens, insomuch that they all had him in great estimation and reuerence, one only doctor except, which was a Charterhouse monk, and the curat of saint Sebauld, which did improue all that he had said.

John Husses hostelle named Faith.

The twentith day after that he departed out of the town of Prage, which was the third day of Nouember, he came vnto Constance, and lodged at an honest matrons house, being a widow named Faith, in Saint Galles streete.

The morrow after, the gentleman master Iohn de Clum, and master Henry Latzemboge, went to speake with the pope, and certified him that Iohn Hus was come, whom they had brought to Constance to the generall Councell, vnder the emperor his safe-conduct; desiring him also that hee on his part would grant the said Iohn Hus liberty to remaine in Constance, without any trouble, veration, or interruption. Vnto whom the pope answered; that albeit that Iohn Hus had killed his brother, yet would he goe about as much as in him lay, that no outrage or hurt should be done vnto him during his abode in the towne of Constance.

The pope consenteth to the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus.

In this meane time, the greatest aduersarie that Iohn Hus had, named master Steuen Paletz, the which was also a Bohemian borne, was come vnto Constance. But his companion master Stanislaus Znoma, was not yet passed the borders of Boheme, when he was stricken with an impostume, whereof he died. As soone as the said Paletz was come to Constance, hee did associate vnto him one Michael de Causis, the which had before falsely accused and blamed the said Iohn Hus. And this may not bee forgotten, that the said Paletz had been familiarly conuersant and acquainted with the said Iohn Hus from his youth vpward; but after that, there was a bull brought vnto Prage from pope Iohn the 23. against the king of Apulia, named Ladislaus, the said Iohn Hus withstood it openly, for so much as he saw that it was wicked and naught.

Stanislaus Znoma, Husses enemy, going to Constance, died by the way.

Steuen Paletz, and Michael de Causis, chiefe enemies to Hus.

A bull against Ladislaus king of Apulia.

And as touching the said Paletz, albeit that he had confessed at a certaine banquet in the presence of the said Iohn Hus, that the said bull was contrary to all equity and right: yet notwithstanding forsomuch as he was obliged and bound vnto the pope, by meanes of certaine benefices receiued at his hand, he maintained and defended the said bull against Iohn Hus. And this was the cause of the discord and falling out betweén them.

Michael de Causis.

As for Michael de Causis, the companion of master Paletz, he was sometime the curat of new Prage: but he not being content therewith, but seéking after a further pray, dreamed and imagined out a new deuice how to attaine vnto it, for he made a semblance that he had found out a new inuention or meane, whereby the mines of gold in Gilory, which were perished and lost, might be renewed & set on worke againe. By this meanes he did so much with the king Winceslaus, that he did put a great sum of mony into his hands, to doe that withall which he had promised.

This honest man, after he had labored and trauelled certaine daies about it, and perceiuing that he brought nothing to passe, and that by that meanes he was vtterly in despaire of his purpose, he conueied himselfe priuily out of the realme of Boheme with the rest of the money, and withdrew himselfe as a worthy bird for such a nest into the court of Rome. Such a man of such conditions was easily corrupt with money, and that by the aduersaries of the said Hus, and promised them to doe what he could for them, the which he did shortly after. The two iolly roisters, Steuen Paletz and Michael de Causis, drew out certaine articles against the said Hus, saying, that they had gathered them out of his owne writings, and specially out of his treatise which he had written of the Church. They trotted vp and downe, hither and thither, taking great paines to shew the said articles vnto the cardinals, bishops, monks, and such others of that sort, doing them also to vnderstand, that there were other matters of greater importance, which the said Iohn Hus had committed and done against the holy constitutions and other ordinances of the pope and the church: which if neede were, they said they would propound before the Councell. Through the kindling of this their fire, they did so incense the cardinals, and all the priests, that all they with one mind and consent, thought to cause the good man to be taken and laid hands on.

The wicked life of Michael de Causis Hus ses enemy described.

The enemies of Hus practise against him.

The 26. day after the said Hus was come to Constance, during all which time he was occupied in reading, writing, and familiar talke with his friends, the cardinals through the instigation and motion of Paletz and Michael de Causis, sent two bishops, to wit, the bishop of Augusta, and of Trident, and with them the Burrowmaster of the town of Constance, and a certaine knight, to the place where Iohn Hus lodged about dinner time, which should make report vnto him, that they were sent by the pope and his cardinals, to aduertise him that hee should come to render some knowledge or witnesse of his doctrine before them, as he had oftentimes desired, and that they were ready for to heare him.

Vnto whom Iohn Hus answered: I am not come for no such intent, as to defend my cause particularly before the pope and his cardinals, protesting that I neuer desired no such thing, but that I would willingly appeare before the whole assembly of the Councell, and there answer for my defence openly, without any feare or doubt, vnto all such things as shall be demanded or required of me. Notwithstanding, said he, forasmuch as you require me so to doe, I will not refuse to go with you before the cardinals. And if it happen that they euill intreat or handle me, yet neuertheless I trust in my Lord Iesus, that he will so comfort and strengthen me, that I shall desire much rather to die for his glory sake, then to denie the veritie and truth which I haue learned by his holy Scriptures. Wherefore it came to passe, that the bishops being instant vpon him, and not shewing any outward semblance, that they bare any malice or hatred against him in their hearts, albeit they had priuily laid garrisons both in the house where they were assembled, and also in other houses: Iohn Hus tooke his horse which he had at his lodging, and went vnto the court of the pope and the cardinals.

John Hus desired to plead his cause before the whole councell.

When he was come thither, and had saluted the cardinals, they began to speake to him in this sort: We haue heard many reports of you, the which if they be true, are in no case to be suffered. For men say that you haue taught great and manifest errors, and contrary and against the doctrine of the true church; and that you haue sowed your errors abroad through all the realme of Boheme, by a long space or time: wherefore wee haue caused you to be called hither before vs, that we might vnderstand and know how the matter standeth.

John Hus is come before the pope and the cardinals.

The words of the pope and the cardinals to Iohn Hus.

Vnto whom Iohn Hus answered in few words: Reuerend fathers, you shall vnderstand that I am thus minded and affectioned, that I would rather chuse to die, then I should be found culpable of one only error, much lesse of many and great errors. For this cause I am the more willingly come vnto the generall Councell, which is here appointed, to shew my selfe ready euen with all my heart to receiue correction, if any man can proue any errors in me. The cardinals answered him againe, that his sayings pleased them very well, and vpon that they went their way, leauing the said Iohn Hus, with master Iohn de Clum, vnder the gard and keeping of the armed men.

The answer of Iohn Hus to the pope and the cardinals.

In the meane season, they did subborne and furnish out a certaine Diuine, a Frier Francisane, a subtill and crafcie man, and a malicious hypocrite, for to question with the said Iohn Hus, which was compassed round about with armed men. This man drawing neere, in his monkish gesture, said: Reuerend master, I a simple and rude idiot am come vnto you for to learne, for I haue heard many strange and contrary things against the catholike faith, to be ascribed vnto you, the which doe diuersly moue my mind, being wholie inclined to the truth. Wherefore I doe desire you, euen for the loue which you beare vnto the truth, and to all good and godly men, that you would teach mee most simple and miserable man, some certaintie and truth. And first, men say that you hold opinion after the consecration and pronuntiation of the words in the sacrament of the altar, there remaineth onely materiall bread. Iohn Hus answered: that it was falsly attributed and imputed vnto him. Then said he: I pray you, is not this your your opinione No verily, said John Hus, I doe not so thinke of it. When the monke asked this question the third time, master John de Clum being somewhat moued with him, said: Why art thou so importunate vpon him? Verily, if any man had affirmed or denied any thing vnto me but once, I would haue beleeued him. And thou, albeit he hath shewed thee his minde so often, yet ceasest not to trouble him. Then said the monke: Gentle master, I pray you pardon me a poore idiot and simple frier; surely I did it of a good mind and intent, being willing and desirous to learne. This frier put forth another question vnto him, protesting his simplicitie and ignorance, what manner of vnitie of the Godhead and manhood was in the person of Christ? When John Hus had heard this question, he turning himselfe vnto master John de Clum, in the Bohemian language said: Truly this frier is not simple as he doth pretend, for hee hath propounded vnto me a very hard question. And afterward turning himselfe to the frier, hee said vnto him: Brother, you say that you are simple, but as I haue heard of you, I perceiue very well, that you are double and craftie, and not simple. It is not so verily, said the frier. Well, said John Hus, I will cause you well to vnderstand that it is so. For as touching the simplicitie of a man, it is required in things that concerne ciuilitie and manners, that the spirit, the vnderstanding, the heart, the words, and the mouth, should agree together; and I doe not perceiue that this is in you. There is in your mouth a certaine semblance of simplicitie, the which would very well declare you to be an idiot and simple, but your deeds shew plainly and euidently a great subtiltie and craft in you, with a great quicknesse and liuelinesse of wit, in that you haue proponed vnto me so hard and difficult a question.

Master John de Clum speaketh for John Hus.

A wolfe in a lambs skinne.

Notwithstanding I will not feare to shew you my mind in this question. And when he had made an end, the monke gaue him great thanks for his gentlenesse, and so departed. After that, the popes garrison which were about the said John Hus, told him, that this frier was called master Didace, who was esteemed and counted the greatest and most subtill Diuine in all Lumbardy. Oh, said Hus, that I had knowne that afore, I would haue handled him after another sort and fashion; but I would to God they were all such, then through the helpe and aid of the holy Scriptures, I would feare none of them. In this maner the said Hus, and master John de Clum, were left vnder the keeping of these men of armes, vntill foure of the clocke at after none. After which time, the cardinals assembled againe in the popes court, to deuise and take counsell what they should doe with John Hus. Then Stephan Paletz, and Michael de Causis, with diuers other of their adherents, made earnest sute that he should not be let goe at libertie againe, and hauing the fauor of the Iudges on their part, they bragged vp and downe in a manner, as they had bin mad men, and mocked the said John Hus, saying: Now we will hold thee well enough, thou art vnder our power and iurisdiction, and shalt not depart vntill such time as thou hast paid the vttermost farthing.

John Husses accusers triumph ouer him when he was taken.

A little afore night, they sent the Prouost of the Romane court vnto master John de Clum, to shew him that he might returne to his lodging: but as for John Hus, they had otherwise prouided for him. When master John de Clum heard these newes, he was wonderfully displeased, forsomuch as through their crafts, subtilties, and glosing words, they had so trained this good man into their snares, whereupon he went vnto the pope, declaring vnto him all that was done; most humbly beseeching him, that he would call to remembrance the promise which he had made vnto him and master Henry Latzembog, and that he would not so lightly falsifie and breake his faith and promise. The pope answered, that all these things were done without his consent or commandement, and said further to master Clum apart: What reason is it that you should impute this deed vnto mee, seeing that you know well enough that I my selfe am in the hands of these cardinals and bishops?

The pope breaketh promise.

In mine opinion, for so much as pope John feared that, which indeed did after follow, that he should be depriued of his dignity, he thought to win the fauor of these Herodian cardinals and bishops, by betraying this good man vnto them. So the said master Clum returned very pensiuefull and sorie: he complained very sore both priuily and openly, of the iniury and outrage that the pope had done, but all profited nothing. After this, the said John Hus was led by the officers to the chapter house of the great church of Constance, where hee was kept prisoner by the space of eight daies: from thence he was carried vnto the Iacobines, hard by the riuer of Rhine, and was shut vp in the prison of the abby, the which was hard by the Bogards.

The pope to please the councell, was against John Hus.

After he had been enclosed there a certaine time, he fell sore sicke of an ague, by meanes of the stench of the place, and became so weake, that they despaired of his life. And for feare lest this good man should die in prison, as others are wont to doe, the pope sent vnto him certaine of his Physitions for to cure and helpe him. In the midst of his sicknesse, his accusers made importunate sute to the principals of the councell, that the said John Hus might be condemned, and presented vnto the pope these articles hereunder written.

The imprisonment and sicknes of John Hus.

¶ Articles presented against Iohn Hus.

Articles against John Hus.

FIrst, hee doth erre about the sacraments of the church, and specially about the sacrament of the body of Christ, for so much as he hath openly preached, that it ought to be ministred openly vnto the people vnder both kindes, that is to say, the body and bloud. This article is euident, for so much as his disciples at this instant in Prage, doe minister the same in both kinds. Moreouer, it is affirmed by diuers, that he hath taught both in the schooles and in the church, or at the least that he doth hold this opinion, that after the words of consecration pronounced vpon the altar, there remaineth still materiall bread in the sacrament. This article shall be knowne by his examination.

The supper of the Lord.

Secondly, hee doth erre as touching the ministers of the Church, for so much as hee saith, that they cannot consecrate or minister the sacraments when they are in mortall sinne. This article shall likewise bee knowne by his examination. Notwithstanding all that which is here contained, may bee gathered by his writings De ecclesia; the which if hee denie, let there then bee some Diuines and others appointed, to peruse and looke ouer his said writings of the church. Moreouer, he saith, that other men beside priests may minister the sacraments. This article is euident, for so much as his disciples doe the same at Prage, the which of themselues doe violently take the sacrament out of the treasury, and communicate among themselues, when the holy communion is denied vnto them. By this and other things also, it is sufficiently euident, that hee hath taught that euery man being without mortall sinne, hath the power of orders or priesthood, for so much as such one-lie as haue taken orders, ought to minister the sacraments vnto themselues. And because hee proceedeth from small matters vnto great and weightier, it doth consequently appeare and follow, that those which be in state of grace, can bind and loose.

Of the administration of the sacraments.

Thirdly, he doth erre as touching the church, and specially for that he doth not allow and admit that the church signifieth the pope, cardinals, archbishops, and the clergy vnderneath them; but saith, that this signification was drawne out from the schoolemen, and in no case to be holden or allowed. This article is manifest by his said treatise vpon the Church.

Of the church.

Moreouer, he doth erre concerning the church, in that he saith, that the church ought not to haue any temporall possessions. And that the temporall Lords may take them away from the church and the clergy without any offence. This error is euident, for so much as through his doctrine and inticements, many churches in the kingdome of Boheme, and in the citie of Prage, are already spoiled and robbed of a great part of their temporalties and goods. He saith also, that Constantinus and other secular princes erred by inriching and indouing churches and monasteries. This article is manifest by that which goeth next before.

Ecclesiasticall reuenewes.

Fourthly, he erreth as touching the church, in that he saith, that all priests are of like power, and therefore affirmeth, that the reseruations of the popes casualities, the ordering of bishops, and the consecration of the priests, were inuented onelie for couetousnesse. This article doth somewhat appeare by those afore going, but by his examination shall be more euident.

The bishops power.

Fifthly, he erreth concerning the church, in that he saith, that the church being in sinne, hath no power of the keies, when as the pope, cardinals, and all other of the priests and clergy are in deadly sinne; the which he saith is possible enough. This also doth appeare in his treatise vpon the Church, in his first error as touching the ministers of the church.

The power of the keies of the church.

Sixthly, hee erreth touching the church, for as much as through contempt he doth not feare excommunication. This doth notoriously appeare by his owne doings, that he did contemne and despise the Apostolike and ordinary censure, and in all the Apostolike excommunications and iniunctions, he hath borne himselfe vpon the diuine commandements, and in contempt of the keies, to the setting out of his hypocrisie, he hath said masse all the waies betweene this and the citie of Prage, and thereby hath prophanat the procesle and authority of the church.

Excommunication.

Seuenthly, hee erreth againe as touching the church, because he keepeth not the institutions and inuestitures thereof, but holdeth opinion that euery man hath authority to inuest and appoint any man to the cure of soules. This is euident by his owne doings, for so much as many in the kingdome of Boheme, by their defenders and fauorers, or rather by himselfe, were appointed and put into parish churches, the which they haue long ruled and kept, not being appointed by the Apostolike sea, neither yet by the ordinarie of the citie of Prage.

Inuestitures.

Eighthly, hee erreth as touching the church, in that hee holdeth opinion, that a man being once ordained a priest or a deacon, cannot bee forbidden or kept backe from the office of preaching. This is likewise manifest by his owne doings, for so much as hee himselfe could neuer be letted from preaching, preaching, neither by the apostolike sée, neither yet by the archbishop of Prage.

Lupus agnum accusat quod turbarit fontem.

And to the intent that the said John Husse, who is clothed in sheepes clothing, and inwardly a rauening Wolfe, may be the better knowne by his fruits, for the better information of you most reuerend fathers; I say, that from the first time that he tooke in hand, or went about to sow such errors and heresies, the which afterward he did indeed, hee vnderstanding and perceiuing himselfe to bee withstanded and gainesaid, by the Germaines, which were in the Vniuersitie of Prage, forsomuch as he could conclude nothing, because they had three voices, and he on his part had but one only voice: hee went about and brought to passe, and that by the secular power, that the Germaines should haue but one voice, and hee and his parts three voices: the which thing when the Germaines once perceiued, rather then they would lose or forsake any part of their right, which they had in voices, or bee in danger in their persons, the which would then haue ensued vpon it, to saue themselues, they wholly with one consent agreed together to depart out of Prage, and by this meanes this solemne and famous Vniuersitie of Prage was made desolate, that had brought forth so many notable men in diuers sciences. Behold this his first fruits which diuided that so famous Vniuersitie, forsomuch as grapes are not gathered of thornes, neither figges of brambles.

A heaping together of many grieuous crimes.

The departure of the Germaines from the Vniuersity of Prage.

Moreouer, when there were questions moued amongst the diuines of the Vniuersitie of Prage vpon the 45. articles of John Wickliffe, and that they had called a conuocation, and all the diuines of Boheme (for the Germaines were already departed) they concluded that euery one of those articles were either hereticall, seditious, or else erroneous. Hee alone held the contrarie opinion, that none of those articles were either hereticall, seditious, or erroneous, as afterward he did dispute, hold, and teach in the common schooles of Prage, whereby it is euidently enough foreséene, that he doth affirme those articles of Wickliffe, the which are not only condemned in England, but also by the whole church, because they were first inuented and set forth by the members of Antichrist.

The 45. articles of Wicklife.

Moreouer, hee being complained of to the archbishop of Prage, that hee preached and set forth certaine articles which were hereticall, false and seditious, hee was forbidden by the said archbishop to preach any more, and proceeded against him, according to the canonicall sanctions, the which processe is confirmed by the apostolike sée, and published as well in the court of Rome, as without: the which John Hus and his adherents haue diuers & manifold waies violated and prophanated. And whosoeuer did speake against him, they were depriued of their benefices, and others placed in, which haue ruled, and yet doe rule the said churches, and the flockes pertaining to the same, not hauing any cure or charge of the soules committed vnto them, neither by the apostolike sée, neither yet by the ordinarie of the place.

The office of preaching forbidden by the archbishop.

Also as many, as well priests as lay men in the citie of Prage and kingdome of Boheme, which haue spoken against the doctrine of Hus, and the prophanation of the processe aforesaid, or at the least not allowing the same, haue suffred most mortall hatred and persecutions, and yet to this day doe suffer. But ý at this present it is dissimuled vntill the end of the processe against John Hus. Therfore if he be now let goe againe, without doubt they shall suffer great persecution both in body and goods, and throughout all the realme of Boheme, house shall be against house, and this mischiefe will creepe, yea suddainely spring vp throughout all Germany, and innumerable soules shall be infected, so that there shall bee such persecution of the clergie and faithfull, as hath not beene since the time of the emperour Constantine to this present day: for hee ceaseth not to moue and stir vp the laity, against the clergie and faithfull christians. And when any of the clergie would draw him away, or call him from his heresie, and for that cause doth forbid him to preach, that he doe not teach no heresies: then saith he, and teacheth that the clergie doth that of enuie and malice, because he rebuketh their vices and faults: that is to say, their simony and pride, and couetousnesse.

Insurrections feared in Boheme against the clergie.

Moreouer, hee stirreth vp the secular princes against the prelates of churches, monasteries, and Vniuersities, and generally against the whole clergie. Going about by this meanes, he preacheth and teacheth that prelats and other men of the church ought not to haue any temporall goods or possessions, but onely to liue vpon almes. And by this meanes hee hath done alreadie very much hurt, and annoyed diuers and many prelates, clerkes and churches in the kingdome of Boheme, and citie of Prage, forsomuch as thereby they are already spoiled and robbed of their possessions. Yea, hee teacheth also that it is lawfull for the lay people without sin to withhold and keepe backe the tithes and oblations, or to giue the church goods to any other minister: all the secular princes are greatly inclined hereunto, but spectally the laity, who followeth euery man his owne will.

He hath generally to lay for himselfe all those heretickes which doe but very smally regard the ecclesiasticall censures, and hath the authority of the Romane church, yea doe vtterly detest and abhorre the same: the which thing will more and more encrease, except it be effectually and manfully withstood; and if he doe by any meanes escape from the councell, hee and his fauourers will say that his doctrine is iust and true, and that it is allowed by the authority of the vniuersall sacred councell, and that all his aduersaries are wicked and naughty men, so that he would doe more mischiefe, then euer any heretiche did since the time of Constantinus Magnus.

Caiphas prophesied.

Wherefore most holy fathers, prouide and take heede to your selues, and to the whole flocke, amongst whom the holy Ghost hath placed you to rule the Church of Christ, the which hee hath purchased with his owne blood; and whilest the disease is new and fresh, helpe and remedie it, as well touching him which doth so infect and trouble the church of God, as also concerning the occasions, through the which hee hath presumed, and might doe the same, because the prelats doe abuse the ecclesiasticall censures, and as well the prelats as those that are vnder them doe not keepe and obserue the order of the church which is appointed them by God, whereby it commeth to passe, that whilest they themselues doe walke the broken and vnknowne paths, their flocke falleth headlong into the ditch.

Master Wallez lieth, for the holy Ghost had no leisure to come to that councell.

Wherfore let our soueraigne lord the pope, and this most sacred councell ordaine and depute Commissioners, the which may examine the said John Hus vpon all afore written, and other things, in the presence of them which know the matter. Let there be also certaine Doctors and Maisters appointed to reade ouer and peruse his bookes which hee hath written, whereof some are here present, that the church may be speedily purged and clensed from these errours.

Upon this his accusation, they ordained and appointed three commissioners or iudges, that is to say, the patriarch of Constantinople, and the bishop of Castile, and the bishop of Lybusse. The which prelats being thus deputed, heard the accusation and the witnesse which was brought in by certaine babling priests of Prage, confirmed by their othes, and afterward recited the said accusation vnto the said Hus in the prison, at such time as his ague was feruent and extremely vpon him.

John Hus sicke of an ague in prison.

Vpon this, John Hus required to haue an aduocate to answere for him; the which was plainely and vtterly denied him. And the reason that the maisters and commissioners brought against it was this, that the plaine canon doth forbid that any man should be a defender of any cause of his, which is suspect of any kind of heresie. The vanitie and follie of the witnesses was such, that if in case they had not beene both the accusers and iudges themselues, there should haue néeded no distinct confutation. I would haue rehearsed the testimonies in this place, but that I knew them to be such, as the prudent and wise reader could not haue read without great tediousnesse. Howbeit, some of them shall be declared, when we come to the processe of his iudgement.

John Hus debarred of his aduocate.

Afterward, when John Hus had recouered a little strength or health, by the commandement of the three commissioners, there were presented vnto him certaine articles, many in number, which they said they had gathered out of his bookes which he made of the church: of which articles some were forged and inuented by maister Wallez, and othersome were gathered only by halues, as shall be more plainely declared hereafter, when we come to speake of the iudgement pronounced and giuen against the said Hus.

Thus John Hus remained in the prison of the couent of the Franciscans, vntill the Wednesday before Palme Sunday, and certaine appointed to keepe him; and in the meane season to imploy and spend his time withall, he wrote certaine bookes, that is to say, of the ten commandements, of the loue and knowledge of God, of matrimonie, of penance, of the three enemies of mankind, of the prayer of our Lord, and of the Supper of our Lord.

The bookes which John Hus wrote in prison.

The same day pope John 23. changed his apparell, and conueied himselfe secretly out of Constance, fearing the iudgement by the which afterward he was depriued of his papall dignitie, by meanes of most execrable and abominable forfaits and doings. This was the cause that John Hus was transported and caried vnto an other prison: for the popes seruants which had the charge and keeping of John Hus, vnderstanding that their maister was fled and gone, deliuered vp the keyes of the prison vnto the emperour Sigismund, and to the cardinals, and followed their maister the pope. Then by the whole consent of the councell, the said John Hus was put into the hands of the bishop of Constance, who sent him to a castle on the other side of the riuer of Rhine, not verie farre from Constance, where he was shut vp in a Tower, with fetters on his legges, that he could scarse walke in the day time, and at night hee was fastned vp to a racke against the wall hard by his bed.

Pope Iohn fled out of Constance.

In the meane season, certaine noble men and gentlemen of Pole and Boheme, did all their endeauour to purchase his deliuerance, hauing respect to the good renoune of all the Realme, the which was wonderfully defamed and slandered by certaine naughtie persons. The matter was growne vnto this point, that all they which were in the towne of Constance, that seemed to beare any fauour vnto John Hus, were made as mocking stockes, and derided of all men, yea euen of the slaues and base people. Wherefore they tooke counsell and concluded together to present their request in writting vnto the whole councell, or at the least vnto the foure nations of Almaine, Italy, France, and England: this request was presented the 14. day of May, An. 1415. the tenor here ensueth.

¶ The first Schedule or Bill, which the Nobles of Boheme deliuered vp to the councell for the deliuerance of Iohn Hus, the 14. day of May, Anno 1415.

MOst reuerend fathers and lords: The nobles and lords of Boheme and Pole here present, by this their present writings doe shew and declare vnto your fatherly reuerences, how that the most noble king and lord, the lord Sigismund, king of Romans, alwaies Augustus, king of Hungarie, Croatia, Dalmatia, &c: hearing of the great dissension that was in the kingdome of Boheme, as heire, king and lord successor, willing and minding to foresee and prouide for his owne honour, he sent these noble men, master Wenceslate de Duba, and John de Clum here present, that they would bring and assure master John Hus vnder the king his name and safe-conduct. So that he would come to the sacred generall councell of Constance, vnder the safe-conduct of the said king, and the protection of the sacred Empire, openly giuen and granted vnto the said master John Hus, that he might purge himselfe and the kingdome of Boheme from the slander that was raised vpon them, and there to make an open declaration of his faith to euery man that would lay any thing to his charge. The which the said nobles with the forenamed master John Hus haue performed and done, according to the kings commandement.

The safe-conduct of the emperor challenged.

When as the said master John Hus, was freely of his owne accord come vnto Constance, vnder the said safe-conduct, and grieuously imprisoned before hee was heard, and at this present is tormented both with fetters and also with hunger and thirst. Albeit that in times past at the councell holden at Paysan 1410. yeare of our Lord, the heretickes which were condemned, were suffered to remaine there at libertie, and to depart home freely: notwithstanding this master John Hasse, neither being conuicted nor condemned, no not so much as once heard, is taken and imprisoned, when as neither king or any prince elector, either any embassadour of any Vniuersitie was yet come or present. And albeit the lord the king, together with the nobles and lords here present most instantly required and desired, that as touching his safe-conduct they would foresee and haue respect vnto his honour: And that the said master John Hus might bee openly heard, forsomuch as he would render and shew a reason of his faith: and if hee were found or conuicted obstinately to affirme or maintaine any thing against the truth or holy Scripture, that then he ought to correct and amend the same, according to the instruction and determination of the councell: yet could hee neuer obtaine this. But the said master John Hasse, notwithstanding all this, is most grieuously oppressed with fetters and irons, and so weakened with thinne and slender diet, that it is to bee feared lest that his power and strength being hereby consumed and wasted, he should be put in danger of his wit or reason.

The extremities John Hus suffered in prison.

And although the lords of Boheme here present are greatly slandered, because they seeing the said master John Hus so to be tormented and troubled, contrarie to the kings safe-conduct, haue not by their letters put the king in mind of his said safe-conduct, that the said lord and king should not any more suffer any such matters, forsomuch as they tend to the contempt and disregard of the kingdome of Boheme, which from the first originall and beginning, since it receiued the catholike faith, it neuer departed or went away from the obedience of the holy church of Rome: yet notwithstanding they haue suffered and borne all these things patiently hitherto, lest by any meanes occasion of trouble or veration of this sacred councell might arise or spring thereof.

Wherefore most reuerend fathers and lords: The nobles and lords before named, doe wholly and most earnestly desire and require your reuerences here present, that both for the honour of the safe-conduct of our said lord the king, and also for the preseruation and increase of the worthie fame and renowne both of the foresaid kingdome of Boheme, and your owne also, that you will make a short end about the affaires of master John Hus: forsomuch as by the meanes of his straite handling he is in great danger by any longer delay, euen as they do most specially trust vpon the most vpright consciences and iudgements of your fatherly reuerences. But forasmuch as most reuerend fathers and lords, it is now come to the knowledge and vnderstanding of the nobles and lords of Boheme here present, how that certaine backbiters and slanderers of the most famous kingdome of Boheme aforesaid, haue declared and told vnto your reuerences, how that the Sacrament of the most pretious blood of our Lord is caried vp and downe through Boheme in vessels not consecrate or hallowed, and that coblers do now heare confessions, and minister the most blessed body of our Lord vnto others: The nobles therefore of Boheme here present require and desire you, that you will giue no credit vnto false promoters and tale tellers, for that as most wicked and naughtie slanderers and backbiters of that kingdome aforesaid, they do report and tell vntruthes: requiring also your reuerences, that such slanderous persons of the kingdome aforesaid, may be named and knowne. And the lord the king together with your reuerences, shal well perceiue and see that the lords of Boheme will goe about in such maner to resell and put away the false and friuolous slanders of those naughtie persons, that they shall be ashamed to appeare hereafter before the lord the king and your reuerences.

The confutation of certaine slanders.

As soone as this their supplication was read, the bishop of Luthonis rising vp, said: Most reuerend fathers, I well perceiue and vnderstand that the last part of this writting doth touch me, my kinsfolkes and friends, as though the kingdome of Boheme were slandered by vs. Wherefore I desire to haue time and space of deliberation, that I may purge my selfe from this crime that is laid against me. The principall of the councell appointed him the 17. day of May, at the which day the lords of Boheme should bee present againe, to heare both the answere of the councell, and also the excuse of the bishop of Luthonis; the which thing indeed was afterward performed: for the 17. day of May, which was the fourth day before Whitsontide, they met there againe: where first of all a certaine bishop in the name of the whole councell answered by word to the nobles of Boheme the contents of whose answere may easily be known by the second supplication, which the Bohemians put vp to the councell. But first I haue here in these few words following shewed how the bishop of Luthonis defended himselfe against that which is before written.

The bishop of Luthonis.

❧ The answere of the Bishop of Luthonis, to the last part of the supplication, which the nobles of Boheme presented vnto the councell.

MOst reuerend fathers and nobles lords, as Peter de Mladoneywitz bacheler of art, in the name of certaine of the nobles of the kingdome of Boheme in his writings, amongst other things did propound how that certaine slanderers and backbiters of the said kingdome haue brought to the eares of your reuerences, that the most precious blood of Christ is caried vp and downe in Boheme in bottels, and that Coblers doe heare confessions, and minister the body of Christ vnto others; whereupon most reuerend fathers and lords, albeit that I together with the other prelats, doctors, masters, and other innumerable catholikes of the said kingdome, the which doe desire as much as in them lieth to defend the faith of Christ, haue laboured for the extirpation and rooting out of that most wicked and detestable sect of Wicklifites, which now (alas for sorow) beginneth to spring and rise in the said kingdome, as it is well knowne: Notwithstanding, here in this my oration, not for any shame or reproofe, but for the honour of the kingdome aforesaid, I haue propounded, and declared a certaine new sect, which is now lately sprung vp in the said kingdome, the followers whereof doe minister and communicate the sacraments in many cities, townes and places of the said kingdome, vnder both kinds both of bread and wine, and doe constantly teach the common people both men and women that it is so to be communicated, obstinately affirming the same, and that the clergie which doe repugne or say nay vnto it, are to bee counted church robbers, as by the writings of their assertions being directed and presented hither shall openly appeare.

The answere and accusation of the bishop of Luthonis against John Hus.

Moreouer, by the report and fame which goeth here abrode, and by the writings which were sent ouer vnto me, I haue propounded that it came to my knowledge, that the blood of Christ is caried about in vessels not consecrated, approuing the foresaid erroneous assertion of the Wicklenists, that affirme it necessarie for saluation, that the people should communicate vnder both kinds of bread and wine; and that it is necessarie, as the body of Christ is caried in the pire or bore, so the blood of Christ should be caried in bottles, or other necessarie vessels from place to place, and specially about the ministration of the sicke. Also I declared not of my selfe, but I heard it to be declared by others, both great and credible persons, that there was a certaine woman a follower of that sect, the which taking by violence the body of Christ out of a priests hands, did communicate vnto her selfe, and affirmed that all men ought to doe so, if the priests should denie them the communion. And the same woman amongst many other errours, of the which shee was conuicted, did affirme that a good lay woman might better consecrate and giue absolution, then an euill priest: affirming that an euill priest can neither consecrate nor absolue. But I know that neither I, neither any of my allisance in this matter, haue brought this at any time vnto your eares, that Coblers in the said kingdome doe heare confession, or minister the Sacrament of the body of Christ, as is alledged by the said Peter, in the behalfe of the said supplicants. Notwithstanding that, wee did feare if meanes were not found to recounter or stoppe the offences before named, that this would immediately follow vpon it. Wherefore most reuerend fathers, lest that the kingdome might bee defamed any more by such pestiferous sects, and that the christian faith might happen to be indangered; with all reuerence and charity I doe desire you, euen by the bowels of mercy of our Lord Iesus Christ, that this most sacred councell would prouide some speedie remedie for this kingdome, as touching the premisses.

Moreouer, whether be they backbiters and slanderers, or wicked and false enuiers of the kingdome of Boheme, the which do let the errours aforesaid, and many others more, which are sowen by the Wickleuists in the said kingdome, and also elsewhere, which also both do labour and haue laboured for the extirpation and rooting out of those errours out of the kingdome aforesaid, and as catholicke men, for the zeale of their faith haue manfully put forth themselues against the maintainers of the said errours, or such as doe maintaine, and defend the teachers of those errours: this answere I haue here presented before your reuerences, alwaies wholly submitting my selfe and assistance vnto your iudgement, and to the definition of this most sacred councell of Constance.

The bishop of Luthonius answere confuted.

THe day before Whitsontide, the nobles of Boheme did confute this their answere made two daies before in the councell to their former writing, as here followeth: Most reuerend fathers and lords, forsomuch as vpon thursday it was answered in the behalfe of your reuerences to the requests of the nobles and lords of Boheme, that the said lords were misinformed of diuers points contained in the declaration of their said bill: therefore the foresaid lords haue now determined and decreed to declare their former propounded requests more at large vnto your reuerences, not minding hereby to argue or reproue your fatherly wisdomes and circumspections, but that your reuerences (their desires being partly on this behalfe fulfilled) might the more effectuously and distinctly discerne and iudge as touching this matter.

And first of all, whereas the lords alledged and said, how that master John Hus was come hither vnto Constance, freely of his owne good will, vnder the safe-conduct of the lord the king, and the protection of the sacred empire: it is answered on the behalfe of your reuerences, how that the said lords are misinformed, as touching the safe-conduct, and that you haue vnderstood by such as are worthie credit, that the friends and fauourers of the said master John Hus, did first procure and get his safe-conduct fifteene daies after his imprisonment.

The bishops do quarrell about the safe-conduct of John Hus.

The lords of Boheme, and specially the lord John de Clum here present, whom this matter doth chiefly touch, doth answere, that not onely the fifteenth day after, but euen the very same day that John Hus was apprehended and taken, when as our reuerend father the pope, in the presence of all his cardinals, demanded of master John de Clum, whether master John Hus had any safe-conduct from the king his son: he answered, Most holy father and cardinals, know ye that he hath a safe-conduct; and when he was asked the question againe the second time, he answered in like maner.

The safe-conduct of John Hus obteined and shewed before the imprisonment of John Hus.

Yet notwithstanding none of them required to haue the safe-conduct shewed vnto them: and againe the third day following, the lord John de Clum complained vnto our lord the pope, how notwithstanding the safe-conduct of our soueraigne lord the king, he detained and kept master John Hus as prisoner, shewing the said safe-conduct vnto many. And for a further truth herein, hee referreth himselfe vnto the testimonies and witnesses of diuers earles, bishops, knights, gentlemen, and famous citizens of the city of Constance, the which all together at this present did see the said safe-conduct, and heard it read; whereupon the said John de Clum is readie to bind himselfe vnder what penaltie shall be required, euidently to proue and confirme that which he hath promised, whosoeuer say to the contrary.

Moreouer, the lords of Boheme refer themselues vnto the knowledge of certaine princes electors, and other princes, bishops, and many other noble men, which were present before the kings maiestie, where & when as the said safe-conduct was granted and giuen out by the speciall commandement of our said lord the king.

Hereby your fatherly reuerences may vnderstand and perceiue that the said lords of Boheme, are not euill informed as touching the said safe-conduct: but rather they which by such reports haue falsly and vntruely informed your reuerences. And first of all they haue offended against the lord our king, and his chancellors. Secondarily, against the lords and nobles of Boheme, as though we had priuily and by stealth, purchased the said safe-conduct. Wherefore the lords aforesaid most humblie require and desire your reuerences, that you will not so lightly beleeue such as be not worthie of credit, but rather hearing the contrary part, to labour and discusse that the truth may the more euidently appeare.

The bishops of the councell falsly informed touching the safe-conduct of John Hus.

Secondly, whereas the lords aforesaid, alledging how master John Hus, comming vnto Constance, of his owne free will, being neither condemned nor heard, was imprisoned, your reuerences haue made answere thereunto, that hee the said master John Hus, in the time of Alexander the fifth, was infamed and slandered vpon certaine heresies, and thereupon cited personally to appeare in the court of Rome, and there was heard by his procurers.

John Hus imprisoned before he was either condemned or heard.

And forsomuch as hee refused obstinately to appeare, hee was excommunicated; in the which excommunication he continued (as you affirme) by the space of fiue yeares, for the which he was iudged, and counted not onely a simple and plaine hereticke, but an heresiarch, that is to say, an inuenter and sower of new and strange heresies, and that hee comming toward Constance, did preach by the way openly. To this the lords aforesaid doe answere, that as touching his slander and citation, they can affirme nothing, but by report. But as touching that hee did not personally appeare, they say they haue heard both himselfe and diuers other credible persons say, yea euen the most famous prince Wenceslaus king of Boheme, and almost all the whole nobility is witnesse, that hee would willingly haue appeared at Rome, or elsewhere, if hee might safely haue come thither, and that deadly enmity had not letted: and moreouer, his procurers which hee sent vnto the court of Rome, alleaging reasonable causes for his non appearance, some of them were cast into prison, and others were euill intreated.

Alexander the fifth.

The answere touching the citation of J. Hus to the court of Rome.

John Hus his procurers euill intreated at Rome.

As for the excommunication which he hath so long sustained, they haue heard him often say, that he hath not resisted against the same by contumacie, or stubbornesse, but vnder euident appellation, and thereupon referreth himselfe vnto the acts of his causes, which were pleaded in the court of Rome, wherein all this is more largely contained, the which your reuerences may euidently perceiue and see in this our present publike transumpt, which we haue offered vnto you vpon certaine points aforesaid.

As concerning his preaching, wherewithall his enemies doe report and charge, that master John Hus did preach openly in the city of Constance: the lords aforesaid, and specially the lord John de Clum here present, doe answere, that he hath continually lodged with the said master John Hus here in Constance; and that whosoeuer they be, that haue beene so bold, or dare bee so bold to say and affirme that master John Hus had preached (as is premised;) or that which lesse is, since the time of his comming vnto this city, euen vnto the very day and time of his captiuitie and imprisonment, that he went but one step out of the house of his lodging, ỹ the said lord John de Clum, will and is content to bind himselfe with any such, as shall affirme the same, vnder what penalty soeuer it be, of money or otherwise, that which hee hath falsly reported vnto your reuerences, he shall neuer be able iustly and truely to affirme and proue.

John Hus falsly reported to preach openly at Constance.

John Hus falsly charged to preach comming to the councell.

Thirdly, whereas your reuerences do say, that you do not vnderstand or know, what the lords do meane, by the heretickes condemned, at the councell holden at Pisa, whether the mocking or deriding of the pope, whose ambassadors came thither for vnity or concord, the which were suffered and gently entreated, as their lords were most enclined vnto vnity and peace, or else that they did vnderstand or meane the particular heretickes, which were there condemned: adioyning thereunto, that the heretickes also comming vnto the councell, vnder the pretence of that vnity, should bee gently handled and entreated, &c. Reuerend fathers & lords, whether they bee counted the first, or that they be thought the second or last, the lords aforesaid require none other thing, but that the said master John Hus may vse such libertie as they vsed, forsomuch as he came willingly vnto this most sacred councell, not for any other purpose, but onely publikely to recognise his faith. And in what point soeuer he shall seeme to varie from the word of God, and the vnion of the holy mother the church, that in that point he will willingly be vnited and reconciled againe thereunto, and not only himselfe, but also his fauourers and adherents hee would moue and prouoke thereunto, of whom the greater number are in the kingdome of Boheme. Also hee is come hither, that he might purge and cleare the noble kingdome of Boheme, from the sinister and euill slander which was railed vpon it.

John Hus had many welwillers in Bohemia.

Last of all most reuerend fathers and lords, forsomuch as your reuerences haue most fauourablie answered vnto the principall request made by the lords aforesaid, that the processe of master John Hus through Gods helpe should bee determined and ended with all expedition and gentlenesse: the lords aforesaid do render most harty thankes vnto your reuerences, and whensoeuer their desire by Gods helpe shall come to the end or effect long wished or looked for, they will not only heare, but also before the whole kingdome of Boheme, and in all other places whersoeuer they come, render most immortall thankes vnto your reuerences for euer.

¶ This declaration of the nobles of Boheme aboue prefixed, may serue not only to the confutation of the bishop Luthonius this Bohemian, but also against the cauillations of Alanus Copus Anglus, Dial. 6. pag. 929. touching the safe-conduct of John Hus, whereof sufficiently before hath beene said: vide supra, pag. 548.

When as the noble men of Boheme by long time could receiue no answere of those supplications which they had alreadie put vp, they determined the last date of May following by an other supplication being put vp vnto the principals of the councell, to entreat that Iohn Hus might be deliuered out of prison, and defend his owne cause openly: they also put vp the testimoniall of the bishop of Nazareth, as touching Iohn Hus. The copie whereof is expressed in the beginning of this historie, word by word.

Vide supra, pag. 549.

¶ Another supplication of the nobles of Boheme.

An other supplication of the Bohemians for Iohn Hus.

MOst reuerend Fathers and Lords in Christ, of late there was a supplication put vp vnto your reuerences on the behalfe of the Lords and Nobles of Boheme, and the nation of Pole, wherein they most humblie desired your reuerences to consider how the informations which were put vp vnto your reuerences, by the enemies of M. Iohn Hus, were insufficient; and with reuerence be it spoken, in manie points vntrue, as in the safe-conduct graunted by the Kings maiestie, and also in other articles, as more plainelie appeareth in the Schedule, which was then offered vnto you: vpon the which said Schedule and other things at that present being put vp, they could not as yet receiue any answere. Wherefore the Lords aforesaid, most humblie require your fatherlie reuerences, that it would please you to consider the said supplication, and to giue some answere to the Lords aforesaid thereupon, and specially hauing respect vnto the great iniuries and griefes which are done vnto the said M. Iohn Hus, the which may be vnderstood and knowne by the Schedule aforesaid, that you will mercifullie consider and foresee, that all those griefes and euils so farre different from all brotherlie loue and charitie are done vnto him by his enemies euen for very malice & hatred.

The Lords could haue no answere of their supplication.

To the intent therefore that the rancour and malice may be confounded and ouerthrowne, and the plaine and euident truth appeare, it may please your fatherly reuerences to vnderstand, that it is notified and knowne vnto the Barons, Nobles, Citizens, Clergie and Laitie of the kingdome of Boheme, that M. Iohn Hus in all his acts and doings as well Scholasticall as Ecclesiasticall, and specially in all his publike and open sermons, he hath made and hath accustomed to make these maner of protestations, the which without any thing to the contrarie, he hath alwaies endeuoured to haue them strong and firme, as by this his protestation here following, which he made about the determination of a certaine question, it may most euidentlie and plainelie appeare vnto euerie man which would behold and looke vpon the same: the forme and tenour whereof here followeth, and is such.

¶ The protestation of Iohn Hus.

The protestation of I. Hus.

FOr so much as aboue all things I do desire the honour of God, the profit of the holie Church, and that I my selfe may be a faithfull member of our Lord Iesu Christ, which is the head and husband of the holie Church which he hath redeemed: therefore as heretofore oftentimes I haue done, euen so now againe I make this protestation, that I neuer obstinatlie said, or hereafter will say any thing that shall be contrarie vnto the truth and veritie: and moreouer, that I haue alwaies holden, do hold, and firmelie desire for to hold the verie true and infallible truth and veritie; so that before that I would defend and maintaine anie errour contrarie thereunto, I would rather choose by the hope and helpe of the Lord to suffer extreme punishment, euen vnto death: yea and through the helpe of God I am readie, euen to offer this my miserable life vnto death for the law of Christ, the which I doe beleeue euery part and parcell thereof to be giuen and promulgate for the saluation of mankind, by the counsell and determination of the most holie Trinitie, and the Saints of God, &c.

Vid. in prim. edit. pag. 207.

By the which his protestation, and also other protestations by the said M. Iohn Hus, being well obserued and noted, it may be easilie gathered and known that his whole intent & purpose was and is, that he neither would nor will haue spoken or written anie thing in his bookes, treatises, doctrines, or publike sermons, or else to haue affirmed anie articles, the which willinglie and wittinglie he did vnderstand or know to be erroneous, offensiue, seditious, hereticall, or offending the godlie eare; albeit that these and such like things are falselie imputed vnto him by his enemies. But it hath alwaies beene his chiefe intent and purpose, and so is, that euerie point, conclusion or article contained in his books or articles, to haue put & affirmed them to this end, according to the truth of the Gospell, the holie Doctors and writers vpon the holie Scriptures, and to that end and purpose, as is before expressed in his protestations: and if in anie point he should be found to varie or go astraie, or that he were not well vnderstood of others, by like information to be informed, vnderstood, corrected and amended, and that he will by no meanes sustaine or defend any maner of article against the holie Church of Rome, or the Catholicke faith.

Wherefore most reuered fathers, the premisses notwithstanding, his enemies, through the extreame hatred which they beare vnto him, haue picked and taken out by piece meale certaine articles out of the bookes of M. Iohn Hus, reiecting and not looking vpon the allegations and reasons, neither hauing anie relation vnto the distinction of their equiuocations, haue compounded and made thereof certaine false and fained articles against him, to this end, that all charitie and loue being set apart, they might the better ouerthrow him, and bring him vnto death, contrarie vnto the safe-conduct vpon good and iust occasion openly assigned, and giuen vnto the said master Iohn Hus, by the most noble Prince the Lord Sigismund, King of the Romanes and of Hungarie, for his iust defence, against all the friuolous accusations and assaults of the enemies, not onelie of the said master Iohn Hus, but also of the famous kingdome of Boheme, and for the quiet appeasing of all such tumults and rumours rising and springing in the said kingdome of Boheme, or elsewhere: the auoiding of which most perilous vprores, the said King of Romans doth greatlie desire and wish, as the right heire and successour of the said kingdome.

Articles forged out of Husses bookes by his enemies.

VVhereupon the Barons and Nobles aforesaid, most humblie desire and require, the premisses being considered, and respect had vnto the great infamie and slander which may happen by the premisses vnto the said kingdome and inhabitants thereof, that you will put to your hands, and take some order and meane, that master Iohn Hus may be distinctlie heard by some famous men, diuines alreadie deputed, or otherwise to be appointed vpon all and singuler such articles as shall be laid vnto him, to declare his owne minde and intent, and also the minde of the doctours alleaged for his purpose, with the manifold distinctions and equiuocations: in the which the drawers out of the most part of his articles haue also made equiuocations, that so according vnto the disposition of the witnesses, of the which a great number of them are and haue a long time bene his mortall enemies, that at the friuolous instigation of his enemies, when he was miserablie detained prisoner, that he should not be condemned vnheard. For so much as by the said declarations your fatherlie reuerences might be the more better informed of the truth, he himselfe is readie alwaies to submit himselfe vnder the determination of this most sacred Councell. For your reuerences, by the craftie and fained perswasions of his enemies, are thus informed, that master Iohn Hus hath bene vncurablie obstinate by a long time in most perilous articles, the which your reuerences may now plainelie perceiue to be vntrue: and for the more euidence herein to be shewed, there is presented vnto your reuerences an instrument of publike recognition of the most reuerend father in Christ the Lord Nicolas Bishop of Nazareth and Inquisitour of heresies, specially appointed by the Apostolike see in the dioces of Prage, the which by your reuerences is more diligentlie to be hearkened vnto.

The Councell euill informed against I. Hus.

VVherefore it may please your fatherlie reuerences to commaund the said M. Iohn Hus neither conuicted nor condemned, to be taken and brought out of his bonds and chaines, in the which he is now most grieuouslie deteined and kept, and to put him into the hands of some reuerend Lords Bishops, or Commissioners, appointed or to be appointed by this present Councell: that the said M. Iohn Hus may somewhat be relieued, and recouer againe his health, and be the more diligentlie and commodiouslie examined by the Commissioners: and for the more assurance, the Barons and Nobles aforesaid of the kingdome of Boheme, will prouide most sure & good sureties, the which will not breake their fidelitie and faith for anie thing in the world. VVhich also shall promise in his behalfe, that he shall not flee or depart out of their hands, vntill such time as the matter be fully determined by the said Commissioners. In the execution of the which premises, we haue determined to prouide and foresee vnto the fame and honour of the said kingdome of Boheme, & also to the safe-conduct of the most worthie Prince, the king of Romans, lest that the enemies and detractours of the honour and fame of the kingdome aforesaid, might not a little slander and reproue the said Lords, pretending and shewing forth hereafter, that they had made vnreasonable or vnlawfull requests: for the withstanding of which mischiefe we require your fathelie reuerences, that you wil decree, and most gratiouslie consent, that this our petition & supplication may be drawne out againe by your Notarie, and reduced into a publicke forme and order.

The nobles' required that Iohn Hus not being conuict nor condemned, should be deliuered out of prison.

A petition for master Iohn Husses deliuerance out of prison.

After this supplication was read before the deputies of the foure nations, the Patriarch of Antioch answered in the name of them all vnto euerie article of the said supplication; but it was done in few words.

First, as touching the protestation of Iohn Hus, whether it be true or false, it shalbe made euident in the processe of his cause. Moreouer, whereas they saie that the aduersaries of Iohn Hus haue peruerselie drawne certaine things out of his bookes, that also the matter it selfe shall declare in the end. Whereas if it shalbe found and decreed that Iohn Hus is vniustlie & vntruly accused, that then it shall come to passe that his aduersaries shall incurre perpetuall ignominie and slander. But as touching sureties, albeit there might be a thousand put in or bound, yet can it not by any meanes be, that the deputies of the Councell with a safe conscience may receiue or take them in this this mans cause, vnto whom there is no faith or credit to bee giuen. Howbeit thus much they will doe, vpon the fifth day of June next, John Hus shal be brought againe vnto Constance, and there haue free libertie to speake his mind before the councell, and that they would louingly and gently heare him: but the matter in the end fell out farre contrary to this promise.

No credit to be kept with an heretike.

Supplication to the emperor Sigismund.

The same day the said barons and lords presented a supplication of this tenour vnto the Emperour: Vnto the most high and mightie prince, the lord Sigismund king of the Romanes, alwaies Augustus, king of Hungarie, Croatia, and Dalmatia, our most gracious lord, faithfull and true seruice in all things, and at all times. Most noble prince, and gracious lord, we signifie vnto your worthinesse, that wee all together with one mind, consent and accord, haue deliuered vp vnto the reuerend fathers and Lords, the deputies of the foure nations, and to the whole sacred councell of Constance, this our supplication here vnder written, as reasonable, iust, and worthie of consideration, the tenour whereof here followeth word by word, and is this.

¶ The copie of the supplication, which was presented vnto the deputies of the councell, is before written, whereunto this which followeth was annexed.

The barons supplication to the king for John Hus.

WHerefore wee most humblie require and desire your princely Maiestie, that both for the loue of iustice, and also of the fame and renoune of that most famous kingdome of Bohemie, whereof we acknowledge you vndoubtedly the true lord and heire successour, and also foreseeing vnto the libertie of your safe-conduct, that you will with your fauourable countenance, beholding these most reasonable and iust supplications, which wee haue put vp to the Lords aforesaid, put to your helping hand toward the said most reuerend fathers and lords, that they will effectually heare vs, in this our most iust petition, which we haue offered vp to them, as is aforesaid: lest that the enemie of the renowne and honour of the famous kingdome of Boheme, and such as our slanderers also hereafter may detract and slander vs, that we should make vnreasonable and vnlawfull requests vnto the said reuerend fathers and lords; and therefore we required and desired of them that it would please them to decree by setting to their publike hand and seale to authorise our said publication. Likewise we doe most hartily require your highnesse, that you would vouchsafe in like maner to giue vs your testimony of the premises.

But what answere the emperor made hereunto, we could neuer vnderstand or know; but by the processe of the matter a man may easily iudge, that this good emperour was brought and led euen vnto this point, through the obstinate mischiefe of the cardinals and bishops, to breake and falsifie his promise and faith which he had made and promised; and this was their reason whereby hee was driuen thereunto, that no defence could or might be giuen either by safe conduct, or by any other meane vnto him, which was suspected or iudged to bee an hereticke. But by the epistles and letters of John Hus, a man mey easilie iudge what the kings mind was. Now we will procéede in the historie.

The king forced by the importunity of the cardinals to breake promise.

The mischieuous councell of the popish band.

The fifth day of June, the cardinals, bishops, and the rest of the priests, all that were almost in Constance, assembled to a great number, at the couent of the Franciscans in Constance, and there it was commanded, that before John Hus should be brought forth, in his absence they should rehearse the witnesses and articles, which they had slanderously gathered out of his bookes: the which articles with John Husses answere, we will hereafter repeate. By chance there was then present a certaine Notary, named Peter Mladonowitz, the which bare great loue and amitie vnto the said Hus, who as soone as he perceiued that the bishops and cardinals were alreadie determined and appointed to condemne the said articles in the absence of John Hus, hee went with all speede vnto master Wencelate de Duba, and John of Clum, and told them all the matter, who incontinent made report thereof to the emperor. Who vnderstanding their intent, sent Lewes the county Palatine of Heydelberge, and the lord Fredericke, Burgraue of Nuremberge, to signifie vnto them, which ruled the councell, that nothing should be resolued or done in the case of John Hus, before that it were first heard with equitie, and that they should send him all such articles as were laid against the said Hus, which were either false or hereticall, and he would doe so much, that the said articles should bee examined, by good and learned men. Then according to the emperors will, the iudgement of the principals of the councell was suspended, vntill such time as John Hus were present.

The craftie counsell of the papists stopped by the emperor.

In the meane season these gentlemen, master of Dube and of Clum, did giue vnto the two princes which the Emperour had sent, certaine small treatises which the said Hus had made, out of the which they had drawne certaine articles to present vnto them which rule the councell, vnder this condition, that they would render them againe, when they should demand them. The intent and meaning of these barons was, that by this meanes the aduersaries of John Hus might the more easilie bee reproued, the which of a naughtie and corrupt conscience, had picked out corrupt sentences out of the said bookes of John Hus. The bookes were deliuered vnto the cardinals and bishops; and that done, John Hus was brought forth, and the princes which were sent by the emperour, departed backe againe. After they shewed the bookes vnto John Hus, and he confessed openly before the whole assemblie that he had made them, and that he was readie, if there were any fault in them, to amend the same.

Now hearken a little to the holy procéedings of these reuerend fathers, for here happened a strange and shamefull matter. With much adoe they had scarcely read one article, and brought forth a few witnesses vpon the same against him, but as he was about to open his mouth to answere, all this mad heard or flocke began so to crie out vpon him, that he had not leisure to speake one onely word. The noise and trouble was so great and so vehement, that a man might well haue called it a brute or noise of wild beasts, and not of men, much lesse was it to be iudged a congregation of men gathered together, to iudge and determine so graue and waighty matters. And if it happened that the noise and crie did neuer so little cease, that he might answere any thing at all, out of the holy Scriptures or ecclesiasticall Doctors, by and by he should heare these goodly replies vpon him: That maketh nothing to the purpose.

John Hus forced to keepe silence by outrage of the bishops and priests.

The like practise in these latter daies was vsed at Oxford against the godly fathers.

An outragious councell.

Besides all this, some did outrage in words against him, and othersome spitefully mocked him: so that hee seeing himselfe ouerwhelmed with these rude and barbarous noises and cries, and that it profited nothing to speake, he determined finally with himselfe to hold his peace and keepe silence. From that time forward al the whole rout of his aduersaries thought that they had won the battell of him, and cried out all together, now he is dumbe, now he is dumbe: This is a certaine signe and token, that he doth consent and agree vnto these his errors. Finally, the matter came to this point, that certaine of the most moderate and honest among them, seeing this disorder, determined to procéede no further, but that all should be deferred and put off vntill an other time. Through their aduice, the prelats and others departed from the councell for that present, and appointed to meete there againe the morrow after to procéed in iudgement.

The next day, which was the seuenth of June, on which day the Sunne was almost wholly eclipsed, somewhat after about seuen of the clocke, this same flocke assembled againe in the cloister of the friers Minors, and by their appointment John Hus was brought before them, accompanied with a great number of armed men. Thither went also the emperor, whom the gentlemen, Master of Duba, and Clum, and the Notarie named Peter, which were great friends of the said Hus, did follow to see what the end would be. When they were come thither, they heard that in the accusation of Michael de Causis, they read these words following: John Hus hath taught the people diuers and many errours both in the chapell of Bethleem, and also in many other places of the citie of Prage, of the which errours some of them hee hath drawen out of Wickliffes bookes, and the rest hee hath forged and inuented of his owne head, and doth maintaine the same very obstinately and stiffely.

A great eclipse of the Sunne.

They went forth with swords and staues, as it had beene to take a theefe.

Peter & John follow Christ into the bishops house.

First, that after the consecration and pronunciation of the words in the Supper of the Lord, there remaineth materiall bread; and this is proued by the witnesse of John Protiwate, parish Priest of saint Clements in Prage, John Pecklow preacher at saint Giles in Prage, Benile preacher in the castle of Prage, Andrew Brode, Chanon of Prage, and diuers other priests. Vnto this John Hus taking a solemne oth, answered, that he neuer spake any such word; but thus much he did grant, that at what time the archbishop of Prage forbad him to vse any more that terme or word bread, hee could not allow the bishops commandement: forsomuch as Christ in the 6. chapter of John doth oftentimes name himselfe the bread of angels, which came downe from heauen, to giue life vnto the whole world. But as touching materiall bread, hee neuer spake any thing at all. Then the cardinall of Cambray taking a certaine bill in his hand, which he said hee receiued the day before, said vnto John Hus, Wil you put any vniuersalities a parte rei. i. as touching the thing: When John Hus answered, that he would, because saint Anselme, and diuers others had so done, the cardinall did procéed to gather his argument in this maner.

Matter made against I. Hus.

False witnesse against I. Hus.

The answere of John Hus.

Mawing of bread forbid by the archbishop.

The cardinall sophisticateth with I. Hus.

It followeth then, said he, that after the consecration is made, there remaineth the substance of materiall bread, and that I doe thus proue: that the consecration being done, whiles the bread is changed and transubstantiated into the body of Christ, as you say, either there doth remaine the common substance of materiall bread, or contrariwise. If the substance do remaine, then is our purpose at an end. If contrariwise, then doth it follow, that by the decision of the singularity, the vniuersall ceaseth any more to be. John Hus answered, truely it ceaseth to be in this singular materiall bread, by meanes of this transubstantiation, when as it is changed and transubstantiated into the body of Christ: but notwithstanding in other singularities, it is made subiect.

Then a certaine Englishman by that argument would proue out of the first position, that there remained materiall bread. Then said John Hus, that is a childish argument, which euery boy in the schooles knoweth, and thereupon gaue a solution. Then an other Englishman would proue, that there remained materiall bread in the Sacrament, because the bread after the consecration was not annihilate. Unto whom John Hus answered: Although, said he, that the bread be not annihilate or consumed, yet singularly it ceaseth there to bee by meanes of the alteration of his substance into the bodie of Christ. Heere an other Englishman stepping forth, said: John Hus seemeth vnto mee to vse the same kind of craftie speech which Wickliffe vsed, for hee granted all these things which this man hath done, and yet in very deed was fully perswaded that materiall bread remained in the Sacrament after the consecration. The which when John Hus had denied, saying, that he spake nothing but onely sincerely and vprightly, according to his conscience, the Englishman proceeded to demand of him againe, whether the body of Christ be totally and really in the Sacrament of the altar. Whereunto John Hus answered: verily, I do thinke that the body of Christ is really and totally in the Sacrament of the altar, the which was borne of the virgine Mary, suffered, died, and rose againe, and sitteth on the right hand of God the father almightie. When they had disputed a good while to and fro, as touching vniuersalities, the Englishman which before would proue that materiall bread remained in the Sacrament, because that the bread was not annihilate, interrupting and breaking their talke, said: to what purpose is this disputation vpon vniuersalities, the which maketh nothing to the purpose, as touching faith: for as far as I can perceiue or heare, this man holdeth a good opinion, as touching the Sacrament of the altar.

An English man.

John Hus agreeth with that blind time in the Sacrament.

Then an other Englishman, named Stokes, said: I haue seene at Prage (said he) a certaine treatise, the which was ascribed vnto this man John Hus, wherein it was plainely set forth, that after the consecration, there remained materiall bread in the Sacrament. Verily, said John Hus, sauing your reuerence, that is not true.

Stokes an Englishman.

Then they returned againe vnto the witnesses of them which were spoken of a little before, who euery man for himselfe affirmed with an oth that which hee had said. Amongst whom John Protyway, parish priest of saint Clements in Prage, when he should come to confirme his testimony, added more, that John Hus should say, that saint Gregorie was but a rimer, when he did alledge his authoritie against him. Unto whom John Hus answered, that in this point they did him great iniurie, forsomuch as he allwaies esteemed and reputed saint Gregory, for a most holy Doctor of the church.

False witnesse.

John Hus falsly accused, for calling S. Gregorie a rimer.

These contentions and disputations being somewhat appeased, the cardinall of Florence turned himselfe toward John Hus, and said: Master, you know well enough that it is written that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all witnes is firme and stable: and here you see now almost twentie witnesses against you, men of authority and worthy of credit, amongst the which some haue heard you teach these things themselues, the other by report & common brute or voice, do testifie of your doctrine, & all together generally bring firme reasons and proofes of their witnesse, vnto the which we are forced and constrained to giue credit, and for my part, I see not how you can maintaine and defend your cause against so many notable and well learned men. Unto whom John Hus answered in this maner: I take God and my conscience to witnesse, that I neuer taught any thing, neither was it euer in my mind or fantasie to teach in such sort or maner, as these men here haue not feared to witnesse against me that which they neuer heard. And albeit they were as many more in number as they are, for all that, I do much more esteeme, yea and without comparison regard the witnesse of my Lord God, before the witnes and iudgement of all mine aduersaries vpon whom I do in no point stay my selfe. Then said the Cardinall againe vnto him, it is not lawfull for vs to iudge according to your conscience, for we cannot chuse, but that wee must needs stay our selues vpon the firme and euident witnesse of these men here. For it is not for any displeasure or hatred that these men do witnes this against you (as you do alledge:) for they alledge and bring forth such reasons of their witnesse, that there is no man that can perceiue any hatred in them, or that wee can in any case be in doubt thereof. And as touching master Steuen Paletz, whereas you say, you do suspect him that he hath craftily and deceitfully drawen out certaine points or articles out of your bookes for to betray them afterward: it seemeth that in this point you do him great wrong, for in mine aduice he hath vsed and shewed a great fidelitie and amitie toward you, in that he hath alleuiated and moderated many of your articles much more then they are in your owne bookes. I vnderstand also that you haue like opinion of diuers other notable men, and specially you haue said, that you do suspect M. Chancellor of Paris, then whom there is no more excellent and christian man in all the whole world.

Twentie witnesses preuailed against John Hus, but the testimony of all Boheme would not serue on his part.

He meaneth Gerson.

Then was there read a certaine article of accusation, in the which it was alledged that John Hus had taught, and obstinately defended certaine erroneous articles of Wickliffes in Boheme. Whereunto Hus answered, that he neuer taught any errours of John Wickliffes, or of any other mans. Wherefore if it be so that Wickliffe hath sowed any errours in England, let the Englishmen looke to that themselues. But to confirme their article, there was alledged that John Hus did withstand the condemnation of Wickliffes articles, the which was first condemned at Rome: and afterward also, when the archbishop Swinco, with other learned men, held a conuocation at Prage for the same matter, when as they should haue beene there condemned for this cause, that none of them were agreeing to the catholike faith or doctrine, but were either heretical, erroneous, or offensiue: he answered, that he durst not agree thereunto, for offending his conscience, and specially for these articles, that Silluester the pope and Constantine did erre in bestowing those great gifts and rewards vpon the church. Also, that the pope or priest being in mortall sinne, cannot consecrate nor baptise. This article, said hee, I haue thus determined, as if I should say, that hee doth vnworthilie consecrate or baptise, when as he is in deadly sinne, and that he is an vnworthie minister of the Sacraments of God. Here his accusers, with their witnesses, were earnest and instant that the article of Wickliffe was written by the very same words in the treatise which John Hus made against Stephen Paletz. Verily, said John Hus, I feare not to submit my selfe, euen vnder the danger of death, if you shall not find it so as I haue said. When the booke was brought forth, they found it written as John Hus had said. Hee added also moreouer, that hee durst not agree vnto them which had condemned Wickliffes articles, for this article: the tenthes were pure almes.

Certaine articles of Wickliffe that John Hus stood in.

A treatise against Steuen Paletz.

Here the Cardinall of Florence obiected vnto him this argument, as touching the almes: it is required that it should be giuen freely without bond or dutie. But tenthes are not giuen freely without bond or dutie: therefore are they no almes. John Hus denying the Maior of this Syllogisme, brought this reason against him. Forsomuch as rich men are bounden vnder the paine of eternall damnation, vnto the fulfilling of the 6. workes of mercy, which Christ repeateth in the 25. chap. of Matthew, and these workes are pure almes: Ergo, almes is also giuen by bond and duety. Then an archbishop of England stepping vp, said, if we all be bound vnto those 6. workes of mercy, it doth follow that poore men, which haue nothing at all to giue, should be damned. I answere, said Hus, vnto your antecedent, that I spake distinctly of rich men, and of those which had wherewithall to do those workes: they, I say, were bound to giue almes vnder paine of damnation.

Whether tenthes be pure almes.

Almes stand of dutie.

Hee answered moreouer vnto the Minor of the first argument, that tenthes were at first giuen freely, and afterward made a bond and duety: and when as hee would haue declared it more at large, he could not be suffered. Hee declared also diuers other causes, why he could not with safe conscience consent vnto the condemnation of Wickliffes articles. But howsoeuer the matter went, he did affirme and say, that hee did neuer obstinately confirme any articles of Wickliffes, but onely that he did not allow and consent that Wickliffes articles should bee condemned before that sufficient reasons were alledged out of the holy Scripture for their condemnation: and of the same mind, saith John Hus, are a great many other Doctors & maisters of the Vniuersity of Prage. For when as Swinco the archbishop commanded all Wickliffes bookes to be gathered together in the whole citie of Prage, and to bee brought vnto him, I my selfe brought also certaine bookes of Wickliffes, which I gaue vnto the archbishop, desiring him, that if he found any errour or heresie in them, that he would note and marke them, and I my selfe would publish them openly. But the archbishop, albeit that he shewed me no errour nor heresie in them, burned my bookes, together with those that were brought vnto him, notwithstanding that hee had no such commandement from pope Alexander the fifth of that name. But notwithstanding by a certaine policie he obtained a bull from the said pope by meanes of Jarollaus bishop of Sarepte, of the order of Franciscans, that al Wickliffes bokes for the manifold errours contained in them (whereof there was none named) should be taken out of all mens hands.

John Hus his mind touching the condemnation of Wickliffes articles.

Wickliffes bookes burned in Prage, by the archbishop Swinco.

The archbishop vsing the authority of this bull, thought he should bring to passe that the king of Boheme and the nobles should consent to the condemnation of Wickliffes bookes; but therein he was deceiued. Yet neuertheless, hee calling together certaine diuines, gaue them in commission to sit vpon Wickliffes bookes, and to proceede against them by a definitiue sentence in the canon law. These men by a generall sentence iudged all those bookes worthie to be burned. The which when the Doctors, maisters and scholiers of the Vniuersitie heard report of, they all together with one consent and accord (none excepted but onely they, which before were chosen by the archbishop to sit in iudgement) determined to make supplication vnto the king to stay the matter. The king granting their request, sent by and by certaine vnto the archbishop to examine the matter. There he denied that hee would decree any thing as touching Wickliffes bookes contrarie vnto the kings will and pleasure. Whereupon, albeit that hee had determined to burne them the next day after, yet for feare of the king, the matter was passed ouer.

of the pope, would be no longer of any force or effect, pryullie calling vnto him his adherents, and shutting the gates of his court round about him, being garded with a number of armed souldiers, he consumed and burned all Wickliffes bookes. Beside this great iniury, the archbishoppe by meanes of his bull aforesaid, committed another no lesse tollerable. For he gaue out commandement, that no man after that time vnder paine of excommunication, should teach any more in chapels. Whereupon I did appeale vnto the pope; who being dead, and the cause of my matter remaining vndetermined, I appealed likewise vnto his successor Iohn 23. Before whom, when as by the space of two yeres, I could not be admitted by my aduocates to defend my cause, I appealed vnto the high Iudge Christ. When Iohn Hus had spoken these words, it was demanded of him, whether he had receiued absolution of the pope or no? He answered, No. Then againe, whether it were lawful for him to appeale vnto Christ or no? Whereunto John Hus answered: Verily I doe affirme here afore you all, that there is no more iust or effectuall appeale, then that appeale which is made vnto Christ, forasmuch as the law doth determine, that to appeale, is no other thing then in a cause of griefe or wrong done by an inferior Iudge, to implore and require aid and remedy at a higher Iudges hand. Who is then an higher Iudge then Christ? Who, I say, can know or iudge the matter more iustly, or with more equitie? when as in him there is found no deceit, neither can he be deceiued: or who can better helpe the miserable and oppressed then he? While John Hus with a deuout and sober countenance was speaking and pronouncing those words, he was derided and mocked of all the whole councell.

John Hus appealed to the pope, and from the pope to Christ.

The popish church derideth Christ.

Then was there rehearsed another article of his accusation in this maner: that John Hus for to confirme the heresie which hee had taught the common and simple people out of Wickliffes bookes, said openly these words: that at what time a great number of monks and friers, and other learned men were gathered together in England in a certaine church, to dispute against Iohn Wickliffe, and could by no meanes vanquish him, or giue him the foile, suddenly the church doore was broken open with lightning, so that with much ado Wickliffes enemies hardly escaped without hurt. He added moreouer, that he wished his soule to be in the same place where John Wickliffes soule was. Whereunto John Hus answered, that a dozen yeres before that any bookes of Diuinitie of John Wickliffes were in Boheme, hee did see certaine works of Philosophie of his, the which he said, did maruellously delight and please him. And when he vnderstood the good and godly life of the said Wickliffe, he spake these words: I trust, said he, that Wickliffe is saued: and albeit that I doubt whether he be damned or no, yet with a good hope I wish, that my soule were in the same place where John Wickliffes is. Then againe did all the company iest and laugh at him.

Hus accused for trusting that Wickliffes soule is saued.

It is also in his accusation, that John Hus did counsell the people, according to the example of Moses, to resist with the sword against all such as did gainsay his doctrine. And the next day after he had preached the same, there were found openly in diuers places certaine intimations, that euery man being armed with his sword about him, should stoutly procede, and that brother should not spare brother, neither one neighbor an other. John Hus answered, that all these things were falslie laid vnto his charge by his aduersaries, for hee at all times when he preached, did diligently admonish and warne the people, that they should all arme themselues to defend the truth of the Gospell, according to the saying of the Apostle, with the helmet and sword of saluation, and that he neuer spake of any materiall sword, but of that which is the word of God. And as touching intimations or Moses sword, hee neuer had nothing to doe withall.

Sedition laid to his charge.

It is moreouer affirmed in his accusation and witnes, that many offences are sprung vp by the doctrine of Hus. For first of all, he sowed discord betweene the ecclesiasticall and the politike state: whereupon followed the persecution, spoiling and robbery of the clergy and bishops. And moreouer, that hee through his dissension, dissolued the Vniuersitie of Prage. Hereunto John Hus briefly answered, that these things had not happened by his meanes or default. For the first dissension that was betweene the ecclesiasticall & politike state, sprang and grew vpon this cause, that pope Gregory the 12. of that name, promised at his election, that at all times at the will & pleasure of the cardinals, he would depart from, and giue ouer his seat againe: for vnder that condition he was elect and chosen. This man, contrary and against Wincesslaus king of Boheme, who was then also king of the Romans, made Lewes duke of Bauaria emperor.

Hus accused for mouing certaine tumults against the clergie and diuision in the Vniuersitie of Prage.

A story of popes.

A few yeres after it happened, that when as pope Gregorie would not refuse and giue ouer his seat and office at the request of the cardinals, that the whole colledge of cardinals sent letters to the king of Boheme, requiring him, that together with them, he would renounce and forsake his obedience vnto pope Gregory, and so it should come to passe, that by the authority of a new bishop, he should recouer againe his imperiall dignitie. For this cause the king consented to the will of the cardinals, as touching a neutralitie; that is to say, that hee would neither take part with pope Gregory, neither yet with Benedict the twelfth, bishop of Auinion, which was then named pope, as it doth appeare by chronicles. In this cause then, forsomuch as the archbishop Swinco with the clergy, were against the king, and abstaining from the diuine seruice many of them departed out of the citie, and the archbishop himselfe breaking downe the tombe of the lord Wintelate, contrary and against the kings will, did also take Wickliffes bookes and burned them: Thereupon the king without any gainsaying, suffered that certaine goods of theirs, which of their owne wils were fled away, should be spoiled, because they should not consent or accord with the bishop. Whereupon it is easie to be vnderstood and knowne, that John Hus was falsly accused for that matter. Howbeit a certaine man, one Nalo, rising vp, said; The clergy (said he) did not abstaine from the diuine seruice, because they would not sweare to consent vnto the king; but because that they were spoiled and robbed of their goods and substance. And the cardinall of Cambray, who was one of the Iudges, said: Here I must say somewhat which is come into my mind.

The cause why Swinco and other of the clergy did flie out of Prage.

This doctor Nalo was counseller to king Wenceslaus.

When as I came from Rome, the same yeere that these things were done, by chance I met on the way certaine prelats of Boheme. Whom when I demanded what newes they had brought out of Boheme, they answered, that there was happened a wonderfull cruell and hainous fact, for all the clergie were spoiled of all their substance, and very ill intreated and handled. Then John Hus alledging the same cause which he did before, went forward vnto the second part of the article which was obiected against him, denying also that it happened through his fault, that the Germans departed from the Vniuersitie of Prage. But when as the king of Boheme, according to the foundation of Charles the fourth his father, granted three voices vnto the Bohemes, and the fourth vnto the Germans; whereat the Germans grudging, that they should be exempted from their voices, of their owne accord departed and went their waies; binding themselues with a great oth, and vnder a great penalty, both of their fame, and also money, that none of them should returne againe vnto Prage. Notwithstanding, I am not ashamed to confesse, that I did approue and allow the doings of the king, vnto whom of duty I owe obedience for the commodity and profit of my country. And because you shall not thinke that I haue spoken any vntruth, here is present Albert Warren Trapius, which was deacon of the faculties, who had sworne to depart with the rest of the Germans: he, if that he will say the truth, shall easily cleere me of this suspition.

A declaration how the Germans departed from the Vniuersitie of Prage.

The penaltie of money was 100. siluer pounds.

But when as Albert would haue spoken, hee could not be heard. But the foresaid Nalo, of whom before is made mention, after he had asked leaue to speak, said; This matter do I vnderstand well enough, for I was in the kings court when these things were done in Boheme, when as I saw the maisters of the three nations of the Germans, Bauarians, Saxons, and Silesians, amongst whom the Polonians were also numbred, most humbly come vnto the king, requiring that he would not suffer the right of their voices to be taken from them. Then the king promised them, that he would foresee and prouide for their requests. But John Hus and Jerome of Prage, with diuers others, perswaded the king that hee should not so doe. Whereat the king at the first being not a little moued, gaue him a sore checke, that he and Hierome of Prage did so much intermeddle themselues, and moued such open controuersies, insomuch that he threatned them, that except they would forsee & take heed, he would bring it to passe that the matter should be determined and decreed by fire. Wherefore most reuerend fathers, you shall vnderstand that the king of Boheme did neuer fauor with his heart these men, whose vnthankefulnesse is such, that they feared not euen of late, to intreat me euill, being so much in the kings fauor and credit. After him stepped forth Paletz, saying: Verily most reuerend fathers, not onely the learned men of other nations, but also of Boheme it selfe, are through the counsell of John Hus and his adherents, banished out of Boheme; of the which number, some remaine yet in exile in Morauia. Hereunto John Hus answered: How can this be true, said he, sithence I was not at Prage at that time, when as these men you speake of departed and went away from thence? These things were thus debated the day aforesaid as touching John Hus.

The slander of the vnshamefast sycophant.

Paletz speaketh against John Hus.

This done, the said John Hus was committed to the custody of the bishop of Reigen, vnder whom Hierome of Prage was also prisoner. But before that he was led away, the cardinall of Cambray calling him backe againe in the presence of the emperor, said: John Hus, I haue heard you say, that if you had not been willing of your owne mind to come vnto Constance, neither the emperor himselfe, neither the king of Boheme could haue compelled you to doe it. Vnto whom John Hus answered: Vnder your licence most reuerend father, I neuer vsed any such kinde of talke or words. But this I did say, that there was in Boheme a great number of gentlemen and noble men, which did fauor and loue mee, the which also might easilie haue kept mee in some sure and secret place, that I should not haue beene constrained to come vnto this towne of Constance, neither at the will of the emperor, neither

How much better might they haue done it which are of more force or puissance then I am? and haue stronger castels and places then I haue? After that the lord de Clum had spoken, the cardinall of Cambray said; Let vs leaue this talke. And I tell you Iohn Hus, and counsell you that you submit your selfe vnto the sentence and mind of the councell, as you did promise in the prison: and if you will doe so, it shall be greatly both for your profit and honor.

The emperors exhortation to Iohn Hus.

And the emperor himselfe began to tell him the same tale, saying: Albeit that there be some which say, that the fifteenth day after you were committed to prison, you obtained of vs our letters of safe-conduct; notwithstanding I can well proue by the witnesse of many princes and noble men, that the said safe-conduct was obtained and gotten of vs by my lord de Dube and de Clum, before you were parted out of Prage, vnder whose gard we haue sent for you, to the end that none should doe you any outrage or hurt, but that you should haue full libertie to speake freely before all the Councell, and to answere as touching your faith and doctrine; and as you see, my lords the cardinals and bishops haue so dealt with you, that we doe very well perceiue their good will towards you, for the which wee haue great cause to thanke them. And forsomuch as diuers haue told vs, that we may not or ought not of right to defend any man which is an heretike, or suspect of heresie: therefore now wee giue you euen the same counsell which the cardinall of Cambray hath giuen you already, that you bee not obstinate to maintaine any opinion, but that you doe submit your selfe vnder such obedience as you owe vnto the authoritie of the holy Councell, in all things that shall be laid against you, and confirmed by credible witnesses. The which thing if you doe according to our counsell, we will giue order that for the loue of vs, of our brother and the whole realme of Boheme, the councell shall suffer you to depart in peace, with an easie and tollerable penance and satisfaction. The which thing if you doe contrariwise refuse to doe, the presidents of the councell, shall haue sufficient wherewithall to proceed against you. And for our part be ye well assured, that we will sooner prepare and make the fire with our owne hands to burne you withall, then we will endure or suffer any longer that you shall maintaine or vse this sickenesse of opinions, which you haue hitherto maintained and vsed. Wherefore our aduice and counsell is, that you submit your selfe wholly vnto the iudgement of the councell.

The answer of Iohn Hus vnto the emperor.

Vnto whom Iohn Hus answered in this sort: O most noble emperor, I render vnto your highnesse most immortall thanks for your letters of safe-conduct. Vpon this, lord Iohn de Clum did breake him of his purpose, and admonished him that he did in no point excuse himselfe of the blame of obstinacie.

Then said Iohn Hus; O most gentle Lord, I doe take God to my witnesse, that I was neuer minded to maintaine any opinion euer obstinatly, and that for this same intent and purpose, I did come hither of mine owne good will, that if any man could lay before me any better or more holy doctrine then mine, that then I would change mine opinion without any further doubt. After he had spoken and said these things, hee was sent away with Sergeants.

The morrow after, which was the eight day of June, the very same company which was assembled the day before, assembled now againe at the Couent of the Franciscans. And in this assembly were also Iohn Hus his friends, lord de Dube, and lord de Clum, and Peter the Notary. Thither was Iohn Hus also brought: and in his presence there were read about thirtie nine articles, the which they said, were drawne out of his bookes. Hus acknowledged all those that were faithfully and truly collected and gathered, to be his; of the which sort there were but very few. The residue were counterfetted and forged by his aduersaries, and specially by Steuen Paletz, the principall author of this mischiefe: for they could finde no such thing in the bookes out of the which they said they had drawne and gathered them; or at the least, if they were, they were corrupted by slanders, as a man may easilie perceiue by the number of articles.

39. Articles laid to Iohn Hus.

These be the same articles in a manner which were shewed before in the prison to Iohn Hus, and are rehearsed here in an other order. Howbeit there were more articles added vnto them, and other some corrected and inlarged. But now we will shew them one with another, and declare what the said Hus did answere both openly before them all, as also in the prison; for he left his answeres in the prison briefly written with his owne hand in these words.

I Iohn Hus, vnworthy minister of Iesus Christ, master of Art, and Bachelar of Diuinity, doe confesse that I haue written a certaine smal treatise intituled, Of the church, the copie whereof was shewed me by the notaries of the three presidents of the councell, that is to say, the Patriarch of Constantinople, the bishop of Castle, and the bishop of Libusse; the which deputies or presidents in respose of the said treatise, deliuered vnto me certaine articles, saying, that they were drawne out of the said treatise, and were written in the same.

The answer of Iohn Hus concerning his booke of the church.

The first article. There is but one holy vniuersall or catholike church, which is the vniuersall companie of all the predestinate. I doe confesse that this proposition is mine, and is confirmed by the saying of S. Augustine vpon S. Iohn.

The second article. S. Paul was neuer any member of the diuell, albeit that he committed, and did certaine acts like vnto the acts of the malignant church. And likewise S. Peter which fell into an horrible sin of periury and denial of his master, it was by the permission of God that he might the more firmely and stedfastly rise againe and be confirmed. I answer, according to S. Augustine; that it is expedient that the elect and predestinate should sinne and offend.

S. Paul was neuer any member of the diuell.

Hereby it appeareth, that there is two manner of separations from the holy church. The first is, not to perdition, as all the elect are diuided from the church. The second is to perdition, by the which certaine heretikes are through their deadly sinne, diuided from the church. Yet notwithstanding by the grace of God, they may returne againe vnto the flocke, and be of the fold of our Lord Iesus Christ, of whom he speaketh himselfe saying; I haue other sheepe which are not of this fold: Iohn 11.

Two maner of separations from the church.

The third article. No part or member of the church doth depart or fall away at any time from the body, for so much as the charitie of predestination, which is the bond and chaine of the same, doth neuer fall. This proposition is thus placed in my booke: As the reprobate of the church proceed out of the same, and yet are not as parts or members of the same, for so much as no part or member of the same doth finallie fall away, because that the charitie of predestination, which is the bond and chaine of the same, doth neuer fall away. This is proued by the 13. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, and to the Romans the 8. chapter, All things turne to good to them which loue God. Also I am certaine that neither death nor life can separate vs from the charity and loue of God, as it is more at large in the booke.

The members of the church neuer fall finally away.

The fourth article. The predestinate, although he be not in the state of grace, according to present iustice, yet is hee alwaies a member of the vniuersall church. This is an error, if it be vnderstood of all such as be predestinate: for thus it is in the booke, about the beginning of the fifth chapter, where it is declared, that there be diuers maners and sorts of being in the church; for there are some in the church, according to a misshapen faith, and other some according to predestination, as christians predestinate now in sinne, but shall returne againe vnto grace.

The predestinate is alwaies a member of the vniuersall church, although not in present iustice.

The fifth article. There is no degree of honor or dignitie, neither any humane election, or any sensible signe, that can make any man a member of the vniuersall church. I answere, this article is after this maner in my booke: And such subtilties are vnderstood and knowne by considering what it is to be in the church, and what it is to be a part or member of the church, and that predestination doth make a man a member of the vniuersall church, the which is a preparation of grace for the present, & of glory to come: and not any degree of dignitie, neither election of man, neither any sensible signe. For the traitor Iudas Iscariot, notwithstanding Christs election, and the temporall graces which were giuen him for his office of Apostleship, and that he was reputed and counted of men a true Apostle of Iesus Christ, yet was he no true disciple, but a wolfe couered in a sheeps skinne, as S. Augustine saith.

To be in the church, and a member of the church.

Predestination.

The sixth article. A reprobate man is neuer no member of the holy church. I answere, it is in my booke with sufficient long probation out of the 26. Psalme, and out of the fifth chapter to the Ephesians, & also by S. Bernards saying, The church of Iesus Christ is more plainly and euidently his body, then the body which he deliuered for vs to death. I haue also written in the 5. chapter of my booke, that the holy church is the barne of the Lord, in the which are both good and euill, predestinate and reprobate; the good being as the good corne or graine, and the euill as the chaffe: and thereunto is added the exposition of S. Augustine.

Both good and bad in the church.

The seuenth article. Iudas was neuer no true Disciple of Iesus Christ. I answere, and I doe confesse the same. This appeareth by the fifth article, which is passed afore, and by S. Augustine in his booke of penance, where he doth expound the meaning of Saint Iohn, in his first Epistle and second chapter, where he said: They came out from amongst vs, but they were none of vs. He knew from the beginning all them which should beleeue, and him also which should betray him, and said: And therefore I say vnto you, that none commeth vnto me, except it be giuen him of my father. From that time many of the Disciples parted from him, and were not those also called Disciples, according to the words of the Gospell? And yet notwithstanding they were no true Disciples, because they did not not remaine and continue in the word of the Sonne of God, according as it is said: If you remaine in my word, you be my disciples. Forsomuch then as they did not continue with Christ as his true disciples, so likewise are they not the true sonnes of God: although they seeme so, vnto him they are not so, vnto whom it is knowne what they shall be: that is to say, of good, euill. Thus much writeth S. Augustine: It is also euident that Judas could not be the true disciple of Christ, by meanes of his couetousnesse: for Christ himselfe said in the presence of Judas, as I suppose; Except a man forsake all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. Forsomuch then as Judas did not forsake all things, according to the Lords will, and follow him, he was a theefe, as it is said John the 12. and as diuell, John the 6. whereby it is euident by the word of the Lord, that Judas was not his true, but fained disciple. Whereupon S. Augustine writing vpon John, declaring how the sheep heare the voice of Christ, saith; What maner of hearers, thinke we, his sheepe were? Truly Judas heard him and was a wolfe, yet followed he the shepheard; but being clothed in a sheeps skinne, he lay in wait for the shepheard.

The eighth Article. The congregation of the predestinate, whether they be in the state of grace or no, according vnto present iustice, is the holy vniuersall church, and therefore it is an article of faith, and it is the same church which hath neither wrinckle, neither spot in it, but is holy and vndefiled, the which the sonne of God doth call his owne. The answere: The words of the booke out of the which this Article was drawne, are these: Thirdly, the church is vnderstood and taken for the congregation and assembly of the faithfull, whether they be in the state of grace, according to present iustice or not. And in this sort it is an article of our faith, of the which Saint Paul maketh mention in the fifth chapter to the Ephesians: Christ so loued his church, that he deliuered and offered himselfe for the same, &c. I pray you then, is there any faithfull man the which doth doubt that the church doth not signifie all the elect and predestinate, the which we ought to beleeue to be the vniuersall church, the glorious spouse of Jesus Christ, holy and without spot? Wherefore this article is an article of faith, the which we ought firmely to beleeue according to our Creed: I beleeue the holy catholike church; and of this church doth saint Augustine, saint Gregory, saint Jerome, and diuers other make mention.

The church is taken sometime for the congregation of the elect and faithfull, and so is the article taken in the Creed.

The ninth Article. Peter neuer was, neither is the head of the holy vniuersall church. The answer: This article was drawne out of these words of my booke: All men doe agree in this point, that Peter had receiued of the rocke of the church (which is Christ) humility, pouerty, stedfastnesse of faith, and consequently blessednesse. Not as though the meaning of our Lord Jesus Christ was, when he said, Vpon this rocke I will build my church, that he would build euery militant church vpon the person of Peter, for Christ should build his church vpon the rocke which is Christ himselfe, from whence Peter receiued his stedfastnesse of faith, forsomuch as Jesus Christ is the onely head and foundation of euery church, and not Peter.

Peter neuer was head of the whole vniuersall church.

The tenth article. If he that is called the vicar of Jesus Christ, doe follow Christ in his life, then he is his true vicar. But if so be it, he doe walke in contrary paths and waies, then is he the messenger of antichrist, and the enemy and aduersarie of Saint Peter, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, and also the vicar of Judas Iscarioth. I answere: The words of my booke are these: If he which is called the vicar of saint Peter, walke in the waies of Christian vertues aforesaid, we doe beleeue verily that hee is the true vicar and true bishop of the church which he ruleth: but if he walke in contrary paths and waies, then is he the messenger of antichrist, contrary both to Saint Peter, and our Lord Jesus Christ. And therefore Saint Bernard in his fourth booke did write in this sort vnto pope Eugenie: Thou delightest and walkest in great pride and arrogancie, being gorgeously and sumptuously arraied, what fruit or profit doe thy flocke or sheepe receiue by thee? If I durst say it, these be rather the pastures and feedings of diuels then of sheep. Saint Peter and S. Paul did not so: wherefore thou seemest by these thy doings to succeed Constantine, and not saint Peter. These be the very words of S. Bernard. It followeth after in my book, that if the maner and fashion of his life and liuing, be contrary to that which S. Peter vsed, or that he be giuen to auarice and couetousnesse, then is he the vicar of Judas Iscarioth, which loued and chose the reward of iniquity, and did set out to sale the Lord Jesus Christ. As soone as they had read the same, those which ruled and gouerned the councell, beheld one another, making mocks and mowes, they nodded their heads at him.

The vicar of Christ, how he is to be taken.

Bernard. ad Eugenium, lib. 4.

The eleuenth Article. All such as do vse simony, and priests liuing dissolutely and wantonly, doe hold an vntrue opinion of the seuen sacraments, as vnbeleeuing bastards, and not as children, not knowing what is the office and duty of the keies or censures, rites, and ceremonies, neither of the diuine seruice of the church, or of veneration or worshipping of relikes, neither of the orders constituted and ordained in the church, neither yet of indulgences or pardons. I answere, that it is placed in this manner in my booke: This abuse of authority or power is committed by such as doe sell and make merchandise of holy orders, and get and gather together riches by simony, making faires and markets of the holy sacraments, and liuing in all kind of voluptuousnesse and dissolute manners, or in any other filthy or villanous kind of liuing: They doe pollute and defile the holy ecclesiasticall state. And albeit that they professe in words that they doe know God, yet do they deny it againe by their deeds, and consequently beleeue not in God: But as vnbeleeuing bastards they hold a contrary and vntrue opinion of the seuen sacraments of the church. And this appeareth most euidently, forsomuch as all such doe vtterly contemne and despise the name of God, according to the saying of Malachi, the first chapter: Vnto you O priests, be it spoken, which do despise and contemne my name.

Prelats making merchandise of holy orders.

The twelfth Article. The papall dignity hath his originall from the emperors of Rome. I answere, and marke well what my words are: The preeminence and institution of the pope is sprung and come of the emperors power and authority. And this is proued by the 96. distinction: for Constantine granted this priuiledge vnto the bishop of Rome, and other after him confirmed the same: That like as Augustus for the outward and temporall goods bestowed vpon the church, is counted alwaies the most high king aboue all others: so the bishop of Rome should be called the principall father aboue all other bishops. This notwithstanding the papall dignity hath his originall immediatly from Christ, as touching his spirituall administration and office, to rule the church. Then the cardinall of Cambray said: In the time of Constantine, there was a generall councell holden at Nice, in the which, albeit the highest rome and place in the church was giuen to the bishop of Rome, for honors cause, it is ascribed vnto the emperor: Wherefore then doe you not aswell affirme and say that the papall dignitie toke his originall rather from that councell, then by the emperors authority and power?

12 The pope taketh his originall from the emperor. 96. dist.

The thirteenth Article. No man would reasonably affirme (without relation) neither of himselfe nor of any other, that he is the head of any particular church. I answer: I confesse it to be written in my booke, and it followeth straight after: Albeit that through his good liuing, he ought to hope and trust that he is a member of the holy vniuersall church, the spouse of Jesus Christ, according to the saying of the Preacher: No man knoweth whether he be worthy and haue deserued grace and fauor, or hatred. And Luke the 17. When ye haue done all that ye can, say that you are vnprofitable seruants.

13 The pope is not the head of any particular church.

The fourteenth Article. It ought not to be beleeued that the pope, whatsoeuer he be, may be the head of any particular church, vnlesse he be predestinat or ordained of God. I answer, that I do acknowledge this proposition to be mine, and this is easie to proue, forsomuch as it is necessary that the christian faith should be depraued, forsomuch as the church was deceiued by M. as it appeareth by S. Augustine.

The fifteenth Article. The popes power as Vicar, is but vaine and nothing worth, if he doe not confirme and addresse his life according to Jesus Christ, and not follow the manners of S. Peter. I answer, that it is thus in my booke; that it is meet and expedient that he which is ordained vicar, should addresse and frame himselfe in manners and conditions, to the authority of him which did put him in place. And John Hus said moreouer before the whole councell: I vnderstand that the power and authority in such a pope as doth not represent the manners of Christ, is frustrate and void, as touching the merit and reward, which he should obtaine and get thereby, and doth not get the same: but not as concerning his office. Then certaine others standing by, asked of him saying; Where is that glosse in your booke? John Hus answered, You shall finde it in my treatise against master Paletz: whereat all the assistance (looking one vpon another) began for to smile and laugh.

15 The popes power vaine.

Distinction of merit and of office.

The sixteenth Article. The pope is most holy, not because he doth supply and hold the rome and place of S. Peter, but because he hath great reuenewes. I answer, that my words are mutilate, for thus it is written: He is not most holy because he is called the vicar of S. Peter, or because he hath great and large possessions: but if he be the follower of Jesus Christ in humility, gentlenes, patience, labor and trauell, and in perfect loue and charity.

16 Holinesse commeth not by sitting, but by following.

The seuentéenth Article. The cardinals are not the manifest and true successors of the other Apostles of Jesus Christ, if they liue not according to the fashion of the Apostles, keeping the commandements and ordinances of the Lord Jesus. I answer, that it is thus written in my booke, and it proueth it self sufficiently: For if they enter in by another way then by the doore, which is the Lord Jesus, they be murtherers and theeues.

17 The cardinals doe count it heresie, that they should be compelled to be followers of the Apostles.

Then said the cardinall of Cambray: Behold both this and all other Articles before rehearsed, he hath written much more detestable things in his booke then is presented in his articles. Truly John Hus thou hast kept no order in thy sermons and writings. Had it not been your part to haue applied your sermons according to your audience? For to what purpose was it, or what did it profit you before the people to preach against the cardinals, when as none of them were present? It had been meeter for you to haue told them their faults before them all, then before the laity. Then answered John Hus; Reuerend father, father, for so much as I did see many priests and other learned men present at my sermons, for their sakes I spake those words. Then said the cardinall, thou hast done very ill, for by such kind of talke thou hast disturbed and troubled the whole state of the church.

18 John Hus condemneth the cruelty of the prelats in seeking the death of heretikes.

The eighteenth Article; An heretike ought not to be committed to the secular powers to be put to death, for it is sufficient onely that he abide and suffer the ecclesiasticall censure. These are my words: That they might be ashamed of their cruell sentence and iudgement, specially forsomuch as Iesus Christ, bishop both of the old and new testament, would not iudge such as were disobedient by ciuill iudgement, neither condemne them to bodily death. As touching the first point; it may be euidently seene in the 12. chapter of S. Luke. And for the second it appeareth also by the woman which was taken in adultery, of whom it is spoken in the eighth chapter of S. John. And it is said in the eighteenth chapter of S. Matthew: If thy brother haue offended thee, &c. Marke therefore what I doe say: That an heretike whatsoeuer he be, ought first to be instructed and taught with christian loue and gentlenes by the holy scriptures, and by the reasons drawne and taken out of the same, as S. Augustine and others haue done, disputing against the heretikes. But if there were any which after all these gentle and louing admonitions and instructions, would not cease from, or leaue off their stiffnesse of opinions, but obstinately resist against the truth, such, I say, ought to suffer corporall or bodily punishment.

As soone as John Hus had spoken those things, the Iudges read in his booke a certaine clause, wherein he seemed greeuously to inueigh against them which deliuered an heretike vnto the secular power, not being confuted or conuicted of heresie, and compared them vnto the high Priests, Scribes and Pharisies, which said vnto Pilat; It is not lawfull for vs to put any man to death, and deliuered Christ vnto him: and yet notwithstanding, according vnto Christs owne witnesse, they were greater murtherers then Pilat: For he, said Christ, which hath deliuered me vnto thee, hath committed the greatest offence. Then the cardinals and bishops made a great noise, and demanded of John Hus, saying; Who are they that thou dost compare or assimule vnto the Pharisies? Then he said, all those which deliuered vp any innocent vnto the ciuill sword, as the Scribes and Pharisies deliuered Iesus Christ vnto Pilat. No, no, said they againe, for all that, you spake here of doctors. And the cardinall of Cambray, according to his accustomed manner said: Truly they which haue made and gathered these articles, haue vsed great lenity and gentlenesse, for his writings are much more detestable and horrible.

The betraying and condemning of innocents.

And how could this bishop of Cambray vnderstand the bookes of John Hus being written in Bohemian speech, which he vnderstood not?

19 The church militant standeth in three parts: 1. Ministers. 2. Nobles. 3. Commons.

The nineteenth Article. The nobles of the world ought to constraine and compell the ministers of the church to obserue and keepe the law of Iesus Christ. I answere, that it standeth thus word for word in my booke: Those which be on our part doe preach and affirme that the church militant, according to the parts which the Lord hath ordained, is diuided, and consisteth in these parts: That is to say: Ministers of the church, which should keep purely and sincerely the ordinances and commandements of the sonne of God, and the nobles of the world that should compell and driue them to keepe the commandements of Iesus Christ, and of the common people, seruing to both these parts and ends, according to the institution and ordinance of Iesus Christ.

The twentith Article. The ecclesiasticall obedience, is a kind of obedience, which the priests and monks haue inuented without any expresse authority of the holy scriptures. I answer and confesse, that those words are thus written in my booke: I say, that there be three kinds of obedience, spirituall, secular and ecclesiasticall. The spirituall obedience is that which is only due according to the law and ordinance of God, vnder the which the Apostles of Iesus Christ did liue, and all christians ought for to liue. The secular obedience is that which is due according to the ciuill lawes and ordinances. The ecclesiasticall obedience is such as the priests haue inuented, without any expresse authority of Scripture. The first kind of obedience doth vtterly exclude from it all euill, as well on his part which giueth the commandement, as on his also which doth obey the same. And of this obedience it is spoken in the 24. chapter of Deut. Thou shalt doe all that which the priests of the kindred of Leuy shall teach and instruct thee, according as I haue commanded them.

Three kinds of obedience: 1. Spirituall. 2. Secular. 3. Ecclesiasticall.

True obedience ruled by Gods comandement. Deut. 24.

The twenty one Article. He that is excommunicated by the pope, if he refuse and forsake the iudgement of the pope, and the generall councell, and appealeth vnto Iesus Christ, after he hath made his appellation, all the excommunications and curses of the pope cannot annoy or hurt him. I answere, that I doe not acknowledge this proposition; but indeed I did make my complaint in my booke, that they had both done me, & such as fauored me great wrong, and that they refuse to heare me in the popes court. For after the death of one pope, I did appeale to his successor, and all that did profit me nothing. And to appeale from the pope to the councell, it were too long, and that were euen as much as if a man in trouble should seeke an vncertaine remedy. And therefore last of all I haue appealed to the head of the church my Lord Iesus Christ, for he is much more excellent and better, then any pope, to discusse and determine matters and causes, forsomuch as he cannot erre, neither yet deny iustice to him that doth aske or require it in a iust cause, neither can he condemne the innocent. Then spake the cardinall of Cambray vnto him, and said; Wilt thou presume aboue Saint Paul, who appealed vnto the emperor, and not vnto Iesus Christ? John Hus answered: Forsomuch then as I am the first that doe it, am I therefore to be reputed and counted an heretike? And yet notwithstanding, S. Paul did not appeale vnto the emperor of his owne motion or will, but by the will of Christ, which spake vnto him by reuelation and said: Be firme and constant, for thou must goe vnto Rome. And as he was about to rehearse his appeale againe, they mocked him.

Appealing vnto Christ first taken by the cardinall of Cambray.

¶ Forsomuch as mention here is made of the appeale of the said Hus, it seemeth good here to shew the manner and forme thereof.

The copie and tenor of the appeale of Iohn Hus.

The appeale of John Hus from pope Iohn 23. vnto Christ.

FOrasmuch as the most mighty Lord, one in essence, three in person, is both the chiefe and first, and also the last and vttermost refuge of all those which are oppressed, and that he is the God which defendeth verity and truth throughout all generations, doing iustice to such as bee wronged, being ready and at hand to all those which call vpon him in verity and truth, vnbinding those that are bound: and fulfilling the desires of all those which honor and feare him; defending and keeping all those that loue him, and vtterly destroying and bringing to ruine the stiffenecked and vnpenitent sinner, and that the Lord Iesus Christ very God and man, being in great anguish compassed in with the Priests, Scribes and Pharisies, wicked Iudges and witnesses, willing by the most bitter and ignominious death, to redeeme the chosen children of God, before the foundation of the world, from euerlasting damnation; hath left behind him this godly example for a memory vnto them which should come after him, to the intent they should commit all their causes into the hands of God, who can doe all things, and knoweth and seeth all things, saying in this maner:

The feruent complaint and prayer of Christ against wicked Iudges.

O Lord, behold my affliction, for my enemy hath prepared himselfe against me, and thou art my protector & defender. O Lord, thou hast giuen me vnderstanding, and I haue acknowledged thee: thou hast opened vnto me all their enterprises; & for mine owne part I haue been as a meeke lambe which is led vnto sacrifice, and haue not resisted against them. They haue wrought their enterprises vpon me, saying: Let vs put wood in his bread, and let vs banish him out of the land of the liuing, that his name be no more spoken of nor had in memory. But thou O Lord of hosts, which iudgest iustly and seest the deuices and imaginations of their hearts, hasten thee to take vengeance vpon them, for I haue manifested my cause vnto thee, forsomuch as the number of those which trouble me is great, and haue counselled together, saying: The Lord hath forsaken him, pursue him & catch him. O Lord my God, behold their doings, for thou art my patience; deliuer me from mine enemies, for thou art my God: doe not separate thy selfe far from me, forsomuch as tribulation is at hand, and there is no man which wil succor me. My God my God looke downe vpon me, wherefore hast thou forsaken me? So many dogs haue compassed me in, and the company of the wicked haue besieged mee round about, for they haue spoken against mee with deceitfull tongues, and haue compassed me in with words full of despite, and haue enforced me without cause. In stead of loue towards me, they haue slandered me, and haue recompenced me with euill for good, and in place of charity they haue conceiued hatred against me.

After the example of Christ he maketh his prayer to God.

A godly prayer of John Hus.

Wherefore behold I staying my selfe vpon this most holy and fruitfull example of my Sauiour and redeemer, doe appeale before God for this my griefe and hard oppression from this most wicked sentence and iudgement, and the excommunication determined by the Bishops, Scribes, Pharisies, and Iudges, which sit in Moises seat, and resigne my cause wholly vnto him; so as the holy Patriarke of Constantinople Iohn Chrysostome, appealed twice from the councell of the bishops and clergy; and Andrew bishop of Prage, and Robert bishop of Lincoln, appealed vnto the soueraigne and most iust Iudge, the which is not defiled with cruelty, neither can hee be corrupted with gifts and rewards, neither yet bee deceiued by false witnesse. Also I desire greatly that all the faithfull seruants of Iesus Christ, and especially the princes, barons, knights, esquires, and all other which inhabit our country of Boheme, should vnderstand and know these things, and haue compassion vpon me, which am so greeuously oppressed by the excommunication which is out against me, the which was obtained and gotten by the instigation and procurement of Michael de Causis my great enemy, and by the consent and furtherance of the canons of the cathedrall church of Prage, and giuen and granted out by Peter of Saint Angels, deane of the church of Rome, and cardinall, and also ordained Iudge by pope Iohn xxiij. who hath continued almost these two yeeres, and would giue no audience vnto my aduocates and procurators, which they ought not to deny: no not to a Iew or Pagan, or to any heretike what-whatsoeuer he were) neither yet would he receiue any reasonable excuse for that I did not appeare personally, neither would he accept the testimonials of the whole Vniuersity of Prage with the seale hanging at it, or the witnes of the sworne Notaries, and such as were called vnto witnesse. By this all men may euidently perceiue, that I haue not incurred any fault or crime of contumacie or disobedience, forsomuch as that I did not appeare in the court of Rome, was not for any contempt, but for reasonable causes.

And moreouer, forsomuch as they had laid ambushments for mee on euery side by waies where I should passe, and also because the perils and dangers of others, haue made mee the more circumspect and aduised; and forsomuch as my procurers were willing and contented to binde themselues euen to abide the punishment of the fire, to answere to all such as would oppose or lay any thing against me in the court of Rome; as also so because they did imprison my lawfull procurator in the said court, without any cause, demerit, or fault, as I suppose. For somuch then as the order and disposition of all ancient lawes, as well diuine of the old and new testament, as also of the canon lawes, is this, that the Iudges should resort vnto the place where the crime or fault is committed or done, and there to enquire of all such crimes as shall be obiected and laid against him which is accused, or slandered, and that of such men as by conuersation haue some knowledge or vnderstanding of the party so accused (the which may not be the euill willers or enemies of him which is so accused or slandered: but must bee men of an honest conuersation, no common quarrell pickers or accusers, but feruent louers of the law of God:) and finally, that there should be a fit and meet place appointed, whither as the accused party might without danger or perill, resort or come, and that the iudge and witnesses should not be enemies vnto him that is accused: And also forsomuch as it is manifest, that all these conditions were wanting and lacking, as touching my appearance for the safegard of my life, I am excused before God from the friuolous pretended obstinacie and excommunication. Whereupon I Iohn Hus doe present and offer this my appeale vnto my Lord Iesu Christ, my iust Iudge, who knoweth and defendeth, and iustly iudgeth euery mans iust and true cause.

22 A knot found in a rush.

The twenty two article. A vicious and naughty man liueth viciously and naughtily; but a vertuous and godly man liueth vertuously and godly. I answere: My words are these: That the diuision of all humane workes is in two parties, that is, that they be either vertuous, or vicious: forsomuch as it doth appeare, that if any man be vertuous and godly, and that he do any thing, he doth it then vertuously and godly. And contrariwise, if a man be vicious and naught, that which he doth is vicious and naught. For as vice, which is called crime or offence, and thereby vnderstand deadly sinne, doth vniuersally infect or deprane all the acts and doings of the subiect, that is, of the man which doth them: so likewise vertue and godlinesse doth quicken all the acts and doings of the vertuous and godly man: in somuch, that he being in the state of grace, is said to pray and do good workes euen sleeping, as it were by a certaine meanes working; as Saint Augustine, Saint Gregory, and diuers other affirme. And it appeareth in the firth chapter of Luke: If thine eye, that is to say, the mind or intention be simple, not depraued with the peruersnesse of any sinne or offence, all the whole body, that is to say, all the acts and doings shall be clere and shining, that is, acceptable and gratefull vnto God. But if thine eye be euill, the whole body is darkened. And in the second to the Corinthians, 10. chapter: All things that you doe, doe them to the glory of God. And likewise in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, and last chapter, it is said: Let all your doings be done with charity. Wherefore all kind of life and liuing according vnto charity, is vertuous and godly: and if it be without charity, it is vicious and euill. This saying may well be proued out of the 23. chapter of Deuteronomy, where God speaketh vnto the people, that he that keepeth his commandements, is blessed in the house and in the field, out going, and in comming, sleeping and waking: but he that doth not keepe his commandements, is accursed in the house and in the fields, in going out and in comming in, sleeping and waking, &c. The same also is euident by S. Augustine vpon the Psal. where he writeth, that a good man in all his doings doth praise the Lord. And Gregory saith, that the sleep of saints and holy men doth not lacke their merit. How much more then his doings which proceed of good zeale, be not without reward, and consequently be vertuous and good? And contrariwise it is vnderstood of him which is in deadly sinne, of whom it is spoken in the law, that whatsoeuer the vncleane man doth touch, is made vncleane.

The true, that is good, bringeth forth good fruit.

2. Cor. 10.

1. Cor. vlt.

Deut. 23.

To this end doth that also appertaine which is before repeated out of the first of Malachi. And Gregory in the first booke and first question, saith: We do defile the bread, which is the body of Christ, when as wee come vnworthily to the table, and when we being defiled, doe drinke his bloud. And Saint Augustine vpon the 146. Psalme, saith: If thou doest exceed the due measure of nature, and doest not abstaine from gluttony, but gorge thy selfe vp with drunkennes, whatsoeuer laud or praise thy tongue doth speake of the grace and fauor of God, thy life doth blaspheme the same. When he had made an end of this article, the cardinall of Cambray said: The Scripture saith that we be all sinners. And againe; If we say we haue no sinne, we deceiue our selues, and so we should alwaies liue in deadly sinne. John Hus answered: The Scripture speaketh in that place of veniall sinnes, the which doe not vtterly expell or put away the habit of vertue from a man, but doe associate themselues together. And a certaine Englishman whose name was M. said: But those sinnes doe not associate themselues with any act morally good. John Hus alledged against Saint Augustines place vpon 146. Psalme; the which when he rehearsed, they all with one mouth said; What makes this to the purpose?

Cardinall of Cambray obiecteth.

John Hus answereth.

The twenty three article. The minister of Christ liuing according to his law, and hauing the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Scriptures, and an earnest desire to edifie the people, ought to preach, notwithstanding the pretended excommunication of the pope. And moreouer, if the pope or any other ruler doe forbid any priest or minister so disposed, not to preach, that he ought not to obey him. I answere, that these are my words: That albeit the excommunication were either threatned or come out against him, in such sort that a Christian ought not to doe the commandements of Christ, it appeareth by the words of Saint Peter and the other Apostles, that we ought rather to obey God then man. Whereupon it followeth, that the minister of Christ liuing according vnto his law, &c. ought to preach notwithstanding any pretended excommunication. For it is euident that it is commanded vnto the ministers of the church to preach the word of God, Acts 5. God hath commanded vs to preach and testifie vnto the people, as by diuers other places of the Scripture, and the holy fathers, rehearsed in my treatise, it doth appeare more at large. The second part of this article followeth in my treatise in this manner.

23 Forbidding to preach, whether it ought to be obeied.

Acts 5.

By this it appeareth, that for a minister to preach, and a rich man to giue almes, are not indifferent workes, but duties and commandements. Whereby it is further euident, that if the pope or any other ruler of the church doe command any minister disposed for to preach, not to preach, or a rich man disposed for to giue almes, not to giue, that they ought not to obey him. And he added moreouer, to the intent that you may vnderstand me the better, I call that a pretended excommunication, the which is vniustly disordered and giuen forth, contrary to the order of the law and Gods commandements. For the which the meete minister appointed thereunto, ought not to cease from preaching, neither yet to feare damnation.

Preaching and almes giuing be not works indifferent, but duties and commandements. To forbid a minister to preach, and to forbid a rich man to giue almes, is both one.

Then they obiected vnto him, that he had said that such kind of excommunications were rather blessings. Verily, said Hus, euen so I do now say againe, that euery excommunication, by the which a man is vniustly excommunicat, is vnto him a blessing afore God; according to that saying of the Prophet: I will curse where as you blesse: and contrariwise, they shall curse, but thou O Lord shalt blesse. Then the cardinall of Florence, which had alwaies a Notary ready at his hand to write such things as he commanded him, said: The law is, that euery excommunication, be it neuer so vniust, ought to be feared. It is true, said John Hus: for I doe remember eight causes, for the which excommunication ought to be feared. Then said the cardinall; Is there no more but eight? It may be, said John Hus, that there be more.

How the popes cursings are blessings.

The cardinall of Florence with his Notary.

Eight causes why excommunication ought to be feared.

The twenty foure article. Euery man which is admitted vnto the ministery of the church, receiueth also by speciall commandement, the office of a preacher, and ought to execute and fulfill that commandement, notwithstanding any excommunication pretended to the contrary. The answere: My words are these: For so much as it doth appeare by that which is afore said, that whosoeuer commeth, or is admitted vnto the ministery, receiueth also by especiall commandement, the office of preaching, he ought to fulfill that commandement, any excommunication to the contrary pretended notwithstanding. Also no Christian ought to doubt but that a man sufficiently instructed in learning, is more bound to counsell and instruct the ignorant, to teach those which are in doubt, to chastise those which are vnruly, and to remit and forgiue those that doe him iniury; then for to doe any other workes of mercy. Forsomuch then as he that is rich and hath sufficient, is bounden vnder the paine of damnation, to minister and giue corporall and bodily almes, as appeareth in the twenty fiue chapter of Matthew: how much more is he bound to doe spirituall almes?

A minister once admitted, is more bound to preach, then to doe any other worke of mercy; the popes prohibition notwithstanding.

The twenty fiue article. The ecclesiasticall censures are antichristian, such as the clergy haue inuented for their owne preferment, and for the bondage and seruitude of the common people. Whereby if the laity be not obedient vnto the clergy at their will and pleasure, it doth multiply their couetousnesse, defendeth their malice, and prepareth a way for antichrist. Whereby it is an euident signe and token, that such censures proceede from antichrist; the which censures in their processes they doe call Fulminations or lightnings, whereby the clergie doth chiefely proceed against such as doe manifest and open the wickednesse of antichrist, which thrust themselues into the office of the clergie. These things are contained in the last chapter chapter of his treatise of the Church. I answere, and I deny that it is in that forme. But the matter thereof is largely handled in the 23. chapter. And in the examination of the audience, they haue gathered certaine clauses most contrary thereunto. The which when they had read, the cardinall of Cambray renewed his old song, saying: Truely these are much more grieuous and offensiue, then the articles which are gathered.

The twenty sixth Article. There ought no interditement to be appointed vnto the people, for so much as Christ the high bishop, neither for Iohn Baptist, neither for any iniury that was done vnto him, did make any interditement. My words are these: When as I complained, that for one ministers sake, an interditement was giuen out, and thereby all good men ceased from the laud and praise of God. And Christ the high bishoppe, notwithstanding that the Prophet was taken and kept in prison, then whom there was no greater amongst the children of men, did not giue out any curse or interditement, nor not when as Herod beheaded him, neither when hee himselfe was spoiled, beaten, and blasphemed of the Souldiours, Scribes and Pharisies, he did not then curse them, but praied for them, and taught his Disciples to doe the same, as it appeareth in the fifth chapter of Saint Matthew. And Christs first vicar following the same doctrine and learning, saith in his first Epistle of Saint Peter, and the second chapter: Hereunto are ye called: For Christ hath suffered for vs, leauing vs an example that we should follow his footsteppes, who when hee was cursed and euill spoken of, did not curse againe. And Saint Paul following the same order and way in the twelfth chapter of the Romans, saith: Blesse them that persecute you. There were besides these many other places of scripture recited in that booke; but they being omitted, the se were only rehearsed, which did helpe or preuaile to stir vp or moue the Iudges mindes.

Christ interdicted none, but praied for all.

1. Pet. 2.

Rom. 12.

And these are the articles which are alledged out of Iohn Hus his booke intituled, Of the Church.

Other Articles moreouer out of other his bookes were collected, and forced against him, first out of his treatise written against Steuen Paletz, to the number of seuen articles. Also six other articles strained out of his treatise against Stanislaus Znoyma. Whereunto his answers likewise be adioyned, not vnfruitfull to be read.

¶ Heere follow seuen Articles, which are said to be drawne out of his Treatise which he wrote against Stephen Paletz.

1 Articles drawn out of the treatise written against Steuen Paletz.

1 The first article. If the pope, bishop, or prelat be in deadly sinne, he is then no pope, bishop, nor prelat. The answer: I grant thereunto, and I send you vnto Saint Augustine, Ierome, Chrysostome, Gregory, Cyprian, and Bernard; the which doe say moreouer, that whosoeuer is in deadly sinne, is no true christian, how much lesse then is he pope, or bishop? of whom it is spoken by the Prophet Amos in his eighth chapter: They haue raigned and ruled, and not through mee; they became princes, and I knew them not, &c. But afterward I doe grant that a wicked pope, bishop, or priest, is an vnworthy minister of the sacrament, by whom God doth baptise, consecrate, or otherwise worke to the profit of his church; and this is largely handled in the text of the booke by the authorities of the holie doctors: for euen hee which is in deadly sinne, is not worthily a king before God, as it appeareth in the first booke of Kings, the fifteenth chapter. Where as God saith vnto Saul by the Prophet Samuel, saying: Forsomuch as thou hast refused and cast off my word, I will also refuse and cast thee off, that thou shalt be no more king. Whiles these things were thus intreating, the emperor loking out at a certaine window of the cloister, accompanied with the Countie Palatine, and the Burgraue of Norenberg, conferring and talking much of Iohn Hus: at length he said, that there was neuer a worse or more pernicious heretike then hee. In the meane while, when Iohn Hus had spoken these words, as touching the vnworthy king, by and by the emperour was called, and hee was commanded to repeate those words againe; which after that hee had done, his dutie therein being considered, the emperor answered: No man, saith hee, doth liue without fault. Then the cardinall of Cambray being in a great furie said: Is it not enough for thee that thou doest contemne and despise the ecclesiasticall state, and goest about by thy writings and doctrine to perturbe and trouble the same, but that now also thou wilt attempt to throw kings out of their state and dignity? Then Paletz beganne to alledge the lawes whereby he would proue that Saul was king, euen when those words were spoken by Samuel, and therefore that Dauid did forbid that Saul should not bee slaine, not for the holinesse of his life, the which there was none in him, but for the holinesse of his annointing. And whereas Iohn Hus repeated out of Saint Cyprian, that hee did take vpon him the name of Christianitie in vaine, which did not follow Christ in his liuing; Paletz answered: Behold and see what a folly is in this man, which alledgeth those things which make nothing for the purpose; for albeit any man be not a true christian, is hee not therefore true pope, bishoppe, or king? Whereas these are names of office, and to be a christian is a name of merit and desert; and so may any man be a true pope, bishoppe, or king, although he be no true christian. Then said Iohn Hus; If pope Iohn the 23. were a true pope, wherefore haue yee deprined him of his office? The emperor answered: The lords of the Councell haue now lately agreed thereupon that he was true pope: but for his notorious and manifest euill doings, wherewithall he did offend and trouble the church of God, and did spoile and bring to ruine the power thereof, he is reiected and cast out of his office.

Thē emperors iudgement of Iohn Hus.

The cardinall of Cambray.

2 The second article. The grace of predestination is the bond whereby the body of the church, and euery part and member thereof is firmely knit and ioyned vnto the head. The answere: I acknowledge this article to bee mine, and it is proued in the text out of the eighth chapter to the Romans; Who shall separate vs from the charity and loue of Christ? &c. And in the tenth chapter of John: My sheepe heare my voice, and I know them, and they follow mee, and I giue them eternall life, neither shall they perish eternally, neither is there any man which shall take them out of my hands. This is the knot of the body of the church, and of our spirituall head Christ, vnderstanding the church to be the congregation of the predestinate.

3 The third article. If the pope bee a wicked man, and specially a reprobate, then euen as Iudas the Apostle, hee is a Diuell, a Theefe, and the Sonne of perdition, and not the head of the holy militant church, for so much as hee is no part or member thereof. The answere: My words are thus: If the pope bee an euill or wicked man, and specially if hee bee a reprobate; then euen as Iudas, so is hee a diuell, a theefe, and the sonne of perdition. How then is hee the head of the holy militant church? Whereas he is not truely no member or part thereof: for if he were a member of the holy church, then should hee be also a member of Christ; and if hee were a member of Christ, then should hee cleaue and sticke vnto Christ by the grace of Predestination and present iustice, and should bee one spirit with God, as the Apostle saith in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, the sixth chapter: Know yee not that your bodies are the members of Christ?

4 The fourth article. An euill pope or prelat, or reprobate is no true pastor, but a theefe and a robber. The answere: The text of my booke is thus: If he be euill or wicked, then is he an hireling, of whom Christ speaketh; he is no shepheard, neither are the sheepe his owne. Therefore when he seeth the wolfe comming, he runneth away, and forsaketh the sheepe: and so finally doth euery wicked and reprobate man. Therefore euery such reprobate, or wicked pope or prelat, is no true pastor; but a very theefe and a robber, as is more at large proued in my booke. Then said Iohn Hus: I doe so limit all things, that such as touching their desert, are not truly and worthily popes and shepheards before God, but as touching their office and reputation of men, they are popes, pastors, and priests.

Then a certaine man rising vp behind Iohn Hus clothed all in silke, said: My lords, take heede lest that Iohn Hus deceiue both you, and himselfe with these his glosses, and loke whether these things bee in his booke or not; for of late I had disputation with him vpon these articles, in the which I said, that a wicked pope, &c. was no pope, as touching merit and desert, but as touching his office he was truly pope. Whereupon he vsed these glosses which hee had heard of me, and did not take them out of his booke. Then Iohn Hus turning himselfe vnto him, said: Did you not heare that it was so read out of my booke? and this did easily appeare in Iohn the twenty three, whether he were true pope, or a very theefe and robber. Then the bishoppes and cardinals loking one vpon another, said: that he was a true pope, and laughed Iohn Hus to scorne.

5 The fifth. The pope is not, neither ought to be called according vnto his office, most holy: for then the king ought also to be called most holy, according to his office. Also the tormentors, lictors, and diuels, ought also to be called holy. The answere: My words are otherwise placed in this manner; So ought a faithfull say, that if any man be a most holy father, then he doth most holily obserue and keepe his fatherhoode: and if he be a naughty and wicked father, then doth he most wickedly keepe the same. Likewise, if the bishop be most holie, then is hee also most good; and whenas he saith that he is pope, it is the name of his office.

Whereupon it followeth, that the man which is pope, being an euill and reprobat man, is a most holy man: and consequently by that his office, he is most good. And forsomuch as no man can be good by his office, except he doe exercise and vse the same his office very well; it followeth that if the pope be an euill and reprobate man, he cannot exercise or vse his office well. Forsomuch as he cannot vse the office wel, except he be morally good: Mat. 12. How can you speak good things, when you your selues are euil? And immediatly after it followeth: If the pope by reason of

of his office be called most holy, wherefore should not the king of Romans be called most holy, by reason of his office and dignitie? Whenas the king according vnto Saint Augustines mind, representeth the Deitie and Godhead of Christ, and the priest representeth only his humanitie. Wherefore also should not Iudges, yea euen tormenters be called holie, for so much as they haue their office by ministring vnto the church of Christ? These things are more at large discoursed in my booke; but I cannot find or know, saith John Hus, anie foundation whereby I should call the pope most holy, when as this is only spoken of Christ: Thou only art most holy: Thou only art the Lord, &c. Should I then truly call the pope most holy?

6 The sixth article: If the pope liue contrarie vnto Christ, albeit he be lawfully and canonicallie elect and chosen, according to humane election, yet doth he ascend and come in anothe way then by Christ. The answere: The text is thus; If the pope liue contrarie vnto Christ in pride and auarice, how then doth he not ascend and come another way into the sheepefold, then by the lowlie and meeke doore our Lord Jesus Christ? But admit as you say, that he did ascend by lawfull election, the which I call an election principally made of God, and not according vnto the common and vulgar constitution and ordinances of men, yet for all that, it is affirmed and proued that he should ascend and come in another way; for Judas Iscariot was truely and lawfullie chosen of the Lord Jesus Christ vnto his bishoprike, as Christ saith in the sixth of John, and yet hee came in another way into the sheepefold, and was a theefe and a Diuell, and the sonne of perdition. Did he not come in another way? when as our Sauiour spake thus of him, he that eateth bread with me, shall lift vp his heele against me.

The same also is proued by Saint Bernard vnto pope Eugenius. Then said Palletz: Behold the furie and madnesse of this man; for what more furious or madde thing can there be then to say, Judas is chosen by Christ, and notwithstanding hee did ascend another way, and not by Christ? John Hus answered, verilie both parts are true, that hee was elect and chosen by Christ, and also that he did ascend, and came in another way, for he was a theefe, a Diuell, and the sonne of perdition. Then said Palletz, cannot a man be truelie and lawfullie chosen pope or bishop, and afterward liue contrarie vnto Christ? And that notwithstanding, hee doth not ascend anie other wayes. But I, said John Hus, doe say that whosoeuer doth enter into any bishoprike or like office by simonie, not to the intent to labour and trauell in the church of God, but rather to liue delicately, voluptuously and vnrighteously, and to the intent to aduance himselfe with all kind of pride, euery such man ascendeth and commeth vp by another way, and according vnto the Gospell, he is a theefe and a robber.

7 The seuenth article: The condemnation of the fortie fiue articles of John Wickliffe made by the doctours is vnreasonable and wicked, and the cause by them alleaged is fained and vntrue: That is to say, that none of those articles are catholike, but that euerie of them be either hereticall, erroneous or offensiue. The answere: I haue written it thus in my Treatise: The fortie and fiue articles are condemned for this cause, that none of those fortie and fiue, is a catholike article, but each of them is either hereticall, erroneous or offensiue.

The cardinall of Cambray. O maister Doctour, where is your proofe? you faine a cause which you do not proue, &c. As it appeareth more at large in my treatise. Then said the cardinall of Cambray, John Hus, thou diddest say that thou wouldest not defend anie errour of John Wickliffes. And now it appeareth in your bookes, that you haue openly defended his articles. John Hus answered: Reuerend Father, euen as I said before, so do I now say againe, that I will not defend any errours of John Wickliffes, neither of anie other mans: but for so much as it seemed vnto mee to bee against conscience, simplie to consent vnto the condemnation of them, no Scripture being alleaged or brought contrarie and against them, thereupon I would not consent or agree vnto the condemnation of them: And for so much as the reason which is copulatiue cannot bee verified in euerie point, according to euerie part thereof.

Articles drawn out of his treatise written against Stanislaus de Znoyma. Now there remaine fiue articles of thirtie nine: These are said to be drawne out of another treatise which he wrote against Stanislaus de Znoyma.

1 The first article: No man is lawfully elect or chosen, in that the Electours or the greater part of them haue consented with a liuely voice according to the custome of men to elect and chuse any person, or that he is thereby the manifest and true successour of Christ, or vicar of Peter in the Ecclesiasticall office, but in that that any man doth most abundantlie worke meritoriouslie to the profit of the church, he hath thereby more abundant power giuen him of God thereunto. The answere: These things which follow are also written in my booke. It standeth in the power and hands of wicked Electours to chuse a woman into the Ecclesiasticall office, as it appeareth by the election of Agnes, which was called John, who held and occupied the popes place and dignity by the space of two yéeres and more.

It may also be that they do chuse a theefe, a murderer or a diuell, and consequently they may also elect and chuse Antichrist.

It may also be, that for loue, couetousnesse, or hatred, they doe chuse some person whom God doth not allow. And it appeareth that that person is not lawfully elect and chosen: In so much as the Electours or the greater part of them haue consented and agréed together, according to the custome of men vpon any person, or that he is thereby the manifest successour or vicar of Peter the Apostle, or any other in the Ecclesiasticall office.

Therefore they which must accordingly vnto the Scripture do elect ans chuse, reuelation being set apart, do only pronounce and determine by some probable reason vpon him they do elect and chuse, whereupon whether the Electours do so chuse good or euill, we ought to giue credit vnto the workes of him that is chosen; for in that point that any man doth most abundantly worke meritoriously to the profit of the church, he hath thereby more abundant power giuen him of God thereunto. And hereupon saith Christ in the tenth of John, giue credit vnto workes.

2 The second article: The pope being a reprobate, is not the head of the holy church of God. The answere: I wrote it thus in my treatise, that I would willingly receiue a probable and effectuall reason of the Doctor, how this question is contrarie vnto the faith, to say, that if the pope be a reprobate, how is he the head of the holy church? Behold the truth cannot decay or faile in disputation, for did Christ dispute against the faith, when he demanded of the Scribes and Pharisies, Matthew the twelfth, Yée stocke and offspring of vipers, how can yee speake good things, when you your selues are wicked and euill? And behold, I demand of the Scribes, if the pope be a reprobate, and the stocke of vipers, how is hée the head of the holy Church of God, that the Scribes and Pharisies, which were in the councell house of Prage make answere hereunto? For it is more possible that a reprobate man should speake good things, for so much as hée may bée in state of grace according vnto present iustice, then to be the head of the holy church of God.

Also in the fifth of John, our Sauiour complaineth vpon the Iewes, saying: How can you beléeue which do séeke for glorie amongst your selues, and do not séeke for the glorie that commeth only of God? And I likewise doe complaine, how that if the pope be a reprobate, can he be the head of the church of God, which receiueth his glorie of the world, and séeketh not for the glorie of God? For it is more possible that the pope being a reprobate should beléeue, then that he should be the head of the church of God: For so much as he taketh his glorie of the world.

3 The third article: There is no sparke of apparance, that there ought to be one head in the spiritualtie, to rule the church, the which should bee alwaies conuersant with the militant church. The answere: I do grant it. For what consequent is is this, The king of Boheme is head of the kingdome of Boheme: Ergo, the pope is head of the whole militant church? Christ is the head of the spiritualtie, ruling and gouerning the militant church by much more and greater necessitie then Cesar ought to rule the temporaltie. For so much as Christ which sitteth on the right hand of God the Father, doth necessarilie rule the militant church as head. And there is no sparke of apparance that there should be one head in the spiritualtie ruling the church, that should alwaies be conuersant with the militant church, except some infidell would heretically affirme, that the militant church should haue héere a permanent and continuall citie or dwelling place, and not to enquire and séeke after that which is to come. It is also further euident in my booke, how vnconsequent the proportion of the similitude is for a reprobate pope to be the head of the militant church, and a reprobate king to be the head of the kingdome of Boheme.

4 The fourth article: Christ would better rule his church by his true Apostles dispersed throughout the whole world without such monstrous heads. I answere, that it is in my booke, as héere followeth, that albeit that the Doctour doth say, that the bodie of the militant church, is oftentimes without a head; yet notwithstanding we do verily beléeue that Christ Jesus is the head ouer euery church, ruling the same without lacke or default, powring vpon the same a continual motion and sense, euen vnto the latter day: neither can the Doctor giue a reason why the church in the time of Agnes, by the space of two yéers and fiue monethes, liuing according to many members of Christ in grace and fauour, but that by the same reason, the church might be without a head, by the space of many yéeres. For so much as Christ should better rule his church by his true Disciples dispersed throughout the whole world, without such monstrous heads. Then said they all together, Behold now hee prophesieth. And John Hus againe further prosecuting his former talke said, but I say that the church in the time of the Apostles was far better ruled and gouerned then now it is. And what doth let and hinder that Christ should not now also rule the same better by his true Disciples without such monstrous heads, as haue been now a late? For behold euen at this present we haue no such head, and yet Christ ceaseth not to rule his church. When he had spoken these words, he was derided and mocked.

5 The fifth article: Peter was no vniuersall pastor or shepheard of the shéepe of Christ, much lesse is the bishop of Rome. The answere: These words are not in my booke, but those which do follow. Secondly, it appeareth by the words of Christ, that he did not limit vnto Peter for his iurisdiction, the whole world, no not one only prouince. So likewise neither vnto any other of the apostles. Notwithstanding certaine of them walked through many regions, and othersome fewer, preaching and teaching the kingdome of God, as Paul which laboured and trauelled more then all the rest, did corporally visit and conuert most prouinces, whereby it is lawfull for any apostle or his vicar to conuert and confirme as much people, or as manie prouinces in the faith of Christ, as they are able, neither is there any restraint of their libertie or iurisdiction: but only by disabilitie or insufficiencie.

6 The sixth article: The Apostles and other faithfull priests of the Lord haue stoutly ruled the church in all things necessarie vnto saluation before the office of the pope was brought into the church, and so would they verie possiblie doe still, if there were no pope euen vnto the latter day. Then they all cried out againe and said; Behold the prophet. But Iohn Hus said, verilie it is true that the apostles did rule the church stoutly, before the office of the pope was brought into the church. And certainlie a great deale better then it is now ruled. And likewise may other faithfull men which do follow their steps do the same, for as now we haue no pope, and so peraduenture it may continue and endure a yéere or more. Besides this were brought against him other nineteene articles, obiected vnto him being in prison, which with his answeres to the same héere likewise follow. Of the which articles, the first is this:

The first article. Paul how he was both a blasphemer and also a member of Christ.

The first article: Paul according vnto present iustice was a blasphemer and none of the church, and therewithall was in grace, according vnto predestination of life euerlasting. The answere: This proposition is not in the booke, but this which followeth: Whereby it doth séeme probable, that as Paul was both a blasphemer according to present iustice, and therewithall also was a faithfull child of our holy mother the church, and in grace according to predestination of life euerlasting: So Iscariot was both in grace according vnto present iustice, and was neuer of our holy mother the church, according to the predestination of life euerlasting, for so much as he lacked that predestination. And so Iscariot albeit he was an apostle, and a bishop of Christ, which is the name of his office, yet was he neuer no part of the vniuersall church.

The second article. Predestination.

The second article: Christ doth more loue a predestinate man being sinfull, then any reprobate is what grace possible soeuer he be. The answere: My words are in the fourth chapter of my booke intituled of the church, and it is euident that God doth more loue any predestinate being sinfull, then anie reprobate, in what grace soeuer he be for the time: for so much as he will, that the predestinate shall haue perpetuall blessednesse, and the reprobate to haue eternall fire. Wherefore God partly infinitely louing them both as his creatures, yet he doth more loue the predestinate because he giueth him greater grace, or a greater gift: that is to say, life euerlasting, which is greater and more excellent then only grace, according vnto present iustice. And the third article of those articles before, soundeth much néere vnto this, that the predestinate cannot fall from grace, for they haue a certaine radicall grace rooted in them, although they be depriued of the abundant grace for a time. These things are true in the compound sense.

The third article. Whoso committeth deadly sin swarueth from the faith.

The third article. All the sinfull according vnto present iustice, are not faithfull, but do swarue from the true catholike faith, for so much as it is impossible that any man can commit any deadly sinne but in that point, that he doth swarue from the faith. The answere: I acknowledge that sentence to be mine, and it appeareth, that if they did thinke vpon the punishment which is to be laid vpon sinners, and did fully beléeue, and had the faith of the diuine knowledge and vnderstanding, &c. then vndoubtedly they would not so offend and sin. This proposition is verified by the saying of the prophet Esay; Thy rulers are vnfaithfull, misbeléeuers, fellowes and companions of théeues, they all loue bribes, and follow after rewards. Behold the prophet calleth the rulers of ꝟ church infidels for their offences, for all such as do not kéepe their faith inuiolate vnto their principall Lord, are vnfaithfull seruants, and they also are vnfaithfull children which kéepe not their obedience, feare, and loue vnto God their father.

Item, this proposition is verified, by the saying of the apostle, the first chapter to Titus: They doe confesse that they know God, but by their workes they do denie him. And for so much as they which are sinfull, doe swarue away from the meritorious work of blessednes, therefore they do swarue from the true faith grounded vpon charitie, for so much as faith without workes is dead. To this end doth also pertaine that which the Lord speaketh, Matth. 23. of the faithfull and vnfaithfull seruant.

Titus chap. 1.

The fourth article: These words of Iohn in his two and twentith chapter, Receiue the holy Ghost: and, Whatsoeuer you shall bind vpon earth, &c. And Matthew the sixteenth and eightéenth chapter, for lacke of vnderstanding shall terrifie many christians, and they shall be wonderfully afraid, and others shall be deceiued by them, presuming vpon the fulnesse of their power and authoritie. The answere: This sentence I do approue and allow, and therefore I say in the same place, that it is first of all to be supposed that the saying of our Sauiour is necessarie, as touching the vertue of the word, for as much as it is not possible for a priest to bind and lose, except that binding and losing be in heauen. But for the lacke of the true vnderstanding of those words, many simple christians shall be made afraid, thinking with themselues that whether they be iust or vniust, the priests may at their pleasures, whensoeuer they will, bind them. And the ignorant priests doe also presume and do take vpon them to haue power to bind and lose when soeuer they will. For manie foolish and ignorant priests do say that they haue power and authoritie to absolue euerie man confessing himselfe, of what sinne or offence soeuer it be, not knowing that in many sinnes it is forbidden them, and that it may happen that an hypocrite do confesse himselfe, or such one as is not contrite for his sinne, whereof proofe hath oftentimes béen found, and it is euident, for so much as the letter doth kill, but the spirit doth quicken.

The fourth article.

The words of Christ for binding and loosing, vnlesse they be well vnderstood, minister too much feare or presumption.

The fifth article: The binding and losing of God, is simplie and plainly the chiefe and principall. The answere: This is euident, for so much as it were blasphemous presumption to affirme, that a man may remit and forgiue an euill fact or offence done against such a Lord, the Lord himselfe not approuing or allowing the same. For by the vniuersall power of the Lord, it is necessarie that he do first absolue and forgiue, before that his vicar doe the same; neither is there one article of our faith, which ought to be more common or knowne vnto vs, then that it should be impossible for any man of the militant church to absolue or bind, except in such case as it be conformable vnto the head of the church Iesu Christ. Wherefore euerie faithfull christian ought to take héed of that saying: if the pope or any other pretend by any manner of signe to bind or lose, that he is thereby bound or loosed; for he that doth grant or confesse that, must also consequently grant and confesse that the pope is without sinne, and so that he is a God, for otherwise he must néeds erre, and do contrarie vnto the keyes of Christ. This saying proueth the fact of the pope, who alwaies in his absolution presupposeth contrition and confession. Yea moreouer, if any letter of absolution be giuen vnto any offender, which doth not declare the circumstances of the offence which ought to be declared, it is said that thereby the letter of absolution is of no force and effect. It is also hereby euident, that manie priests doe not absolue those which are confessed, because that either through shamefastnesse they do cloake or hide greater offences, or else that they haue not due contrition or repentance, for vnto true absolution there is first required contrition. Secondly, a purpose and intent to sinne no more. Thirdly, true confession. And fourthly stedfast hope of forgiuenesse. The first appeareth by Ezechiel, If the wiked do repent him, &c. The second in the fifth and eighth of Iohn, Do thou not sinne any more. The third part by this place of Luke: Shew your selues vnto the priests. And the fourth is confirmed by the saying of Christ: My sonne beléeue, and thy sinnes are forgiuen thée. I also added many other probations in my treatise out of the holy fathers, Augustine, Ierome, and the master of the sentences.

The fifth article. Binding and loosing chiefly and principally belong to Christ.

To true absolution foure things are required.

The sixth article: The priests do gather and heape vp out of the Scriptures those things which serue for the belly, but such as pertaine to the true imitation and following of Christ, that they reiect and refuse as impertinent vnto saluation. The answere: This Saint Gregorie doth sufficiently proue in his seuenteenth Homilie, alleaging the saying of Christ: The haruest is great, the workemen are few; speaking also that which we cannot say without griefe or sorrow, that albeit there be a great number which willinglie heare good things, yet there lacke such as should declare the same vnto them; for behold the world is full of priests, but notwithstanding there is a scarsitie of workemen in the haruest of the Lord. Wée take vpon vs willinglie priesthood, but we do not fulfill and do the workes and office of priesthood. And immediatlie after he saith, Wée are fallen vnto outward affaires and businesse, for wée take vpon vs one office for honor sake, and wee doe exhibite and giue another to ease our selues of labour. We leaue preaching, and as farre as I can perceiue wee are called bishops to our paine, which doe retaine the name of honor, but not the deritie.

The sixth article.

Ex Gregorio.

Priests more giuen to their owne lucre and bellie, then to the seruice of Christ.

And immediatlie after he saith, Wée take no care for our flocke, we daily call vpon for our stipend and wages, we couet and desire earthly things with a greedie mind, we gape after worldly worldly glorie, we leaue the cause of God vndone, and make haste about our worldly affaires and businesse, we take vpon vs the place of sanctitie and holinesse, and we are wholly wrapped in worldlie cares and troubles, &c. This writeth Saint Gregorie, with manie other things more in the same place. Also in his Pastorall, in his Morals, and in his Register. Also Saint Bernard as in manie other places, so likewise in his 33. sermon vpon the Canticles, he saith, All friends, and all enemies; all kinsfolkes and aduersaries, all of one houshold, and no peace-makers: they are the Ministers of Christ, and serue Antichrist: they go honorablie honored with the gods of the lord, and yet they do honor, &c.

The seuenth article: The power of the pope, which doth follow Christ, is not to be feared. The answere: It is not so in my treatise, but contrariwise, that the subiects are bound willingly and gladly to obey the vertuous and good rulers, and also those which are wicked and euill. But notwithstanding, if the pope do abuse his power, it is not then to be feared as by bondage. And so the lords the cardinals, as I suppose, did not feare the power of Gregorie the twelfth before his deposition, when as they resisted him, saying that he did abuse his power contrarie vnto his owne oth.

The eighth article: An euill and a wicked pope is not the successor of Peter, but of Judas. The answere: I wrote thus in my treatise: If the pope be humble and meeke, neglecting and despising the honors and lucre of the world: if he be a shepheard, taking his name by the feeding of the flocke of God (of the which feeding the Lord speaketh, saying: Feed my sheepe) if he feed the sheepe with the word, and with vertuous example, and that he become euen like his flocke with his whole heart and mind: if he doe diligently and carefullie labour and trauell for the church; then is he without doubt the true vicar of Christ. But if hee walke contrarie vnto these vertues, for so much as there is no societie betweene Christ and Belial: and Christ himselfe saith, He that is not with me, is against me: how is he then the true vicar of Christ or Peter, and not rather the vicar of Antichrist? Christ called Peter himselfe Sathanas, when he did contrarie him but only in one word, and that with a good affection, euen him whom he had chosen his vicar, and specially appointed ouer his church: Why should not any other then, being more contrarie vnto Christ, be truelie called Sathanas, and consequently Antichrist, or at least the chiefe and principall minister or vicar of Antichrist? There be infinite testimonies of this matter in Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Cyprian, Chrysostome, Bernard, Gregorie, Remigius, and Ambrose, &c.

The ninth article: The pope is the same beast of whom it is spoken in the Apocalyps, power is giuen vnto him to make warre vpon the Saints. The answere: I denie this article to be in my booke.

The tenth article: It is lawfull to preach, notwithstanding the popes inhibition. The answere: The article is euident, for so much as the Apostles did preach contrarie to the commandement of the bishops of Jerusalem. And saint Hilarie did the like, contrarie to the commandement of the pope which was an Arrian. It is also manifest by the example of cardinals, which contrarie vnto the commandement of pope Gregorie the twelfth, sent throughout all realmes such as should preach against him. It is also lawfull to preach vnder appeale, contrarie vnto the popes commandement. And finally, he may preach which hath the commandement of God, whereunto he ought chiefely to obey.

The eleuenth article: If the popes commandement be not concordant and agreeable with the doctrine of the Gospell or the Apostles, it is not to be obeyed. The answere: I haue thus written in my booke: The faithfull disciple of Christ ought to weigh and consider whether the popes commandement be expresse and plainly the commandement of Christ or any of his Apostles, or whether it haue any foundation or ground in their doctrine or no: and that being once knowne or vnderstood, he ought reuerentlie and humblie to obey the same. But if he doe certainly know that the popes commandement is contrarie and against the holy Scripture, and hurtfull vnto the church; then he ought boldly to resist against it, that he be not partaker of the crime and offence by consenting thereunto. This I haue handled at large in my treatise, and haue confirmed it by the authorities of Saint Augustine, Hierome, Gregorie, Chrysostome, Bernard, and Bede, and with the holy Scripture and canons, the which for breuities cause I do heere passe ouer. I will only rehearse the saying of Saint Isidore, who writeth thus: He which doth rule, and doth say or command any thing contrarie and besides the will of God, or that which is euidently commanded in the Scriptures, he is honored as a false witnesse of God, and a church-robber. Whereupon we are bounden to obey no prelat, but in such case as he do command or take counsell of the counsels and commandements of Christ.

Likewise Saint Augustine vpon this saying: vpon the chaire of Moses, &c. saith: Secondly, they teach in the chaire of Moses the law of God: Ergo, God teacheth by them: but if they will teach you any of their owne inuentions, do not giue eare vnto them, neither do as they command you. Also in the saying of Christ, He that heareth you heareth me, all lawfull and honest things be comprehended, in the which we ought to be obedient, according to Christs saying: It is not you which do speake, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you. Let therefore my aduersaries and slanderers learne that there be not only twelue counsels in the Gospell, in the which subiects ought to obey Christ and his appointed ministers, but that there are so many counsels and determinations of God, as there be lawfull and honest things ioyned with precepts and commandements of God, binding vs thereunto, vnder the paine of deadlie sinne, for euerie such thing doth the Lord command vs to fulfill in time and place, with other circumstances, at the will and pleasure of their Minister.

Consilia, præcepta.

The twelfth article: It is lawfull for the clergie and lattie, by their power and iurisdiction to iudge and determine of all things pertaining vnto saluation, and also of the workes of the prelats. The answere: I haue thus written in my booke, that it is lawfull for the clergie and lattie to iudge and determine of the workes of their heads and rulers. It appeareth by this, that the iudgement of the secret counsels of God, in the court of conscience is one thing, and the iudgement of the authoritie and power in the church is another. Wherefore subiects first ought principally to iudge and examine themselues, 1. Corinthians the eleuenth chapter. Secondly, they ought to examine all things which pertaine vnto their saluation, for a spirituall man iudgeth and examineth all things. And this is alleaged as touching the first iudgement, and not the second, as the enemie doth impute it vnto me. Whereupon in the same place I doe say, that the lay man ought to iudge and examine the workes of his prelat, like as Paul doth iudge the doings of Peter in blaming him. Secondly, to auoid them according to this saying: Beware of false prophets, &c. Thirdly, to rule ouer the Ministerie: For the subiect ought by reason to iudge and examine the workes of the prelats. And if they be good, to praise God therefore and reioyce: But if they be euill, they ought with patience to suffer them, and to be sorie for them, but not to doe the like, lest they be damned with them: according to this saying: If the blind leade the blind, both fall into the ditch.

The twelfth article. The clergie and lattie may iudge of the workes of their prelats.

Judgement double.

Secret in the court of conscience. Open in the court of authoritie.

The thirteenth article: God doth suspend of himselfe, euerie wicked prelat from his ministerie, while he is actually in sinne, for by that meanes that he is in deadly sinne, he doth offend and sinne what soeuer he doe: and consequently is forbidden so to doe; therefore also is he suspended from his ministerie. The answere: This is proued as touching suspension from dignitie, by Osee the fourth chapter, and Esay, and Malachie the first. And Paul in the first to the Corinthians, the eleuenth chapter, suspendeth all such as be sinfull, or in any grieuous crime or offence, from the eating of the bodie of the Lord, and the drinking of his blood, and consequently suspendeth all sinfull prelats from the ministration of the reuerend Sacrament. And God doth suspend the wicked and sinfull from the declaration of his righteousnesse, Psalme 49. For so much then as to suspend in effect, is to prohibite the ministerie or anie other good thing for the offence sake, or as the new lawes do terme or call it, to interdict or forbid; it is manifest by the Scriptures afore rehearsed, that God doth prohibit the sinfull, being in sinne to exercise or vse their ministerie or office, which by Gods commandement ought to be exercised without offence. Whereupon he saith by Esay the prophet: Yee that carrie the vessels of the Lord, be ye clensed and made cleane. And to the Corinthians it is said; Let all things be done with loue and charitie, &c. The same thing also is commanded by diuers and sundrie Canons, the which I haue alleaged in my treatise.

The thirteenth article. To Godward all wicked ministers be suspended.

The fourteenth article: The answere which he made to the fiue and twentith article in prison sufficeth for this, that is to say, that the clergie for their owne preferment and exaltation, doth supplant and vndermine the lay people, doth increase and multiplie their couetousnesse, cloketh and defendeth their malice and wickednesse, and prepareth a way for Antichrist.

The first part he proueth by experience, by the example of Peter de Luna, which named himselfe Benedict, by the example of Angelus Corrarius, which named himselfe Gregorie the twelfth, and also by the example of John the three and twentith. Likewise by the thirteenth and twentie fourth of Ezechiel, and out of Gregorie, which saith, What shall become of the flocke, when the shepheards themselues, are become Wolues, &c. Also out of Osee, Miche, and other of the Prophets, and many places of Saint Bernard.

The second part is proued by the eighth chapter of Jeremie, Gregorie in his seuenteenth Homilie, and Saint Bernard vpon the Canticles.

The third part of this article is also proued by experience: for who defendeth the wickednesse of any schisme but only the clergie, alleaging Scriptures, and bringing reasons therefore: Who excuseth simonie, but only the clergie: likewise couetousnesse in heaping together many benefices, luxuriousnesse and fornication: For how many of the clergie are there now a daies which do say it is no deadly sinne, alleaging (albeit disorderlie) the saying of Genesis, Increase and multiplie?

The fourteenth article. The lay people supplanted by the clergie.

Hereby also is the 4. part of the article easily verified. For

The seuenth article.

The eighth article.

The ninth article. John Hus need not proue this article, the pope will proue it himselfe.

the way of Antichrist is wickednesse and sinne: of the which the Apostle speaketh to the Thessalonians: Gregorie in his Register, Pascrasall and Morals: also Saint Bernard vpon the Canticles plainely saith; Wicked and euill priests prepare the way for Antichrist.

The fifteenth article. The dishonestie of such as gathered false accusations against Iohn Hus.

The fifteenth article: John Hus doth openly teach and affirme that these conclusions aforesaid are true. The answere is manifest by that which I haue afore written. For some of these propositions I did write and publish, other some mine enemie did faine, now adding, then diminishing and taking away, now falsely ascribing and imputing the whole proposition vnto me: the which thing the commissioners themselues did confesse before me. Whom I desired for the false inuention and fayning of those articles, that they would punish those, whom they themselues knew and confessed to be mine enemies.

The sixteenth article.

The sixteenth article: Hereby also it appeareth, that it is not true which they haue affirmed in the article following: that is to say, that all the aforesaid conclusions be false, erroneous, seditious, and such as doe weaken and make feeble the power and strength of the church, inuented contrarie to the holy scriptures and the church. But if there be any such, I am readie most humblie to reuoke and recant the same.

The seuentéenth article.

The seuentéenth article: There was also an obiection made against me as touching the treatises which I wrote against Paletz and Stanislaus de Znoyma. The which I desired for Gods sake, they might be openly read in the audience of the whole councell, and said, that I, notwithstanding my former protestation, would willingly submit my selfe to the iudgement of the whole councell.

The eightéenth article.

The eightéenth article: There was also another article obiected against me in this forme. Item, John Hus said and preached that he should go to Constance, and if so be that for anie maner of cause he should be forced to recant that he had before taught, yet notwithstanding he neuer purposed to doe it with his mind: for so much as whatsoeuer he had before taught, was pure and true, and the sound doctrine of Christ. The answere: This article is full of lies, to the inuenter whereof I suppose the Lord saith thus: All the day long thou hast imagined mischiefe and wickednesse, and with thy tongue as with a sharpe rasour, thou hast wrought deceit. Thou hast delighted and loued rather to talke of wickednesse and mischiefe then of equitie and iustice. Verily I doe grant, that I left behind me a certaine epistle to be read vnto the people, the which did containe that all such as did weigh and consider my carefull labors and trauels, should pray for me, and stedfastly perseuere and continue in the doctrine of our Lord Iesu Christ, knowing for a certaintie that I neuer taught them any such errors as mine enemies doe impute or ascribe vnto me; and if it should happen that I were ouercome by false witnesse, they should not be vexed or troubled in their minds, but stedfastly continue in the truth.

The nineteenth article.

The nineteenth article: Last it was obiected against me, that after I was come into Constance, I did write vnto the kingdome of Boheme, that the pope and the emperor receiued me honorablie, and sent vnto me two bishops to make agreement betweene me and them; and that this seemeth to be written by me to this end and purpose, that they should confirme and establish me and my hearers in the errors which I had preached and taught in Boheme. This article is falsely alleaged euen from the beginning. For how manifestly false should I haue written that the pope and the emperour did honor me, whenas otherwise I had written before, that as yet we knew not where the emperour was: and before the emperor himselfe came vnto Constance, I was by the space of three weekes in prison. And to write that I was honored by my imprisonment, the people of the kingdome of Boheme would repute the honor as no great renowne and glorie vnto me. Howbeit my enemies may in derision say vnto me, that according to their wils and pleasures, I am exalted and honored. Wherefore this article is wholly throughout false and vntrue.

Nineteene articles drawne out by the Parisians against John Hus. Iohn Gerson chancellour of Paris.

Vnto these articles aboue prefixed, were other articles also to be annexed, which the Parisians had drawne out against master John Hus, to the number of nineteene. The chiefe author whereof, was John Gerson chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Paris, a great setter on of the pope against good men. Of these articles John Hus doth often complaine in his epistles, that he had no time nor space to make answere vnto them. Which articles being falsly collected and wrongfully depraued, although John Hus had no time to answere vnto, yet I thought not vnfit heere to set downe for the reader to see and iudge.

Articles formally contained or picked out of the Treatise of Iohn Hus of Prage, which he intituled of the church, following in this part or behalfe the errours, as they tearme them, of Iohn Wickliffe.

1 The first article: No reprobate is true pope, lord, or prelat. The error is in the faith, and behauiour and maners, being both of late and manie times before condemned, as well against the poore men of Lions, as also against the Waldenses and Pikardes. The affirmation of which error is temerarious, seditious, offensiue and pernitious, and tending to the subuersion of all humane policie and gouernance, forasmuch as no man knoweth whether he be worthie of loue or hatred, for that all men do offend in many points, and thereby should all rule and dominion be made vncertaine and vnstable, if it should be founded vpon predestination and charitie: neither should the commandement of Peter haue been good, which willeth all seruants to be obedient vnto their maisters and lords, although they be wicked.

2 The second article: That no man being in deadly sinne, wherby he is no member of Christ, but of the diuell, is true pope, prelat, or lord. The error of this is like vnto the first.

3 The third article: No reprobate or otherwise being in deadly sin, sitteth in the apostolike seate of Peter, neither hath any apostolicall power ouer the christian people. This error is also like vnto the first.

4 The fourth article: No reprobates are of the church, neither likewise any which do not follow the life of Christ. This error is against the common vnderstanding of the doctors, concerning the church.

5 The fifth article: They only are of the church, and sit in Peters seat, and haue apostolike power which follow Christ and his Apostles in their life and liuing. The errour hereof is in faith and manners, as in the first article, but containing more arrogancie and rashnesse.

6 The sixth article: That euerie man which liueth vprightlie according to the rule of Christ, may and ought openly to preach and teach, although he be not sent, yea although he be forbidden or excommunicate by any prelat or bishop, euen as he might and ought to giue almes: for his good life in liuing together with his learning doth sufficiently send him.

This is a rash and temerarious error, offensiue and tending to the confusion of the whole ecclesiasticall hierarchie.

7 The seuenth article: That the pope of Rome being contrarie vnto Christ, is not the vniuersall bishop, neither hath the church of Rome any supremacie ouer other churches, except peraduenture it be giuen vnto him of Cesar, and not of Christ. An error lately and plainly reproued.

8 The eighth article: That the pope ought not to be called most holy, neither that his feet are holy and blessed, or that they ought to be kissed. This error is temerarious, vnreuerently and offensiuely published.

9 The ninth article: That according vnto the doctrine of Christ, heretikes, be they neuer so obstinate or stubborne, ought not to be put to death, neither to be accursed or excommunicated. This is the error of the Donatists, temerariously, and not without great offence affirmed against the lawes of the Ecclesiasticall discipline, as S. Augustine doth proue.

10 The tenth article: That subiects and the common people may and ought publikely and openly to detect and reproue the vices of their superiours and rulers, as hauing power giuen them of Christ, and example of Saint Paul so to do. This errour is pernicious, full of offence, inducing all rebellion, disobedience, and sedition, and the curse and malediction of Cham.

11 The eleuenth article: That Christ only is head of the church and not the pope. It is an error according vnto the common vnderstanding of the doctors, if all the reason of the supremacie, and of being head be secluded and taken away from the pope.

12 The twelfth article: That the only church which comprehendeth the predestinate and good liuers, is the vniuersall church, whereunto subiects do owe obedience. And this is consequent vnto the former article. The error is contained as in the former articles.

13 The thirteenth article: That tithes and oblations giuen vnto the church are publike and common almes. This error is offensiue, and contrarie to the determination of the apostle, 1. Corinth. 9. chapter.

14 The fourteenth article: That the clergie liuing wickedlie, ought to be reproued and corrected by the lay people, by the taking away of their tithes and other temporall profits. A most pernicious errour and offensiue, inducing the secular people to perpetrate sacriledge, subuerting the ecclesiasticall libertie.

15 The fifteenth article: That the blessings of such as are reprobate or euill liuers of the clergie are maledictions and cursings before God according to the saying: I will curse your blessings. This error was lately reproued of S. Augustine, against S. Cyprian and his followers, neither is the matter of the sentences allowed of the masters in that point that he seemeth to fauour this article.

16 The sixteenth article: That in these daies and in long time before, there hath been no true pope, no true church, or faith, which is called the Romish church, whereunto a man ought to obey, but that it both was and is the synagogue of Antichrist and Satan. The error in this article is in this point, that it is deriued, and taketh his foundation vpon the former articles.

17 The seuentéenth article: That al gift of money giuen vnto the ministers of the church, for the ministration of any spiritual matter, it doth make such ministers in y case vsers of simonie.

This

This error is seditious and temerarious, for so much as some thing may be giuen vnto the clergie, vnder the title of sustentation or maintaining the minister, without the selling or buying in of any spirituall thing.

18 The eighteenth article: That whosoeuer is excommunicate of the pope, if he appeale vnto Christ, he is preserued that he need not feare the excommunication, but vtterly to contemne and despise the same. This errour is temerarious and full of arrogancie.

19 The nineteenth article: That euery deed done without charitie is sin. This errour was reproued and reuoked before this time at Paris, specially if it be vnderstood of deadly sinne, for it is not necessarie that he which lacketh grace should continuallie sinne and offend anew: Albeit he be continually in sinne.

¶ This following, the maisters of Paris by their whole voice and consent did adde and adioyne vnto these nineteene articles, for their reason and determination.

WE affirme that these articles aforesaid are notoriouslie hereticall, and that they are iudicially to be condemned for such, and diligently to be rooted out with their most seditious doctrines, lest they do infect other. For albeit they seeme to haue a zeale against the vices of the prelats and the clergie, the which (the more is the pitie and griefe) doe but too much abound, yet is it not according vnto learning: for a sober and discreet zeale, suffereth and lamenteth those sinnes and offences, which he seeth in the house of God, that he cannot amend or take away; for vices cannot be rooted out and taken away by other vices and errors, for so much as Diuels are not cast out through Belsebub, but by the power of God which is the holy Ghost, who willeth that in correction the measure and meane of prudence be alwaies kept, according to the saying: Marke, who, what, where and why, by what meanes and when, prelats and bishops are bound vnder grieuous and perpetuall penalties of the law, diligently and vigilantly to beare themselues against the foresaid errors and such other like, and the maintainers of them; for let it alwaies be well vnderstood and noted, that the error which is not resisted is allowed, neither is there any doubt of priuie affinitie or societie of him, which slacketh to withstand a manifest mischiefe.

These things are entermedled by the way vnder correction, as by way of doctrine.

Iohn Gerson Chancellour of Paris, vnworthilie.

THese things thus declared, a man may easily vnderstand, that John Hus was not accused for holding any opinion contrarie to the articles of our faith, but because he did stoutly preach and teach against the kingdome of Antichrist for the glorie of Christ, and the reforming of the church.

The words of the cardinall of Cambray vnto John Hus after his accusation.

Now to returne vnto the storie: when as the first thirtie nine articles, which I haue before rehearsed, were all read ouer together with their testimonies, the cardinall of Cambray calling vnto John Hus, said; Thou hast heard what grieuous and horrible crimes are laid against thee, and what a number of them there are: and now it is thy part to deuise with thy selfe what thou wilt doe. Two waies are proponed and set before thee of the councell, whereof the one of them thou must of force and necessitie enter into.

A double inconuenience for John Hus to fall into.

First, that thou do humblie and meekely submit thy selfe vnto the iudgement and sentence of the councell, that whatsoeuer shall bee there determined by their common voice and iudgement, thou wilt patiently beare and suffer the same. The which thing if thou wilt do, we of our part both for the honor of the most gentle emperour heere present, and also for the honor of his brother the king of Boheme, and for thy owne safegard and preseruation, will intreat and handle thee with as great humanitie, loue and gentlenesse, as we may. But if as yet thou art determined to defend any of those articles which we haue proponnded vnto thee, and dost desire or require to be further heard thereupon, we will not denie thee power and licence thereunto: but this thou shalt well vnderstand, that heere are such maner of men, so cleare in vnderstanding and knowledge, and hauing so firme and strong reasons and arguments against thy articles, that I feare it will be to thy great hurt, detriment, and perill, if thou shouldest any longer will or desire to defend the same.

This do I speake and say vnto thee to counsell and admonish thee, and not as in maner of a Iudge.

John Hus answereth.

This Oration of the cardinals many other prosecuting, euery man for himselfe, did exhort and perswade John Hus to the like: vnto whom with a lowlie countenance he answered: Most reuerend fathers, I haue often said that I came hither of mine owne free will, not to the intent obstinately to defend anie thing, but if that in any thing I should seeme to haue conceiued a peruerse or euill opinion, that I would meekely and patientlie be content to be reformed and taught. Whereupon I desire that I may haue yet further libertie to declare my mind. Whereof except I shall alleage most firme and strong reasons, I will willingly submit my selfe (as you require) vnto your information.

Then there start vp one which with a loud voice said; Behold how craftily this man speaketh: He termeth it information and not correction or determination. Verily, said John Hus, euen as you will terme it, information, correction, or determination: for I take God to my witnesse, that I speake nothing but with my heart and mind.

The cardinall of Cambray appointeth John Hus certaine conditions whereby he may be deliuered.

Then said the cardinall of Cambray: for so much then as thou doest submit thy selfe vnto the information and grace of this councell, this is decreed almost by three score doctours, whereof some of them are now departed hence, in whose rome and place the Parisians are succeeded; and also it is approued by the whole councell, not one man speaking the contrarie thereunto:

First of all, that thou shalt humblie and meekelie confesse thy selfe to haue erred in these articles, which are alleaged and brought against thee.

Moreouer, that thou shalt promise by an oth, that from henceforth thou shalt not teach, hold or maintaine any of these articles. And last of all, that thou shalt openly recant all these articles.

The answere of John Hus.

Vpon the which sentence: when as many others had spoken their minds, at the length John Hus said; I once againe do say, that I am readie to submit my selfe to the information of the councell: but this I most humblie require and desire you all, euen for his sake, which is the God of vs all, that I be not compelled or forced to do the thing, which my conscience doth repugne or striue against, or the which I cannot doe without danger of eternall damnation: that is, that I should make reuocation by oth to all the articles which are alleaged against me. For I remember that I haue read in the booke of the vniuersalities, that to abiure is to renounce an error which a man hath before holden. And for so much as many of these articles are said to be mine, which were neuer in my mind or thought to hold or teach, how should I then renounce them by an oth: But as touching those articles which are mine indeed, if there be any man which can teach me contrariwise vnto them, I will willingly performe that which you desire.

The emperour exhorteth John Hus to recant.

Then said the emperour, why maiest not thou without danger also renounce all those articles which thou saiest are falsly alleaged against thee by the witnesses: For I verily would nothing at al doubt to abiure al errors, neither doth it follow that therfore by and by I haue professed any error. To whom John Hus answered: Most noble emperor, this word to abiure, doth signifie much otherwise then your maiestie doth heere vse it. Then said the cardinall of Florence: John Hus, you shal haue a forme of abiuration, which shall be gentle and tollerable enough, written and deliuered vnto you, and then you will easlie and soone determine with your selfe, whether you will do it or no. Then the emperor repeating againe the words of the cardinal of Cambray, said: thou hast heard that there are two waies laid before thee. First, that thou shouldest openly renounce those thy errors, which are now condemned, and subscribe vnto the iudgement of the councell, whereby thou shouldest trie and find their grace and fauour. But if thou proceed to defend thy opinions, the councell shall haue sufficient, whereby according to their lawes and ordinances, they may decree and determine vpon thee. To whom John Hus answered: I refuse nothing (most noble emperor) whatsoeuer the councell shall decree or determine vpon me. This only one thing I except, that I do not offend God and my conscience, or say that I haue professed those errors which was neuer in my mind or thought for to profesle. But I desire you all, if it may be possible, that you will grant me further liberty to declare my mind and opinion, that I may answere as much as shall suffice, as touching those things which are obiected against me, and specially concerning ecclesiasticall offices, and the state of the ministerie.

The emperour rehearseth the cardinall of Cambrayes words.

The force of false witnesse.

The emperour to John Hus.

But when as other men began to speake, the emperour himselfe began to sing the same song which he had sung before. Thou art of lawfull age, said the emperour, thou mightest haue easlie vnderstood what I said vnto thee yesterday and this day: for we are forced to giue credit vnto these witnesses which are worthie of credit: for so much as the Scripture saith, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses, all truth is tried: how much more then by so many witnesses of such worthie men:

Wherefore if thou be wise, receiue penance at the hands of the councell, with a contrite heart, and renounce the manifest errors, and promise by an oth that from henceforth thou wilt neuer more teach or preach against them. The which if thou refusest to do, there are lawes and ordinances, whereby thou shalt be iudged of the councell.

An old bishop of Pole.

Heere a certaine verie old bishop of Pole put to his verdict. He said the lawes are euident as touching heretiques, with what punishment they ought to be punished. But John Hus constantly answered as before: in so much that they said he was obstinate and stubborne. Then a certaine well fed priest and gaylie apparelled, cried out vnto the Presidents of the councell, saying: he ought by no meanes to bee admitted to recantation: for he hath written vnto his friends, that although he do sweare with his tongue, yet he will keepe his mind vnswo2ne without oth: wherefo2e he is not to be trusted. Vnto this slander John Hus answered as is said in the last article, affirming that he was not guiltie of any erro2.

Obiection of a priest better fed then taught.

Pallets against John Hus.

Then said Pallets, to what end is this p2otestation, fo2 so much as thou saiest that thou wilt defend no erro2, neither yet Wickliffe, and yet doest defend him? When he had spoken these wo2ds, he b2ought fo2th fo2 witnesse nine articles of John Wickliffes, and read them openly: and afterward he said; When as I and maister Stanislaus in the p2esence of Ernestus of Austrich duke of Pr2age, p2eached against them, he obstinately defended the same, not only by his sermons, but also by his bookes which he set fo2th. The which except you do heere exhibite, we will cause them to be exhibited. So said the emperor also. Vnto whom John Hus answered, I am verie well contented that not only those, but also al other my bookes be b2ought fo2th and shewed.

A new heape of slanders.

In the meane time there was exhibited vnto the councell a certaine article, wherein John Hus was accused, that hee had slanderously interpreted a certaine sentence of the popes: the which he denied that he did, saying, that he neuer saw it but in prison, when as the article was shewed him by the commissioners. And when he was demanded who was the autho2 therof, he answered that he knew not, but that he heard say that maister Jessenitz was the autho2 thereof.

What (said they) then doe you think o2 iudge of the interpretation thereof? Then answered John Hus, what should I say thereunto, when as I said I neuer saw it, but as I haue heard it of you. Thus they were all so grieuous and troublesome vnto him, that he waxed faint and wearie, fo2 he had passed all the night befo2e without sleepe, through the paine of his teeth.

John Hus waxeth faint and wearie.

Then was there another article read, in the which was contained that three men were beheaded at Prage, because that through Wickliffes doctrine and teaching, they were contumelious and slanderous against the popes letters: and that they were by the same Hus, with the whole pompe of the scholars, and with a publike conuocation o2 congregation carried out to be buried, and by a publike sermon placed amongst the number of Saints. And the same doctor Palo, of whom you haue heard certaine testimonies alreadie recited, affirmed the same to be true, and that he himselfe was p2esent, when as the king of Boheme commanded those blasphemers so to be punished.

John Hus b2ieth.

Then said John Hus: both those parts are false, that the king did command any such punishment to be done, and that the coarses were by me conueyed with anie such pompe vnto their sepulture o2 buriall: wherefo2e you doe both iniurie vnto me and the king. Then Pallets confirmed the affirmation of doctour Palo his fellow, with this argument (fo2 they both laboured to one end and purpose:) That it was p2ouided by the kings commandement, that no man should once speake against the popes Buls: And these three spake against the popes Buls: Ergo, by vertue of the kings commandement they were beheaded. And what John Hus his opinion and mind was as touching these men, it is euident enough by his booke entituled Of the church, wherein he writeth thus: I beléeue they haue read Daniel the p2ophet, where as is said: And they shall p2rish with swo2d and fire, and with captiuitie, and many shall fraudulently and craftilie associate themselues vnto them. And afterward he saith: how is this fulfilled in these two lay men, who not consenting, but speaking against the fained lies of Antich2ist, haue offered their liues therefo2e, and manie other were readie to do the same, and many were fraudulentlie associate vnto them, which being feared by the threatnings of Antich2ist, are fled, and haue turned their backes, &c.

Ex puris affirmatiuis non consiftit argum. in 2. figura.

When these things were read, one loking vpon another, as though they had been all in a maruellous strange study, they held their peace fo2 a certaine space. Fo2 this Pallets, and the fo2esaid doctor Palo had also added that John Hus in an open sermon had inflamed and stirred vp the people against the magistrates, in so much that a great number of the citizens did openly set themselues against the magistrates: and by that meanes was it, that he said those three were readie to suffer death fo2 the truth. And this sedition was hardly appeased by any benefit, o2 helpe that the king could do. Then the English men exhibited the copie of a certain epistle, which they said was falsly conueyed vnto Pr2age, vnder the title of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, and that John Hus did reade the same out of the pulpit vnto the people, that he might commend and p2aise John Wickliffe vnto the citizens of Pr2age. When they had read the same befo2e the councell, the Englishmen demanded of John Hus, whether he had read the same openly o2 no. Which when he had confessed, because it was b2ought thither by two scholars vnder the seale of the Vniuersitie: they also inquired of him what scholars they were. He answered: this my friend (meaning Stephen Pallets) knoweth the one of them as well as I, the other I know not what he was.

Another quarrell picked by English men against John Hus.

The testimonials of Oxford, fo2 Wickliffe b2ought to Prage.

Then they first enquired of him, as touching the last man, where he was. John Hus answered: I heard say (said he) that in his returne into England, he died by the way. As touching the first, Pallets said, that he was a Bohemian and no Englishman, and that he b2ought out of England a certaine small piece of the stone of Wickliffes sepulchre, which they that are the followers of his doctrine at this p2esent, do reuerence and wo2ship as a thing most holy. Hereby it appeareth fo2 what intent all these things were done, and that John Hus was the autho2 of them all.

A piece of the stone of Wickliffes sepulchre b2ought fo2 a relike to Prage.

Then the English men exhibited another epistle, contrarie to the first, vnder the seale of the Vniuersitie, the effect and argument whereof was this: The Senate of the Vniuersitie, not without great so2row and griefe hath experimented and found, that the erro2s of Wickliffe are scattred and spread out of that Vniuersitie throughout all England. And to the intent that through their helpe and labour, meanes may be found to remedie this mischiefe, they haue appointed fo2 that purpose twelue doctours, men of singular learning, and other masters, which should sit in iudgement vpon the bookes of Wickliffe.

These men haue noted out aboue the number of two hund2ed articles, the which the whole Vniuersitie haue iudged wo2thie to be burnt: but fo2 the reuerence of the said sacred councell, the said Vniuersitie hath sent them vnto Constance, referring and remitting the whole autho2itie of the iudgement vnto this councell.

Heere was great silence kept fo2 a while. Then Pallets rising vp, as though he had finished now his accusation, said: I take God to my witnes befo2e the emperours maiestie heere p2esent, and the most reuerend fathers, cardinals and bishops, that in this accusation of John Hus, I haue not bred any hatred o2 euil will: but that I might satisfie the oth which I toke, when I was made doctor, that I would be a most cruell and sharpe enemie of all maner of erro2s, fo2 the p2osit and commoditie of the holy catholike church. Michael de Causis did also the like. And I, said John Hus, do commit all these things vnto the heauenly Iudge, which shall iustly iudge the cause o2 quarrels of both parties. Then said the cardinall of Cambray, I cannot a little commend and p2aise the humanitie and gentlenesse of maister Pallets, which he hath vsed in drawing out the articles against maister John Hus. Fo2 as we haue heard, there are many things contained in his booke, much wo2se and detestable.

The oth of Pallets.

The oth of Michael de Causis.

John Hus witnesseth the Lord.

When he had spoken these wo2ds, the bishop of Rygen vnto whom John Hus was committed, commanded that the said John Hus should be carried againe safely vnto prison. Then John de Clum following him, did not a little incourage and comfo2t him. No tongue can exp2esse what courage and stomacke he receiued by the short talke which he had with him: when as in so great a b2oile and grieuous hatred, he saw himselfe in a maner fo2saken of all men. After that John Hus was carried away, the emperour began to exho2t the p2esidents of the councell in this maner, saying:

John de Clum doth comfo2t John Hus.

The emperours oration to the p2esidents of the councell.

YOu haue heard the manifold and grieuous crimes which are laid against Iohn Hus, which are not only proued by manifest and strong witnesses, but also confessed by him: of the which euery one of them by my iudgement and aduice haue deserued, and are worthie of death. Therefore, except he do recant them all, I iudge and thinke meete that he be punished with fire: and albeit he doe that which he is willed and commanded to do; notwithstanding I do counsell you, that he be forbid the office of preaching and teaching, and also that he returne no more into the kingdome of Boheme. For if he be admitted againe to teach and preach, and specially in the kingdome of Boheme, he will not obserue and keepe that which he is commanded, but hoping vpon the fauour and good will of such as be his adherents and fautours there, he wil returne again vnto his former purpose and intent, and then besides these errours, he will also sow new errors amongst the people, so the last error shall be worse then the first.

Moreouer, I iudge and think it good that his articles which are condemned, should be sent vnto my brother the king of Boheme, and afterward into Pole and other prouinces, where as mens minds are repleniished with his doctrine; with this commandement, that whosoeuer do proceed to hold or keepe the same, they should by the common aid both of the ecclesiasticall and ciuill power, be punished. So at the length shall remedie be found for this mischiefe, if the boughes together with the root, be vtterly rooted and pulled vp: and if the bishops and other prelats, which heere in this place haue laboured and trauelled for the extirpating of this heresie, be commended by the whole voices of the councell vnto the kings and princes, vnder whose dominion they are. Last of al, if there be any found heere at Constance, which are familiars vnto Iohn Hus, they also ought to be punished with such seueritie and punishment as is due vnto them, and specially his scholar Ierome of Prage. Then said the rest, when the master is once punished, we hope we shall find the scholar much more tractable and gentle.

That which God planteth man shall neuer root vp.

Ierome of Prage mentioned and p2omoted by the emperour.

After they had spoken these wo2ds, they departed out of the Cloyster, where they were assembled and gathered together. The day befo2e his condemnation, which was the sixth of Iulie, the emperour Sigismund sent vnto him foure bishops, accom-accomplished with maister Wencelate de Duba, and John de Clum, that they should learne and vnderstand of him what he did intend to doe. When as hee was brought out of prison vnto them, John de Clum began first to speake vnto him, saying.

The pitifull and louing oration of John de Clum vnto John Hus.

MAster Iohn Hus, I am a man vnlearned, neither am I able to counsell or aduertise you, being a man of learning and vnderstanding: notwithstanding I do require you, if you know your selfe guilty of any of those errors, which are obiected and laid against you before the Councell, that you will not bee ashamed to alter and change your mind to the will and pleasure of the Councell: if contrariwise, I will be no author vnto you, that you should doe any thing contrarie, or against your conscience, but rather to suffer and indure any kind of punishment, then to denie that which you haue knowne to bee the truth. Vnto whom, Iohn Hus turning himselfe, with lamentable teares, said: Verily as before I haue oftentimes done, I do take the most high God for my witnesse, that I am readie with my whole heart and mind, if the Councell can instruct or teach me any better by the holy scripture: I will bee readie with all my heart to alter and change my purpose. Then one of the bishops which sate by, said vnto him, that he would neuer bee so arrogant or proud, that hee would preferre his owne mind or opinion before the iudgement of the whole Councell. To whom Iohn Hus answered, neither doe I otherwise mind or intend. For if he which is the meanest, or least in all this Councell, can conuict me of error, I will with an humble heart and mind performe, and doe whatsoeuer the Councell shall require of me. Marke, said the bishops, how obstinately hee doth perseuere in his errors. And when they had thus talked, they commanded the keepers to carrie him againe vnto prison, and so they returned againe vnto the Emperour with their commission.

The maruellous constancie of John Hus.

That is no right modestie that more regardeth to obey man, then manifest veritie. Iohn Hus answereth.

The next day after, which was Saturday, and the sixth day of Iulie, there was a generall Session holden of the Princes and lords, both of the ecclesiasticall and temporall estates in the head Church of the city of Constance, the emperour Sigismund being president in his impertall robes and habit: in the midst whereof, there was made a certaine high place, being square about like a table, and hard by it there was a deske of wood, vpon the which the garments and vestiments pertaining vnto priesthood were laid, for this cause, that before Iohn Hus should be deliuered ouer vnto the ciuill power, he should bee openly depriued and spoiled of his priestly ornaments. When Iohn Hus was brought thither, he fell downe vpon his knees before that same high place, and prayed a long time. In the meane while the bishop of Londy went vp into the pulpit, and made this sermon following.

The Sermon of the bishop of Londy, before the sentence was giuen vpon Iohn Hus.

The sermon before the sentence

IN the name of the Father, the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost. Trusting by humble inuocation vpon the diuine helpe and aid, most noble prince, and most Christian emperour, and you most excellent fathers, and reuerend lords, bishops, and prelats, also most excellent doctors and masters, famous and noble dukes, and high countes, honourable nobles, and barons, and all other men worthie of remembrance: that the intent and purpose of my mind may the more plainely and euidently appeare vnto this most sacred congregation, I am first of all determined to intreat or speake of that which is read in the Epistle on the next Sunday, in the sixth chapter to the Romans: That is to say: Let the bodie of sinne be destroyed, &c.

The theame. His theame confirmed by Aristotle.

It appeareth by the authoritie of Aristotle, in his booke intituled De cœlo & mundo, how wicked, dangerous, and foolish a matter it seemeth to be, not to withstand peruerse and wicked beginnings. For he saith, that a small errour in the beginning, is very great in the end. It is very damnable and dangerous to haue erred, but more hard to be corrected or amended. Whereupon that worthie doctor Saint Ierome, in his booke vpon the exposition of the Catholike faith, teacheth how necessarie a thing it is, that heretikes and heresies should be suppressed, euen at the first beginning of them, saying thus: The rotten and dead flesh is to bee cut off from the bodie, lest that the whole bodie do perish and putrifie. For a scabbed sheepe is to bee put out of the fold, lest that the whole flocke bee infected. And a little fire is to be quenched, lest the whole house be consumed and burned. Arrius was first a sparke in Alexandria, who because hee was not at the first quenched, hee presumed and went about with his wicked and peruerse imaginations, and phantasticall inuentions, to spot and defile the Catholike faith, which is founded and established by Christ, defended with the victorious triumphs of so many Martyrs, and illuminate and set foorth with the excellent doctrines and writings of so many men. Such therefore must bee resisted: such heretikes of necessitie must bee suppressed and condemned.

Wherefore I haue truely propounded, as touching the punishment of euerie such obstinate heretike, that the bodie of sinne is to be destroyed. Whereupon it is to be considered according vnto the holy traditions of the Fathers, that some sins are aduerse and contrary vnto another. Othersome are annexed or conioined together: othersome are, as it were, branches and members of others: and some are as it were the rootes and head of others. Amongst all which, those are to bee counted the most detestable, out of the which the most and worst, haue their originall and beginning. Wherefore, albeit that all sinnes and offences are to be abhorred of vs: yet those are specially to bee eschued, which are the head and roote of the rest. For by how much the peruersenesse of them is of more force and power to hurt, with so much the more speed and circumspection, ought they to bee rooted out and extinguished, with apt preseruatiues and remedies. Forsomuch then as amongst all sinnes none doth more appeare to be inueterate, then the mischiefe of of this most execrable schisme, therefore haue I right well propounded, that the bodie of sinne should be destroyed. For by the long continuance of this schisme, great and most cruell destruction is sprung vp amongst the faithfull, and hath long continued: abominable diuisions of heresies are growne: threatnings are increased and multiplied: the confusion of the whole clergie is growne thereupon, and the opprobries and slanders of the Christian people are abundantly sprung vp and increased. And truly it is no maruell, for so much as that most detestable and execrable schisme, is, as it were, a bodie and heape of dissolution of the true faith of God: for what can be good or holy in that place, where as such a pestiferous schisme hath raigned so long a time? For as saint Bernard saith, Like as in the vnitie and concord of the faithfull, there is the habitation and dwelling of the Lord, so likewise in the schisme and dissipation of the Christians, there is made the habitation and dwelling of the diuell. Is not schisme and diuision the originall of all subuersion, the denne of heresies, and the nourisher of all offences? for the knot of vnitie and peace being once troubled and broken, there is free passage made for all strife and debate. Couetousnesse is vttered in othes for lucres sake, lust and will is set at liberty, and all meanes opened vnto slaughter. All right and equitie is banished, the ecclesiasticall power is iniuried, and the calamitie of this schisme bringeth in all kind of bondage, sword and violence doth rule, the laitie haue the dominion, concord and vnitie are banished, and all prescript rules of religion vtterlie contemned and set at naught.

They cannot abide the laitie to rule in any case.

Consider most gentle lords, how that during this most pestiferous schisme, how many heresies haue appeared and shewed themselues, how many heretiks haue scaped vnpunished, how many Churches haue been spoiled and pulled downe, how many cities haue been oppressed, and regions brought to ruine, what confusion hath there hapned in the clergie? What and how great destruction hath been amongst the Christian people I pray you marke how the Church of God, the spouse of Christ, and the mother of all faithfull, is contemned and despised. For who doth reuerence the keies of the Church, who feareth the censures or lawes, or who is it, that doth defend the liberties thereof? But rather who is it, that doth not offend the same, or who doth not inuade it, or else what is hee that dare not violently lay hands vpon the patrimonie or heritage of Iesus Christ? The goods of the clergie, and of the poore, and the releefe of pilgrims and strangers, gotten together by the bloud of our Sauiour, and of many martyrs, are spoiled and taken away: behold the abomination of the desolation brought vpon the Church of God, the destruction of the faith, and the confusion of the Christian people, to the ruine of the Lords flocke or fold, and all the whole companie of our most holy Sauiour and Redeemer. This losse is more great or grieuous then any which could happen vnto the martyrs of Christ, and this persecution much more cruell then the persecution of any tyrants, for they did but onely punish the bodies, but in this schisme and diuision the soules are tormented. There the bloud of men was only shed, but in this case the true faith is subuerted and ouerthrowne. That persecution was saluation vnto many: but this schisme is destruction vnto all men. When the tyrants raged, then the faith did increase: but by this diuision it is vtterly decaied. During their crueltie and madnesse, the primitiue Church increased, but through this schisme it is confounded and ouerthrowne. Tyrants did ignorantly offend: but in this schisme, many doe wittingly and willingly euen of obstinacie offend. There came in heretikes, vsers of simonie, and hypocrites, to the great detriment and deceit of the Church: vnder those tyrants, the merits of the iust were increased.

All the popish religion lieth in lands, lordships and liberties.

Note here the popes diuinitie, how the bloud of Christ serueth to purchase their patrimonie.

But during this schisme, mischiefe and wickednes are augmented: for in this most cursed and execrable diuision, truth is made an enemie to all Christians, faith is not regarded, loue and charitie hated, hope is lost, iustice ouerthrowne, no kind of courage, or valiantnesse, but onely vnto mischiefe: modestie and temperance cloked, wisdome turned into deceit, humilitie fained, equitie and truth falsified, patience vtterlie fled, conscience small, all wickednesse intended, deuotion counted follie, gentlenesse abiect and cast away, religion despised, obedience not regarded, and all manner of life reprochfull and abominable. With how great and grieuous sorrowes is the Church of God repleniished and filled, whilest that tyrants doe oppresse it, heretikes inuade it, vsers of simonie doe spoile and and rob it, and schismatikes goe about vtterly to subuert it? O most miserable and wretched Christian people, whom now by the space of fortie yeeres, with such indurate and continuall schisme, they haue tormented, and almost brought to ruine! O the little barke and ship of Christ, which hath so long time wandred and strayed now in the middest of the whirlepooles, and by and by sticketh fast in the rocks, tossed to and fro with most grieuous and tempestuous stormes! O miserable and wretched boate of Peter, if the most holy father would suffer thee to sincke or drowne, into what dangers and perils haue the wicked pirats brought thee? amongst what rocks haue they placed thee? O most godly and louing Christians, what faithful deuout man is there, which beholding and seeing the great ruine and decay of the Church, would not bee prouoked vnto teares? what good conscience is there, that can refraine weeping? because that contention and strife is powred vpon the ecclesiasticall rulers, which haue made vs to erre in the way: because they haue not found, or rather would not find the way of vnitie and concord: Whereupon so many heresies, and so great confusion is sprung vp, and growne in the flocke of Peter, and the fold of our Lord.

He stirreth vp the emperour Sigismund.

Many princes, kings and prelates, haue greatly laboured and trauelled for the rooting out hereof, but yet could they neuer bring to passe, or finish that most wholesome and necessary worke. Wherefore most Christian king, this most glorious and triumphant victorie hath tarried only for thee, the crowne and glorie thereof shall be thine for euer, and this most happy victorie shall be continually celebrate to thy great honour and praise, that thou hast restored againe the Church which was so spoiled, thou hast remooued and put away all inueterate and ouergrowne schismes and diuisions, thou hast trodden downe vsers of simonie, and rooted out all heretikes. Doest thou not behold and see how great, perpetuall and famous renowne and glorie it will be vnto thee? For what can bee more iust, what more holy, what more better, what more to bee desired, or finally, what can be more acceptable, then to root out this wicked and abominable schisme, to restore the Church againe vnto her ancient libertie, to extinguish and put away all simonie, and to condemne and destroy all errours and heresies from amongst the flock of the faithfull? Nothing truely can bee better, nothing more holie, nothing more profitable for the whole world, and finally, nothing more acceptable vnto God. For the performance of which most holy and godly worke, thou wast elect and chosen of God, thou wast first deputed and chosen in heauen, before thou wast elect and chosen vpon earth. Thou wast first appointed by the celestiall and heauenlie prince, before the electors of the empire did elect or choose thee, and specially, that by the imperial force and power, thou shouldest condemne and destroy those errors and heresies, which we haue presently in hand to bee condemned and subuerted. To the performance of this most holy worke, God hath giuen vnto thee the knowledge and vnderstanding of his diuine truth and veritie, power of princely maiestie, and the iust iudgement of equitie and righteousnes, as the most highest himselfe doth say; I haue giuen thee vnderstanding and wisedome, to speake and vtter my words, and haue set thee to rule ouer nations and kingdomes, that thou shouldest helpe the people, plucke downe and destroy iniquity, and by exercising of iustice, thou shouldest, I say, destroy all errours and heresies, and speciallie this obstinate hereticke heere present, through whose wickednesse and mischiefe, many places of the world are infected with most pestilent and hereticall poison, and by his meanes and occasion, almost vtterly subuerted and destroyed. This most holy and godly labour, O most noble prince, was reserued only for thee, vpon thee it doth onely lie, vnto whom the whole rule and ministration of iustice is giuen. Wherefore thou hast established thy praise and renowne, euen by the mouthes of infants and sucking babes, for thy praises shall bee celebrate for euermore, that thou hast destroyed and ouerthrowne such and so great enemies of the faith. The which that thou maist prosperously and happilie performe and bring to passe, our Lord Iesus may vouchsafe to grant thee his grace and helpe, who is blessed for euer and euer, Amen.

The proctor of the Councell calleth for the sentence.

¶ When this Sermon was thus ended, the procurer of the Councell rising vp, named Henricus de Piro, required that the processe of the cause against John Hus might bee continued, and proceed vnto the definitiue sentence. Then a certaine bishop, which was appointed one of the Iudges, declared the processe of the cause, which was pleaded long since in the court of Rome and elsewhere, betweene John Hus and the prelates of Prage.

The Cardinall of Cambray commanded John Hus, to keepe silence.

At the last he repeated those articles which wee haue before remembred, amongst the which hee rehearsed also one article, that John Hus should teach the twa natures of the Godhead and manhood to be one Christ. John Hus went about brieflie with a word or two to answere vnto euery one of them; but as often as he was about to speake, the cardinall of Cambray commanded him to hold his peace, saying: hereafter you shall answer to all together, if you will. Then said John Hus, how can I at once answer vnto all those things which are alleaged against mee, when as I cannot remember them all? Then said the cardinall of Florence, we haue heard thee sufficiently. But when as John Hus for all that would not hold his peace, they sent the officers which should force him thereunto. Then began he to intreate, pray, and beseech them, that they would heare him, that such as were present, might not credit or beleeue those things to be true which were reported of him. But when all this would nothing preuaile, he kneeling downe vpon his knees, committed the whole matter vnto God, and the Lord Iesus Christ, for at their hands hee beleeued easily to obtaine that which he desired.

John Hus could not be heard in the councell.

John Hus committeth his cause to the Lord Christ.

When the articles abouesaid were ended, last of all there was added a notable blasphemie, which they all imputed to John Hus. That is, that hee said there should be a fourth person in diuinitie, and that a certaine doctor did heare him speake of the same. When John Hus desired that the doctor might bee named, the bishop which had alleaged the article, said, that it was not needfull to name him. Then said John Hus, O miserable and wretched man that I am, which am forced and compelled to beare such blasphemie and slander.

Marke the vnshamefastnesse of them to faine what they list. John Hus againe slandered.

Afterward the article was repeated, how he appealed vnto Christ, and that by name, was called hereticall. Whereunto John Hus answered; O Lord Iesus Christ, whose word is openly condemned here in this councell, vnto thee againe I doe appeale: which when thou was euill intreated of thine enemies, diddest appeale vnto God thy father, committing thy cause vnto a most iust Iudge, that by thy example, wee also being oppressed with manifest wrongs and iniuries, should flee vnto thee. Last of all, the article was rehearsed, as touching the contempt of the excommunication by John Hus. Whereunto he answered as before, that he was excused by his aduocates in the court of Rome, wherefore he did not appeare when he was cited: and also that it may be proued by the acts, that the excommunication was not ratified: and finally, to the intent he might cleare himself of obstinacie, he was for that cause come vnto Constance, vnder the emperors safe-conduct. When he had spoken these words, one of them which was appointed Iudge, read the definitiue sentence against him, which followeth thus word for word.

The Councell doth call it hereticall to appeale to Christ.

Contempt of the popes excommunication laid to John Hus.

The sentence or iudgement of the Councell of Constance giuen against Iohn Hus.

The sentence read against John Hus.

THe most holy and sacred generall Councell of Constance, being congregate and gathered together, representing the Catholike Church for a perpetuall memorie of the thing, as the veritie and truth doth witnes, an euill tree bringeth forth euill fruit: hereupon it commeth, that the man of most damnable memorie John Wickliffe, through his pestiferous doctrine, not through Iesus Christ by the gospell, as the holy fathers in times past, haue begotten faithfull children, but contrarie vnto the wholesome faith of Iesus Christ, as a most venemous rote, hath begotten many pestilent and wicked children, whom hee hath left behind him, successors and followers of his peruerse and wicked doctrine, against whom this sacred Synode of Constance is forced to rise vp, as against bastards and vnlawfull children, and with diligent care, with the sharpe knife of the ecclesiasticall authoritie, to cut vp their errours out of the Lords field, as most hurtfull brambles and briers, lest they should growe to the hurt and detriment of others.

Forsomuch then as in the holy generall Councell latelie celebrated and holden at Rome, it was decreed, that the doctrine of John Wickliffe of most damnable memorie, should be condemned, and that his bookes which contained the same doctrine, should be burned as hereticall, and this decree was approued and confirmed by the sacred authoritie of the whole Councell: neuertheless one John Hus here personallie present in this sacred Councell, not the disciple of Christ, but of John Wickliffe, an archheretike, after, and contrarie, or against the condemnation and decree, hath taught, preached and affirmed the articles of Wickliffe, which were condemned by the Church of God, and in times past by certaine most reuerend fathers in Christ, lords, archbishops and bishops, of diuers kingdomes and realmes, maisters of diuinitie of diuers Vniuersities: especiallie resisting in his open sermons, and also with his adherents and complices in the schooles, the condemnation of the said articles of Wickliffes, oftentimes published in the said Vniuersitie of Prage, and hath declared him the said Wickliffe, for the fauour and commendation of his doctrine, before the whole multitude of the clergie and people, to bee a Catholicke man, and a true Euangelicall doctor. He hath also published and affirmed, certaine and many of his articles worthilie condemned, to bee catholicke, the which are notoriouslie contained in the bookes of the said John Hus.

They shall bring you before their councels, they shall persecute you, and call you in Wherefore, after diligent deliberation and full information first had vpon the premisses by the reuerend fathers and lords in Christ of the holy Church of Rome, cardinals, patriarks, archbishops, bishops, and other prelates, doctors of diuinitie, and of both lawes in great number assembled and gathered together, this most sacred and holie Councell of Constance declareth and determineth the articles abouesaid (the which which after due conference had, are found in his bookes written with his owne hand, the which also the said John Hus in open audience, before this holy Councell, hath confessed to be in his bookes) not to be catholike, neither worthie to bee taught, but ỹ many of them are erroneous, some of them to be wicked, other some to be offensiue vnto godly eares, many of them to be temerarious and seditious, and the greater part of them to be notoriously hereticall, and euen now of late by the holy fathers and generall councels, reprooued and condemned. And forsomuch as the said articles are expressely contained in the bookes of the said John Hus, therefore this said * sacred Councell, doth condemne and reprooue all those bookes which he wrote in what forme or phrase soeuer they be, or whether they be translated by others; and doth determine and decree, that they all shall be solemnlie and openlie burned in the presence of the clergie and people of the citie of Constance, and elsewhere: adding moreouer for the premisses, that all his doctrine is worthie to be despised and eschewed of all faithfull Christians. And to the intent this most pernitious and wicked doctrine, may be vtterlie excluded and shut out of the Church, this sacred Synode doth straitly command, that diligent inquisition be made by the ordinaries of the places by the ecclesiasticall censure, for such treatises and works, and that such as are found, be consumed and burned with fire. And if there be any found, which shall contemne or despise this sentence or decree, this sacred Synode ordaineth and decreeth that the ordinaries of the places, and the inquisitors of heresies, shall proceed against euery such person as suspect of heresie.

*The said concilium malignantium.

Wherefore, after due inquisition made against the said John Hus, and full information had by the comissaries and doctors of both lawes, and also by the sayings of the witnesses which were worthie of credit, and many other things openlie read before the said John Hus, and before the fathers and prelates of this sacred Councell (by the which allegations of the witnesses it appeareth that the said John Hus hath taught many euill and offensiue, seditious, and perilous heresies, and hath preached the same by a long time) this most sacred and holy Synode lawfully congregate and gathered together in the holy Ghost, the name of Christ being inuocate and called vpon, by this their sentence which here is set forth in writing, determineth, pronounceth, declareth, and decreeth, that John Hus was and is a true and manifest hereticke, and that he hath preached openly errors and heresies lately condemned by the Church of God, and many other seditious, temerarious, and offensiue things to no small offence of the diuine maiestie, and of the vniuersall Church, and detriment of the catholike faith and church, neglecting and despising the keies of the Church, and ecclesiasticall censures. In the which his errors he hath continued with a mind altogether indurate and hardned by the space of many yeeres, much offending the faithfull Christians by his obstinacie and stubburnesse, whereas he made his appeale vnto the Lord Iesus Christ, as the most high iudge, omitting and leauing all ecclesiasticall meanes. In the which his appeale hee alleaged many false, iniurious, and offensiue matters, in contempt of the Apostolike see and the ecclesiasticall censures and keies.

Many shall come in my name and shall deceiue many: Marke 13.

To appeale to Christ is derogatorie to the popes holinesse.

Whereupon both for the premisses and many other things, the said Synode pronounceth John Hus to be an heretick, and iudgeth him by these presents to be condemned and iudged as an heretike; and reprooueth the said appeale as iniurious, offensiue, and done in derision vnto the ecclesiastical iurisdiction, and iudgeth the said Hus, not only to haue seduced the Christian people by his writings and preachings, and specially in the kingdome of Boheme, neither to haue been a true preacher of the Gospell of Christ vnto the said people, according to the exposition of the holy doctors: but also to haue been a seducer of them, and also an obstinate and stiffnecked person, yea and such a one as doth not desire to returne againe to the lap of our holy mother the Church, neither to abiure the errors and heresies which hee hath openly preached and defended. Wherefore this most sacred Councell decreeth and declareth, that the said John Hus, shall be famously depосed and degraded from his priestly orders and dignitie, &c.

Mertie condemned for heresie.

¶ Whilest these things were thus read, John Hus, albeit he were forbidden to speake, notwithstanding he did often interrupt them, and specially when he was reprooued of obstinacie, he said with a loud voice: I was neuer obstinat, but as alwaies heretofore, euen so now againe I desire to be taught by the holy Scriptures, and I doe professe my selfe to be so desirous of the truth, that if I might by one onelie word subuert the errors of all heretikes, I would not refuse to enter into what perill or danger soeuer it were. When his bookes were condemned, he said: Wherefore haue you condemned those bookes, whenas you haue not proued by any one article, that they are contrary to the Scriptures, or articles of faith? And moreouer, what iniurie is this that you do to me, that you haue condemned these books written in the Bohemian tongue, which they neuer read.

John Hus cleareth himselfe of obstinacie.

They condemne the bookes written in the Bohemian tongue, which they neuer read.

Hus prayeth for his enemies.

When the sentence and iudgement was ended, kneeling downe vpon his knees, hee said: Lord Iesus Christ, forgiue mine enemies, by whom thou knowest that I am falsly accused, and that they haue vsed false witnesse and slanders against me; forgiue them I say, for thy great mercies sake. This his prayer and oration the greater part, and specially the chiefe of the priests, did deride and mocke.

John Hus commanded to put on the priests garments.

At the last, the seuen bishops which were chosen out to degrade him of his priesthood, commanded him to put on the garments pertaining vnto priesthood, which thing when hee had done, vntill hee came to the putting on of the Albe, he called to his remembrance the white vesture which Herode put vpon Iesus Christ to mock him withall. So likewise in all other things he did comfort himselfe by the example of Christ. When he had now put on all his priestly vestures, the bishops exhorted him that hee should yet alter and change his mind and purpose, and prouide for his honour and safegard. Then he (according as the manner of the ceremonie is) going vp to the top of the scaffold, being full of teares, hee spake vnto the people in this sort.

John Hus his oration vnto the people.

These lords and bishops doe exhort and counsell me, that I should here confesse before you all that I haue erred: the which thing to doe, if it were such as might be done with the infamie and reproch of any man, they might peraduenture easily perswade me thereunto: but now truely I am in the sight of the Lord my God, without whose great ignominie, and grudge of mine owne conscience, I can by no meanes doe that which they require of me. For I doe well know, that I neuer taught any of those things which they haue falslie alleaged against me, but I haue alwaies preached, taught, written and thought contrarie thereunto. With what countenance then should I behold the heauens? with what face should I looke vpon them, whom I haue taught, whereof there is a great number, if through me it should come to passe that those things which they haue hitherto knowne to bee most certaine and sure, should now be made vncertaine? Should I by this my example astonish or trouble so many soules, so many consciences, indued with the most firme and certaine knowledge of the Scriptures, and Gospell of our Lord Iesus Christ and his most pure doctrine, armed against all the assaults of Satan? I will neuer doe it, neither commit any such kind of offence, that I should seeme more to esteeme this vile carcase appointed vnto death, then their health and saluation. At this most godly word hee was forced againe to heare by the consent of the bishops, that hee did obstinately and maliciously perseuere in his pernitious and wicked errors.

The degrading of John Hus.

Then he was commanded to come down to the execution of his iudgement, and in his comming downe, one of the seuen bishops afore rehearsed, first tooke away the chalice from him which he held in his hand, saying: O cursed Judas, why hast thou forsaken the counsell and waies of peace, and hast counselled with the Iewes? we take away from thee this chalice of thy saluation. But John Hus receiued this curse in this manner: but I trust vnto God the father omnipotent, and my Lord Iesus Christ, for whose sake I doe suffer these things, that he will not take away the chalice of his redemption, but haue a stedfast and firme hope that this day I shall drinke thereof in his kingdome. Then followed the other bishops in order, which euery one of them toke away the vestiments from him, which they had put on, ech one of them giuing him their curse. Whereunto John Hus answered, that he did willingly embrace and beare those blasphemies for the name of the Lord Iesus Christ. At the last they came to the rasing of his shauen crowne. But before the bishops would goe in hand with it, there was a great contention betweene them, with what instrument it should bee done, with a rasor, or with a paire of sheares.

The words of John Hus vnto the Emperour.

In the meane season John Hus turning himselfe towards the emperour, said: I maruell, that forsomuch as they bee all of like cruell mind and stomacke, yet they cannot agree vpon their kind of crueltie. Notwithstanding, at the last they agreed to cut off the skinne of the crowne of his head with a paire of sheares. And when they had done that, they added these words: Now hath the church taken away all her ornaments and priuiledges from him. Now there resteth nothing elle, but that he be deliuered ouer vnto the secular power. But before they did that, there yet remained another knacke of reproch. For they caused to be made a certaine crowne of paper, almost a cubit deepe, in the which were painted three diuels of wonderfull vgly shape, and this title set ouer their heads, Heresiarcha. The which when hee saw, hee said: My Lord Iesus Christ for my sake did weare a crowne of thorne: why should not I then for his sake againe weare this light crowne, bee it neuer so ignominious? Truly I will doe it, and that willinglie. When it was set vpon his head, the bishops said: now wee commit thy soule vnto the diuell. But I, said John Hus (lifting his eies vp towards the heauens) doe commit my spirit into thy hands: O Lord Iesus Christ, vnto thee I commend my spirit which thou hast redeemed. These contumelious opprobries thus ended, the bishops turning themselues towards the Emperour, said: This most sacred Synode of Constance, leaueth now John Hus, which hath no more any office, or to doe in the Church of God, vnto the ciuill ciuill iudgement and power. Then the emperor commanded Lodouicus duke of Bauaria, which stood before him in his robes, holding the golden appell with the crosse in his hand, that he should receiue John Hus of the bishops, and deliuer him vnto them which should doe the execution. By whom, as he was led to the place of execution, before the church doores hee saw his bookes burning, whereat he smiled and laughed. And all men that he passed by, hee exhorted, not to thinke that he should die for any errour or heresie, but only for the hatred and ill will of his aduersaries, which had charged him with most false and vniust crimes. All the whole citie in a manner being in armor, followed him.

The protestation of John Hus as he was led to the place of execution.

The place appointed for the execution, was before the gate Gotlebian, betweene the gardens and the gates of the suburbs. When as John Hus was come thither, kneeling downe vpon his knees, and lifting his eies vp vnto heauen, he prayed, and said certaine Psalmes, and specially the 50. 31. Psalmes. And they which stood hard by, heard him oftentimes in his prayer, with a merrie and chearefull countenance repeate this verse: Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit, &c. Which thing when the lay people beheld which stood nert vnto him, they said: what he hath done afore, we know not, but now we see and heare that hee doth speake and pray very deuoutly and godlie. Othersome wished that hee had a confessor. There was a certaine priest by, sitting on horsebacke in a greene gowne drawne about with red silke, which said, hee ought not to bee heard, because he is an hereticke. Yet notwithstanding, whilest he was in prison, he was both confessed, and also absolued by a certaine doctour, a monke, as Hus himselfe doth witnesse in a certaine Epistle which hee wrote vnto his friends out of prison. Thus Christ raigneth vnknowne vnto the world, euen in the midst of his enemies. In the meane time whilest hee prayed, as hee bowed his necke backward to looke vpward vnto heauen, the crowne of paper fell off from his head vpon the ground. Then one of the souldiers taking it vp againe, said: let vs put it againe vpon his head, that he may be burned with his makers the diuels whom he hath serued.

The prayers of John Hus well liked of the people.

When as by the commandement of the tormentors, he was risen vp from the place of his prayer, with a loud voice he said: Lord Iesus Christ assist and helpe me, that with a constant and patient mind, by thy most gratious helpe, I may beare and suffer this cruell and ignominious death, whereunto I am condemned for the preaching of thy most holy Gospell and word. Then as before, he declared the cause of his death vnto the people. In the meane season the hangman stripped him of his garments, and turning his hands behind his backe, tied him fast vnto the stake with ropes that were made wet. And where as by chance he was turned towards the East, certaine cried out that hee should not looke towards the East, for hee was an heretike: so he was turned towards the West. Then was his necke tied with a chaine vnto the stake, the which chaine when he beheld, smiling he said, that he would willingly receiue the same chaine for Iesus Christs sake, whom hee knew was bound with a farre worse chaine. Vnder his feete they set two fagots, admixing straw withall, and so likewise from the feet vp to the chin, hee was inclosed in round about with wood. But before the wood was set on fire, Lodouicus duke of Bauaria, with another gentleman with him, which was the sonne of Clement, came and exhorted John Hus, that hee would yet be mindfull of his safegard, and renounce his errors. To whom he said, what errour should I renounce, when as I know my selfe guiltie of none? For, as for those things which are falsly alleaged against me, I know that I neuer did so much as once thinke them, much lesse preach them. For this was the principall end and purpose of my doctrine, that I might teach all men penance and remission of sinnes, according to the veritie of the Gospell of Iesus Christ, and the exposition of the holie doctors: wherefore with a chearefull mind and courage I am here readie to suffer death. When hee had spoken these words, they left him, and shaking hands together they departed.

Pardon offered againe to John Hus.

The last confession of John Hus.

Then was the fire kindled, and John Hus began to sing with a loud voice, Iesus Christ the son of the liuing God haue mercie vpon me. And when he began to say the same the third time, the wind droue the flame so vpon his face, that it choked him. Yet notwithstanding he moued a while after, by the space that a man might almost say three times the Lords prayer. When all the wood was burned and consumed, the vpper part of the body was left hanging in the chaine, the which they threw downe stake and all, and making a new fire burned it, the head being first cut in small gobbets, that it might the sooner bee consumed vnto ashes. The heart, which was found amongst the bowels, being well beaten with staues and clubs, was at last pricked vpon a sharpe sticke, and rosted at a fire apart vntill it was consumed. Then with great diligence gathering the ashes together, they cast them into the riuer of Rhene, that the least remnant of the ashes of that man should not bee left vpon the earth, whose memorie notwithstanding cannot be abolished out of the minds of the godlie, neither by fire, neither by water, neither by any kind of torment.

This godly seruant and martyr of Christ was condemned by the cruell councell, and burned at Constance, an. 1415. about the moneth of Iulie.

How grieuously this death of J. Hus was taken among the nobles of Boheme and of Moraula, hereafter (Christ willing) shall appeare by their letters which they sent vnto the Councell, and by the letters of Sigismund the king of Romanes, written vnto them. Wherein hee laboureth, all that he can, to purge and excuse himselfe, of Hulles death. Albeit hee was not altogether free from that cruell fact, and innocent from that bloud: yet notwithstanding he pretendeth in words so to wipe away that blot from him, that the greatest part of that crime seemeth to rest vpon the bloudie prelates of that councell, as the words of the king doe purport in forme as followeth.

Ex Cochleo de hist. Huss. lib. 4.

The Emperour excuseth himselfe of the death of Iohn Hus.

INterea (inquit) nobis adhuc in partibus Rheni existentibus, peruenit ad Constantiam, &c. i. In the meane time as we were about the coasts of Rhene, Iohn Hus went to Constance, and there was arrested, as is not to you vnknowne. Who if he had first resorted vnto vs, and had gone with vs vp to the Councel, perhaps it had been otherwise with him. And God knoweth, what griefe and sorrow it was to our heart, to see it so to fall out, as with no words can be well expressed. Whereof all the Bohemians, which were there present, can beare vs witnes, seeing and beholding how carefull and sollicitous we were in labouring for him: Insomuch that we many times with anger and furie departed out of the councel: and not only out of the councell, but also went out of the citie of Constance taking his part, vnto such time as the rulers of the Councell sending vnto vs, said: That if we would not permit them to prosecute that, which right required in the Councell, what should they then do in the place? Whereupon thus we thought with our selues, that here was nothing esse for vs more to doe, nor yet to speake in this case, forasmuch the whole Councell otherwise had been dissolued. Where is to bee noted moreouer, that in Constance the same time there was not one clerke, or two, but there were ambassadours for all kings and princes in Christendome, especially since the time that (Petrus de Luna giuing ouer) all those kings and princes which tooke his part, came to vs: so that whatsoeuer good was to be done, it was now to be passed in this present councel, &c. Ex Epist. Imper. Sigismund. ad Nobiles, &c.

¶ By this it may appeare that the Emperour as partly ashamed and sorie of that which was done, would gladly haue cleared himselfe thereof, and haue washed his hands with Pilate: yet he could not so cleare himselfe, but that a great portion of that murder remained in him to be noted, and well worthy of reprehension: as may both appeare by his last words spoken in the Councell to John Hus, whereof John Hus in his Epistles complaineth, writing to certaine of his friends in Bohemia in his 33. Epistle, as by his words may appeare here following.

Ex Epist. Ioh. Hus 33.

The emperour vncourteous to Iohn Hus.

IDesire you yet againe for the loue of God, that the lords of Boheme ioyning together, will desire the king for a finall audience to be giuen me. Forsomuch as he alone said to me in the Councell, that they should giue me audience shortly, and that I should answere for my selfe briefly in writing: it will bee to his great confusion, if he shall not performe that which he hath spoken. But I feare that word of his will be as firme and sure, as the other was concerning my safe-conduct granted by him. Certaine there were in Bohemia, which willed mee to beware of his safe-conduct. And other said: hee will surely giue you to your enemies. And the Lord Mikest Dwekie told mee before M. Iessenitz, saying: Master, know it for certaine you shall be condemned. And this I suppose he spake, knowing before the intention of the king. I hoped well that hee had been well affected toward the law of God and the truth, and had therein good intelligence: now I conceiue that he is not greatly skilfull nor so prudentlie circumspect in himselfe. Hee condemned me before mine enemies did. Who, if it had pleased him, might haue kept the moderation of Pilate the Gentile, which said: I find no cause in this man: or at least if he had said but thus: Behold, I haue giuen him his safe-conduct safely to returne. And if he will not abide the decision of the Councel, I wil send him home to the king of Bohemia, with your sentence and attestations, that hee with his Clergy may iudge him. But now I heare by the relatiō of Henry Lessl, and of other, that he will ordaine for me sufficient audience: And if I will not submit my selfe to the iudgement of the Councell, he will send me safe, the contrary way, &c.

Pilate more moderate to Christ, then this emperour to Iohn Hus.

This John Hus being in prison, wrote diuers treatises, as of the commandements, of the Lords prayer, of mortall sin, of matrimonie, of the knowledge and loue of God, of three enemies of mankind, the world, the flesh, and the diuell, of penance, of the Sacrament of the bodie and bloud of the Lord: of the sufficiencie of the law of God to rule the Church, &c. He wrote also diuers Epistles and letters to the lords, and to his friends of Boheme: And in his writtings did foretell many things before to come, touching the reformation of the church: and seemeth in the prison to haue had diuers prophetical reuelations shewed to him of God. Certaine of which his letters, and predications, I thought here vnderneath to insert, in such sort, as neither in reciting all I will ouercharge the volume too much: nor yet in reciting of none, I will be so briefe, but that the reader may haue some taste, and take some profit of the Christian writtings and doings of this blessed man: First, beginning with the letter of the lord Clum, concerning the safe-conduct of John Hus.

A letter of the lord Iohn de Clum, concerning the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus.

TO all and singuler that shall see and heare these presents, I Iohn de Clum doe it to vnderstand, how master Iohn Hus bachelar of diuinitie, vnder the safe-conduct and protection of the renouned prince and lord Sigismund of Romans semper Augustus, and king of Hungarie, &c. my gratious lord, and vnder the protection, defence, and safegard of the holie Empire of Rome, hauing the letters patent of the said my lord king of Romans, &c. came vnto Constance to render a full count of his faith in publike audience to all that would require the same. This the said M. Iohn Hus, in this imperiall citie of Constance, vnder the safe-conduct of the said my lord king of Romans, hath bin and yet is detained. And although the pope with the cardinals haue bin seriously required, by solemne Ambassadors of the said my lord king of Romans, &c. in the kings name and behalfe, that the said M. Iohn Hus should bee set at libertie, and bee restored vnto mee, yet notwithstanding, they haue and yet doe refuse hitherto to set him at libertie, to the great contempt and derogation of the safe-conduct of the king, and of the safegard and protection of the Empire, or emperiall maiestie. Wherefore I Iohn aforesaid in the name of the king, doe here publish and make it knowne, that the apprehending and detaining of the said M. Iohn Hus, was done wholly against the will of the forenamed king of Romans my lord, seeing it is done in the contempt of the safe-conduct of his subiects, and of the protection of the empire, because that the said my lord was then absent farre from Constance, and if hee had been there present, would neuer haue permitted the same. And when he shall come, it is to be doubted of no man, but that he for this great iniurie, and contempt of this safe-conduct done to him and to the empire, will grieuously be molested for the same. Giuen at Constance, in the day of the natiuitie of the Lord, 1414.

¶ In this instrument aboue prefixed note (gentle Reader) three things.

First, the godnesse of this gentle lord Iohn de Clum, being so fervent and zealous in the cause of Iohn Hus, or rather in the cause of Christ.

Secondly, the safe-conduct granted vnto the said Iohn Hus, vnder the faith and protection of the Emperour, and of the empire.

Thirdly, here is to be seene the contempt and rebellion of these proud prelates in disobeying the authoritie of their high Magistrate, who contrarie to his safe-conduct giuen, and the mind of the emperour, did arrest and imprison this good man, before the comming of the said emperour, and before that Iohn Hus was heard. Let vs now, as we haue promised, adioyne some of the epistles of this godly man.

An Epistle of Iohn Hus, vnto the people of Prage in his owne vulgar speech.

A letter of John Hus to the people of Prage.

GRace and peace from our Lord Iesus Christ, that you being deliuered from sinne, may walke in his grace, and may grow in all modestie and vertue, and after this may enioy eternall life.

Dearely beloued, I beseech you which walk after the law of God, that you cast not away the care of the saluation of your soules, when as you hearing the word of God, are premonished wisely to vnderstand that you be not deceiued by false Apostles: which doe not reprehend the sinnes of men, but rather ther doe extenuate and diminish them, which flatter the priests, and do not shew to the people their offences: which magnifie themselues, boast their owne workes, and maruellously extoll their owne worthinesse, but follow not Christ in his humilitie, in pouertie, in the crosse and other manifold afflictions. Of whom our mercifull sauiour did premonish vs before, saying: False Christs and false Prophets shall rise, and shall deceiue many. And when he had forewarned his welbeloued disciples, he said vnto them: Beware and take heed of false prophets, which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly are rauening uening wolues: yee shall know them by their fruits. And truth it is, that the faithfull of Christ haue much neede diligently to beware and take heed vnto themselues. For as our Sauiour himselfe doth say: the elect also, if it were possible, shal be brought into error. Wherefore my welbeloued, be circumspect and watchfull, that ye be not circumuented with the craftie traines of the diuell. And the more circumspect ye ought to be, for that antichrist laboureth the more to trouble you. The last iudgement is neere at hand: death shall swallow vp many, but to the elect children of God, the kingdom of God draweth neere, because for them hee gaue his owne bodie. Feare not death, loue together one another, perseuere in vnderstanding the good will of God without ceasing. Let the terrible and horrible day of iudgement bee alwaies before your eies, that you sinne not: and also the ioy of eternall life, whereunto you must endeuour. Furthermore, let the passion of our Sauiour be neuer out of your minds; that you may beare with him and for him gladly, whatsoeuer shall be laid vpon you. For if you shall consider well in your minds his crosse and afflictions, nothing shall be grieuous vnto you, and patientlie you shall giue place to tribulations, cursings, rebukes, stripes, and prisonment, and shall not doubt to giue your liues moreouer for his holy truth, if need require. Know yee welbeloued, that antichrist being stirred vp against you, deuiseth diuers persecutions. And many he hath not hurt, no not the least haire of their heads, as by mine owne example I can testifie, although hee hath been vehemently incensed against me. Wherefore I desire you all, with your prayers to make intercession for mee to the Lord, to giue me intelligence, sufferance, patience and constancie, that I neuer swarue from his diuine veritie. He hath brought me now to Constance. In all my iournie openly and manifestly, I haue not feared to vtter my name as becommeth the seruant of God. In no placke I kept my selfe secret, nor vsed any dissimulation. But neuer did I find in any place more pestilent and manifest enemies then at Constance. Which enemies neither should I haue had there, had it not been for certaine of our owne Bohemians, hypocrites and deceiuers, who for benefits receiued and stirred vp with couetousnesse, with boasting and bragging haue perswaded the people that I went about to seduce them out of the right way. But I am in good hope that through the mercie of our God, and by your praiers, I shal persist strongly in the immutable veritie of God, vnto the last breath. Finally, I would not haue you ignorant, that whereas euery one here is put in his office, I onely as an outcast am neglected, &c. I commend you to the mercifull Lord Iesus Christ, our true God, & the son of the immaculate virgin Mary, which hath redeemed vs by his most bitter death, without all our merits, from eternall paines, from the thraldome of the diuell, and from sinne. From Constance the yeere of our Lord, 1415.

Another letter of Iohn Hus to his benefactors.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

MY gratious benefactors and defenders of the truth, I exhort you by the bowels of Iesus Christ, that now ye setting aside the vanities of this present world, will giue your seruice to the eternall king, Christ the Lord. Trust not in princes, nor in the sonnes of men, in whom there is no health. For the sons of men are dissemblers and deceitfull. To day they are, to morrow they perish, but God remaineth for euer. Who hath his seruants, not for any neede he hath of them, but for their owne profit: vnto whom he performeth that which hee promiseth, and fulfilleth that which he purposeth to giue. He casteth off no faithfull seruant from him; for he saith: Where I am, there also shall my seruant be. And that Lord that maketh euery seruant of his to be the Lord of all his possession, giuing himselfe vnto him, and with himselfe, all things: that without all tediousnesse, feare, and without all defect, he may possesse al things, reioycing with all Saints in ioy infinite. O happie is that seruant, whom, when the Lord shall come, hee shall find watching. Happie is the seruant which shal receiue that king of glorie with ioy. Wherefore, welbeloued Lords, and benefactors, serue you that king in feare: which shall bring you, as I trust, now to Boheme at this present, by his grace in health, and hereafter, to eternall life of glorie. Fare you well: For I thinke that this is the last letter that I shall write to you: who to morrow, as I suppose, shall be purged in hope of Iesus Christ, through bitter death, from my sinnes. The things that happened to me this night, I am not able to write. Sigismund hath done al things with me deceitfully: God forgiue him and only for your sakes. You also heard the sentence which he awarded against mee. I pray you haue no suspition of faithfull Vitus.

Another letter to the lord Iohn de Clum.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

MOst gratious benefactor in Christ Iesus, dearelie beloued, yet I reioyce not a little, that by the grace of God I may write vnto your honour. By you letter, which I receiued yesterday, I vnderstand, first how the iniquitie of the great strumpet, that is, of the malignant congregation (whereof mention is made in the Apocalyps) is detected, and shal be more detected. With the which strumpet, the kings of the earth doe commit fornication, fornicating spiritually from Christ, and as is there said, sliding backe from the truth, and consenting to the lies of antichrist, through his seduction and through feare, or through hope of confederacie, for getting of worldly honour. Secondly, I perceiued by your letter, how the enemies of the truth begin now to be troubled. Thirdly, I perceiued the feruent constancy of your charity, wherwith you professe the truth boldly. Fourthly, with ioy I perceiued ỹ you mind now to giue ouer the vanitie and painfull seruice of this present world, and to serue the Lord Iesus Christ quietly at home. Whom to serue is to raigne, as Gregorie saith. Whom he that serueth faithfullie, hath Iesus Christ himselfe in the kingdome of heauen to minister vnto him, as hee himselfe saith: Blessed is that seruant, whom when the Lord shall come, he shall find waking, and so doing. Verely I say vnto you, that he rising, shall gird himselfe, and shall minister to him. This doe not the kings of the world to their seruants: whom only they doe loue so long as they are profitable and necessarie for their commodities, &c.

Another Epistle of Iohn Hus, wherein he declareth why God suffreth not his to perish, bringing diuers examples, wherewith he doth comfort and confirme both himselfe and other.

THe Lord God be with you. Many causes there were, welbeloued in God my deare friends, which moued me to thinke that those letters were the last, which before I sent vnto you, looking that same time for instant death. But now vnderstanding the same to be deferred, I take it for great comfort vnto me, that I haue some leisure more to talke with you by letters: and therefore I write againe to you, to declare and testifie at least, my gratitude and mindeful dutie toward you. And as touching death, God doth know why he doth defer it both to me and to my welbeloued brother M. Ierom, who I trust will die holily and without blame: and do know also that he doth, and suffereth now more valiantly, then I my selfe a wretched sinner. God hath giuen vs a long time, that we might call to memorie our sinnes the better, and repent for the same more feruentlie. He hath granted vs time, that our long and great temptation should put away our grieuous sinnes, and bring the more consolation. He hath giuen vs time, wherein we should remember the horrible rebukes of our merciful king and Lord Iesus, and should ponder his cruell death, and so more patiently might learne to beare our afflictions. And moreouer that wee might keepe in remembrance, how that the ioyes of the life to come, are not giuen after the ioyes of this world immediatly, but through many tribulations the saints haue entred into the kingdom of heauen. For some of them haue bin cut and chopt all to peeces, some their eies bored through, some sod, some rosted, some slaine aliue, some buried quicke, stoned, crucified, grinded betwixt milstones, drawne and haled hither and thither vnto execution, drowned in waters, strangled and hanged, torne in peeces, vexed with rebukes before their death, pined in prisons, and afflicted in bands. And who is able to recite al the torments and sufferings of the holy saints, which they suffered vnder the old and new Testament for the veritie of God: namely those which haue at any time rebuked the malice of the priests, or haue preached against their wickednesse? And it will be a maruell if any man now also shall escape vnpunished, whosoeuer dare boldly resist the wickednesse and peruersitie, especiallie of those priests, which can abide no correction. And I am glad that they are compelled now to reade my bookes, in the which their malice is somewhat described: and I know they haue read the same more exactly and diligently, then the holy Gospell, seeking therein to find out errors. Giuen at Constance vpon Thursday, the 28. day of Iune, An. 1415.

The torments of the martyrs vnder the old and new testament.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, wherein he rehearseth what iniuries he receiued of the councell, and of the deputies.

IF my letter be not sent yet to Boheme, keepe it and send it not, for hurt may come thereof, &c.

He meaneth by Iohn that he should moue the king in those matters contained in this Epistle.

Item, if the king doe aske, who ought to be my iudge, since that the Councell neither did call me, nor did cite mee, neither was I euer accused before the Councell, and yet the Councell hath imprisoned mee, and hath appointed their proctor against me.

Item, I desire you right noble and gratious Lord Iohn, if audience shall be giuen me, that the king will be there present himselfe, and that I may haue a place appointed neere vnto him, that he may heare me well and vnderstand what I say: and that you also with the Lord Henrie, and with Lord Wencelaus and other mo, if you may, will be present, and heare what the Lord Iesus Christ my procurator and aduocate, and most gratious iudge, will put in my mouth to speake, that whether I liue or die, you may bee true and vpright witnesses with me, lest lying lips shal say hereafter that I swarued away from the truth which I haue preached.

Item, know you that before witnesses and notaries in the prison, I desired the commissioners that they would depute vnto me a proctor and an aduocate, who promised so to do, and afterward would not performe it. Wherefore I haue committed my selfe to the Lord Iesus Christ that hee will bee my procurator and aduocate and iudge of my cause.

Item, know you, that they haue as I suppose no other quarel against me, but only this, that I stood against the popes bull, which

which pope Iohn sent downe to Boheme, to sanctifie war with the signe of the crosse and full remission of sinnes, to all them which would take the holy crosse to fight for the patrimonie of the Romish church against Ladislaus king of Naples, and they haue mine owne writing which was read against me, and I do acknowledge it to be mine. Secõdly, they haue also against me, that I haue continued so long in excommunication, and yet did take vpon me to minister in the church and say Masse. Thirdly, they haue against me, because I did appeale from the pope to Christ. For they read my appeale before mee, the which with a willing mind, smiling I confessed before them all to be mine. Fourthly, because I left a certaine letter behind me, which was read in the church of Bethleem, the which letter my aduersaries haue verie euil fauouredly translated, and sinisterly expounded, in the which I did write that I went out without a safe-conduct. Whereunto you your selues can say and beare me record, that I in my going out, had no safe-conduct of the pope, neither yet did I know whether you should go out with me when I wrote that letter.

Item, if audience may be giuen to me, and that after the same audience the king would suffer me not to be returned againe into prison, but that I may haue your counsels and others my friends: and if it may please God that I may say some thing to my soueraigne lord the king, for the behalfe of christianity, and for his owne profit, &c.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, wherein he confirmeth the Bohemians, and describeth the wickednesse of that Councell.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

IOhn Hus in hope the seruant of God, to all the faithful in Boheme, which loue the Lord, greeting through the grace of God. It commeth in my mind, wherein I must needs admonish you, that be the faithfull and beloued of the Lord, how that the councell of Constance being full of pride, auarice, and all abomination, hath condemned my bookes written in the Boheme tongue, for hereticall, which bookes they neuer saw, nor euer heard them read: And if they had heard them, yet they could not vnderstand the same, being some Italians, some Frenchmen, some Britaines, some Spaniards, Germaines, with other people of other nations moe: vnlesse peraduenture Iohn bishop of Litomish vnderstood them, which was present in that councell, and certaine other Bohemians, and priests which are against me, and labour all they may how to depraue both the verity of God, and the honestie of our countrie of Boheme: Which I iudge in the hope of God, to be a godly land, right wel giuen to the true knowledge of the faith, for that it doth so greatly desire the word of God, and honest maners. And if you were heere at Constance, ye should see the grieuous abomination of this councell, which they call so holy, and such as cannot erre. Of the which councel I haue heard it by the Swechers reported, that the citie of Constance is not able in thirty yeeres to be purged of those wicked abominations in that councell committed. And all be offended almost with that councell, being sore grieued to behold such execrable things perpetrate in the same.

The councell condemne bookes which they vnderstand not.

Praise of Boheme.

The abomination of the councell of Constance described.

When I stood first to answere before mine aduersaries, seeing all things there done with no order, and hearing them also outragiously crying out, I said plainly vnto them, that I looked for more honest behauiour, and better order and discipline, in that councell. Then the chiefe cardinall answered, Saiest thou so? but in the tower thou spakest more modestly. To whom, said I: In the tower no man cried out against me, where as now all do rage against me. My faithfull and beloued in Christ, be not afraid with their sentence in condemning my bookes. They shall be scattered hither and thither abroad, like light butterflies, and their statutes shall endure as Spiderwebs. They went about to shake my constancie from the veritie of Christ: but they could not ouercome the vertue of God in me. They would not reason with the Scriptures against me, as diuers honorable lords can witnes with me, which being readie to suffer contumelie for the truth of God, tooke my part stoutly: namely lord Wenceslaus de Duba, and lord Iohn de Clum: for they were let in by king Sigismund into the councel. And when I said, that I was desirous to be instructed, if I did in any thing erre, then they heard the chiefe cardinall answere againe: Because thou wouldest be informed, there is no remedie, but that thou must first reuoke thy doctrine, according to the determination of fiftie Bachelers of Diuinitie appointed. O high instruction.

John Hus seemeth heere to prophecie of the councell, as it came to passe.

The councell afraid to be tried by the scriptures.

This cardinall was cardinall Cambrensis.

After like maner S. Katharine also should haue denied and reuoked the veritie of God and faith in Christ, because the 50. masters likewise did withstand her: which notwithstanding, that good virgin would neuer doe, standing in her faith vnto death: But she did win those her masters vnto Christ, when as I cannot win these my masters by any meanes. These things I thought good to write vnto you, that you might know how they haue ouercome me, with no grounded Scripture nor with any reason: but only did assay with terrors and deceits to perswade mee to reuoke and to abiure. But our mercifull God, whose law I haue magnified, was and is with me, and I trust, so will continue, and will keepe me in his grace vnto death. Written at Constance after the feast of Iohn Baptist, in prison and in bands, daily looking for death; although for the secret iudgements of God, I dare not say whether this be my last Epistle: for now also almightie God is able to deliuer me.

Saint Katharine disputed with fiftie doctors, conuerted them; but Iohn Hus could not conuert his fiftie doctors.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, wherein he comforteth his friends, and willeth them not to be troubled for the condemning of his bookes: and also declareth the wickednesse of the Clergie.

MAster Iohn Hus, in hope the seruant of God, to al the faithfull which loue him and his statutes, wisheth the truth and grace of God.

Beloued, I thought it needful to warne you that you should not feare or be discouraged because the aduersaries haue decreed that my bookes shall be burnt. Remember how the Israelites burned the preachings of the prophet Ieremy, and yet they could not auoid the things that were prophecied of in them. For after they were burnt, the Lord commanded to write the same prophecie againe, and that larger; which was also done. For Ieremie sitting in prison spake, and Baruch which was readie at his hand, wrote. This is written either in the 35. or 45. chapter of the vision of Ieremie. It is also written in the bookes of the Machabees, that the wicked did burne the law of God, and killed them that had the same. Againe, vnder the new Testament, they burned the Saints, with the bookes of the law of God. The cardinals condemned and committed to fire certaine of S. Gregories bookes, and had burnt them all if they had not bin preserued of God by the meanes of Peter, Gregories minister. Hauing these things before your eyes, take heed lest through feare, you omit to reade my boookes, and deliuer them to the aduersaries to be burnt. Remember the sayings of our mercifull Sauiour, by which he forwarneth vs, Matth. 24. There shall be (saith he) before the day of iudgement, great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning, vntill this day, neither shall be afterwards: So that euen the elect of God should be deceiued, if it were possible. But for their sakes, those daies shall be shortned. When you remember these things (beloued) be not afraid, for I trust in God that that schoole of Antichrist shall be afraid of you, and suffer you to be in quiet, neither shall the councell of Constance extend to Bohemia. For I thinke, that many of them, which are of the councel, shal die before they shal get from you my books. And they shal depart from the councel and be scattered abroad, throughout the parts of the world, like storkes, and then they shall know when winter commeth, what they did in sommer. Consider that they haue iudged their head the P. worthie of death, for many horrible facts that he hath done. Go to now; Answere to this you preachers, which preach that the pope is the god of the earth, that he may, as the lawyers say, make sale of the holy things: that he is the head of the whole holy church in verity well gouerning the same: that he is the heart of the church in quickning the same spiritually: that he is the wel-spring from which floweth al vertue and goodnes: that he is the sunne of the holy church: that he is the safe refuge to which euery Christian man ought to flie for succour. Behold now that head is cut off with the sword, now the god of the earth is bound, now his sins are declared openly, now that welspring is dried vp, that sun darkened, that heart is plucked out and throwne away, lest that any man should seeke succor thereat. The councel hath condemned that head, and that for this offence, because he took money for indulgences, bishopricks and other such like. But they condemned him by order of iudgment which were themselues the buyers and sellers of the same merchandise. There was present Iohn bishop of Lytomissia, who went twice about to buy the bishoptike of Prage, but others preuented him. O wicked men, why did they not first cast out the beame out of their own eyes? These men haue accursed and condemned the seller, but they themselues, which were the buyers and consenters to the bargaine, are without danger. What shall I say that they do vse in this manner of buying and selling at home in their owne countries? For at Constance there is one bishop that bought, and another which sold, and the pope for allowing of both their facts, took bribes of both sides. It came so to passe in Bohemia also as you know. I would that in that councell God had said, He that amongst you is without sin, let him giue the sentence against pope Iohn: Then surely they had gone all out of the councell house, one after another. Why did they bow the knee to him alwaies, before this his fall, kisse his feete, and call him the most holy father, seeing they saw apparantly before, that he was an heretike, that he was a man killer, that he was a wicked sinner, all which things now they haue found in him? Why did the cardinals chuse him to be P. knowing before that he had killed the holy father? Why suffered they him to meddle with holy things, in bearing the office of the popedome? for to this end they are his counsellers, that they should admonish him of that which is right. Are not they themselues as guiltie of these faults as he? seeing that they accounted these things vices in him, and were partakers of some of them themselues? why durst no man lay ought to his charge, before he had fled from Constance, but as soone as the secular power, by the sufferance of God laid hold vpon him, then, and neuer afore, they conspired al together that he should not liue any longer? Surely, euen at this day is the malice, the abomination and filthinesse of Antichrist reuealed in the pope and others of this councell.

Good bookes of good men haue been burned of old time.

Antichrist now first beginneth to be reuealed in the poye.

Now the faithfull seruants of God may vnderstand what our Sauiour Christ meant by this saying: When you shal see the abomination of desolation, which is spoken of by Daniel, &c. who so can vnderstand it, &c. Surely these be great abominations, pride, couetousnesse, simonie, sitting in a solitarie place, that is to say, in a dignitie void of goodnesse, of humilitie, and other vertues: as we do now clearely see in those that are constituted in any office and dignitie. O how acceptable a thing should it be (if time would suffer me) to disclose their wicked acts, which are now apparant, that the faithfull seruants of God might know them? I trust in God that he will send after me, those that shall be more valiant: and there are aliue at this day, that shall make more manifest the malice of Antichrist, and shall giue their liues to the death, for the truth of our Lord Iesus Christ: who shall giue both to you and me the ioyes of life euerlasting. This epistle was written vpon S. Iohn Baptists day in prison and in cold irons; I hauing this meditation with my selfe, that Iohn was beheaded in his prison and bonds, for the word of God.

A prophecie of Iohn Hus.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

IOhn Hus in hope the seruant of God, to all the faithfull at Boheme, which loue the Lord, wisheth to stand and die in the grace of God, and at last to attaine vnto eternall life.

Ye that bare rule ouer other and be rich, and ye also that be poore, welbeloued and faithfull in God, I beseech you, and admonish you all, that ye will be obedient vnto God, make much of his word, and gladly hearing the same, wil humblie performe that which yee heare. I beseech you sticke fast to the veritie of Gods word, which I haue written and preached vnto you out of his law, and the sermons of his Saints. Also I desire you if any man either in publike sermon or in priuate talke heard of me any thing, or haue read any thing written by mee which is against the veritie of God; that he do not follow the same. Albeit I do not find my conscience guiltie that I euer haue spoken or written any such thing amongst you.

I desire you moreouer if any man at any time haue noted any leuity either in my talke or in my conditions, that he do not follow the same: but pray to God for me, to pardon me that sin of lightnes. I pray you that ye will loue your priests and ministers, which be of honest behauiour, to prefer and honor them before others: namely such priests as trauel in the word of God. I pray you take heed to your selues and beware of malitious and deceitfull men, and especially of these wicked priests of whom our Sauiour doth speake, that they are vnder sheepes clothing, and inwardly are rauening wolues. I pray such as be rulers and superiours, to behaue themselues gently towards their poore inferiours, and to rule them iustly. I beseech the citizens that they will walke euery man in his degree, and vocation with an vpright conscience. The Artificers also I beseech, that they wil exercise their occupations diligently, and vse them with the feare of God. I beseech the seruants, that they wil serue their masters faithfully. And likewise the schoolemasters I beseech that they liuing honestly, will bring vp their scholars vertuously, and to teach them faithfullie. First to learne to feare God: then for the glorie of God and the publike vtilitie of the common wealth, and their owne health, and not for auarice or for worldly honor, to employ their minds to honest Arts. I beseech the Students of the Vniuersitie and all schooles, in all honest things to obey their masters, and to follow them, and that with all diligence, they will studie to be profitable both to the setting forth of the glorie of God, and to the soules health as wel of themselues as of other men. Together I beseech and pray you all, that you will yeeld most hartie thankes to the right honorable lords, the lord Wencelaus de Duba, lord Iohn de Clum, lord Henrie Lumlouio, lord Vilem Zagecio, lord Nicolas and other lords of Boheme, of Morauia and Polony: that their diligence towards me, may be gratefull to all good men: because that they like valiant champions of Gods truth, haue oftentimes set themselues against the whole councell for my deliuerance, contending and standing against the same to the vttermost of their power: but especially lord Wencelaus de Duba, and lord Iohn de Clum. Whatsoeuer they shall report vnto you, giue credit vnto them; for they were in the councell when I there answered many. They know who they were of Bohemia, and how many false and slanderous things they brought in against me, and that councell cried out against me, and how I also answered to all things whereof I was demanded. I beseech you also that yee will pray for the king of Romans, and for your king, and for his wife your queene, that God of his mercie would abide with them and with you, both now and henceforth in euerlasting life, Amen.

I note for all noble men to marke and to follow.

This Epistle I haue written to you out of prison and in bands, looking the next day after the writing hereof, for the sentence of the councell vpon my death; hauing a full trust that he will not leaue me, neither suffer me to denie his truth and to reuoke the errours, which false witnesses malitiously haue deuised against me. How mercifullie the Lord God hath dealt with me, and was with me in maruellous temptations, ye shall know when as hereafter by the helpe of Christ, we shall all meete together in the ioy of the world to come. As concerning M. Ierome my dearely beloued brother and fellow, I heare no other but that he is remaining in strait bands, looking for death as I do: and that for the faith which he valiantly maintained amongst the Bohemians, our cruell enemies of Boheme haue giuen vs into the power and hands of other enemies, and into bands. I beseech you pray to God for them.

Moreouer, I beseech you, namely you of Prage, that ye will loue the temple of Bethleem, and prouide so long as God shall permit, that the word of God may bee preached in the same. For, because of that place, the diuell is angrie and against the same place he hath stirred vp priests and canons, perceiuing that in that place his kingdome should be disturbed and diminished. I trust in God that he will keepe that holy church so long as it shall please him, and in the same shall giue greater encrease of his word by other, then he hath done by me a weake vessell. I beseech you also that ye will loue together, and withholding no man from the hearing of Gods word, ye will prouide and take care that good men be not oppressed by any force and violence. Written at Constance, the yeare of our Lord, 1415.

¶ Another right godly letter of Iohn Hus, to a certaine priest admonishing him of his office, and exhorting him to be faithfull: worthie to be read of all Ministers.

THe peace of our Lord Iesus Christ, &c. My deare brother be diligent in preaching the Gospell, and do the worke of a good Euangelist: neglect not your vocation; labour like a blessed souldier of Christ. First, liue godly and holily. Secondlie, teach faithfully and truly. Thirdly, be an example to other in wel doing, that you be not reprehended in your sayings: correct vice and set forth vertue. To euill liuers threaten eternall punishment; but to those that be faithfull and godly, set forth the comforts of eternall ioy. Preach continually, but be short and fruitful, prudently vnderstanding, and discreetly dispensing the holy Scriptures. Neuer affirme or maintaine those things that be vncertaine and doubtfull, lest that your aduersaries take hold vpon you, which reioyce in deprauing their brethren, whereby they may bring the Ministers of God into contempt. Exhort men to the confession of their faith, and to the communion of both kinds, both of the bodie and blood of Christ, whereby such as do repent earnestly of their sins, may the more often come to the holy communion. And I warne you that you enter into no tauernes with guests, and bee not a common company keeper. For the more a preacher keepeth him from the companie of men, the more he is regarded. Albeit, denie not yet your helpe and diligence, whersoeuer you may profit other. Against fleshly lust preach continually all that euer you can: For that is the raging beast, which deuoureth men, for whom the flesh of Christ did suffer. Wherefore my heartily beloued, I beseech you to flie fornication: for whereas a man would most profit and do good, there this vice vseth most to lurke. In any case flie the companie of yong women, and beleeue not their deuotion: For S. Austin saith, the more deuout she is, the more procliue to wantonnes, and vnder the pretence of religion, the snare and venome of fornication lurketh. And this know my welbeloued, that the conuersation with them, subuerteth manie, whom the conuersation of this world could neuer blemish nor beguile. Admit no women into your house, for what cause soeuer it be, and haue not much talke with them otherwise, for auoiding of offence. Finally, howsoeuer you do, feare God and keep his precepts: so shall you walke wisely, and shall not perish: so shall you subdue the flesh, contemne the world, and ouercome the diuell: so shall you put on God, find life, and confirme other, and shall crowne your selfe with the crowne of glorie, the which the iust Iudge shall giue you. Amen.

A worthy lesson for all ministers and prelats.

✻ This letter of Iohn Hus containeth a confession of the infirmitie of mans flesh: how weake it is, and repugnant against the spirit. Wherin he also exhorteth to perseuere constantly in the truth.

HEalth be to you from Iesus Christ, &c. My deare friend, know that Paletz came to me to perswade me that I should not feare the shame of abiuration, but to consider the good which thereof will come. To whom I said, that the shame of condemnation and burning is greater then to abiure: and why should I feare then that shame? But I pray you tell me plainly your mind; Presuppose ỹ such articles were laid to you, which you knew your selfe not to be true: what would you do in that case? would you abiure? Who answered: The case is sore, and began to weepe. Many other things he spake which I did reprehend. Michael de Causis was sometimes before in the prison with the deputies. And when I was with the deputies, thus I heard him speake vnto the keepers: We by the grace of God wil burne this heretike shortly: for whose cause I haue spent many Florences. But yet vnderstand that I write not this to the intent to reuenge mee of him, for that I haue committed to God, and pray to God for him with all my heart.

A prophecie of Iohn Hus.

Yet I exhort you againe, to be circumspect about our letters: For Michael hath taken such order that none shall be suffered to come into the prison: no nor yet the keepers wiues are permitted to come to me. O holy God, how largely doth Antichrist extend his power and cruelty? But I trust that his power shall be shortened, and his iniquitie shal be detected more and more amongst the faithfull people.

Almightie God shall confirme the hearts of his faithfull, whom he hath chosen before the constitution of the world, that they may receiue the eternall crowne of glory. And let Antichrist rage as much as he will, yet he shall not preuaile against Christ, which shal destroy him with the spirit of his mouth, as the Apostle saith: and then shall the creature be deliuered out of seruitude of corruption, into the libertie of the glorie of the sons of God, as saith the Apostle in the words following: We also within our selues do grone, waiting for the adoption of the sonnes of God, the redemption of our bodie.

I am greatly comforted in those words of our Sauiour: Happie be you when men shal hate you, and shal separate you, and shall rebuke you, and shall cast out your name as execrable, for the son of man. Reioyce and be glad, for behold, great is your reward in heauen, Luke 6. O worthie, yea O most worthie consolation, which not to vnderstand, but to practise in time of tribulation, is a hard lesson.

This rule Saint Iames with the other Apostles, did well vnderstand, which saith; Count it exceeding ioy my brethren, when ye shall fall into diuers tentations, knowing that the probation of your faith worketh patience: let patience haue her perfect worke. For certainly it is a great matter for a man to reioyce in trouble, and to take it for ioy to be in diuers temptations. A light matter it is to speak it and to expound it: but a great matter to fulfill it: For why? our most patient and most valiant champion himselfe, knowing that he should arise againe the third day, ouercomming his enemies by his death, and redeeming from damnation his elect after his last supper, was troubled in spirit and said, My soule is heauie vnto death. Of whom also the Gospell saith, that he began to feare, to be sad and heauie. Who being then in an agonie, was confirmed of the Angell, and his sweat was like the drops of blood falling vpon the ground. And yet he notwithstanding, being so troubled, said to his disciples; Let not your hearts be troubled, neither feare the crueltie of them that persecute you: for you shall haue mee with you alwaies, that you may ouercome the tyrannie of your persecutours. Whereupon those his souldiers, looking vpon the Prince and King of glorie, sustained great conflicts. They passed thorow fire and water, and were saued, and receiued the crowne of the Lord God, of the which Saint Iames in his canonicall epistle, saith; Blessed is the man that suffereth temptation, for when he shall be proued, he shall receiue the crowne of life, which God hath promised to them that loue him. Of this crowne I trust stedfastly the Lord will make me partaker also with you, which be the feruent sealers of the truth, and with all them which stedfastly and constantly doe loue the Lord Iesus Christ, which suffered for vs, leauing to vs example that wee should follow his steps. It behooued him to suffer, as he saith: and vs also it behooued to suffer, that the members may suffer together with the head. For he saith: If any man will come after me, let him denie himselfe and take vp his crosse and follow me.

The example of Christ.

The prayer of Iohn Hus to Christ.

O most mercifull Christ, draw vs weake creatures after thee, for except thou shouldest draw vs, we are not able to follow thee. Giue vs a strong spirit, that it may be readie, and although the flesh be feeble, yet let thy grace go before vs, go with vs, & follow vs: for without thee we can do nothing, and much lesse enter into the cruell death for thy sake. Giue vs that prompt and readie spirit, a bold heart, an vpright faith, a firme hope and perfect charitie, that we may giue our liues patientlie and ioyfully for thy names sake, Amen. Written in prison and in bonds in the Vigill of holy Saint Iohn the Baptist, who being in prison and in bonds for the rebuking of wickednes, was beheaded.

¶ Among diuers other letters of Iohn Hus, which hee wrote to the great consolation of others: I thought also heere to intermixe another certaine godly letter written out of England, by a faithfull scholar of Wickliffe, as appeareth, vnto Iohn Hus and the Bohemians, which for the zealous affection therein contained, seemeth not vnworthie to be read.

A letter to Iohn Hus, and to the Bohemians, from London.

A zealous letter to Iohn Hus from London.

GReeting, and whatsoeuer can be deuised more sweet, in the bowels of Christ Iesu. My dearely beloued in the Lord, whom I loue in the truth, and not I only, but also all they that haue the knowledge of the truth, which abideth in you, and shall be with you through the grace of God for euermore: I reioyced aboue measure, when our beloued brethren came and gaue testimonie vnto vs of your truth, and how you walked in the truth. I haue heard brethren, how sharpely Antichrist persecuteth you, in vexing the faithfull seruants of Christ with diuers and strange kinds of afflictions. And surely no maruell, if amongst you (since it is so almost all the world ouer) the law of Christ be too too grieuously impugned, and that red Dragon hauing so many heads (of whom it is spoken in the Apocalyps) haue now vomited out of his mouth that great floud, by which he goeth about to swallow vp the woman: but the most gratious God will deliuer for euer his only and most faithfull spouse. Let vs therefore comfort our selues in the Lord our God, and in his vnmeasurable goodnesse, hoping strongly in him which will not suffer those that loue him, to be vnmercifullie defrauded of any their purpose, if we according to our dutie, shal loue him with all our heart: for aduersitie should by no meanes preuaile ouer vs, if there were no iniquitie raigning in vs. Let therfore no tribulation or sorrow for Christs cause, discourage vs; knowing this for a suretie, that whomsoeuer the Lord vouchsafeth to receiue to be his children, those he scourgeth: for so the mercifull father will haue them tried in this miserable life by persecutions, that afterwards he may spare them. For the gold that this high artificer hath chosen, he purgeth and trieth in this fire, that he may afterwards lay it vp in his pure treasurie. For we see that the time which we shall abide heere, is short and transitorie: the life which we hope for after this, is blessed and euerlasting. Therefore whilest we haue time, let vs take paine, that we may enter into that rest. What other thing do we see in this brickle life, then sorow, heauines and sadnes, and that which is most grieuous of all to the faithfull, too much abusing and contempt of the law of the Lord? Let vs therefore endeuour our selues as much as we may, to lay hold of the things that are eternall and abiding, despising in our minds all transitorie and fraile things. Let vs consider the holy fellowship of our fathers that haue gone before vs. Let vs consider the Saints of the old and new Testament. Did they not passe through this sea of tribulation and persecution? were not some of them cut in pieces, other some stoned, and other of them killed with the sword? some others of them went about in pelts and goats skins, as the Apostle to the Hebrewes witnesseth. Surely they all walked strait waies, following the steps of Christ, which said, He that ministreth vnto me, let him follow me, whersoeuer I go, &c. Therefore let vs also, which haue so noble examples giuen vs of the Saints that went before vs, laying away as much as in vs lieth, the heauie burden and the yoke of sin which compasseth vs about, runne forward through patience, to the battell that is set before vs, fixing our eyes vpon the author of faith, and Iesus the finisher of the same: who seeing the ioy that was set before him, suffered the paines of the crosse, despising death. Let vs call vpon him, which suffered such reproch against himselfe of sinners, that we be not wearied, fainting in our hearts, but that we may heartily pray for helpe of the Lord, and may fight against his aduersarie Antichrist: that we may loue his law, and not be deceitfull laborers, but that we may deale faithfully in al things, according to that, that God hath vouchsafed to giue vs, and that we may labour diligently in the Lords cause vnder hope of an euerlasting reward. Behold therfore brother Hus, most dearly beloued in Christ, although in face vnknowne to me, yet not in faith and loue (for distance of places cannot separate those whom the loue of Christ doth effectually knit together) bee comforted in the grace which is giuen vnto thee, labour like a good souldier of Christ Iesus, preach, be instant in word and in example, and call as many as thou canst, to the way of truth: for the truth of the Gospell is not to be kept in silence, because of the friuolous censures and thunderbolts of Antichrist. And therfore to the vttermost of thy power strengthen thou and confirme the members of Christ, which are weakened by the diuel: and if the Lord will vouchsafe it, Antichrist shall shortly come to an end. And there is one thing wherein I do greatly reioyce, that in your realme and in other places, God hath stirred vp the hearts of some men that they can gladly suffer for the word of God, imprisonment, banishment and death.

Examples of the old martyrs.

Further, beloued, I know not what to write vnto you, but I confesse, that I could wish to powre out my whole heart, if thereby I might comfort you in the law of the Lord. Also I salute from the bottome of my heart, all the faithfull louers of the law of the Lord, and specially Iacobellus your coadiutor in the Gospell, requiring that he wil pray vnto the Lord for me in the vniuersall church of Iesus Christ. And the God of peace which hath raised from the dead the shepheard of the sheep, the mightie Lord Iesus Christ, make you apt in all goodnesse, to do his will, working in you that which may be pleasant in his sight. All your friends salute you which haue heard of your constancie. I would desire also to see your letters written backe to vs, for know ye that they shall greatly comfort vs.

Another letter of Iohn Hus to his friends of Boheme.

THe Lord God be with you. I loue the counsell of the Lord aboue gold and precious stone. Wherfore I trust in the mercie of Iesus Christ, that he will giue me his spirit to stand in his truth. Pray to the Lord, for the spirit is readie and the flesh is weake. The Lord almightie bee the eternall reward vnto my Lords, which constantlie, firmelie and faithfullie do stand for righteousnesse: to whom the Lord God shall giue in the kingdome of Boheme, to know the truth. For the following of which truth, necessarie it is that they returne againe into Boheme, setting apart all vaine-glorie, and following not a mortall and miserable king, but the king of glorie which giueth eternall life.

O how comfortable was the giuing of the hand of lord Iohn de Clum vnto me, which was not ashamed to reach forth his hand to me a wretch, and such an abiect heretike, lying in fetters of iron, and cried out vpon all men! Now peraduenture I shall not speake much hereafter with you: Therefore salute in time as you shall see them, all the faithfull of Boheme.

Wicked Palletz.

Palletz came to me into prison. His salutation in my vehement infirmitie, was this before the commissaries, that there hath not risen a more perillous heretike since Christ was borne, then was Wickliffe and I. Also he said, that all such as came to heare my talke, were infected with this heresie, to thinke that the substance of bread remained in the Sacrament of the altar. To whom I answered and said: O master, what a grieuous salutation haue you giuen me, and how greatly do you sinne? Behold I shall die, or peraduenture to morrow shall be burnt: And what reward shall be recompenced to you in Boheme for your labour?

This thing peraduenture I should not haue written, lest I might seeme to hate him. I haue alwaies had this in my heart, Trust not in princes, &c. And againe, Cursed be the man which trusteth in man, and maketh flesh to be his arme. For Gods sake be you circumspect how you stand and how you returne. Carry no letters with you. Direct your bookes not all by one, but diuerslie by diuers friends.

The visions of Iohn Hus by dreames.

Know this for certaine, that I haue had great conflicts by dreames, in such sort as I had much a do to refraine from crying out. For I dreamed of the popes escape before he went. And after the lord Iohn had told me thereof, immediatly in the night it was told me that the P. should returne to you againe. And afterward also I dreamed of the apprehending of master Ierome, although not in full maner as it was done. All the prisonmets, whither and how I am caried, were opened to me before, although not fully after the same forme and circumstance. Many serpents oftentimes appeared vnto me, hauing heads also in their taile: but none of them could bite me, and many other things more.

A prophecie of master Ierome of Prage.

These things I write, not esteeming my selfe as a Prophet, or that I extoll my selfe, but only to signifie vnto you what temptations I had in bodie and also in mind, and what great feare I had, lest I should transgresse the commandement of the Lord Iesus Christ. Now I remember with my selfe the words of master Ierome, which said, that if I should come to the councell, he thought I should neuer returne home againe. In like maner there was a good and godly man, a tailour, which taking his leaue of me at Prage, spake to me in these words: God be with you (said he) for I thinke verily, my deare and good master Iohn, that you shall not returne againe to vs with your life. The king, not of Hungarie, but of heauen, reward you with all goodnesse, for the faithfull doctrine which I at your hands haue receiued, &c.

¶ And shortly after the writing hereof, he sendeth also vnto them another prophetical vision of his to be expounded touching the reformation of the church, written in his 44. epistle: the contents whereof be these.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, sent to the Lord Iohn de Clum.

I Pray you expound to me the dreame of this night: I saw how that in my church of Bethleem, they came to race & put out all the images of Christ, and did put them out. The next day after I arose and saw many painters, which painted and made more fairer Images and many more then I had done before: which images I was very glad and ioyfull to behold. And the painters with much people about thē, said, Let the bishops and priests come now, and put vs out these pictures. Which being done, much people seemed to me in Bethleem to reioyce, and I with them. And I awaking therewith, felt my selfe to laugh, &c.

Prophetia.

¶ This vision lord Iohn de Clum, and Iohn Hus himselfe in his book of epistles in the 45. epistle seemeth to expound, and applieth these images of Christ vnto the preaching of Christ and of his life. The which preaching and doctrine of Christ, though the pope and his cardinals should extinguish in him, yet did he foresee and declare, that the time should come, wherein the same doctrine should be reuiued againe by others, so plentiously, that the pope with all his power, should not be able to preuaile against it. Thus much as concerning this vision of I. Hus. Whereunto doth well accord the prophecie of Ierome of Prage, printed in the coine called Moneta Hussi: of the which coine I haue my selfe one of the plates hauing this superscription following printed about it; Centum reuolutis annis Deo respondebitis & mihi. That is, After an hundred yeres come and gone, you shall giue a count to God and to me. Whereof (God willing) more shall be said hereafter.

Furthermore, in the 48. epistle the said Iohn Hus seeming to speake with the like spirit of prophetie, hath these words following: Sed spero, quod quæ dixi sub tecto, prædicabuntur super tecta: That is, but I trust that those things which I haue spoken within the house, hereafter shall be preached vpon the top of the house. Prophetia.

And because we are heere in hand with the prophecies of Iohn Hus, it shal serue well in place, heere moreouer to record his words in a certaine treatise by him written, De Sacerdotum & Monachorum carnalium Abominatione; wherein the said Iohn Hus speaking prophetically of the reformation of the church, hath these words following: Ex istis vlterius aduerte incidentaliter, quod Dei ecclesia nequit ad pristinam suam dignitatem reduci, &c. That is in English:

Moreouer, hereupon note and marke by the way, that the church of God, cannot be reduced to his former dignitie, or be reformed, before all things first be made new: The truth whereof is plaine by the temple of Salomon. Like as the clergy and priests, so also the people and laitie: Or else vnlesse all such as now be addict to auarice, from the least to the most, be first conuerted and reclaimed, as well the people as clergie and priests. Albeit as my mind now giueth me, I beleeue rather the first, that is, that then shall rise a new people, formed after the new man, which is created after God. Of the which people new clerkes and priests shall come, and be taken: which all shall hate couetousnesse, and glorie of this life, hasting to an heauenly conuersation. Notwithstanding all these things shall come to passe, and be brought by little and little in order of times, dispensed of God for the same purpose. And this God doth and will do for his owne goodnesse and mercie, and for the riches of his great longanimitie and patience, giuing time and space of repentance to them that haue long lien in their sins, to amend, and flie from the face of the Lords furie, while that in like maner the carnall people, and carnall priests successiuely and in time, shall fall away and be consumed as with the moth, &c. Prophetia.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

MAster Martin my deare brother in Christ, I exhort you in the Lord, that you feare God, keepe his commandements, and flee the companie of women, and beware of hearing their confession, lest by the hypocrisie of women, Satan deceiue you; trust not their deuotion. You know how I haue detested the auarice and the inordinate life of the clergie, wherefore through the grace of God I suffer now persecution, which shortly shall be consummate in me, neither do I feare to haue my hart powred out for the name of Christ Iesus; I desire you heartily be not greedie in seeking after benefices. And yet if you shall be called to any cure in the countrie, let the honor of God, the saluation of soules, and the trauell thereof moue you thereunto, and not the hauing of the liuing or the commodities thereof. And if you shall be placed in any such benefice, beware you haue no yong woman for your cooke or seruant, lest yeu edifie and increase more your house, then your soule. See that you be a builder of your spirituall house, being gentle to the poore, and humble of mind, and waste not your goods in great fare. I feare also if you do not amend your life, ceasing from your costly and superfluous apparel, lest you shal be grieuously chastised, as I also wretched man shall be punished, which haue vsed the like, being seduced by custome of euill men and worldly glorie, whereby I haue been wounded against God with the spirit of pride. And becausse you haue notably knowne both my preaching and outward conuersation euen from my youth, I haue no need to write many things vnto you, but to desire you for the mercie of Iesus Christ, that you do not follow me in any such leuitie and lightnes, which you haue seene in me. You knew how before my priesthood (which grieueth me now) I haue delighted to play oftentimes at chesse, and haue neglected my time, and thereby haue vnhappily prouoked both my selfe and other to anger many times by that play. Wherfore, besides other my innumerable faults, for this also I desire you to inuocate the mercie of the Lord, that he wil pardon me, and so direct my life, that hauing ouercome the wickednes of this present life, the flesh, the world and the diuell, I may find place in the heauenly countrie, at the least in the day of iudgement. Fare ye well in Christ Iesus, with all them which keepe his law. My gray coate, if you will, keepe to your selfe for my remembrance, but I thinke you are ashamed to weare that gray colour: therefore you may giue it to whom you shall think good. My white coat you shal giue the Minister N. my scholar. To George or else to Zuzikon 60. groats, or else my gray coat: for he hath faithfully serued me.

The consolation of master Ierome to master Hus.

MY master, in those things which you haue both written hitherto, and also preached after the law of God against the pride, auarice, and other inordinate vices of the priests, go forward, bee constant and strong. And if I shall know that you are oppressed in the cause, and if need shall so require, of of mine owne accord, I will follow after to helpe you, as much as I can.

By the life, acts and letters of John Hus hitherto rehearsed, it is euident and plaine, that he was condemned not for anie error of doctrine, which they could well proue in him, who neither denied their popish transubstantiation, neither spake against the authoritie of the church of Rome, if it were well gouerned, nor yet the seuen Sacraments, and also said masse himselfe, and almost in all their popish opinions was a papist with them: but only of euill will was accused of his malicious aduersaries, because he spake against the pompe, pride and auarice, and other wicked enormities of the pope, cardinals and prelats of the church, and because he could not abide the high dignities and liuings of the church, and thought the doings of the pope to be Antichristi like. For this cause he procured so manie enemies and false witnesses against him. Who straining and picking matter out of his bookes and writings, hauing no one iust article of doctrine to lay vnto him, yet they made him an heretike, whether he would or no, and brought him to his condemnation. This can hatred and malice do, where the charitie of Christ hath no place. Which being so, as thy charitie (good Reader) may easily vnderstand, in perusing the whole course of his storie: I beseech thee then, what cause had John Cochleus to write his twelue bookes against John Hus and Hussites? In which bookes how bitterly and intemperatly he misuseth his pen, by these few words in his second booke thou maiest take a little taste: which words I thought here briefly to place in English, to the end that all English men may iudge thereby, with what spirit and truth these catholikes be caried. His words be these; Lib. 2. Hist. Dico igitur Ioan. Hus neque sanctum neque beatum habendum esse, sed impium potius, &c. That is, I say therefore John Hus is neither to be counted holie nor blessed, but rather wicked and eternally wretched; in so much that in the day of iudgement, it shall be more easie, not only with the infidel Pagans, Turks, Tartarians and Iews, but also with the most sinfull Sodomites, and the abominable Persians, which most filthily do lie with their daughters, sisters or mothers, yea and also with most impious Cain, killer of his owne brother, with Thiestes, killer of his owne mother, and the Lestrygones and other Anthropophagi, which deuoure mans flesh; yea more easie with those infamous murderers of infants, Pharao and Herod, then with him, &c. These be the words of Cochleus. Whose railing bookes although they deserue neither to be read, nor answered, yet if it please God, it were to be wished that the Lord would stir vp some towardlie yong man, that hath so much leasure to defend the simplicitie of this John Hus, which cannot now answere for himselfe. In the meane time, something to satisfie or stay the readers mind against this immoderate hyperbole of Cochleus, in like few words I will bring out John Hus to speake and to cleare himselfe against this slander: whose words in his booke De sacerdotum & monachorum abominatione desolationis, pag. 84. &c. I beseech the reader to note. Nam & ista scribens fateor, quod nihil aliud me in illis perurget, nisi dilectio Dom. nostri Iesu crucifixi, &c. That is, For in writing these things, I confesse nothing else to haue moued me hereunto, but only the loue of our Lord Iesus crucified, whose prints and stripes (according to the measure of my weaknesse and vilenesse) I couet to beare in my selfe, beseeching him so to giue me grace, that I neuer seeke to glorie in my selfe or in any thing else, but only in his crosse, & in the inestimable ignominie of his passion which he suffered for me. And therefore I write and speake these things, which I do not doubt will like all such as vnfainedly do loue the Lord Christ crucified: and contrarie will mislike not a little all such as be of Antichrist. Also againe, I confesse before the most merciful Lord Iesus Christ crucified, that these things which I do now write, and those that I haue written before, neither I could haue written, nor knew how, nor durst so haue written, vnlesse he by his inward vnction had so commanded me. Neither yet do I write these things as of authoritie, to get me fame and name: For as Saint Augustine and Ierome do say, that is only to be giuen to the Scriptures and writings of the Apostles, Euangelists and Prophets, and to the canonicall Scriptures, which do abound in the fulnesse of the Spirit of Iesus. And whatsoeuer is there said, is full of veritie and wholesome vtilitie, &c. And heere place also would require something to say to Aeneas Siluius, to Antoninus, and to Laziardus, which falsly impute articles to him, which he neuer maintained. But because time suffereth not, I will proceed to the storie of master Ierome of Prage.

John Hus condemned for no erroneous doctrine wherein he was culpable.

Cochleus raileth against John Hus without cause.

Ex Cochle. lib. 2. hist. Hussitarum, pag. 88.

❧ The tragicall and lamentable historie of the famous learned man and godly martyr of Christ, master Ierome of Prage, burned at Constance for like cause and quarrell, as master John Hus was, 1416.

The storie of Ierome of Prage.

These things hitherto being discoursed touching the life, acts and constant martyrdome of master John Hus, with part also of his letters adioyned to the same, whose death was on the 6 of Julie, an. 1416. now remaineth consequently to describe the like tragedie and cruell handling of his christian companion and fellow in bands master Ierome of Prage. Who grieuously sorrowing the slanderous reproch and diffamation of his countrie of Boheme, and also hearing tel of the manifest iniuries done vnto that man of worthie memorie master John Hus: freely and of his owne accord came vnto Constance the fourth day of Aprill, an. 1415. Who there perceiuing that John Hus was denied to be heard, and that watch and waite was laid for him on euery side, he departed to Iberling a citie of the empire, vntill the next day; the which citie was a mile off from Constance, and from thence he wrote his letters by me vnto Sigismund king of Hungarie and his barons, and also vnto the councell, most earnestly requiring that the king and the councell would giue him a safe-conduct freely to come and go, and that he would then come in open audience to answere vnto euery man, if there were any of the councell that would lay any crime vnto him, as by the tenor of his intimation, shall more at large appeare.

Ierome commeth to Constance.

The safe-conduct was required but in vaine of the emperor.

When as the said king of Hungarie was required thereunto, as is aforesaid, being in the house of the lord cardinall of Cambray, he denied to giue master Ierome any safe-conduct, excusing himselfe for the euill speed he had with the safe-conduct of John Hus before, and alleaging also certaine other causes. The deputies also of the foure nations of the councell being moued thereunto by the lords of the kingdome of Boheme, answered: we (say they) will giue him a safe-conduct to come, but not to depart. Whose answeres, when they were reported vnto master Ierome, he the next day after wrote certaine intimations according to the tenor heere vnder written, which he sent vnto Constance to be set vpon the gates of the citie, and vpon the gates of the churches and monasteries, and of the houses of the cardinals, and other nobles and prelats. The tenour whereof heere followeth word for word in this maner.

The intimations of Ierome of Prage, set vp in diuers places of the towne of Constance.

Vnto the most noble prince and lord, the lord Sigismund, by the grace of God king of the Romans, alwaies Augustus, and of Hungarie, &c. I Ierome of Prage master of Art of the generall Vniuersities of Paris, Collen, Heidelberg and Prage, by these my present letters do notifie vnto the king together with the whole reuerend councell, and as much as in me lieth, do all men to vnderstand and know, that because of the craftie slanderers, backbiters and accusers, I am readie freely and of mine owne will, to come vnto Constance, there to declare openly before the councell the puritie and sinceritie of my true faith and mine innocencie, and not secretly in corners before any priuate or particular person. Wherefore if there be anie of my slanderers, of what nation or estate soeuer they be; which will obiect against me any crime of error or heresie: let them come forth openly before me in the presence of the whole councell, and in their owne names obiect against me, and I will be readie, as I haue written, to answere openly and publikely before the whole councel, of mine innocencie, and to declare the puritie and sinceritie of my true faith. And if so be that I shall be found culpable in error or heresie, then I will not refuse openly to suffer such punishment as shall be méete and worthie for an erroneous person, or an heretike.

Wherefore I most humblie beseech my lord the king and the whole sacred councell, that I may haue to this end and purpose aforesaid, safe and sure accesse. And if it happen that I offering such equitie and right as I do, before anie fault be proued against me, be arrested, imprisoned, or haue anie violence done vnto me; that then it may be manifest vnto the whole world, that this generall councell doth not proceed according to equitie and iustice, if they would by any meanes put me backe from this profound and strait iustice, being come hither freely of mine owne mind and accord. The which thing I suppose to be farre from so sacred and holy councell of wise men.

When as yet he through such intimations copied out in the Bohemian, Latine, and Germaine tongue, being set vp as is aforesaid, could not get any safe-conduct, then the nobles, lords, and knights spirituall of the Bohemian nation present in Constance, gaue vnto master Ierome their letters patents, confirmed with their seales for a testimonie and witnesse of the premisses. With the which letters the said master Ierome returned againe vnto Boheme; but by the treason and conspiracie of his enemies was taken in Hirlaw by the officers of duke John, and in Zultzbach was brought backe againe to the presence of the duke. In the meane time such as were the setters forward of the councell against master John Hus, and master Ierome, that is to say, Michael de Causis and master Palletz and other their accomplices, required that the said master Ierome should be cited by reason of his intimations, and certaine daies after the citation heere vnder written, was set vpon the gates and porches of the citie, and churches, which followeth heere in this maner:

Safe-conduct denied to Ierome.

Ierome returneth toward Boheme, with the testimonies of the lords of Boheme.

Ierome apprehended in the way by duke John.

Michael de Causis, and Palletz enemies to Ierome.

¶ This most sacred and holy Synode and generall councell of Constance, faithfully congregated & gathered together in the holy Ghost, representing the vniuersall militant church, vnto Ierome of Prage, which writeth himselfe to be a master of Art of so manie Vniuersities, and pretendeth these things which are only pertaining vnto sobrietie and modestie, and that he knoweth no more then he ought, &c. Know thou that there is a certaine writing come vnto our vnderstanding and knowledge, the which was set vp as it were by thine owne person vpon the gates of the churches and city of Constance, vpon the Sunday, when there was sung in the church of God; Quasi modo geniti. Wherein thou doest affirme, that thou wilt openlie answere vnto thy accusers and slanderers which shall obiect anie crime, error or heresie against thee, whereof thou art mervellously infamed and accused before vs, and specially touching the doctrine of Wickliffe, and other doctrines contrarie vnto the catholike faith, so that thou mightest haue granted vnto thee a safe conduct to come. But for so much as it is our part principally and chiefly to foresee and loke vnto these craftie Fores which go about to destroy the vineyard of the Lord of hosts, therefore we do cite and call forth by the tenor of these presents, thy person manifoldly defamed and suspected for the temerarious affirming and teaching of manifold errors; so that within the terme of fiftéene daies to be accounted from the date of these presents, whereof fiue daies are appointed for the first terme, fiue for the second, and other fiue for the third, we doe ordaine and appoint by canonicall admonition and warning, that thou do appeare in the publike Session of the sacred councell, if there be any holden the same day, or else the first day immediately following, when as any session shal be, according to the tenor of thy said writing, to answere to those things, which any person or persons shall obiect or lay against thee in any cause of thy faith, and to receiue and haue, as iustice shall require. Whereupon, so much as in vs lieth, and as catholike faith shall require, we offer and assigne to thee by the tenour hereof, our safe-conduct from all violence (iustice alwaies being saued) certifying thee, that whether thou dost appeare or not, the said terme or time appointed notwithstanding, processe shall go forward against thee by the said sacred councell, or by their commissarie or commissaries, for the time aforesaid not obserued and kept, thy contumacie or stubburnesse in any thing notwithstanding. Giuen in the sixth Session of the generall Councell, the seuentéenth day of Aprill, vnder the seale of the presidents of the foure nations.

¶ Grumpert Faber Notarie of the Germaines.

This Duke John in histories is commonly called the son of Clement.

After that Sigismund king of Hungarie with the rest of the councell, vnderstood by the foresaid duke John that master Jerome was taken, they were earnestly in hand, requiring that master Jerome should be brought before them vnto the councell. The which duke John, after he had receiued letters of the king and the councell, brought master Jerome bound vnto Constance, whom his brother duke Ludouicus led thorow the citie to the cloister of the friers Minors in Constance, where as the chiefe priests and elders of the people, Scribes and Pharisies, were gathered together, attending and waiting for his comming. Hée the said master Jerome caried a great handbolt of iron with a long chaine in his hand, and as hee passed the chaine made a great rattling and noise, and for the more confusion and despite towards him, they led him by the same chaine after Duke Ludouicus aforesaid, holding and stretching out the chaine a great way from him: with the which chaine they also kept him bound in the Cloister. When he was brought into the Cloister, they read before him the letter of Duke John, which was sent with the said master Jerome vnto the Councell, containing in effect, how that the said duke John had sent master Jerome vnto the councell, who by chance was fallen into his hands, because he heard an euill report of him, that he was suspected of the heresies of Wicklise; that the councell might take order for him, whose part it was to correct and punish such as did erre and stray from the truth, besides manie other flattering tales which were written in the said letter for the praise of the councell. After this they read the citation which was giuen out by the councell against master Jerome, whereof we haue spoken before. Then certaine of the bishops said vnto him; Jerome, why diddest thou flie and runne away, and diddest not appeare when thou wast cited? He answered, because I could not haue any safe-conduct, neither from you, neither from the king, as it appeareth by these letters patents of the barons, which you haue, neither by mine open intimations could I obtaine any safe-conduct.

Jerome is brought bound vnto Constance by duke John.

The councell neither would giue him libertie safely to come, nor freely to go.

Wherefore I perceiuing many of my grieuous and heauie friends to be heere present in the councell, would not my selfe be the occasion of my perils and dangers; but if I had knowne or had any vnderstanding of this citation, without all doubt, albeit I had béen in Boheme, I would haue returned againe. Then all the whole rabble rising vp, alleaged diuers and sundrie accusations and testimonies against him with a great noise and tumult. When the rest held their peace, then spake master Gerson the Chancellor of Paris: Jerome when thou wast at Paris, thou thoughtest thy selfe by meanes of thy eloquence to be an Angell, and diddest trouble the whole Vniuersitie, alleaging openly in the schooles many erroneous conclusions with their correlaria, and especially in the question de vniuersalibus & de Idæis, with many other verie offensiue questions. Vnto whom master Jerome answered: I answere to you master Gerson: Those matters which I did put forth there in the schooles at Paris, in the which also I answered to the arguments of the maisters, I did put them forth philosophically and as a Philosopher, and master of the Vniuersitie: and if I haue put forth any questions which I ought not to haue put forth, teach me that they be erroneous, and I will most humblie be informed, and amend the same.

Master Jerome is accused by master Gerson, with commendation of his eloquence.

Gerson rennieth old matters.

Whiles he was yet speaking, another (as I suppose, the Master of the Vniuersity of Collen vpon the riuer of Rheine) rising vp said: When thou wast also at Collen in thy position which thou diddest there determine, thou diddest propound many erroneous matters. Then said master Jerome vnto him, shew me first one errour which I propounded. Wherewithal he being in a manner astonished, said, I do not remember them now at the first, but hereafter they shall be obiected against you.

The master of the Vniuersitie of Collen. This man would accuse, but he lacked matter.

And by and by the third man rising vp, said: when that you were also at Heidelberg, you propounded many erroneous matters as touching the Trinitie, and there painted out a certaine shield or scutchine, comparing the Trinitie of persons in diuinitie vnto water, snow and ice, and such like. Vnto whom master Jerome answered: Those things that I wrote or painted there, the same will I also speake, write and paint heere; and teach me that they be erroneous, and I will most humblie reuoke and recant the same.

The master of the Vniuersitie of Heidelberg.

Then certaine cried out, let him be burned. Let him be burned. Vnto whom he answered: If my death do delight or please you, in the name of God let it be so.

Crucifige, crucifige eum.

Then said the archbishop of Salisburg; not so master Jerome, for so much as it is written: I will not the death of a sinner, but rather that he conuert and liue. When these and many other tumults and cries were passed, whereby they did then most disorderly and outragiously witnesse against him, they deliuered the said master Jerome being bound, vnto the officers of the citie of Constance, to be carried to prison for that night: and so euerie one of them returned to their lodgings.

Jerome is comforted by the Notarie.

In the meane time, one of the friends of master John Hus, loking out at a window of the Cloister, said vnto him, master Jerome; Then said he, you are welcome my deare brother. Then said Peter vnto him: Be constant and feare not to suffer death for the truth sake, of the which when you were in times past at libertie, you did preach so much godnesse. Vnto whom Jerome answered, truly brother I do not feare death, and for so much as we know that we haue spoken much thereof in times past; let vs now sée what may be knowne or done in effect. By and by his keepers comming to the window, threatning him with strokes, did put away the said Peter from the window of the Cloister.

Et tu de illis es. Luc. 22.

Then came there one Vitus vnto master Jerome and said, master how do you? Vnto whom he answered; truely brother, I do very well. Then his keepers comming about him, laid hold of the said Vitus, saying, this is also one of the number, and kept him. When it drew towards euening, the archbishop of Rigen, sent certaine of his seruants which led away master Jerome, being strongly bound with chaines, both by the hands and by the necke, and kept him so for certaine houres. When night drew on, they caried him vnto a certaine tower of the citie in Saint Pauls churchyard, where as they tying him fast vnto a great blocke, and his fét in the stockes: his hands also being made fast vpon them, they left him: whereas the blocke was so high, that he could by no meanes sit thereupon, but that his head must hang downeward. They caried also the said Vitus vnto the archbishop of Rigen, who demanded of him, why he durst be so bold to talke with such a man being a reprobate of all men, and an heretike: and when as he could find no cause of imprisonment in him, and that he said he was master John de Clums friend (taking an oth and promise of him that he should not go about to endamage the councell, by reason of that imprisonment and captiuitie) so dismissed him and sent him away.

Master Jerome, vnknowne vnto vs whither he was caried, lay in the said tower two daies and two nights, relieued only with bread and water. Then one of his keepers comming vnto master Peter, declared vnto him how that master Jerome lay hard by in bonds and chaines, and how he was fed. Then master Peter desired that he might haue leaue giuen him to giue him meat, because he would procure the same vnto him. The keeper of the prison granting his request, caried meat vnto him. Within eleuen daies after, so hanging by the héeles; he vsed so small repast, that he fell sore sick euen vnto the death. Whenas he liuing then in that captiuitie and prison, desired to haue a Confessor, they of the councell denied that he should haue any, vntill such time as by great importunitie he obtained to haue one: his friends being then there present in the same prison and tower, wherein he then lay by the space of one yéere lacking but seuen daies.

Jerome hanging in the stocks was fed with bread and water.

Master Jerome was kept in irons in prison the space of one yeere.

After they had put John Hus to death, then about the feast of the nattuitie of Marie the virgin, they brought forth master Jerome, whom they had kept so long in chaines, vnto the church of Saint Paul: and threatning him with death, being instant vpon him, they forced him to abiure and recant, and consent vnto vnto the death of maister Iohn Hus, that he was iustly and truly condemned and put to death by them. He, what for feare of death, and hoping thereby to escape out of their hands, according to their will and pleasure, and according to the tenour which was exhibited vnto him, did make abiuration, and that in the cathedrall Church and open Session, the draught whereof penned to him by the papists, here ensueth.

¶ The abiuration of maister Hierome of Prage.

The forced abiuration of Hierome.

I Hierome of Prage, maister of Art, acknowledging the catholike Church, and the apostolike faith, do accurse and renounce all heresies, and specially that, wherof I haue hitherto been infamed, and that which in times past Iohn Hus and Iohn Wickliffe haue holden and taught in their works, treatises and sermons, made vnto the people and clergie: for the which cause the said Wickliffe and Hus, together with the said doctrines and errors, are condemned by this Synode of Constance as heretikes, and all the said doctrine sententially condemned, and especiallie in certaine articles expressed in the sentences and iudgements giuen against them by this sacred Councell.

Also I doe accord and agree vnto the holie Church of Rome, the Apostolicke seat in this sacred Councell, and with my mouth and heart doe professe in all things, and touching all things, and specially as touching the keies, sacraments, orders and offices, and Ecclesiasticall censures, of pardons, reliques of Saints, Ecclesiasticall libertie, also ceremonies, and all other things pertaining vnto Christian religion, as the Church of Rome, the Apostolicke see, and this sacred Councell doe professe: and specially that many of the said articles are notoriously hereticall, and lately reprooued by the holie fathers, some of them blasphemous, other some erroneous: some offensiue vnto godly eares, and many of them temerarious and seditious. And such also were counted the articles lately condemned by the sacred Councell, and it was inhibited and forbidden to all and singuler Catholicke men hereafter to preach, teach, or presume to hold or maintaine any of the said articles, vnder paine of being accursed.

And I the said Hierome, forsomuch as I haue laboured by Scholasticall arts, to perswade the opinion, De Vniuersalibus realibus, and that one substance of the common kind should signifie many things subiect vnder the same, and euery one of them, as S. Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine doe affirme, and likewise others. For the teaching hereof by a plaine example I described as it were a certaine triangle, forme or figure, the which I called the shield of faith.

Therefore vtterly to exclude and take away the erroneous and wicked vnderstanding thereof, the which peraduenture some men may gather thereby, I doe say, affirme, and declare, that I neuer made the said figure, neither named it the shield of faith to that intent or purpose, that I would extoll or preferre the opinion of vniuersalities aboue or before the contrary opinion, in such sort, as though that were the shield of faith, and that without the affirmation thereof, the catholike faith could not be defended or maintained, when as I my selfe would not obstinatelie sticke thereunto. But this I said, because I had put example in the description of the triangle or forme, that one diuine essence consisted in three subiects or persons in themselues distinct, that is to say, the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost. The article of the which Trinitie, is the chiefe shield of faith, and foundation of the catholicke truth.

Furthermore, that it may be euident vnto all men what the causes were for the which I was reputed and thought to sticke to, and fauour sometime Iohn Hus: I signifie vnto all men by these presents, that when as I heard him oftentimes both in his sermons, and also in the Schooles, I beleeued that he was a very good man, neither that he did in any point gainesay the traditions of our holy mother the Church, or holy doctors: insomuch as when I was latelie in this Citie, and the articles which I affirmed were shewed vnto mee, which were also condemned by the sacred Councell, at the first sight of them I did not beleeue that they were his, at the least not in that forme. But when as I had further vnderstood by certaine famous doctors and maisters of diuinitie, that they were his articles, required for my further information and satisfaction, to haue the bookes of his owne handwritting shewed vnto me, wherein it was said, those articles were contained. The which bookes, when they were shewed vnto mee written with his owne hand, which I did know as well as mine owne, I found all, and euery one of those articles therein written in like forme as they are condemned. Wherefore I doe worthilie iudge and thinke him and his doctrine with his adherents, to be condemned and reprooued by this sacred Councell, as hereticall and without reason. All which the premisses with a pure minde and conscience, I do here pronounce and speake, being now fullie and sufficientlie informed of the foresaid sentences and iudgements giuen by the sacred Councell against the doctrines of the said Iohn Wickliffe and Iohn Hus, and against their owne persons:

Hierome is made here to say not his own mind, but what pleased them.

vnto the which iudgement, as a deuout catholike in all things, I doe must humblie consent and agree.

Also I the foresaid Hierome, which before the reuerend fathers, the lords, cardinals, and reuerend lords, prelates and doctors, and other worshipfull persons of this sacred Councell in this same place, did heretofore freely and willingly declare and expound mine intent and purpose, amongst other things speaking of the Church, did diuide the same into three parts. And as I did perceiue afterward, it was vnderstood by some that I would affirme, that in the triumphant Church, there was faith. Whereas I doe firmelie beleeue that there is the blessed sight and beholding of God, excluding all darke vnderstanding and knowledge. And now also I do say, affirme and declare, that it was neuer my intent and purpose, to proue that there should be faith, speaking of faith, as faith is commonly defined, but knowledge farre exceeding faith. And generallie whatsoeuer I said, either there, or at any time before, I doe referre, and most humblie submit my selfe vnto the determination of this sacred Councell of Constance.

Moreouer, I doe sweare both by the holy Trinitie, and also by the most holy Gospell, that I will for euermore remaine and perseuere without all doubt, in the truth of the Catholike Church. And all such as by their doctrine and teaching, shall impugne this faith, I iudge them worthie together with their doctrines of eternall curse. And if I my selfe at any time (which God forbid I should) doe presume to preach or teach contrarie thereunto, I will submit my selfe vnto the seueritie of the Canons, and bee bound vnto eternall paine and punishment. Whereupon I doe deliuer by this my confession and tenor of my profession willingly before this sacred generall Councell, and haue subscribed and written all these things with mine owne hand.

Hierome after his abiuration returned into prison.

After all this, they caused him to bee caried againe vnto the same prison, but not so straitly chained and bound as he was before: notwithstanding kept euery day with souldiers and armed men. And when as afterward, his enemies which were appointed against him, as Michael de Caulis, and wicked Pallets, with other their companions in these affaires, vnderstood and knew by the words and talke of maister Hierome and by other certaine tokens, that hee made the same abiuration and recantation, not of a sincere and pure mind, but only to the intent thereby to scape their hands, they together with certaine friers of Prage, of the order of Carmelites, then comming in, put vp new accusations against the said maister Hierome, and drew the same into articles, being very instant and earnest that he should answer thereunto. And forsomuch as his iudges, and certaine cardinals, as the cardinall of Cambray, the cardinall de Vrsinis, the cardinall of Aquilegia, and of Florence, considering the malice of the enemies of maister Hierome, did see the great iniurie that was done vnto him, they laboured before the whole Councell for his deliuerie.

Hierome accused anew by Caulis, Pallets, and the Carmelites.

The cardinall of Cambray with certaine other cardinals labour for the deliuery of Hierome.

It happened vpon a certaine day, as they were labouring in the Councell for the deliuerie of the said maister Hierome, that the Germaines and Bohemians his enemies, with all force and power resisted against it, crying out, that hee should in no case bee dismissed. Then start vp one called doctor Palo, which said vnto the cardinals; we maruell much of you most reuerend fathers, that your reuerences wil make intercession for such a wicked hereticke, for whose sake we in Boheme with the whole clergy, haue suffered much trouble and mischiefe, and peraduenture your fatherhods shall suffer: and I greatly feare, lest that you haue receiued some rewards, either of the king of Boheme, or of these heretikes. When as the Cardinals were thus rebuked, they discharged themselues of maister Hierons cause and matter.

Si dimittis hunc, non es amicus Cæsaris.

The patriarch of Constantinople gaue sentence of death both against M. Hus, and M. Hierome of Prage.

Then his enemies aforesaid, obtained to haue other iudges appointed, as the Patriarch of Constantinople, and a Germaine doctor, forsomuch as they did know that the patriarch was a grieuous enemie vnto maister Hierome, because he being before appointed iudge by the Councell, had condemned Iohn Hus vnto death.

But M. Hierome would not answer them in prison, requiring to haue open audience, because he would there finally declare vnto them his mind, neither would hee by any meanes consent vnto those priuat iudges. Whereupon the presidents of the Councell thinking that the said M. Jerome would renue his recantation, before the said audience, and confirme the same, did grant him open audience.

In the yere of our Lord 1416. the 25. day of May, which was the Saturday before the Ascension of our Lord, the said maister Jerome was brought vnto open audience before the whole councell, to the great cathedrall Church of Constance, where as by the commissioners of the Councell, in the behalfe of his foresaid enemies, there was laid against him of a new a hundred and seuen articles, to the intent that hee should not scape the snare of death, which they prouided and laid for him: in so much as the iudges had before declared that by the saying of the witnesses it was alreadie concluded in the same audience. The day aforesaid, from morning, vntill none, he answered vnto more then 40. articles, most subtilly obiected against him: denying that he held or maintained any such articles cles as were either hurtfull or false, affirming that those witnesses had deposed them against him falsly and slanderously, as his most cruell and mortall enemies. In the same Session they had not yet proceeded vnto death, because that the nowne time drew so fast on, that hee could not answer vnto the articles. Wherfore for lack of time sufficient to answer vnto the residue of the articles, there was another time appointed, which was the third day after the foresaid Saturday, before the Ascension of our Lord, at which time againe earely in the morning, hee was brought vnto the said Cathedrall Church to answer vnto all the residue of the articles.

The dexteritie of Hierome in confuting his aduersaries.

In all which articles, as well those which he had answered vnto the Saturday before, as in the residue, he cleared himself very learnedly, refelling his aduersaries (who had no cause, but onely of malice and displeasure were set against him, and did him great wrong) in such sort, that they were themselues astonied at his oration, and refutation of their testimonies brought against him, and with shame enough were put to silence: As when one of them had demanded of him, what hee thought by the Sacrament of the altar, he answered; Before consecration (said he) it is bread and wine: after the consecration it is the true bodie and blood of Christ; adding withall moe words according to their catholike faith. Then another rising vp; Hierome, said he, there goeth a great rumor of thee, that thou shouldest hold, bread to remaine vpon the altar. To whom hee pleasantlie answered, saying: that hee beleeued bread to bee at the bakers. At which words being spoken, one of the Dominicke friers sumthing tooke on, and said; What? doest thou denie that no man doubteth of? Whose peeuish saulinesse, Hierome with these words did well represse: Hold thy peace (said he) thou monke, thou hypocrite: and thus the monke being nipped in the head, sat downe dumbe. After whom, started vp another, who with a loud voice cried out: I sweare (said he) by my conscience, that to bee true, that thou doest denie. To whom said Hierome againe, speaking in Latine: Heus, inquit, sic iurare per conscientiam tutissima fallendi via est: That is, thus to sweare by your conscience, is the next way to deceiue. Another there was, a spitefull and a bitter enemie of his, whom he called by no other name then dogge, or asse. After he had thus refuted them one after another, that they could find no crime against him, neither in this matter nor in any other, they were all driuen to keepe silence.

False witnesses.

This done, then were the witnesses called for, who comming in presence, gaue testimonie vnto the articles before produced. By reason whereof, the innocent cause of Hierome was oppressed, and began in the councell to be concluded. Then Hierome rising vp, began to speake: Forsomuch (saith he) as you haue heard mine aduersaries so diligently hitherto, conuenient it is, that you should also now heare me to speake for my selfe.

Audience hardly giuen to Hierome to speake for himselfe.

Whereupon with much difficultie, at last audience was giuen in the Councell for him to say his mind. Which being granted, he from morning to nowne continuing, intreated of diuers and sundrie matters, with great learning and eloquence. Who first beginning with his prayer to God, besought him to giue him spirit, abilitie, and vtterance, which might most tend to the profit and saluation of his owne soule. And so entring into his Oration:

The oration of Hierome had before the Councell.

demned. Moreouer, how Stephen was slaine by the Colledge of the priests, and how all the Apostles were condemned to death, not as good men, but as seditious stirrers vp of the people, and contemners of the Gods, and euill doers. It is vniust, saith he, vniustlie to bee condemned one priest of an other, and yet he proued that the same hath so happened most vniustly in that Councell of priests. These things did hee discourse at large, with maruellous eloquence, and with singular admiration of all that heard him.

The false witnesses of Jerom refelled.

And forasmuch as all the whole summe of the cause did rest onely in the witnesses, by many reasons he proued that no credit was to be giuen vnto them, especially seeing they spake all things of no truth, but onely of hatred, malice, and enuie. And so prosecuting the matter, so liuely and expresselie hee opened vnto them the causes of their hatred, that he had almost perswaded them. So liuely and likelie their hatred was detected, that almost no trust was giuen to their testimonies, saue onely for the cause and quarrell wherein they stood touching the popes doctrine. All mens minds here were moued and bending to mercie towards him: For he told them how that hee of his owne accord came vp to the Councell, and to purge himselfe he did open vnto them all his life and doings, being full of vertue and godlinesse. This was (saith he) the old manner of ancient and learned men and most holy Elders, that in matters of faith they did differ many times in arguments, not to destroy the faith, but to find out the veritie. So did Augustine and Jerome dissent, not only being diuers, but also contrarie one from the other, and yet without all suspition of heresie.

All this while the popes holie Councell did watt still, when he would begin to excuse himselfe, and to retract those things which were obiected against him, and to craue pardon of the Councell. But he persisting still in his constant oration, did acknowledge no errour, nor gaue any signification of retractation.

Hierome commendeth the life, and bewaileth the death of John Hus.

At last, entring into the praise and commendation of master John Hus, he affirmed that he was a good, iust, and holie man, and much vnworthie that death which hee did suffer. Whom hee did know from his youth vpward, to be neither fornicator, drunkard, neither any euill or vitious person, but a chaste and sober man, and a iust and true preacher of the holie Gospell: and whatsoeuer things master John Hus and Wickliffe had holden or written speciallie against the abuse and pomp of the clergie, he would affirme euen vnto the death, that they were holie and blessed men, and that in all points of the catholick faith, he doth beléeue as the holy catholick Church doth hold or beléeue. And finallie he did conclude, that all such articles as John Wickliffe and Joh. Hus had written and put forth against the enormities, pomp, and disorder of the prelats, he would firmely and stedfastly, without recantation, hold and defend euen vnto the death. And last of all he added, that al the sinnes that euer he had committed, did not so much gnaw and trouble his conscience, as did that onely sinne, which hee had committed in that most pitifferous fact, when as in his recantation, he had vniustly spoken against that good and holy man and his doctrine, and specially in consenting vnto his wicked condemnation, concluding that he did vtterlie reuoke and denie that wicked recantation which he made in that most cursed place, and that he did it through weakenesse of heart and feare of death: And moreouer, that whatsoeuer thing he hath spoken against that blessed man, he hath altogether lied vpon him, and that he doth repent him with his whole heart, that euer he did it.

Hierome repenteth his speaking against John Hus.

And at the hearing hereof, the hearts of the hearers were not a little sorie. For they wished and desired greatly that such a singular man should be saued, if otherwise their blind superstition would haue suffered it. But he continued stil in his prefixed sentence, séeming to desire rather death then life. And persisting in the praise of John Husse, he added moreouer, that he neuer maintained any doctrine against the state of the Church, but onely spake against the abuses of the clergie, against the pride, pompe, and excesse of the prelates. Forsomuch as the patrimonies of the Churches were first giuen for the poore, then for hospitalitie, and thirdly to the reparations of the Churches: it was a griefe to that good man (said he) to see the same misspent and cast away vpon harlots, great feastings, and kéeping of horses and dogs, vpon gorgeous apparell, and such other things vnséeming Christian religion. And herein he shewed himselfe maruellous eloquent: yea, neuer more.

Hus neuer maintained any doctrine against the Church of Rome: but onely spake against their naughtie life.

And when his oration was interrupted many times by diuers of them, carping at his sentences as he was in speaking, yet was there none of al those that interrupted him which escaped vnblanckt, but he brought them al to confusion, and put them to silence. When any noise began, he ceased to speake, and after began againe, proceeding in his oration, and desiring them to giue him leaue a while to speake, whom they hereafter should heare no more: neither yet was his mind euer dashed at all these noises and tumults.

Hierome did put them to silence.

Hierome in prison 340. daies. The excellent memorie in M. Hierome.

And this was marueilous in him to behold, notwithstanding he continued in strait prison 340. daies, hauing neither booke, nor almost light to read by: yet how admirable his memorie serued him: Declaring how all those paines of his strait handling, did not so much grieue him, as he did wonder rather to see their vnkind humanitie towards him.

When hee had spoken these and many other things as touching the praise of John Wickliffe, and John Hus, they which sat in the Councell, whispered together, saying: by these these his words it appeareth that he is at a point with himself. Then was he againe carried into prison, and grieuously fettered by the hands, armes and feet, with great chaines and fetters of yron.

M. Hierome brought againe before the Councell.

The Saturday next before the Ascension day, earlie in the morning hee was brought with a great number of armed men vnto the Cathedrall Church before the open congregation, to haue his iudgement giuen him. There they exhorted him, that those things which he had before spoken in the open audience, as is aforesaid touching the praise and commendation of master Iohn Wickliffe, and master Iohn Hus, confirming and establishing their doctrine, he would yet recant the same: but he maruellous stoutly without all feare, spake against them, and amongst other things said vnto them: I take God to my witnesse, and I protest here before you all, that I do beleeue and hold the articles of the faith, as the holy Catholike Church doth hold and beleeue the same: but for this cause shall I now bee condemned, for that I will not consent with you vnto the condemnation of those most holy and blessed men aforesaid, whom you haue most wickedlie condemned for certaine articles, detesting and abhorring your wicked and abominable life. Then hee confessed there before them all his beleefe, and vttered many things very profoundly and eloquently, in so much, that all men there present, could not sufficiently commend and praise his great eloquence and excellent learning, and by no meanes could they induce or perswade him to recant.

M. Hierome holdeth all the articles of the Catholike Church.

The eloquence of M. Hierome.

Then a certaine bishop named the bishop of Londy, made a certaine sermon exhortatiue against master Hierome, perswading to his condemnation.

After the bishop had ended the said sermon, master Hierome said againe vnto them: You shall condemne me wickedly and vniustly. But I after my death will leaue a remorse in your conscience, and a naile in your hearts; Et cito vos omnes, vt respondeatis mihi coram altissimo & iustissimo iudice post centum annos: That is: And here I cite you to answere vnto me before the most high and iust Iudge, within a hundred yeeres.

The prophecy of M. Hierome.

No pen can sufficiently write, or note those things which he most eloquently, profoundly, and Philosophically had spoken in the said audience, neither can any tongue sufficiently declare the same, wherefore I haue but only touched here the superficiall matter of his talke, partly, and not wholly noting the same. Finally, when as by no meanes he might bee perswaded to recant the premisses, immediatly euen in his presence, the sentence and iudgement of his condemnation was giuen against him, and read before him.

The sentence read against M. Hierome.

IN the name of God Amen. Christ our God, and our Sauiour being the true vine, whose father is the husbandman, taught his Disciples, and all other faithfull men, saying: If any man dwell not in me, let him be cast out as a bough or branch, and let him wither and dry, &c. The doctrine and precepts of which most excellent doctor and master, this most sacred Synode of Constance, executing and following in the cause of inquisition against heretiks, being moued by this said sacred Synode, through report, publike fame, and open infamation: procedeth against Hierome of Prage, master of Art, lay man. By the acts and processes of whose cause it appeareth that the said master Hierome hath holden, maintained, and taught diuers articles hereticall and erroneous, lately reproued and condemned by the holy Fathers, some being very blasphemous, other some offending godlie eares, and many temerarious and seditious, which haue been affirmed, maintained, preached and taught by the men of most damnable memory Iohn Wickliffe, and Iohn Hus, the which are also written in diuers of their works and bookes. Which articles of doctrine and bookes of the said Iohn Hus and Wickliffe, together with their memory, and the person of the said Iohn Hus, were by the said sacred Synode condemned of heresie. The which sentence of condemnation this Hierome afterward during the time of inquisition, acknowledged in the said sacred Synode, and approued the true Catholike and Apostolike faith thereunto consenting, accursing all heresie, specially that whereof hee was infamed, and confessed himselfe to bee infamed, and that which in times past Iohn Hus and Iohn Wickliffe maintained and taught in their works, sermons, and bookes: for the which the said Wickliffe and Hus, together with their doctrine and errors, were by the said sacred Synode as heretically condemned. The condemnations of all which the premisses, hee did openly professe and allow, and did sweare that he would persuere and continue in the veritie of that faith. And if that he should presume at any time to hold opinion, or preach contrarie thereunto, that hee would submit himselfe to the triall and truth of the Canons, and be bound to perpetuall punishment. And this his profession written with his owne hand, he deliuered vp vnto the holie Councell. Many daies after his said profession and abiuration, as a dog returning vnto his vomit, to the intent hee might openly vomit vp the most pestilent poison which had long lurked and layen hid in his breast, he required and desired that he might be openly heard before the Councell. The which being granted vnto him, hee affirmed, said and professed before the whole Synode, being publikely gathered together, that he had wickedly consented and agreed to the sentence and iudgement of the condemnation of the said Wickliffe and Hus, and that he had most shamefully lied in approuing and allowing the said sentence, neither was hee ashamed to confesse that hee had lied: yea, hee did also reuoke and recant his confession, approbation, and protestation, which he had made vpon their condemnation, affirming that hee neuer at any time had read any errors or heresie in the bookes and treatises of the said Wickliffe and Hus. Albeit he had before confessed it, and it is euidently proued, that he did diligently studie, reade, and preach their bookes, wherein it is manifest that there are contained many errors and heresies. Also the said master Hierome did professe as touching the Sacrament of the altar, and the transubstantiation of the bread into the bodie of Christ, that he doth hold and beleeue as the Church doth hold and beleeue, saying also that he doth giue more credit vnto S. Augustine, and the other doctors of the Church, then vnto Wickliffe and Hus. It appeareth moreouer by the premisses, that the said Hierome is an adherent and maintainer of the said Wickliffe and Hus, and their errors, and both is, and hath been a fauourer of them. Wherefore the said sacred Synode determineth the said master Hierome as a rotten and withered branch not growing vpon the vine, to be cut off, and cast out. The said Synode also pronounceth, declareth and condemneth him as an heretike and drowned in all kind of heresies, excommunicate and accursed, leauing him vnto the arbitrement and iudgement of the secular iudge, to receiue iust and due punishment, according to the qualitie of so great an offence: The said sacred Synode notwithstanding intreating that the said iudge would moderate his sentence of iudgement without perill of death.

M. Hierome giuen to the secular power.

The which sentence so giuen before his face, and ended, a great and long miter of paper was brought vnto him, painted about with red diuels, the which when he beheld and saw, throwing away his hood vpon the ground amongst the prelates, hee tooke the miter, and put it vpon his head: saying, Our Lord Iesu Christ, when as he should suffer death for me most wretched sinner, did weare a crowne of thorne vpon his head: and I for his sake in stead of that crowne, will willingly weare this miter and cap. Afterward hee was laid hold of by the secular power.

A paper with red diuels put vpon the head of M. Hierome by diuellish papists.

M. Hierome committed to the secular power.

After that he was led out of the said Church to the place of execution: when he was going out of the Church with a cheerefull countenance and a loud voice lifting his eies vp into heauen, hee began to sing, Credo in vnum Deum, as it is accustomed to be sung in the Church. Afterward as he passed along, hee did sing some Canticles of the Church: the which being ended, in the entring out of the gate of the citie, as men goe vnto Gothlehem, hee did sing this hymne, Felix namque. And that respond being ended, after he came to the place of execution where as master Iohn Hus before had suffered death innocently, kneeling downe before an image which was like vnto the picture of master Iohn Hus, which was there prepared to burne master Hierome, hee made a certaine deuout prayer.

M. Hierome went singing vnto his martyrdome.

M. Hierome prayeth.

While he was thus praying, the tormentors tooke him vp, and lifting him vp from the ground, spoiled him of all his garments, and left him naked, and afterward girded him about the loynes with a linnen cloth, and bound him fast with cords and chaines of iron to the said Image, which was made fast vnto the earth: and so standing vpon the ground, when as they began to lay the wood about him, he sung Salue festa dies. And when the hymne was ended, he sung againe with a loud voice, Credo in vnum Deum, vnto the end. That being ended, he said vnto the people in the Germaine tongue in effect as followeth. Dearely beloued children, euen as I haue now sung, so do I beleeue and none otherwise. And this Creed is my whole faith: notwithstanding now I die for this cause, because I would not consent and agree to the Councell, and with them affirme and hold that master Iohn Hus was by them holily and iustly condemned: for I did know well enough that he was a true preacher of the Gospell of Iesu Christ.

M. Hierome giueth testimonie of Iohn Hus.

After that hee was compassed in with the wood vp to the crowne of the head, they cast all his garments vpon the wood also, and with a firebrand they set it on fire. The which being once fired, he began to sing with a loud voice: In manus tuas domine commendo spiritum meum. When that was ended, and that he began vehementlie to burne, hee said in the vulgar Bohemian tongue: O Lord God father almightie, haue mercy vpon mee, and be mercifull vnto mine offenes, for thou knowest how that sincerely I haue loued thy truth. Then his voice by the vehemencie of the fire was choked and stopped, that it was no longer heard, but hee moued continually his mouth and lips, as though hee had still prayed or spoken within himselfe.

The last words of M. Hierome.

When as in a manner his whole bodie with his beard was burned round about, and that there appeared through the great burning vpon his bodie certaine great bladders, as big as an egge, yet hee continuallie very strongly and stoutly moued,

Church: he was of such a stout and strong nature. After that he was thus dead in the fire, by and by they brought his bedding, his strawbed, his boots, his hood, and all other things that he had in the prison, and burned them all to ashes in the same fire. The which ashes, after that the fire was out, they did diligently gather together, and carry them in a Cart, and cast them into the Riuer of Rheine, which ran hard by the Citie.

The ashes of M. Hierome cast into the riuer of Rheine.

That man which was the true reporter hereof, and which testified vnto vs the acts and doings about the condemnation of master Hierome, and sent the same vnto vs to Prage in writting, doth thus conclude: All these things (saith hee) I did behold, see, and heare to bee done, in this forme and manner. And if any man doe tell you the contrarie, doe not credit him; for all those things which happened vnto him, when hee came toward Constance, and also at his first comming vnto Constance of his owne free will, and afterward when he was brought bound vnto Constance, as is aforesaid, I my selfe did see and perfectly behold, and for a perpetuall memorie thereof to be had for euer, I haue directed the same vnto you, not lying, or falsifying any point thereof, as he which is the searcher of all mens hearts can beare mee witnesse, willing rather to sustaine the note of ignorance and rudenesse of skile, to beare witnesse vnto the truth, then I would by any meanes be compelled by tickling, or flattering the eares of the hearers with fained and cloked speech, to swarue or goe aside from the truth.

The witnes of the Writer.

The truth of this storie.

Thus end the tragicall histories of master John Hus, and master Hierome of Prage, faithfully gathered and collected by a certaine Bohemian, being a present witnesse and beholder of the same, written and compiled first in Latine, and so sent by the said Bohemian into his country of Boheme, and againe translated out of the Latine with like fidelitie, into our English tongue.

In the meane time while master Hierome was in this trouble, and before the Councell, the nobles and lords of Boheme and of Morauia (but not a little agrieued thereat) directed their letters vnto this barbarous Councell of popish murderers, in tenour and forme of words as followeth.

The letter of the 54. Nobles of Morauia written vnto the Councell of Constance in the defence of master Iohn Hus, and Hierome of Prage.

To the right reuerend fathers and lords in Christ, the lords, cardinals, patriarks, primates, archbishops, bishops, ambassadours, doctors, and masters, and to the whole Councell of Constance: Wee the Nobles, lords, knights and esquires, of the famous Marquesdome of Morauia, with the desire of all goodnes, and the obseruation of the commandements of our Lord Iesus Christ.

FOrasmuch as euery man both by the law of nature, and also by Gods law, is commanded to do that vnto another man, which he would haue done vnto himselfe, and is forbidden to doe that thing vnto another, which hee would not haue done vnto himselfe, as our Sauiour saith: All things whatsoeuer you will that men should do vnto you, the same do you vnto them, for this is the law & the Prophets: yea, the law is fulfilled in this one point, Thou shalt loue thy neighbor as thy self. We therfore (God being our author) hauing respect as much as in vs lieth vnto the said law of God, and the loue of our neighbour, before did send our letters vnto Constance for our dearely beloued friend of good memorie, master Iohn Husse bacheler of diuinitie, and preacher of the Gospell. Whom of late in the Councell of Constance (we know not with what spirit being led) you haue condemned as an obstinate heretike: neither hauing confessed any thing, neither being lawfully conuict as were expedient: hauing no errours or heresies declared or laid against him, but onely at the sinister, false and importune accusations, suggestions and instigations of his mortall enemies, and the traitors of our Kingdome and Marquesdome of Morauia. And being thus vnmercifully condemned, you haue slaine him with most shamefull and cruell death, to the perpetuall shame and infamie of our most Christian Kingdome of Boheme, and the famous Marquesdome of Morauia (as we haue written vnto Constance, vnto the most noble Prince and Lord, the Lord Sigismund king of Romans, and of Hungary, the heire and successor of our kingdom) the which was also read & published in your congregations, which we wil here also haue enrolled; and haue burned him, as it is reported, in the reproch and contempt of vs.

Matth.7.

Rom.13.

Wherefore we haue thought good, euen now to direct our letters patents to your reuerences now present, in the behalfe of master Iohn Hus, openlie professing and protesting both with heart and mouth, that he the said master Iohn Hus, was a iust, good, and catholicke man, and a long season worthilie commended and allowed in our kingdome, for his life and conuersation. Hee also preached and taught vs and our subiects the law of the Gospell, and of the holie Prophets, and the bookes of the old and new Testament, according to the exposition of the holy doctors approoued by the Church, and left many Monuments in writing, most constantly detesting and abhorring all errors and heresies, continuallie admonishing both vs and all faithfull Christians to doe the like, diligently exhorting all men as much as in him lay, by his words, writings and trauell, vnto quietnesse and concord: so that vsing all the diligence that we might, we neuer heard or could vnderstand, that master Iohn Hus had preached, taught, or by any meanes affirmed any errour or heresie in his Sermons, or that that by any manner of meanes he had offended vs, or our subiects, either by word or deed, but that hee alwaies led a quiet and a godlie life in Christ, exhorting all men diligently, both by his word and works, as much as he might, to obserue and keepe the law of the Gospell, and the institutions of the holie fathers, after the preaching of our holy mother the Church, and to the edifying of mens soules. Neither did these premisses, which you had so perpetrated to the reproch both of vs and our kingdome and marquesdome, suffice and content you, but that also without all mercie and pitie, you haue apprehended, imprisoned and condemned, and euen now peraduenture, like as you did master Iohn Hus, you haue most cruelly murdered the worshipfull man master Hierome of Prage, a man abounding in eloquence, master of the seuen liberall artes, and a famous philosopher, not being seene, heard, examined, neither conuict, but onely at the sinister and false accusation of his and our accusers and betraiers.

All that will liue godly in Christ. 2. Tim. 3.

Defence of M. Hierome of Prage.

Furthermore, it is come to our knowledge and vnderstanding (which wee doe not without great griefe rehearse) as wee may also euidentlie gather by your writings, how that certaine detractors, odible both to God and men, priuie enuiers and betraiers, haue wickedly and grieuously, albeit falslie and traiterouslie, accused vs, our kingdome and marquesdome aforesaid, before you in youf councell, that in the said kingdome of Boheme, and marquesdome of Morauia, diuers errours are sprung vp, which haue grieuouslie and manifoldlie infected both our hearts, and also the hearts of many faithfull men: in so much, that without a speedie stop or stay of correction, the said kingdome and marquesdome, together with the faithfull Christians therein, should incur an irrecuperable losse and ruine of their soules.

These cruell and pernitious iniuries which are laid vnto vs, and to our said kingdome and marquesdome, albeit most falslie and slanderouslie, how may we suffer? for so much as through the grace of God (when in a manner all other kingdomes of the world haue oftentimes wauered, making Schismes and Antipapes) our most Christian kingdome of Boheme, and most noble marquesdome of Morauia, since the time they did receiue the catholike faith of our Lord Iesus Christ, as a most perfect * quadrant, haue alwaies without reprofe stuck vnto the church of Rome, and haue sincerely done their true obedience. Also with how great costs and charges and great trauell, with what worship and due reuerence they haue reuerenced the holy mother the Church and her pastors, by their princes and faithfull subiects, it is more manifest then the day light vnto the whole world; and your selues, if you will confesse the truth, can witnesse the same also.

He meaneth the long schisme spoken of before, where three popes were striuing one against another.

* A quadrant being foure square pyonerbially, signifieth a man that is constant and immutable. Rom. 12.

Wherefore, that we, according to the mind of the Apostle, may procure honest and good things, not onelie before God, but before men also, and lest by neglecting the famous renowme of the kingdome and marquesdome, wee bee found cruell toward our neighbours; hauing a stedfast hope, a pure and sincere conscience and intent, and a certaine true faith in Christ Iesu our Lord, by the tenour of these we signifie and declare vnto your fatherhoods, and to all faithfull Christians, openly professing both with heart and mouth, that whatsoeuer man, of what estate, preheminence, dignitie, condition, degree, or religion so euer he be, which hath said, or affirmed, either doth say or affirme, that in the said kingdome of Boheme, and marquesdome of Morauia, heresies haue sprung vp which haue infected vs and other faithfull Christians, as is aforesaid (the onelie person of our most noble Prince and Lord, Sigismund king of Romans and of Hungarie, &c. our Lord and heire successor, being set apart, whom we trust and beleeue, not to be guiltie in the premisses) all and euery such man (as is aforesaid) doth lie falslie vpon his head, as a wicked and naughtie traitour and betraier of the said kingdome and marquesdome, and most traiterous vnto vs, and most pernitious heretike, the sonne of all malice and wickednesse, yea, and of the diuell himselfe, who is a liar and the father of all lies.

Iohn 8. Deut. 38. Psalm. 30.

Notwithstanding, we for this present committing the foresaid iniuries vnto God, vnto whom vengeance pertaineth, who will also abundantly reward the workers of iniquitie, will prosecute them more amplie before him, whom God shall appoint in the Apostolike see, to gouerne his holy Church, as the onely and vndoubted pastor. Vnto whom God willing, we exhibiting our due reuerence and obedience as faithfull children, in those things which are lawfull, honest, and agreeable to reason and the law of God, will make our request and petition, that speedie remedie may bee prouided for vs, our said kingdome and marquesdome, vpon the premisses, according to the law of our Lord Iesus Christ; and the institutions of the holy fathers. The premisses notwithstanding we setting apart all feare and mens ordinances prouided to the contrarie, will maintaine and defend the law of our Lord Iesus Christ, and the deuout, humble and constant preachers thereof, euen to the shedding of our bloud.

These noble men offered their obedience to the pope, no further then was lawfull, honest and agreeable to reason and the law of God. Marke this and learne you noble men.

Round about the said letters there were 54. seales hanging, and their names subscribed, whose seales they were. The names of which noble men, I thought it good here to anner withall, partly for the more credit of that hath been said, partly also for examples sake, to the intent that our noble men and gentlemen in this our Realme of England, now liuing in this cleare light of the Gospell, may by their example vnderstand, that if they ioyne themselues with the Gospell of Iesus, zealously, and as they should doe, yet are they neither the first, nor the most that so haue done before them: if not, yet the truth may here remaine in the storie to their shame, or else to their instruction, seeing so many noble and worthie gentlemen within the small kingdome of Bohemia, to be so forward in those so darke daies, and among so many enemies 200. yeeres agoe, to take part with Christ: And yet our gentlemen here in such long continuance of time, being so diligently taught, are neither in number nor in zeale to them to bee compared, but will still take part, contrary both to Christ, and to the example of these nobles, whose names they may see and reade here following.

After these things thus declared and discoursed concerning the history of John Hus, and Hierome of Prage, the order of place and countrie next would require, consequentlie to inferre and comprehend the great troubles and perturbations, which happened after and vpon the death of these men in the countrie of Boheme: but the order of time calleth mee backe, first to other matters heere of our owne countrie, which passed in the meane time with vs in England. Which things being taken by the way and finished, we will (Christ willing) afterward returne to the tractation hereof, to prosecute the troubles and conflicts of the Bohemians, with other things beside pertaining to the latter end of the Councell of Constance, and chosing of pope Martin, as the order of yeeres and time shall require.

Ye heard before pag. 541. how after the death of Thomas Arundell archb. of Cant. succeeded Henrie Chichelley, anno 1414. and sate 25. yeeres. In whose time was much trouble and great affliction of good men here in England: of whom many were compelled to abiure, some were burned, diuers were driuen to exile. Whereof partly now to intreate, as wee find them in registers and histories recorded, we will first begin with John Claydon Cotiar of London, and Richard Turming; whom Robert Fabian doth falsely affirme to be burned in the yeere wherein sir Roger Acton and M. Browne suffered; who indeede suffered not before the second yeere of Henrie Chichelley being archbishop of Canturbury, which was an. 1413. The history of which John Claydon, in the Registers is thus declared:

Ex regist. Cant.

Iohn Claydon examined.

THe 17. of August 1415. did personally appeare Iohn Claydon Coriar of London (arrested by the maior of the said citie for the suspition of heresie) before Henry archbishop of Canturburie, in Saint Pauls Church: which Iohn (being obiected to him by the archbishop, that in the city of London and other places of the prouince of Canturbury, he was suspected by diuers godly and learned men for heresie, and to be contrary to the catholicke faith, and determination of the Church) did openly confesse and denied not, but that he had been for the space of 11. yéeres, suspected both about the citie of London, and also in the Prouince of Canturburie, and speciallie of the common sort, for Lollardie and heresie, and to be contrarie to the catholicke faith and determination of the Church of Rome, and defamed of the same all the time aforesaid.

Iohn Claydon first imprisoned by Robert Braybrooke bishop of London.

In somuch, that in the time of master Robert Braybrooke bishop of London deceased, he was for the space of two yéeres committed to the prison of Conwey, for the foresaid defamation and suspition, and for the same cause also he was in prison in the Fléete for three yéeres. Out of which prison he (in the raigne of king Hen. the fourth) was brought before lord Iohn Scarle then Chancellor to the king, and there did abiure all heresie and errour. And the said Iohn Claydon being asked of the said archbishop whether he did abiure the heresie of which he was suspect, before any other: did confesse, that in a Conuocation at London in Pauls Church before Thomas Arundell late archbishop deceased, hee did abiure all such doctrine which they called heresie and error contrarie to the catholicke faith and determination of the Church, and that he had not onely left such articles and opinions, wherein hee was defamed, but also did abstains from all companie that were suspected of such opinions, so that he should neither giue aid, helpe, counsell, nor fauor vnto them.

Iohn Claydon before abiured.

English bookes.

And moreouer, the said John was asked by the said archbishop, whether hee euer had in his house since his abiuration, in his keeping, any bookes written in English. Whereunto hee confessed, that hee would not denie, but that hee had in his house, and in his keeping many English bookes: for hee was arrested by the maior of the citie of London, for such books as hee had, which bookes (as hee thought) were in the maiors keeping. Vpon the which, the maior did openlie confesse, that hee had such bookes in his keeping, which in his iudgement were the worst, and the most peruerse that euer he did reade or see, and one booke that was well bound in red leather, of parchment, written in a good English hand: and among the other bookes found with the said Iohn Claydon, the maior gaue vp the said booke before the archbishop. Whereupon the said Iohn Claydon, being asked of the archbishop if he knew that booke, did openlie confesse that he knew it very well, because he caused it to bee written of his owne costs and charges, for hee spent much monie thereupon since his abiuration. Then was hee asked who wrote it. He did answer, one called Iohn Grime.

The iudgement of the maior of London.

Claydon bestowed much monie vpon English books.

And further, being required what the said Iohn Grime was, hee answered, hee could not tell. Againe, being demanded whether hee did euer reade the same booke, he did confesse that he could not reade, but hee had heard the fourth part thereof read of one Iohn Fullar. And being asked whether hee thought the contents of that booke to be catholike, profitable, good, and true: Hee answered, that many things which he had heard in the same booke, were both profitable, good and healthfull to his soule: and as hee said, hee had great affection to the said booke, for a Sermon preached at Horsaldowne, that was written in the said booke. And being further asked, whether, since the time of his said abiuration, hee did commune with one Richard Baker, of the citie aforesaid; hee did answere, yea: for the said Richard Baker did come often vnto his house to haue communication with him. And being asked, whether he knew the said Richard to be suspected, and defamed of heresie, hee did answere againe, that he knew well that the said Richard was suspected and defamed of many men and women in the citie of London, as one whom they thought to be an heretike.

Iohn Claydon could not reade.

Richard Turming Baker.

This Turming belike, was then in prison.

Which confession being made, he did cause the said bookes to bee deliuered to master Robert Gilbert, doctour of diuinitie, to William Lindewood doctor of both lawes, and other Clerkes, to bee examined, and in the meane time Dauid Beard, Alexander Philip, and Balthasar Mero, were taken for witnesses against him, and were committed to bee examined to master Iohn Escourt, generall examiner of Canturburie. This done, the archbishop continued his Session till Monday next in the same place. Which Monday being come, which was the 11. of the said moneth, the said master Escourt openlie and publikelie exhibited the witnesses, being openlie read before the archbishop, and other bishops: which being read, then after that were read diuers tractations, found in the house of the said Iohn Claydon: out of the which, being examined, diuers points were gathered and noted for heresies and errors, and specially out of the booke aforesaid: which booke the said Iohn Claydon confessed by his owne costs to bee written and bound, which booke was intituled, The Lanterne of light. In the which and in the other examined, were these Articles vnder written contained.

William Lindwood, doctor of both lawes.

An English book intituled, The Lanterne of light.

1. First, vpon the text of the Gospell, how the enemie did sow the tares, there is said thus: that wicked antichrist the pope hath sowed among the lawes of Christ his popish and corrupt decrees, which are of no authoritie, strength, nor valure.

2. That the archbishops and bishops, speaking indifferently, are the seates of the beast antichrist, when hee sitteth in them and raigneth aboue other people in the darke caues of errors and heresies.

3. That the bishops licence for a man to preach the word of God, is the true character of the beast. i. antichrist; and therefore simple and faithfull priests may preach when they will against the prohibition of that antichrist, and without licence.

The heads and taile of antichrist.

4. That the court of Rome is the chiefe head of antichrist, and the bishops bee the bodie: and the new sects, that is, the monks, canons, and friers, brought in not by Christ, but dannablie by the pope, be the venemous and pestiferous taile of antichrist.

This is true, speaking of the inuisible Church.

5. That no reprobate is a member of the Church, but onelie such as bee elected and predestinate to saluation: seeing the Church is no other thing but the congregation of faithfull soules, which doe and will keepe their faith constantly, as well indeed as in word.

6. That Christ did neuer plant priuate religions in the Church, but whilest hee liued in this world hee did rote them out. By which it appeareth that priuate religions bee vnprofitable branches in the Church, and to be roted out.

7. That the materiall Churches should not be decked with gold, siluer, and pretious stone sumptuouslie, but the followers of the humilitie of Iesus Christ, ought to worship their Lord God humblie in meane and simple houses, and not in great buildings, as the churches be now a daies.

Two causes of persecution noted.

8. That there be two chiefe causes of the persecution of the Christians: one is, the priests vnlawfull keeping of temporall and superfluous goods: the other is, the vnsatiable begging of the friers, with their hie buildings.

Foure conditions in giuing almes.

9. That almes is not giuen vertuouslie nor lawfully except it bee giuen with these foure conditions: first, vnlesse it bee giuen to the honour of God: secondlie, vnlesse it be giuen of goods iustly gotten: thirdlie, vnlesse it be giuen to such a person as the giuer thereof knoweth to be in charitie: and fourthlie, vnlesse it bee giuen to such as haue need, and doe not dissemble.

10. That the often singing in the church is not founded in the scripture, and therefore it is not lawfull for priests to occupie themselues with singing in the Church, but with the studie of the law of Christ, and preaching his word.

That bread remaineth in the Sacrament.

11. That Iudas did receiue the bodie of Christ in bread, and his bloud in wine. In the which it doth plainelie appeare that after consecration of bread and wine made, the same bread and wine that was before, doth truly remaine on the altar.

12. That all ecclesiasticall suffrages doe profit all vertuous and godly persons indifferentlie.

13. That the popes and the bishops indulgences be vnprofitable, neither can they profit them, to whom they bee giuen by any meanes.

14. That the laitie is not bound to obey the prelats whatsoeuer they command, vnlesse the prelates doe watch to giue God a iust account of the soules of them.

15. That images are not to bee sought to by pilgrimages, neither is it lawfull for Christians to bow their knees to them, neither to kisse them, nor to giue them any maner of reuerence.

The bookes of Iohn Claydon burned.

For the which articles, the archbishop with other bishops, and diuers learned communing together, first condemned the books as hereticall, and burned them in fire: and then because they thought the said Iohn Claydon to be forsworne and fallen into heresie, the archbishop did proceed to his definitiue sentence against the said Iohn personally appearing before him in iudgement (his confessions being read and deposed against him) after this manner.

The sentence and condemnation of Iohn Claydon.

IN the name of God, Amen. We Henrie by the grace of God archbishop of Canturburie, primate of all England, and legate of the Apostolike sea, in a certaine cause of hereticall prauitie and of relapse into the same, whereupon Iohn Claydon lay man of the prouince of Canturbury, was detected, accused, and denounced, and in the said our prouince of Canturburie publikely defamed (as by publike fame and common report notoriously to vs hath been knowne) first, sitting in iudgement seat and obseruing all things lawfullie required in this behalfe, do proceed to the pronouncing of the sentence definitiue in forme as followeth. The name of Christ being inuocated and only set before our eies, forasmuch as by the acts and things enacted, producted, exhibited and confessed before vs, also by diuers signes and euidences we haue found the said Iohn Claydon to haue bin, and to be publikly and notoriously relapsed againe into his former heresie, heretofore by him abiured: according to the merits and deserts of the said cause, being of vs diligently searched, waighed & pondered before, to the intent that that the said Iohn Claidon shall not infect other with his scab, by the consent and assent of our reuerend brethren Richard bishop of London, Iohn bishop of Couentrie and Liechfield, and Steuen bishop of saint Dauids, and of other doctors as well of Diuinitie as of both lawes, and also of other discreet and learned men assisting vs in this behalfe, doe iudge, pronounce, and declare the said Iohn Claidon, to be relapsed againe into his heresie, which hee before did abiure, finally and definitiuely appointing him to be left vnto the secular iudgement, and so doe leaue him by these presents.

John Claidon committed to the secular power.

The law de comburendo, insufficient.

Thus John Claidon receiuing his iudgement and condemnation of the archbishop was committed to the secular power, and by them vniustly and vnlawfully was committed to the fire, for that the temporall magistrate had no such law sufficient for them, to burne any such man for religion condemned of the prelats, as is aboue sufficiently proued and declared, pag. 539. But to be short, Quo iure quaque iniuria, John Claidon notwithstanding by the temporall magistrates, not long after was had to Smithfield, where meekely hee was made a burnt offering vnto the Lord, An. 1415.

The death and martyrdome of John Claidon.

The burning of Iohn Claidon, and Richard Turning.

John Claidon, Richard Turning, martyrs.

Robert Fabian, and other Chronologers which follow him, adde also that Richard Turming Baker, of whom mention is made before in the examination of John Claidon, was likewise the same time burned with him in Smithfield. Albeit in the Register I find no sentence of condemnation giuen against the said Turming, neither yet in the storie of saint Albons is there any such mention of his burning made, but onely of the burning of John Claidon aforesaid: wherefore the iudgement hereof I leaue free to the Reader. Notwithstanding, concerning the said Turming this is certaine, that hee was accused vnto the bishops, and no doubt was in their hands, and bands. What afterward was done with him, I referre it vnto the authors.

Anno 1416

The next yeer after the burning of these two aforesaid and also of Iohn Hus being burnt at Constance, which was An. 1416. the prelats of England seeing the daily encrease of the Gospell, and fearing the ruine of their papall kingdome, were busilie occupied with all their counsell and diligence, to maintaine the same. Wherefore to make their state and kingdome sure, by statutes, lawes, constitutions, and terrour of punishment, as Thomas Arundell, and other prelats had done before, so the forenamed Henry Chichelley archbishop of Canturburie, in his conuocation holden at London, maketh another constitution (as though there had not enough beene made before) against the poore Lollards: the copie and tenour whereof he sendeth abrode, to the bishop of London, and to other his Suffraganes, by them to be put in strait execution, containing in words as followeth.

Ex Regist. Chicheley. 217.

HEnry by the grace of God archbishop of Canturbury, primate of all England, and legate of the chiefe seate: to our reuerend brother in the Lord Richard, by the grace of God bishop of London, health and brotherly loue, with continuall increase. Lately in our last conuocation in saint Pauls church in London, being kept by you and other our brethren and clergie of our prouince, we doe remember to haue made this order vnder written by your consents: When as among manie other our cares this ought to bee chiefe, that by some meanes wee take those heretickes, which like foxes lurke and hide themselues in the Lords vineyard: and that the dust of

You should be better occupied to shake off the dust from your negligence may be vtterly shaken from our feete and from the feete of our fellow brethren: in this the said conuocation of the prelats and clergie, wee haue ordained, that our fellow brethren, our Suffragans and archdeacons of our prouince of Canturburie, by themselues, their Officials or Commissaries in their iurisdictions, and euery of their charges in their countrey, twice euery yeare at the least, doe diligently inquire of such persons as are suspect of heresie: and that in euery such their archdeaconries in euery parish, wherein is reported any heretickes to inhabite, they cause three or more of the honestest men and best reported of, to take their oth vpon the holy Euangelist, that if they shall know or vnderstand any frequenting either in priuile conuenticles, or else differing in life or maners from the common conuersation of other catholike men, or else that hold any, either heresies or errours, or else that haue any suspected bookes in the English tongue, or that doe receiue any such persons suspect of heresies and errours into their houses, or that be fauourers of them that are inhabitants in any such place, or conuersant with them, or else haue any recourse vnto them: they make certificates of those persons in writting, with all the circumstances wherewith they are suspect, vnto the said our suffragans or archdeacons, or to their commissaries, so soone, and with as much speede as possible they can: And that the said archdeacon and euery of their Commissaries aforesaid, doe declare the names of all such persons denounced together with all the circumstances of them, the dioces, and places, and secretly vnder their seales doe send ouer vnto vs the same: And that the same diocesans effectually direct forth lawfull processe against them, as the qualitie of the cause requireth, and that with all diligence they discerne, define and execute the same.

Twice euery yeer to enquire for Lollards.

Against priuie conuenticles.

To differ from the common sort in life and maners, against the popes law.

Against English bookes.

And if perhaps they leaue not such persons conuict vnto the secular court, yet notwithstanding let them commit them vnto the perpetuall or temporall prisons, as the qualitie of the cause shall require, vntill the nexte conuocation of the prelats and clergie of our prouince of Canturburie, there personally to remaine: and that in the same prisons they cause them to be kept according as the law requireth: And that of all and singuler the things aforesaid, that is, what inquisition they haue made, and what they haue found, and how in the processe they haue behaued themselues, and what persons so conuict they haue caused to be put in safe keeping, with what diligence or negligence of the Commissaries aforesaid, with all and all maner of other circumstances premised, and thereunto in any wise appertaining, and specially of the abiurations, if in the meane time they shall chance to abiure any heresies: that then in the nexte conuocation of the prelates and clergie vnder the forme aforesaid, they cause the same distinctly and apertly to be certified to vs and our successors: And that they deliuer effectually to the official of our court, the same processe to remaine with them, or else in the register of our court of Canturburie; so that euery one, to whom such things appertaine for the further execution of the same processe, may haue recourse vnto the same official, with all effect.

We therefore command, that as touching the constitution brought vnto your citie and diocesan, you cause the same in conuenient place and time to bee published, and that in all points you both obserue the same your selues and cause it also of others to bee diligently obserued: Commanding furthermore, all and singuler our fellow brethren and Suffragans, that they in likewise cause the same to bee published throughout all their cities and dioces, and both diligently obserue the same themselues, and also cause all others to do the same: and what thing soeuer you shall doe in the premises, that you certifie vs betwixt this and the feast of saint Peter ad vincula, nexte comming, that you duely certifie vs of these things, by your letters patents, containing the same effect, sealed with your seales. Dated at our house in London, the first day of July, Anno 1416.

The trouble of Iohn Barton, and Robert Chapell in cause of religion.

This Philip seemeth to be Philip Repington afore mentioned in the storie of Wicklife.

During the time of this conuocation in the yeere aboue said, two priests were presented and brought before the bishops, noted and defamed for heretickes: one named John Barton, vnto whom it was obiected by Philip bishop of Lincolne, that he had bene excommunicated about fiue or seuen yeeres before, vpon articles concerning religion, and yet neither would appeare being cited, nor would seeke to bee reconciled againe vnto the church. Which things being so proued against him, he was committed to the custodie of the foresaid Philip bishop of Lincolne, and so to be holden in prison, till hee should heare further what should be done.

The other was Robert Chapell, otherwise named Holbech, chaplaine sometime to the lord Cobham: vnto whom likewise it was obiected, that hee being vnder the sentence of excommunication about three or foure yeares, yet notwithstanding to the contempt of the keyes, did continue saying masse, and preaching, and sought not to be reconciled; Chapell denying that he did know any such excommunication giuen out against him. Then was the copie of his excommunication first made by the bishop of Roff, afterward denounced by the bishop of London at Paulscrosse, brought readd before him: and so that done, that Session brake vp for that time, which was about the latter end of May, An. 1416.

The 17. day of the moneth of July next following, the said Chapell appeared againe before the archbishop and the prelats. To whom when it was obiected as before, how hee had preached without the bishops licence, in diuers places, as at Cobham, at Cowling, and at Shorne; at length hee confessing and submitting himselfe, desired pardon. Which although it was not at the first granted vnto him, yet at the last the bishop of Roff. putting in his hands the decree of the canon law; 1.q.7.cap. Quoties, &c. and causing him to reade the same, made him to abiure all his former articles and opinions as hereticall and schismaticall, neuer to hold the same againe, according to the contents of the foresaid canon. Whereupon the said Robert being absolued by the authoritie of the archbishop, (saue only that hee should not intermeddle with saying masse before he had beene dispensed from the pope himselfe for irregularitie) was iniopned by the archbishop himselfe for his penance, standing at Pauls to publish these articles following vnto the people, in stead of his confession giuen him to bee read.

R. Chapel abiureth.

Articles obtruded to R. Chapel to confesse.

In primis, I confesse that bishops, priests, and other ecclesiasticall persons, hauing no other profession to the contrarie, may lawfully haue, receiue, and retaine lands and possessions temporall, to dispense and dispose the same and the rents thereof, to the behoofe of themselues, or of their church where they dwell, according as seemeth good to them.

2 Item, I confesse that it were very vnlawfull, yea rather vniust, that temporall men vpon any occasion, whatsoeuer it be, should take away temporall lands and possessions from the church either vniuersall or particular, to whom they are giuen, the consideration of the abuse of mortall prelats, priests, or other ministers in the church conuersant (which are mixt together good with bad) abusing the same, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Marke well this catholike doctrine of the popes church, concerning remission of sins.

3 Item, I confesse that peregrinations to the reliques of saints and to holy places, are not prohibited, nor to be contemned of any catholike, but are auaileable to remission of sins, and approued of holy fathers, and worthie to be commended.

Marke how this doctrine agreeth with Gods commandement, and with his word.

4 Item, I confesse that to worship the images of Christ or of any other saints, being set vp in the church, or in any other place, is not forbidden: neither is any cause inductiue of Idolatrie, being so vsed as the holy fathers doe will them to bee worshipped: But rather such images doe profit much to the health of christians, because they doe put vs in remembrance of the merits of those saints whom they represent, and the sight of them doth moue and stir vp the people to prayers and deuotion.

Ergo, by this doctrine the iust man liueth not by his faith, but by his confession auricular.

5 Item, I confesse that auricular confession vsed in the church is necessary for a sinner to the saluation of his soule, and necessarie to bee done of such a priest, as is ordained by the church, to heare the confession of the sinner, and to enioyne him penance for the same: without which confession (if it may be had,) there is no remission of sinnes, to him that is in sinne mortall.

6 Item, I confesse and firmely doe hold, that although the priest be in mortall sinne, yet may he make the body of Christ, and minister other Sacraments and Sacramentals: which neuertheless are profitable to all the faithfull, whosoeuer receiueth them in faith and in deuotion of the church.

How can these priests be seruants of Christ which be makers of Christ?

7 Item, I confesse that bishops in their owne dioces, may forbid, decree, or ordaine vpon reasonable causes, that priests should not preach, without their speciall licence, the word of God, and that those that do against the same, should suffer the ecclesiasticall censures.

Priuate religions profitable, if we could tell wherefore.

8 Item, I confesse that priuate religions as well of monks, canons and other, as also of the begging friers, being allowed by the church of Rome, are profitable to the vniuersall church, and in no meanes contrarie to Gods law, but rather founded and authorised thereon.

9 Item, I promise and sweare vpon these holy Euangelies, which I hold here in my hands, that I will henceforth neuer hold, affirme, nor by any meanes teach any thing contrarie vnto the premisses either openly or priuately.

After the setting out of the constitution aforesaid in the daies of the abouenamed Henry Chichesley archbishop of Canturburie, great inquisition hereupon followed in England, and many good men whose hearts began to bee wonne to the Gospell, were brought to much veration and caused outwardly to abiure.

Strait inquisition in England.

Christ had the hearts of men: they had their bodies.

Thus, while Christ had the inward hearts of men: yet the catholicke Antichrist would needs possesse their outward bodies, and make them sing after his song. In the number of whom, being compelled to abiure, besides the other aforesaid, was also John Taylor of the parish of S. Michaels at Quern. William James maister of art and physition, who had long remained in prison, and at length after abiuration, was licenced with his keeper, to practise his physicke.

A briefe sum of such as abiured, vnder Henry Chichesse.
I. Taylor.
M James.
John Dwarke.

Also I. Dwark, so named for his low stature, which was sent by the duke of Bedford to the foresaid Chichesse and other bishops to be examined before them in the conuocation: there hee at length reuolting from his doctrine recanted & did penance.

I. Iourdelay.

In like maner John Iourdelay of Lincolnshire, well commended in the registers for his learning, accused by the priests of Lincolne for a certaine booke, which he contrarie to the former decree of the bishops did conceale and did not exhibite vnto them, was therefore enforced to abiure. After whom was brought likewise before the bishops, one Katharin Dertford a Spinster, who being accused and examined vpon these 3. articles concerning the sacrament of the popes altar, adoration of Images, and of pilgrimage, answered that she was not able, being vnlearned, to answere to such high matters, neither had she any further skill, but onely her Creed and x. commandements: and so was shee committed to the vicar generall of the B. of Wint. (for that she was of the same dioces) to be kept and further to be examined of the same. Ex regist. H. Chichesley.

I. Iourdelay abiureth.

At the same sitting was also brought before the said archbishop and his fellow bishops, by the Lieutenant of the Tower, the parson of Yeggely in Lincolnshire, named M. Rob. who being long kept in the Tower, at length by the kings writ was brought & examined the same time vpon the like articles, to wit: touching the sacrament of their altar, peregrination, adoration of Images, and whether it was lawfull for spirituall men to enioy temporall lordships, &c. To the which articles he answered (saith the Register) doublie and mockingly, saue only in the sacrament he seemed something more conformable, albeit not yet fully to their contentation. Wherfore being committed to the custodie and examination of Richard bishop of Lincolne, in the end he was also induced to submit himselfe.

Robert parson of Yeggeley examined.

The same likewise did M. Henry of Tenterden, being suspected and arrested for companie keeping with them, whom the bishops called Lollards, and for hauing suspected bookes.

M. henry of Tenterden examined.

Besides these, diuers other there were also which in the same conuocation were conuented, and reuoked their opinions, as I. Galle a priest of London, for hauing a booke in English, intituled: A booke of the new law. Item, Richard Wonke, vicar of Chesham in Lincolneshire, who submitted himselfe likewise. In this race and number followed moreouer, Bartholomew Cornmonger, Nic. Hoper seruant to the lord Cobham, Tho. Granter with other mo, mentioned in the foresaid Register.

A booke of the new law: I. Galle: Rob. Wonke. Bart. Cornmonger: N. Hopert Tho. Granter, troubled for their doctrine.

Among the rest which were at this time troubled for their faith, was one Radulph Mungin priest, who for the same doctrine was arrested and sent vp by the lord Chancellor of England, to the foresaid archbishop, and by him committed to Dauid Price, vicar generall to the bishop of London: Where after he had endured foure monethes in prison, hee was by the said Dauid presented to the conuocation, against whom diuers articles were obiected.

But for the better explaning of the matter, first here is to be noted, that touching the time of this conuocation prouinciall, pope Martin had sent downe to the clergie of England, for a subsidie to be gathered of the church, to maintaine the popes warre against the Lollards (so the papists did terme them) of Bohemia. Also another subsidie was demanded to persecute one Peter Clerke maister of Art of Oxford, who flying out of England, was at the councell of Basill, disputing on the Bohemians side. And thirdly, another subsidie was also required to persecute M. Russell, Warden of the gray friers in London, who the same time was fled from England to Rome, to maintaine his opinion before the pope, and there escaped out of prison, &c. of whom more largely hereafter (Christ willing) we shall entreate. In the meane time marke here the pretie shifts of the pope to hooke in the English money by all maner of pretences possible.

A subsidie gathered by the pope to fight against the faithfull of Bohemia.

Romish sleights to get the English money.

Thus Rafe Mungin, the foresaide examinate, appearing before the bishops in the conuocation, it was articulated against him, first that he should affirme and hold, not to be lawfull for any christian to fight and make warre against the heretickes of Bohemia.

Articles obiected against Rafe Mungin.

Item, it was to him obiected, that he did hold and say, not to be lawful for any man to haue propriety of goods, but the same to be common: which he expresslie denied that euer he so said or affirmed. Whereby we haue to obserue, how the craftie malice of these aduersaries vseth falslie to collect and surmise of men, what they neuer spake, wherby to oppresse them wrongfully, whom by plaine truth they cannot expugne.

Moreouer, they obiected against him, that he should keepe companie with maister Clerke aforesaid, and also that hee dispersed in the citie of London, certaine bookes of John Wickliffe and of Peter Clerke, namely, the booke Trialogus, and the gospels of John Wickliffe, &c. He was charged moreouer to haue spoken against the popes indulgences, for that the pope had no more power to giue indulgences then hee had.

Trialogus. The Gospels translated by I. Wickliffe.

Upon these and other such articles obiected, the said Mungin being asked if he would reuoke, answered that it seemed to him not iust or meete so to doe, which did not know himselfe guiltie of any heresie. Thus he being respited for the time, was committed to prison till the next sitting; who then being called diuers and sundrie times afterward before the bishops, after long inquisition and straite examination made, also depositions brought in against him so much as they could search out, hee notwithstanding still denied as before, to recant. Wherefore the foresaid Henrie the archbishop, proceeding to his sentence definitiue, condemned him to perpetuall prison.

Radulfe Mungin condemned to perpetuall prison.

After

Thomas Granter. Richard Monke.

After whole condemnation, the Sunday next following, the recantation of Thomas Granter, and of Richard monke priests aboue mentioned, were openly read at Pauls Crosse, the bishop of Rochester the same time preached at ỹ said Crosse. The tenour of whose recantation, with his articles in the same expressed, here vnder followeth.

The recantation of Thomas Granter. Note the doctrine and opinions in those daies, where the Gospell tooke place.

IN the name of God. Before you my lord of Canturbirie, and all you my lords here being present, and afore you all here gathered at this time, I Thomas Granter priest vnworthie, dwelling in the citie of London, feeling and vnderstanding, that afore this time I affirmed open errors and heresies, saying, beleeuing, and affirming within this citie, that he that christian men callen pope, is not very pope, ner Gods vicarie in earth, but I said he was Antichrist. Also I said, beleeued, and affirmed, that after the sacramentall words said by a priest in the masse, there remaineth materiall bread and wine, and is not turned into Christs body and his blood. Also I said and affirmed that it was not for to doe in no wise, to goe on pilgrimage, but it was better I said to abide at home and beate the stooles with their heeles; for it was, I said, but tree and stone that they soughten. Also I said and affirmed that I held no Scripture catholike ner holy, but onely that is contained in the Bible. For the Legends and liues of saints, I held hem nought, and the miracles written of hem I held vntrue. Because of which errours and heresies I was tofore M. Dauie Price, vicar generall of my lord of London, and since tofore you my lord of Canturburie and your brethren in your councell prouinciall, and by you fully informed, which so said, mine affirming, beleeuing and teaching, bene open errours and heresies, and contrarious to the determination of the church of Rome. Wherefore I willing to follow and sewe the doctrine of holy church, and depart fro all maner errours and heresie, and turne with good will and heart to the one head of the church, considering that holy church shitteth ner closeth not her bosome to him that will turne againe, ne God will not the death of a sinner, but rather he ben turned and liue: with a pure heart I confesse, detest, and despise my said errours and heresies, and the said opinions I confesse as heresies and errours, to the faith of the church of Rome, and to all vniuersally holy church repugnant. And therefore these said opinions in speciall, and all other errours and heresies, doctrines and opinions, ayen the faith of the church, and the determinations of the church of Rome, I abiure and forsweare, here tofore you all, and sweare by these holy Gospels by me bodily touched, that from henceforth I shall neuer hold, teach, ne preach errour, errours, heresie, ne heresies, nor false doctrine against the faith of holy church, and determinatton of the church of Rome, ner none such thing I shall obstinately defend, ne any man holding or teaching such maner things by me or any other person, openly or priuily I shall defend. I shall neuer after this time bee receitor, fautor, counsellor, or defendor of heretickes, or of any person suspect of heresie, ner I shall trow to him, ner wittingly fellaship with him, ner yeue him counsell, fauour, yiftes, ne comfort. And if I know any heretickes, or of heresie, or of such false opinions, any person suspect, or any man or woman making or holding priuie conuenticles, or assemblies, or any diuers or singular opinions from the common doctrine of the church of Rome, or if I may know any of their fautors, comforters, counsellers, or defenders, or any that haue suspect bookes or quiers of such errours and heresies: I shall let you my lord of Canturburie, or your officers in your absence, or the Diocesans and Ordinaries of such men, haue soone and ready knowing, so helpe me God and holydome, and these holy Euangelies by me bodily touched.

One head, that is, the vnitie of the church.

Wentlely to the church of Rome.

¶ After this recantation at the crosse thus published, and his submission made, the said Granter then was by the aduice of the prelats, put to seuen yeeres prisonment, vnder the custodie and charge of the bishop of London.

After this, followed in like maner the recantation of Richard Monke. Also of Edmund Frith, which was before Butler to sir John Oldcastle.

The affliction and trouble in Kent, vnder Chichesley.

Besides these aboue remembred, many and diuers there be in the said register recorded, who likewise for their faith and religion were greatly vexed and troubled, especially in the dioces of Kent, in the townes of Romney, Tenterden, Woodchurche Cranbroke, Stophelherst, Benenden, Halden, Roluenyden and others, where as whole households, both man and wife, were driuen to forsake their houses and townes for danger of persecution: as sufficiently appeareth in the processe of the archbishop Chichelsie against the said persons, and in the certificate of Burbath his officiall, wherein are named these persons following.

Persons persecuted in Kent.

1. W. White priest.	9. W. Chiueling.
2. Tho. Grenested priest.	10. John Tame.
3. Bartho. Cronmonger.	11. John Fowlin.
4. John Wadnon.	12. William Somer.
5. Ioan his wife.	13. Marian his wife.
6. Tho. Euerden.	14. John Abraham.
7. William Euerden.	15. Robert Munden.
8. Steuen Robin.	16. Laurence Coke.

These being cited vp together by the bishop would not appeare. Whereupon great inquisition being made for them by his officers, they were constrained to flie their houses and townes, and shift for themselues as couertly as they might. When Burbath and other officers had sent word to the archb. that they could not be found, then he directed downe order that Citations should bee set vp for them on euery church doze through all townes where they did inhabite, appointing them a day and terme when to appeare. But notwithstanding, when as they yet could not bee taken, neither would appeare, the archbishop sitting in his tribunall seate, proceedeth to the sentence of excommunication against them. What afterward happened to them, in the register doth not appeare: but like it is, at length they were forced to submit themselues.

The seconde apprehension of the lord Cobham.

¶ Concerning sir John Oldcastle the lord Cobham, and of his first apprehension, with his whole storie and life, sufficiently hath beene expressed before, pag. 515. how he being committed to the Tower, and condemned fallie of heresie, escaped afterward out of the Tower & was in Wales about the space of foure yeares. In the which meane time, a great summe of money was proclaimed by the king, to him that could take the said sir John Oldcastle, either quicke or dead. About the end of which foure yeares being expired, the lord Powes, whether for loue and greedinesse of the money, or whether for hatred of the true and sincere doctrine of Christ, seeking all maner of waies how to play the part of Judas, at length obtained his bloodie purpose, and brought the lord Cobham bound vp to London: which was about the yeare of our Lord, 1417. and about the moneth of December. At which time, there was a parliament assembled at London, for the releefe of money the same time to be sent to ỹ king, whom the bishops had sent out (as yee heard before) to fight in France. The records of which parliament doe thus say: that on tuesday the xiij. day of December, and the xxix. day of the said parliament, sir John Oldcastle of Cowling, in the countie of Kent, knight, being outlawed (as is afore minded) in the kings bench, and excommunicated before by the archbishop of Canturburie for heresie, was brought before the lords, and hauing heard his said conuictions, answered not thereto in his excuse. Upon which record and processe, it was adiudged that hee should be taken as a traitor to the king and the realme: that he should be carted to the tower of London, and from thence drawen through London vnto the new gallowes in Saint Giles without Temple barre, and there to be hanged, and burned hanging.

The L. Powes playeth Judas.

Treason falsly surmised.

As touching the pretensed treason of this lord Cobham fallie ascribed vnto him in his inditement, rising vpon wrong suggestion and false surmise, and aggrauated by rigour of words, rather then vpon any ground of due probation, sufficiently hath beene discoursed before in my defence of the said lord Cobham, against Alanus Copus pag. 523. Where againe is to be noted, as I said before, how by this appeareth, that the lord Cobham was neuer executed by force of the inditement or outlawrie, because if he had, he should then haue beene brought to the barre in the kings bench, and there the iudges should haue demanded of him, what he could haue said, why he should not haue died: and then not shewing sufficient cause for the discharge or delay of execution, the iudges should haue awarded and giuen the iudgement of treason: which being not so, it is cleare he was not executed vpon the inditement. Besides, to proue that he was not executed vpon the inditement, and the outlawrie, the maner of the execution proueth it, because it was neither the execution of a traitor, nor was the whole punishment thereof pronounced by the Judge, as by due order of law was requisite.

Vide supra, pag. 523.

Finally, as I said before, here I repeate againe, that albeit the said lord Cobham was attainted of treason by the Act, and that the king, the lords, and the commons assented to the Act: yet all that bindeth not in such sort (as if indeede hee were no traitor) that any man may not by search of the truth, vtter and set forth sincerely and iustly, the very true and certaine cause, whereupon his execution did follow. Which seemeth by all circumstance and firme arguments, to rise principally of his religion, which first brought him in hatred of the bishops: the bishops brought him in hatred of the king: the hatred of the king brought him to his death and martyrdome. And thus much for the death and execution of this worthie seruant of Christ the lord Cobham.

Judas seeketh for his reward.

Moreouer, in the records aboue mentioned it followeth, how in the said parliament, after the martyrdome of this valiant knight, motion then was made, that the lord Powes might be thanked and rewarded, according to the proclamation made, for his great trauell taken in the apprehension of sir John Oldcastle knight, hereticke. Thus stand the words of the record. Where two things are to bee noted: first, how sir John here in the record is called not traitor, but hereticke onely. Secondly, marke how this brother of Judas here craueth his reward, for betraying the innocent blood. Wherein it is not to be doubted, but that his light fee, and quid vultis mihi dare in this world, will haue an heauie reward hereafter in the world to come, vnlesse hee repented, &c.

The description of the cruell Martyrdome of sir Iohn Oldcastle, Lord Cobham.

An. 5. Henr. 5. Act. 17.

Furthermore, in the said Parliament, Act. 17. it was enacted that the church and all estates should enioy all their liberties, which were not repealed, or repealeable by the common law: meaning belike, the excluding of the iurisdiction of the popes forreine power, which hath alwaies by the common law bene excluded out of this realme.

An. 5. Hen. 5. Act. 7.

In the same parliament also a grieuous complaint was made (by the bishops no doubt) against insurrections. In the end they suspected that they were the Lollards, heretickes, and traitors, with a request that commissions might at all times be granted to inquire of them. Wherunto answer was made, that the statutes therefore made should bee executed, &c.

All the blame laid to the Lollards.

Thus the clergie Tanquam leones rugientes, ceased not to roare after christian blood: and whosoeuer was else in fault, still the clergie cried: crucifie Christ, and deliuer vs Barrabas: For then all horrible facts and mischiefes, if any were done, were imputed to the poore Lollards.

And now from our English matters, to returne againe to the storie of the Bohemians, from whence wee haue a little digressed: when as the newes of the barbarous crueltie exercised at Constance against Iohn Hus, and Hierom of Prage, were noised in Boheme, the nobles and gentlemen of Morauia and Boheme, such as fauoured the cause of Iohn Hus, gathering themselues together in the zeale of Christ: first sent their letter vnto the councell, expostulating with them, for the iniurie done to those godly men, as is before expressed, page 554. For the which letter they were all cited vp to the councell. Vnto this letter Sigismund the emperour maketh answere againe in the name of the whole councell: first, excusing himselfe of Iohn Hus his death, which he said was against his safe conduct, and against his will: Insomuch that hee rose in anger from the councell, and departed out of Constance, as is before remembred. Secondly, hee requireth them to bee quiet, and to conforme themselues peaceably vnto the order of the catholike church of Rome, &c.

Also the councell hearing or fearing some stirre to rise among the Bohemians, did make lawes and articles whereby to bridle them, to the number of xxiiij.

Articles decreed in the councell of Constance against the Bohemians.

FIrst, that the king of Bohemia shall be sworne to giue obedience and to defend the liberties of the church of Rome.

That all masters, Doctors and priests, shall be sworne to abiure the doctrine of Wickliffe, and Hus, in that councell condemned.

That all they which being cited, would not appeare, should also be sworne to abiure: and they which would not appeare, contemning the censure of the keies, should haue processe against them, and be punished.

That all such lay men as had defended the causes of Iohn Wicliffe and Iohn Hus, should sweare to defend them no more, and to approue the doings of that councell, and the condemnation of Iohn Hus.

That all such secular men as had spoiled the clergy should be sworne to restitution.

That priests being expelled from their benefices, should be restored againe.

That all prophaners of churches should be punished after the canonicall sanctions.

That such as had beene promoters in the councell against Iohn Hus, should be permitted safely to returne into Boheme againe, and to enioy their benefices.

That the reliques and treasure taken out of the church of Prage, should be restored fully againe.

That the Vniuersitie of Prage should be restored againe and reformed, and that they which had beene the disturbers therof, should be really punished.

That the principall heretickes and doctors of that sect, should be sent vp to ỹ see apostolique, namely, Ioánes Iessenetz, Iacobellus de Misna, Simon de Tysna, Simon de Rochinzano, Christianus de Brachatitz, Ioannes Cardinalis, Zdenko de Loben, The pronoste of Alhallowes, Zaisaus de Suiertitz, and Michael de Czisko.

The fauourers of Iohn Hus in Boheme.

That all Secular men, which communicated vnder both kinds, should abiure that heresie, and sweare to stop the same hereafter.

That they which were ordained Priests by the suffragane of the archbishop of Prage, taken by the lord Zenko, should not be dispensed with, but sent vp to the see apostolicke.

This suffragan was a good man and held with I. Hus.

That the treatises of Iohn Wickliffe, translated into the Bohemian tongue by Iohn Hus, and Iacobellus, should bee brought to the Ordinarie.

Wickliffes bookes translated by I. Hus and Iacobellus into the Bohemian speech.

That the treatises of Iohn Hus condemned in the councell, should also be brought to the Ordinarie

That all the tractations of Iocobellus De vtraque specie, de Antichristo (wherein he calleth the pope Antichrist) Et de remanentia panis post consecrationē, should likewise be brought and burned.

That all songs and ballets made to the preiudice of the councell, and of the catholicke persons of both states, should be forbid to be sung in cities, townes and villages, vnder great and extreme punishment.

That none should preach the word without the licence of the Ordinarie, or of the parson of that place.

That ordinaries and prelats, hauing iurisdiction, should not be stopped in their iurisdiction, by the secular power, vnder paine of excommunication.

That all and singuler persons shall be commanded to obedience, vnder paine of excommunication: and that whosoeuer knoweth any person to fauour any Wickleuistes or their doctrine, or that keepeth companie with suspect persons, he shall present the same to his Dioceſans or his Officials.

That

That the confederacie of the seculars made betweene themselues, or any of the spiritualty, to the preiudice of the foresaid councell, and of the apostolike see and Church of Rome, in the fauour of John Husse, Hierome of Prage, and other in the said councell condemned, shall bee dissolued.

That the rites and ceremonies of christian religion, touching Gods seruice, images, and worshipping of reliques, shall bee obserued, and transgressours of the same bee punished.

Concilium magnanimum.

That all and singuler, either spirituall or secular that shall preach, teach, hold, or maintaine the opinions and articles of John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Hierome, in this councell condemned, and conuict of the same, shall be holden for heretickes, and falling in relapse, shall be burned.

That all secular persons being monished and charged by the Ordinaries, shal be bound to giue their aid and furtherance vnto them, touching the premisses.

The Bohemians, notwithstanding these cruell articles, contemning the vaine deuices of these prelats and fathers of the councell, ceased not to proceede in their league and purpose begunne, ioyning themselues more strongly together.

Deposing of pope John 23. Ex hist. Albani.

In this meane time it happened, that during this councell of Constance, after the deposing of pope John, and spoiling of his goods, which came to 75. thousand pounds of gold and siluer, as is reported in the storie of Saint Albans, pope Martine vpon the day of Saint Martine, was elected. Concerning whose election, great preparation was made before of the councell, so that beside the cardinals, fiue other bishops of euery nation should enter into the conclaue, who there together should be kept with thinne diet, till they had founded a pope. At last, when they were together, they agreed vpon this man, and not tarrying for opening the doore, like mad men, for hast, brast open an hole in the wall, crying out, habemus papam, Martinum, wee haue a Martine pope. The emperour hearing thereof, with the like hast, came apace, and falling downe kissed the new popes feet. Then went they all to the church together, and sang, Te Deum.

The election of pope Martine. The emperor kisseth the popes feet.

The next day following, this Martine was made priest (which before was but a cardinall deacon) and the next day after was consecrate bishop, and sang his first masse, whereat was present 140. mitred bishops. After this the next morow, the new holy pope ordained a generall procession, where a certaine clerke was appointed to stand with flare, and fire, who setting the flare on fire, thus said: Ecce pater sancte, sic transit gloria mundi. i. Behold holy father, thus vadeth ỹ transitorie glory of this world. Which done, the same day the holy father was brought vp vnto an high scaffold (saith the story) I will not say to an high mountaine, where was offered to him all the glorie of the world, &c. there to bee crowned for a triple king. This done, the same day after dinner, the new crowned pope was with great triumph brought through the middest of the citie of Constance, where all the bishops and abbats followed with their miters. The popes horse was all trapt with red skarlet downe to the ground. The Cardinals horses were all in white silke, the emperour on the right side, and prince elector on the left, playing both the popes footemen, went on foote, leading the popes horse by the bridle.

Pope Martine.

The coronation of pope Martine. Meretrix equitans super bestium: Apocalyp.

The pope on horsebacke, the emperour on foote.

As this Pageant thus with the great giant procéded, and came to the market place, there the Iewes (according to the maner) offered to him their law and ceremonies. Which the pope receiuing, cast behind him, saying: Recedant vetera, noua sunt omnia. i. Let old things passe, all things bee made new, &c. Ex hist. S. Alb. ex paralip. Vrsperg. This was Anno 1417.

Why then doth the pope keepe still the old Iewes ceremonies, if al things be made new? Anno 1417

Thus the pope beeing now confirmed in his kingdome, first beginneth to write his letters to the Bohemians, wherein partly he moueth them to catholike obedience, partly hee dissembleth with them, fayning, that if it were not for the emperours requeſt, he would enter processe against them. Thirdly and finally hee threatneth to attempt the vttermost against them, and with all force to inuade them, as well with the apostolicall, as also with the secular arme, if they did still persist, as they began.

Albeit these new threats of the new bishop, did nothing moue the constant hearts of the Bohemians, whom the inward zeale of Christs word had before inflamed.

And although it had beene to be wished, such bloodshed and warres not to haue followed: yet to say the truth, how could these Rabines greatly blame them herein, whom their bloodie tyrannie had before prouoked so vniustly, if now with their glosing letters they could not so easilie appease them againe?

Wherefore these foresaid Bohemians, partly for the loue of John Hus and Hierome their countrimen, partly for the hatred of their malignant papistrie, assembling together, first agreed to celebrate a solemne memoriall of the death of John Hus and Hierome, decréeing the same to bee holden and celebrate yearely. And afterward, by meanes of their friends, they obtained certaine churches of the king, wherin they might freely preach and minister the Sacraments vnto the congregation. This done, they suppressed diuers monasteries, phasicall temples, and idolatrous phanes, beginning first with the great monasterie of the blacke friers, eight miles from Prage, and driuing away the wicked and vicious priests and monks out of them, or compelling them vnto a better order. And thus their number more and more increasing vnder the conduct of a certaine noble man named Nicolas, they went againe vnto the king, requiring to haue more and ampler churches granted vnto them. The king seemed at the first willingly and gently to giue eare vnto the said Nicolas intreating for the people, and commanded them to come againe the next day.

A yerely memoriall of John Hus and Hierome kept among the Bohemians.

When the people were departed, the king turning himselfe to the noble man Nicolas, which taried still behind, said: Thou hast begun a web to put me out of my kingdome, but I will make a rope of it, wherewithall I will hang thée. Whereupon he immediately departed out of the kings presence, and the king himselfe went into the castle of Villegrade: within a while after, into a new castle, which hee himselfe had builded fiue stones casts from thence, sending embassadors to his brother to require aid.

K. Wincelaus threatneth Nicolas.

These protestants being assembled in the towne of Prage, holding their conuentions: the king sent forth his chamberlaine with three hundred horsmen, to runne vpon them: but he hauing respect vnto his life, fled. When newes thereof was brought vnto the king, all that were about him being amazed, vtterly detested the fact: but the kings cupbearer standing by, said: I knew before that these things would thus come to passe. Whom the king in a rage taking hold of, threw him downe before his feet, and with his dagger would haue slaine him: but being letted by such as were about him, with much ado, he pardoned him his life. Immediately ỹ king being taken with a palsie, fell sicke, and within eightéene daies after, when he had marked the names of such whom he had appointed to bee put to death, incessantly calling for aide of his brother, and other his friends, hee departed this life before the princes which hee had sent vnto, were come with aide, when hee had reigned 55. yeares, and was about the age of 57. yeeres.

The death of king Wincelaus.

The marueilous worke of Gods iudgement to be noted, in defending his people.

The storie of Zisca.

Out of Eneas Siluius.

IMmediately after the death of Wenceslaus, there was a certaine noble man named Zisca, borne at Troſnouia, which from his youth vpward, was brought vp in the kings court, and had lost one of his eyes in a battell, where as he had valiantly borne himselfe. This man being sore grieued for the death of John Hus, and Hierome of Prage, minding to reuenge the iniuries which the councell had done, greatly to the dishonour of the kingdome of Boheme, vpon their complices and adherents: he gathered together a number of men of warre, and subuerted the monasteries and idolatrous temples, pulling downe, and breaking in pieces the images and idols, driuing away the priests and monks, which he said were kept vp in their cloisters, like swine in their sties to bee fatted. After this his armie being increased, hauing gathered together about fortie thousand men, he attempted to take the castle of Villegrade, which was but slenderly warded. From thence the said Zisca vnder the conduct of Coranda, went speedily vnto Pelzina, where as he knew he had many friends of his faction, and tooke the towne into his power, fortifying the same very strongly, and those which taried behind, tooke the castle of Villegrade.

Then the queene Sophia being very careful, sent letters and messengers vnto the emperour Sigismund, and other nobles adioyning vnto her, requiring aide and helpe: but the emperour made preparation against the Turke, which had then lately wonne certaine castles of him. Whereupon the queene seeing all aide so farre off, together with Zenko Warterberge, gathered an host with the kings treasure, and fortified the castle of Prage, and the lesser citie which ioyneth vnto the castle, making gates and towers of wood vpon the bridge ouer the riuer Multane, to stoppe that the protestants should haue no passage that way. Then it happened that at the Ile of S. Benedict, one Peter Steremberge fought an equall or indifferent battell with them.

The queene sendeth for Sigismund the emperour.

In the meane time the number of the protestants being increased in Prage, they fought for the bridge. In which battell many were slaine on both parts, but at the length the Husstes wan the bridge, and the nether part of lesser Prage, the queenes part fleeing into the vpper part thereof: where as they turning againe fiercely renued the battell, and fought continually day and night by the space of fiue daies. Many were slaine on both parts, and goodly buildings were raced, and the councell house, which was in a low place, was vtterly defaced and burned.

During the time of this troublous estate, the embassadors of the emperour Sigismund were come: which taking vpon them the rule and gouernance of the realme, made a truce or leagus with the citie of Prage vnder this condition, that the castle of Wisgrade being rendred, it should bee lawfull for them to send emballadours to the emperour Sigismund to intreat as touching their estate, and that Zisca should render Pelzina and Piesta with the other forts which hee had taken. These conditions thus agreed vpon and receiued, all the forreine protestants departed out of the citie, and the Senate of the citie began to gouerne againe according to their accustomed maner, and all things were quieted. Howbeit, the papists which were gone out of the towne, durst not returne againe: but still looked for the emperour, by whose presence they thought they should haue bene safe. But this their hope was frustrate by meanes of certaine letters which were sent from the emperour, wherein it was written that hee would shortly come and rule the kingdome, euen after the same order and maner as his father Charles had done before him. Whereby the protestants vnderstood that their sect and religion should be vtterly banished, which was not begun during the reigne of the said Charles.

About Christmas, the emperour Sigismund came to Brunna a citie of Morauia, and there hee pardoned the citizens of Prage, vnder condition that they would let downe the chaines and barres of the citie, and receiue his rulers and Magistrates. Whereunto the whole citie obeyed, and the magistrates thereof lifting vp their hands vnto heauen, reioyced at the comming of the new king. But the emperour turned another way, and went vnto Uratislauia, the head citie of Slesia, where as a little before, the communaltie of the citie had slaine in an insurrection, the magistrates, which his brother Wencellaus had set in authoritie: the principals whereof he beheaded. The nelves whereof when they were reported at Prage, the citizens being feared by the examples of the Uratislauians, distrusting their pardon, rebelled out of hand, and hauing obtained Cencho on their part, which had the gouernment of the Castle of Prage, they sent letters into all the realme, that no man should suffer the emperour to enter, which was an enemie vnto Boheme, and sought nothing else, but to destroy the kingdome: which also bound the ancient citie of the Pzutenians, vnder order by pledges, and put the Marquesse of Brandenburge from the Bohemian crowne: and had not onely suffered Iohn Hus and Hierome of Prage to be burned at the councell of Canstance, but also procured the same, and with all his indeauour did impugne the doctrine and faith which they taught and followed. Whilest these things were thus done, Zisca hauing giuen ouer Pelzina by composition, was twice assaulted by his enemies, but through policie hee was alwaies victor. The places where they fought, were rough and vnknowne, his enemies were on horsebacke, and all his souldiers on foote, neither could there bee any battell fought, but on foote. Whereupon, when his enemies were allighted from their horses, Zisca commanded the women which customablie followed the host, to cast their kerchieffes vpon the ground, wherein the horsemen being intangled by their spurres, were slaine before they could vnloose their feet.

The citie of Prage fell from the emperour.

The policie of Zisca.

After this, he went vnto Ausca, a towne situate vpon the riuer Lusinitius, out of which towne Procopius and Ulricius, two brethren papists, had cast out many protestants. This towne Zisca tooke by force of armes the first night of Lent, raced it, and set it on fire. He also tooke the castle of Litius, which was a mile off, whither as Ulricius was fled, and put Ulricius and all his familie to the sword, sauing one onely.

Then, forsomuch as hee had no walled or fensed towne to inhabite, hee chose out a certaine place vpon the same riuer, which was fensed by nature, about eight miles from the citie of Ausca. This place hee compassed in with walles, and commanded euery man to build them houses, where they had pitched their tents, and named this citie Thabor, and the inhabitants his companions Thaborites, because their citie by all like, was builded vpon the top of some hill or mount. This citie, albeit that it was fensed with high rockes and cleaues, yet was it compassed with a wall and baumure, and the riuer of Lucinitius fenseth a great part of the towne; the rest is compassed in with a great brooke, the which running straight into the riuer Lusinitius, is stopped by a great rocke, and driuen backe towards the right hand, all the length of the citie, and at the further end it ioyneth with the great riuer. The way vntoit by land is scarce thirtie foote brode, for it is almost an Iland. In this place there was a deepe ditch cast, and a triple wall made, of such thicknesse, that it could not be broken with any engine. The wall was full of towers and forts set in their conuenient and meet places. Zisca was the first that builded the castle, and those that came after him, fortified it, euery man according to his owne deuice. At that time the Thaborites had no horsemen amongst them, vntill such time as Nicolas, master of the mint (whom the emperour had sent into Bohemia with a M. horsemen to set things in order, and to withstand the Thaborites lodging all night in a village named Nogize) was surprised by Zisca comming vpon him suddenly in the night, taking away all his horse and armour, and setting fire vpon the village. Then Zisca taught his Souldiers to mount on horsebacke, to leape, to runne, to turne, to cast in a ring, so that after this hee neuer led armie without his wings of horsemen.

The citie of Thabor builded.

In this meane time Sigismundus the emperour gathering together the nobles of Slesia, entred into Boheme, and went vnto Grecium, and from thence with a great armie vnto Cuthna, alluring Cencho with many great and large promises, to render vp the castle of Prage vnto him, and there placed himselfe to annoy the towne. Thus Cencho infamed with double treason, returned home. The Citizens of Prage sent for Zisca, who speeding himselfe thither with the Thaborites, receiued the citie vnder his gouernance. In the Bohemians host there was but onely two Barons, Yulco Crussina of Lituburge, and Yulco of Waldestene, with a few other nobles. All the residue were of the common people. They went about first to subdue the castle, which was by nature very strongly fensed, and could not be wonne by any other meanes then with famine: whereupon all the passages were stopped, that no victuals should be caried in. But the Emperour opened the passages by dint of sword, and when he had giuen vnto them which were besieged, all things necessarie, hauing sent for aid out of the empire, he determined shortly after to besiege the citie. There were in the emperours campe the dukes of Saron, the marquesse of Brandenburge, and his sonne in law Albert of Austrich. The citie was assaulted by the space of fiue weekes. The emperour Sigismund was crowned in the Metropolitane house in the castle, Conradus the archbishop solemnising the ceremonies of the coronation. The city was straitly besieged. In ỹ meane time the captaines Rosenses and Chragerie, which had taken the tents of the Thaborites, being ouercome in battell by Nicolas Hus, whom Zisca had sent with part of his power for that purpose, were driuen out of their tents, and Grecium the queenes citie was also taken.

Prage besieged of Sigismund.

There is also aboue the towne of Prage a high hill, which is called Widechon. On this hill had Zisca strongly planted a garrison, that his enemies should not possesse it, with whom the Marquesse of Misnia skirmishing, lost a great part of his souldiers. For when as the Misnians had gotten the toppe of the hill, being driuen backe into a corner, which was broken and steepe, and fiercely set vpon, when as they could no longer withstand the violent force of their enemies, some of them were slaine, and some falling headlong from the hill, were destroyed. Whereupon the emperour Sigismund raising his siege, departed vnto Cuthna, and Zisca with his companie departed vnto Thabor, and subdued many places: amongst which hee subuerted a towne pertaining to the captaine of Wisgrade. During this time the castle of Wisgrade was strongly besieged, where as, when other victuals wanted, they were compelled to eate horse flesh. Last of all, except the emperour did aide them by a certaine day, they promised to yeeld it vp, but vnder this condition, that if the Emperour did come, they within the castle should be no more molested.

The emperour was present before the day, but being ignorant of the truce taken, entring into a straite vnderneath the castle, was suddenly set vpon by the souldiers of Prage, where he had a great ouerthrow, and so leauing his purpose vnperformed, returned backe againe. There were slaine in that conflict fiftie noble men of the Morauians, and of the Hungarians, and other a great number. The castle was deliuered vp vnto them. Whilest these things were in doing, Zisca tooke Bollaus a captaine, which was surnamed Cigneus, by force, in a very strong towne of his, and brought him vnto his religion. Who a few yeares after, leading the protestants host in Austria, was wounded before Rhetium, and died. There were in the territorie of Pelzina many Monasteries, of the which Zisca subuerted and burned fiue. And forsomuch as the Monasterie of saint Clare was the strongest, there he pitched himselfe.

The emperour fighting against Zisca had the ouerthrow.

The abbeies of Pelzina subuerted.

Thither also came the emperour with his armie: but when Zisca brought forth his power against him, hee most cowardly fled, and not long after, he departed and left Boheme. Then Zisca went with his armie vnto Pelzina; but forasmuch as he saw the citie so fensed, that hee was in doubt of winning the same, hee went from thence to Commitauia a famous citie, the which hee tooke by force, burning all the priests therein.

Afterward, when as he lay before the towne of Raby, and strongly besieged the same, he was stricken with a shaft in the eye, hauing but that one before to see withall. From thence, he was caried to Prage to physitions, where as hee being cured of his wound, and his life saued, yet hee lost his sight, and for all that, hee would not forsake his armie, but still tooke the charge of them.

Zisca, albeit he lost his eyes, yet would not forsake his armie.

After this, the garrisons of Prage went vnto Warona, where as there was a great garrison of the emperors, and tooke it by force, many being slaine of either part. They also tooke the towne of Broda in Germanie, and slue the garrison, and afterward tooke Cuthna and many other cities by composition. mocking them by the way, because they durst not ioyne battell, they returned backe. After all this, the emperor appointed the princes electors a day, that at Bartholmewtide, they should with their army inuade the West part of Boheme, and hee with an host of Hungarians would enter on the East part. There came vnto his aid the archbishoppe of Mentz, the countie Palatine of Rheine, the dukes of Saxon, the marquesse of Brandenburge, and many other bishops out of Almaine: all the rest lent their aides. They encamped before the towne of Sozius, a strong and well fenced place, which they could by no meanes subdue. The country was spoiled and wasted round about, and the siege continued vntill the feast of Saint Galle. Then it was broken vp, because the emperor was not come at his day appointed: but hee hauing gathered togethet a great army of the Hungarians, and well Moranians, about Christmas entred into Boheme, and toke certaine townes by force, and Cuthna was yelded vnto him. But when Zisca (although he was blind) came towards him, and set vpon him, he being afraid, and many of his nobles slaine, fled. But first hee burned Cuthna, which the Taborits, by meanes of the siluer mines, called the powch of Antichrist. Zisca pursuing the emperor a daies iourny, got great and rich spoile, and taking the towne of Broda by force, set it on fire: the which afterward almost by the space of fourteen yeares, remained vninhabitted. The emperor passed by a bridge ouer the riuer of Iglaria. And Pilo a Florentine, which had brought fifteene thousand horsemen out of Hungary to these warres, passed ouer the yce, the which by the multitude and number of his horsemen being broke, deuoured and destroied a great number. Zisca hauing obtained this victory, would not suffer any image or idoll to be in the churches, neither thought it to be borne withall, that priests should minister with copes or vestiments: for the which cause hee was much the more enuied amongst the states of Boheme. And the consuls of Prage being agreeued at the insolencie of John Premonstratensis, called him and nine other of his adherents, whom they supposed to be the principals of this faction, into the councell house, as though they would conferre with them as touching the commonwealth: and when they were come in, they slew them, and afterward departed home euery man to his owne house, thinking the citie had been quiet, as though nothing had been done. But their seruants being not circumspect enough, washing downe the court yard, washed out also the bloud of those that were slaine, through the sinks or chanels: the which being once seene, the people vnderstood what was done. By and by there was a great tumult: the councell house was straight way ouerthrowne, and eleuen of the principall citizens, which were thought to be the authors thereof, were slaine, and diuers houses spoiled.

The martyrdome of certain godly Bohemians falsly circumuented and killed with the sword.

Privy murther at length commeth out.

About the same time, the castell of Purgell, wherein the emperor had left a small garrison (whither as also many papists with their wiues & children were fled) was through negligence burned, and those which escaped out of the fire, went vnto Pelsina. After this, diuers of the Bohemian captaines, and the senat of Prage, sent ambassadors to Vitold Duke of Lituania, and made him their king. This did Zisca and his adherents gainsay. This Vitold sent Sigismund Coributus, with two thousand horsemen into Boheme, who was honorably receiued of the inhabitants of Prage. At his comming, they determined to lay siege vnto a castell situate vpon a hill, which was called Charles stone.

Here Sigismundus had left for a garrison foure centurions of souldiers. The tents were pitched in three places. The siege continued six moneths, and the assault neuer ceased day and night. Fiue great slings threw continually great stones ouer the walles, and about two thousand vessels, tubs, or baskets, filled with dead carcases and other excrements, were cast in amongst those which were besieged: which thing did so infect them with stench, that their teeth did either fall out, or were all lose. Notwithstanding they bare it out with stout courage, and continued their fight vntill the winter, hauing privily receiued medicine out of Prage, to fasten their teeth againe.

Stench very hurtfull for the teeth.

In the meane time Fredericke the elder, prince of Brandenburge, entring into Boheme with a great power, caused them of Prage to raise the siege. And Vitoldus at the request of Uladillaus king of Pole, which had talked with the emperor in the borders of Hungary, called Coributus his vncle, with his whole army out of Boheme. Whereupon the emperor supposed that the protestants being destitute of forren aid, would the sooner doe his commandement: but hee was farre deceiued therein; for they leading their armies out of Boheme, subdued the borderers thereupon adioyning. It is also reported, that Zisca went into Austrich, and when as the husbandmen of the countrey had carried away a great number of their cattell by water into an Isle of the riuer called Danubius, and by chance had left certaine calues and swine in their villages behind them: Zisca draue them vnto the riuers side, and kept them there so long, beating them, and causing them to roare out and cry, vntill that the cattell feeding in the Iland, hearing the lowing and grunting of the cattell on the other side the water, for the desire of their like, did swim ouer the riuer: by the meanes whereof, he got and draue away a great booty.

Another warlike policie of Zisca. Stratagema.

About the same time, the emperor Sigismundus gaue vnto his sonne in law Albert duke of Austrich, the country of Moraiia, because it should not want a ruler. At the same time also Ericius king of Denmarke, and Peter Infant, brother to the king of Portingall and father of James, cardinall of Saint Eustachius, came vnto the emperor, being both very expert men in the affaies of warre, which did augment the emperors host with their aid and power. Whereupon, they straightway pitched their campe before Lutemperge, a towne of Moraiia, and continued the siege by the space of three moneths. There was at that time a certaine knight at Prage surnamed Aqua, which was very rich and of great authority. This man, forsomuch as he had no child of his owne, adopted vnto him his sisters sonne, named Procopius: whom when he was of meane nature & age, he carried with him into France, Spaine, and Italy, and vnto Jerusalem, and at his returne caused him to be made priest. This man when the Gospell began to flourish in Boheme, toke part with Zisca; and forsomuch as he was strong and valiant, and also painfull, he was greatly esteemed.

This Procopius for his valiant acts, was afterward called Procopius Magnus, and had committed vnto him the whole charge of the prouince of Moraiia, and the defence of the Lutemperges, who receiuing a great power by force (maugre all the whole power which lay in the siege) carried victuals into the towne which was besieged, and so did frustrate the emperors siege. The emperor before this had deliuered vnto the marquesses of Misnia, the bridge and towne of Aulca, vpon the riuer of Albis, that they should fortifie them with their garrisons. Whereupon Zisca besieged Aulca, and Frederike the marquesse of Misnia, with his brother the Lantzgraue of Turing, gathering together a great army out of Saronia, Turing, Misnia, and both the Lusaces, determined to rescue and aid those which were besieged.

Procopius Magnus.

The valiant courage of Procopius.

There was a great battell fought before the city, and the victory depended long vncertaine, but at last it fell on the protestants part. There were slaine in that battell, the Burgraues of Misnia or Chrzpogenses, the barons of Gychen, and many other nobles, beside nine thousand common souldiers, and the towne of Aulca was taken and vtterly raced.

The victory of protestants.

At the last, dissension rising betweene Zisca and them of Prage, they of Prage prepared an army against him, wherewith he perceiuing himselfe ouermatched, fled vnto the riuer of Albis, and was almost taken, but that hee had passage thorow the towne of Poggiebras; but they of Prage pursuing the taile of the battell, slew many of his Taborites. At the length they came vnto certaine hils, where as Zisca going into the valley, knowing the straits of the place, that his enemies could not spread their army, he commanded his standard to stand stil, and exhorting and encouraging his souldiers hee gaue them battell.

The battell between the citie of Prage and Zisca.

This battell was very fierce and cruell: but Zisca hauing the vpper hand, slew three thousand of them of Prage, and put the rest to flight, and straightwaies toke the citie of Cuthna by force (which they of Prage had repaired) and set it on fire: then with all speed he went with his army to besiege Prage, and incamped within a bow shot of the towne. There were many both in the citie, and also in his host which grudged sore at that siege: some accusing Zisca, other some them of Prage. There were great tumults in the campe, the souldiers saying that it was not reasonable, that the city should be suppressed, which was both the head of the kingdome, and did not dissent from them in opinion, saying; that the Bohemians power would soone decay, if their enemies should know that they were diuided within themselues: also that they had sufficient wars against the emperor, and that it was but a foolish deuice to moue wars amongst themselues. This talke came vnto the eare of Zisca, who calling together his army, standing vpon a place to bee heard, spake in these words.

The noble victory of Zisca.

BRethren, be ye not agreeued against me, neither accuse him which hath sought your health and safegard. The victories which yee haue obtained vnder my conduct, are yet fresh in memory, neither haue I brought you at any time vnto any place, from whence you haue not come victors. You are become famous and rich, and I for your sake haue lost my sight, and dwell in darknesse. Nothing haue I gotten by all these fortunate battels, but onely a vaine name. For you haue I fought, and for you haue I vanquished; neither doe I repent me of my trauels, neither is my blindnesse greeuous vnto me, but onely that I cannot prouide for you, according to my accustomed manner; neither doe I persecute them of Prage for mine owne cause, for it is your bloud that they thirst and seeke for, and not for mine. It were but small pleasure for them to destroy me, being now an old man and blinde; it is your valiantnesse and stout stomaches which they feare. Either must you or they perish: who whilest they seeme to lie in wait for me, doe seeke after your liues. You must rather feare ciuill wars then forren, and ciuill sedition ought first to be auoided. And then hauing but a few of his faction left, we may with the leſſe feare looke for it: better then if theſe doubtfull citizens of Prage were ſtill in our campe. But becauſe ye ſhall accuſe me no more, I giue you free libertie to doe what you will. If it pleaſe you to ſuffer them of Prage to liue in quietneſſe, I will not be againſt it, ſo that there be no treaſon wrought. If you determin to haue war, I am alſo ready. The hearts of the ſouldiers altered by the oration of Ziſca.

When hee had ſpoken theſe words, the ſouldiers mindes were changed, and wholly determined to make warres, ſo that the yran by and by to take vp their armor and weapons, to run vnto the walles to prouoke their enemies to fight for the gates of the citie. Ziſca in the meane time prepared all things ready for the aſſault. There is a little from Pelſina, a certaine village named Rochezana. In this place there was a child borne of poore and baſe parentage, whoſe name was John: he came vnto Prage, and got his liuing there by begging, and learned Grammar and Logicke. When he came to mans ſtate, he became the ſchoolemaſter of a noble mans child: and for ſo much as he was of an excellent wit and ready tongue, he was receiued into the colledge of the poore: and laſt of all, being made prieſt, hee began to preach the word of God to the citizens of Prage, and was named Ioannes de Rochezana, by the name of the towne where he was borne. This man grew to be of great name and authority in the towne of Prage. Whereupon when as Ziſca beſieged Prage, he by the conſent of the citizens, went out into the campe, and reconciled Ziſca againe vnto the citie.

Peace betweene Ziſca & Prage, by the meanes of Iohn de Rochezana.

When as the emperor perceiued that all things came to paſſe according vnto Ziſca his will and mind, and that vpon him alone the whole ſtate of Boheme did depend, he ſought priuie meanes to reconcile and get Ziſca into his fauor, promiſing him the gouernance of the whole kingdome, the guiding of all his hoſtes and armies, and great yeerly reuenewes if he would proclaime him king, and cauſe the cities to be ſworne vnto him. Upon which conditions, when as Ziſca for the performance of the couenants went vnto the emperor, being in his iourny at the caſtell of Pziſcouia, he was ſtricken with ſickneſſe and died.

IOhn Ziſca, not inferior to an emperor or captaine in warlike policie, a ſeuere puniſher of the pride and auarice of the clergy, and a defender of my country, doe lie here. That which Appius Claudius by giuing good counſell, and M. Furius Camillus by valiantneſſe did for the Romans; the ſame, I being blinde, haue done for my Bohemians. I neuer lacked opportunity of battell, neither did fortune at any time faile me. I being blind, did foreſee all opportunity of well ordering or doing my buſineſſe. Eleuen times in ioyning battell, I went victor out of the field. I ſeemed to haue worthily defended the cauſe of the miſerable and hungry, againſt the delicate, fat, and gluttonous prieſts, and for that cauſe to haue receiued helpe at the hands of God. If their enuie had not let it, without doubt I had deſerued to be numbred amongſt the moſt famous men. Notwithſtanding my bones lie here in this hallowed place, euen in deſpite of the pope.

¶ Iohn Ziſca a Bohemian, enemy to all wicked and couetous prieſts, but with a godly zeale.

And thus haue you the acts and doings of this worthy Ziſca, and other Bohemians, which for the more credit we haue drawne out of Aeneas Syluius, onely his railing termes excepted, which we haue here ſuppreſſed.

All this while the emperor with the whole power of the Germans, were not ſo buſie on the one ſide, but Martin the pope was as much occupied on the other ſide: who about the ſame time directed downe a terrible bull, full of all poiſon, to all biſhops and archbiſhops, againſt all ſuch as tooke any part or ſide with Wickliffe, Iohn Hus, Ierome, or with their doctrine and opinions. The copie of which bull, which I found in an old written monument, I wiſh the reader throughly to peruſe, wherein he ſhall ſee the pope to powre out at once all his poiſon.

Poznamen. and Nitrien. and alſo to our beloued children the Inquiſitors appointed of the prelats aboue recited, or where elſe ſoeuer, vnto whom theſe preſent letters ſhall come, greeting, and Apoſtolicall benediction. Amongſt all other paſtorall cares wherewith wee are oppreſſed, this chiefly and ſpecially doth inforce vs, that heretikes with their falſe doctrine and errors, being vtterly expulſed from amongſt the company of chriſtian men, and roted out (ſo farre forth as God will make vs able to doe) the right and catholike faith may remaine ſound and vndefiled: and that all chriſtian people, immoueable and inuiolate, may ſtand and abide in the ſincerities of the ſame faith, the whole vaile of obſcuritie being remoued. But lately in diuers places of the world, but ſpecially in Bohemia, and the dukedome of Morauia, and in the ſtraits adioyning thereunto, certaine archheretikes haue riſen and ſprung vp, not againſt one onely, but againſt diuers and ſundry documents of the catholike faith, being landlopers, ſchiſmatikes, and ſeditious perſons, fraught with diuelliſh pride and wolviſh madneſſe, deceiued by the ſubtilty of ſatan, and from one euill vanity brought to a worſe. Who although they roſe vp and ſprang in diuers parts of the world, yet agreed they all in one, hauing their tailes as it were knit together: to wit, John Wickliffe of England, John Hus of Bohemia, and Ierome of Prage of damnable memory, who drew with them no ſmall number to miſerable ruine and infidelity. For when as thoſe and ſuch like peſtiferous perſons did in the beginning of their poiſoned doctrine, obſtinately ſow and ſpread abroad peruerſe and falſe opinions, that prelats who had the regiment and execution of the iudicial power, like dumbe dogs, not able to bark, neither yet reuenging ſpeedily with the Apoſtle, all ſuch diſobedience, nor regarding corporally to caſt out of the lords houſe (as they were inioined by the canons) thoſe ſubtill and peſtilent archheretikes, and their woluiſh fury and cruelty, with all expedition, but ſuffering their falſe and pernitious doctrine negligently, by their ouerlong delaies, to grow and wax ſtrong: a great multitude of people in ſtead of true doctrine receiued thoſe things, which they did long falſly, pernitiouſly and damnably ſow among them, and giuing credit vnto them, fell from the right faith, and are intangled (the more pitie) in the foule errors of Paganiſme.

All theſe errors and hereſies be, for that they ſpeake againſt the priuiledges of prelats and their exceſſiue dignities.

Inſomuch, that thoſe archheretikes, and ſuch as ſpring of them, haue infected the catholike flocke of Chriſt in diuers climats of the world, and parts bordering vpon the ſame, and haue cauſed them to putrifie in the filthy dunghill of their lies. Wherefore the generall ſynod of Conſtance, was compelled with Saint Auguſtine to exclaime againſt ſo great and ruinous a plague of faithfull men, and of the ſound and true faith it ſelf, ſaying: What ſhall the ſoueraigne medicine of the church doe, with motherly loue ſeeking the health of her ſheepe, chaſing as it were, amongſt a company of men frantike, and hauing the diſeaſe of the Lethargy? what? ſhall ſhee deſiſt and leaue off her good purpoſe? No not ſo. But rather let her, if there be no remedy, be ſharpe to both theſe ſorts, which are the grieuous enemies of her wombe. For the phyſition is ſharpe vnto the man diſtraught and raging in his frenſie, and yet hee is a father to his owne rude and vnmannerly ſonne, in binding the one, in beating the other, by ſhewing therein his great loue vnto them both. But if they be negligent, and ſuffer them to periſh (ſaith Auguſtine) this manſuetude is rather to be ſuppoſed falſe cruelty.

All the Pagans with the pope, that like not his ſuperſtitious and idolatrous traditions.

A great difference betweene a louing mother, and the frantike whore of Babylon.

And therefore the foreſaid ſynod, to the glory of almighty God, and preſeruation of his catholike faith, and augmenting of chriſtian religion, and for the ſaluation of mens ſoules, hath corporally reiected and caſt forth of the houſhold of God, the foreſaid John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Ierome; who amongſt other things, did beleeue, preach, teach, and maintaine of the ſacrament of the altar, and other ſacraments of the church and articles of the faith, contrary to that the holy church of Rome beleeueth, holdeth, preacheth and teacheth, and haue preſumed obſtinatly to preach, teach, hold, and beleeue many other moe, to the damnation of themſelues and of others: and the ſaid ſynod hath ſeparated the ſame, as obſtinate and malapert heretikes from the communion of the faithfull people, and haue declared them to be ſpiritually throwne forth. And many other things both wholſome and profitable hath the ſame councell as touching the premiſſes, ſtabliſhed and decreed, whereby they, which by the meanes of thoſe archheretikes, and by their falſe doctrine, haue ſpiritually departed from the Lords houſe, may by the canonicall rules be reduced to the ſtraight path of truth and verity.

And moreouer (as we to our great griefe doe heare) not onelie in the kingdome of Bohemia, and dukedome of Morauia and other places aboue recited, but alſo in certaine parts and prouinces neere adioyning and bordering vpon the ſame; there bee many other of the ſectaries and followers of the foreſaid archheretikes and hereticall opinions, caſting behinde their backes as well the feare of God, as the ſhame of the world, neither receiuing fruit of conuerſion and repentance by

by the miserable destruction of the foresaid John Hus and Jerome, but as men drowned in the dungeon of their sinnes, cease not to blaspheme the Lord God, taking his name in vaine (whose mindes the father of lies hath damnably blinded) and doe reade and study the foresaid bookes or workes, containing heresies and errors, being lately by the foresaid Synod condemned to bee burned: also to the perill of themselues and many other simple men, and against the statutes, decrees, and ordinances in the Synod aforesaid, and the canonicall sanctions, doe presume to preach and teach the same, to the great perill of soules, the derogation of the Catholike faith, and slander of many other besides. Wee therefore considering that error, where it is not resisted, seemeth to bee allowed and liked; and having a desire to resist such euill and pernicious errors, and vtterly rote them out from amongst the company of faithfull christians, especially from the afore recited places of Bohemia, Moravia, and other straits and Ilands ioyning and bordering vpon the same, lest they should stretch out and enlarge their limits: wee will and command your discretions by our letters apostolicall, the holy councell of Constance approuing and allowing the same, that you that are archbishops, bishoppes, and other of the clergy, and euery one of you by himselfe, or by any other or others, being graue and fit persons to haue spirituall iurisdiction; doe see that all and singuler persons, of what dignitie, office, preeminence, state, or condition soeuer they bee, and by what name soeuer they are knowne, which shall presume otherwise to teach, preach, or obserue, touching the most high and excellent, the most wholsome and superadmirable sacrament of the bloud of our Lord Jesus Christ, or else of the sacrament of Baptisme, confession of sinnes, penance for sinnes, and extreme vnction, or else of any other sacraments of the church, and the articles of the faith, then that, which the right, holy & vniuersall church of Rome doth hold, teach, preach, and obserue: or else that shal presume obstinately by any waies or meanes, priuily or apertly, to hold, beleeue and teach the articles, bookes, or doctrine of the foresaid archheretikes, John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Hieronymus of Prage, being by the foresaid Synod of Constance with their authors (as is said) damned and condemned, or dare presume publikely or priuily to allow or commend in any wise the death and end of the said archheretikes, or of any other their receiuers, aiders, and fauourers in the fauour or supportation of the foresaid errors, as also their beleeuers and adherents: that then as before, you see and cause them, and euery of them, to bee most seuerely punished, and that you iudge and giue sentence vpon them as heretikes, and that as arrant heretikes you leaue them to the secular court or power. Let the receiuers also and fauourers and defenders of such most pestiferous persons, notwithstanding they neither beleeue, fauor, nor haue deuotion towards their errors, but happily shall receiue or entertaine such pestiferous persons, because of carnall affection, or friendly loue, besides the punishment due vnto them by both lawes, ouer and aboue the same punishment by competent Judges bee so afflicted, and for so hainous acts of theirs, with so seuere paine and punishment excruciated, that the same may be to other in like case offending, an example of terror: that at the least, those whom the feare of God by no meanes may reuoke from such euill doing, yet the seuerity of this our discipline may force and constraine.

Et os eius sicut os Leonis. And his mouth is like the mouth of a lion. Apoc. 13.

Draconis hæc sanguine scripta. The popes religion hath left all sense of humanity.

As touching the third sort, which shall bee any manner of waies infected with this damnable sect, and shall after competent admonition repent and amend themselues of such errors and sects aforesaid, and will returne againe into the lap and vnitie of our holy mother the church, and fully acknowledge and confesse the catholike faith: towards them let the seuerity of iustice, as the quality of the fact shall require, be somewhat tempered with a taste of mercy.

* Et vidi bestiam & reges terræ & exercitus eorum pugnantes cum illo qui sedebat in equo, & exercitu eius. Apoc. 13. Et data est illi potestas in omnem tribum, & populum & linguam & gentem. 1. And power is giuen him ouer all tribes, and people, and tongues, and nations, &c. Apoc. 13.

✠ And furthermore wee will and command, that by this our authority Apostolicall, ye exhort and admonish all the professors of the Catholike faith, as Emperors, Kings, Dukes, Princes, Marquesses, Earles, Barons, Knights, and other Magistrates, Rectors, Consuls, Proconsuls, Shires, Countries and Vniuersities of the kingdomes, prouinces, cities, townes, castels, villages, their lands and other places, and all other executing temporall iurisdiction, according to the forme and exigence of the law, that they expell out of their kingdomes, prouinces, cities, townes, castels, villages and lands, and other places, all and all manner of such heretikes, according to the effect and tenor of the Councell of Lateran, beginning, Sicut ait ecclesia, &c. that those whom publikelie and manifestly by the euidence of their deeds, shall be knowne to be such as like sicke and scabbed sheepe infect the Lords flocke, they expell and banish till such time as from vs, or you, or else other ecclesiasticall Judges or Inquisitors holding the faith and communion of the holy Church of Rome, they shall receiue other order and countermand: and that they suffer no such within their shires and circuits, to preach or to keepe either house or family, either yet to vse any handy craft or occupations or other trades of merchandise, or else to solace themselues any waies, or frequent the company of christian men.

And furthermore, if such publike and knowne heretikes shall chance to die, (although not so denounced by the church) yet in this so great a crime, let him and them want christian buriall, and let no offerings or oblations be made for them, nor receiued. His goods and substance also from the time of his death, according to the canonical sanctions being confiscat, let no such enioy them to whom they appertaine, till that by the ecclesiasticall Judges, hauing power and authority in this behalfe, sentence vpon that his or their crime of heresie, be declared, and promulgate: and let such owners as be found suspect or noted with any such suspition of heresie, before a competent and ecclesiasticall Judge, according to the consideration and exigence of that suspition, and according to the quality of the person, by the arbitrement of such a Judge, shew and declare his proper and owne innocency with deuotion, as beseemeth in that behafe. And if in his purgation, being canonically interdicted, he doe faile, or be not able canonically to make his purgation, or that he refuse to take his oth by damnable obstinacy to make such purgation; then let him bee condemned as an heretike. But such as through negligence or through slothfulnesse, shall omit to shew their said innocency, and to make such purgation, let him be excommunicat, and so long put out from the company of christian men, till that they shall make condigne satisfaction: so that if by the space of one whole yeere, they shall remaine in such excommunication, then let them as heretikes be condemned.

And further, if any shall be found culpable in any point of the foresaid pestiferous doctrine of the archheretikes aforesaid, or in any article thereof, whether it be by the report of the seditious, or else well disposed; let them yet be punished according to the canons. If only through infamy and suspicion of the foresaid articles, or any of them, any man shall be found suspect, and in his purgation canonicall for this thing being interdicted, shall faile: let him be accounted as a man conuict, and as a conuict person by the canons let him be punished.

Note the tenderes of this louing mother the church of Rome.

And furthermore, we inuocating and putting in execution the canon of our predecessor of happy memory, pope Boniface the eighth, which beginneth thus: Vt inquisitionis negocium, &c. Inexhorting wise require, and also command all temporall potentates, Lords and Judges afore recited, by what soeuer dignities, offices, & names they are knowne: that as they desire to be had, esteemed, and counted for the faithfull members and children of the church, and doe reioyce in the name of Christ: so in likewise for defence of the same faith, they will obey, intend, giue their aid and fauorable helpe to you that are archbishops, bishoppes, and ecclesiasticall men, inquisitors of all hereticall prauitie, and other Judges and ecclesiasticall persons by you hereunto, as aforesaid, appointed (holding the faith and communion of our holy mother the church) for the searching out, taking, and safe custody of all the aforesaid heretikes, their beleeuers, their fauorers, their receiuers, and their defenders, whensoeuer they shall be thereunto of them required.

Et faciet omnes pusillos, & magnos, & diuites, & pauperes, & seruos, &c. & dare eis characterem in manu sua dextra. 1. And he shall make both little and great, rich and poore, free and bond to take his character in their right hand, &c. Apoc. 13.

And that they bring and cause to be brought (all delay set apart) the foresaid pestiferous persons so seeking to destroy others with them, into such safe keeping and prisons, as by you the archbishoppes, bishoppes, clergy and inquisitors aforesaid, are to be appointed, or else vnto such other place or places, as either you or they shall command within any of their dominions, gouernments and rectories, where they by catholike men, that is, by you the archbishoppes, bishoppes, the clergy and inquisitors, or any other that shall bee by you appointed, or are already appointed by any of you, may bee holden and kept in safe keeping, putting them in fetters, shackles, bolts, and manacles of yron vnder most strait custody for escaping away, till such time as all that businesse which belongeth vnto them, be by the iudgement of the church finished and determined, and that of such heresie, by a competent ecclesiasticall Judge (which firmely holdeth the faith and communion of the aforesaid holy Church of Rome) they be condemned.

Satan rattleth his chaines.

The residue let the foresaid temporall lords, rectors, Judges, or other their officers & purseuants, take amongst them, with condigne deaths, without any delay to punish. But fearing lest to the preiudice and slander of the foresaid catholike faith and religion, through the pretext of ignorance, any man herein should be circumuented, or that any subtill and crafty men should vnder the vaile of friuolous excuse, cloke and dissemble in this matter; and that as touching the conuincing or apprehending of the foresaid heretikes, their receiuers and defenders, fauorers, beleeuers, and adherents, and also of such as are suspect of heresie, and with such like peruerse doctrine in any wise spotted, wee might giue more perfect instruction; Therefore as well to the kingdome of Bohemia, and parts néere adioyning to the same, as all other where this superstitious doctrine first began to spread, we haue thought it good to send the articles hereunder written concerning the sect of those archheretikes, for the better direction of the foresaid catholike faith.

Touching which articles, by vertue of holy obedience, we charge and command you and all other archbishoppes and bishops, all manner of commissaries and inquisitors, that euery of them within the dioceſſe and limits of their iuriſdiction, and alſo in the foreſaid kingdome, and dukedome, and places neere adioyning, although the ſame places be beyond the ſame their iuriſdiction: in the fauor of the catholike faith, doe giue moſt diligent and vigilant care about the extirpation and correction of thoſe errors, archhereſies, and moſt peſtiferous ſect aforeſaid: and alſo that they compel all defamed perſons and ſuſpect of ſo peſtiferous a contagion, whether it be vnder the penalty of the crime confeſſed, or excommunication, ſuſpenſion or interdict, or any other formidable paine canonicall or legall, when and whereſoeuer it ſhall ſeeme good to them, and as the quality of the fact requireth, by an oth corporally taken either vpon the holy Euangeliſts, or vpon the reliques of ſaints, or vpon the image of the crucifix, according to the obſeruances of certains places, and according to the interrogatories, to make conuenient anſwer to euery article within written. For we intend againſt all and ſinguler archbiſhops, biſhops, eccleſiaſticall perſons, or inquiſitors, which ſhall ſhew themſelues negligent and remiſſe in the extirpation of the leauen of this hereticall prauitie, and purging their territories, dioceſſe, and places to them appointed, of ſuch euil and wicked men: to proceed and to cauſe to be proceeded, vnto the depriuation and depoſition of their pontificall dignities, and ſhall ſubſtitute ſuch other in their places, which can and may be able to confound the ſaid hereticall prauity, and procéede to further paines againſt ſuch by the lawes limited, and to other yet more greeuous (if néede require) we our ſelues will proceed and cauſe to be proceeded, according as the party his fact, and filthineſſe of his crime committed, ſhall deſerue. The tenor of thoſe articles whereof we haue made mention in this our own writting are in words as follow.

The old maner of the popiſh oth.

¶ The Articles of Iohn Hus to be inquired vpon.

1 There is one only vniuerſall church, which is the vniuerſitie of the predeſtinate, as ſhall after be declared.

2 The vniuerſall church is only one: as there is one vniuerſitie of thoſe that are predeſtinate.

3 Paul was neuer a member of the diuell, although hee did certaine acts like vnto the acts of the church malignant.

Speaking of the inuiſible church, the article is true.

4 The reprobate are not parts of the church, for that no part of the ſame finally falleth from her, becauſe that the charity of predeſtination which bindeth the ſame church together, neuer faileth.

5 The two natures (that is) the Diuinity, and the humanity, be one Chriſt.

This article ſeemeth to be wreſted out of the words of Ierome of Prage.

6 The reprobate, although hee be ſometime in grace, according to preſent iuſtice, yet is he neuer a part of the holy church: and the predeſtinate is euer a member of the church, although ſometime he fall from grace aduentitia, but not from grace of predeſtination: euer taking the church for the conuocation of the predeſtinate, whether they be in grace or not, according to preſent iuſtice. And after this ſort the church is an article of our beléefe.

7 Peter is not, nor neuer was the head of the holy catholike church.

8 Prieſts liuing vitiouſly, do defile the authority of prieſthood, and ſo, as vnfaithfull children, do vnfaithfully beléeue of the ſeuen ſacraments, of the keies of the church, of offices, of cenſures, of ceremonies, of the worſhipping of reliques, indulgences, orders, and other holy things of the church.

The papall dignity touched. &c.

9 The papall dignity came and grew from the emperor: and his gouernment and inſtitution, ſprang from the emperors gouernment.

10 No man can reaſonably affirme either of himſelfe or other, that he is the head of any particular church, or that the biſhop of Rome is the head of the church of Rome.

11 A man ought not to beléeue, that he which is biſhoppe of Rome is the head of euery particular church, vnleſſe God haue predeſtinate him.

12 None is the vicar of Chriſt, or elſe of Peter, vnleſſe he follow him in maners and conditions, ſéeing that there is no other following more pertinent, nor otherwiſe apt to receiue of God this power procuratory. For vnto the office of a vicegerent of Chriſt is required, the conformity of manners, and the authority of the inſtitutor.

13 The pope is not the manifeſt and true ſucceſſor of Peter the prince of the Apoſtles, if he liue in manners contrary to Peter: and if he hunt after auarice, then is he the vicar of Iudas Iſcariot. And likewiſe the cardinals bee not the true and manifeſt ſucceſſors of the colledge of the other Apoſtles of Chriſt, vnleſſe they liue according to the maner of the Apoſtles, keeping the commandements and counſels of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

14 The doctors alledging, that if a man, which will not be amended by the eccleſiaſticall cenſures, is to be deliuered to the ſecular powers, doe follow in this point the biſhops, Scribes and Phariſies, that deliuered Chriſt to the ſecular power (ſaying, it is not lawfull for vs to kill any man) becauſe he would not obey them in all things: and that ſuch be greater homicides then Pilat.

15 The eccleſiaſticall obedience is ſuch an obedience as the prieſts of the church haue found out, beſides the expreſſe authority of the ſcripture. The immediat diuiſion of humane workes, is, that they be either vertuous or vitious: and if a man be vitious, and doth any thing, then doth he it vitiouſly; and if he be vertuous, and doth any thing, then doth he it vertuouſly. For like as vice, which is called a great offence or mortall ſin, doth ſtaine all the doings of a vitious man: ſo vertue doth quicken all the doings of a vertuous man.

16 A prieſt of God liuing after his law, and hauing the knowledge of the Scripture, and a deſire to edifie the people, ought to preach, notwithſtanding any excommunication pretended of the pope. And further, if the pope, or any other magiſtrate doth forbid a prieſt ſo diſpoſed to preach, he ought not to be obedient vnto him. For euery one that taketh vpon him the order of prieſthood, receiueth in charge the office of a preacher: and of that burden ought he well to diſcharge himſelfe, any excommunication againſt him pretended in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

17 By the cenſures eccleſiaſticall, as of excommunication, ſuſpending, and interdict, the clergy to their owne aduancement cauſe the lay people to aid them: they multiply their auarice, they defend their malice, and prepare the way to antichriſt. And it is an euident ſigne that ſuch cenſures procéede from antichriſt, which in their proceſſe they call Fulminationes, that is, their thunderbolts wherewith the clergy principally procéedeth againſt thoſe that declare the wickednеſſe of antichriſt, who ſo greatly for his owne commodity hath abuſed them.

18 If the pope be euill, eſpecially if he be a reprobate, then is he with Iudas a very diuell, a théefe, and the ſon of perdition, and is not the head of the holy church militant, nor any member of the ſame.

19 The grace of predeſtination, is the band wherewith the bodie of the church and euery member of the ſame, is indiſſolubly ioyned to their head Chriſt.

20 The pope or prelat that is euill and a reprobate, is a paſtor in name, and not in deed, yea he is a théefe and a robber in very deed.

21 The pope ought not to be called the moſt holy one for his office ſake, for then ought a king to be called by his office, the moſt holy one: and hangmen, with other ſuch officers alſo were to be called holy, yea the diuell himſelfe ought to be called holy, foraſmuch as he is Gods officer.

Iohn Hus expoundeth this article with this diſtinct. Non ratione meritи, ſed ratione officij.

22 If the pope liue contrary vnto Chriſt, although he climbe vp by the right and lawfull election, according to the common cuſtome of men: yet notwithſtanding ſhould hee otherwiſe climbe then by Chriſt, yea though we admit that he ſhould enter by the election principally made by God. For Iudas Iſcarioth was lawfully elect of God Chriſt Ieſus to his biſhoprick, and yet came not hee the ſame way he ought to doe vnto the ſheepfold.

Iohn Hus declareth his mind touching this article ſufficiently before.

23 The condemnation of 45. articles of Iohn Wickliffe by the doctors made, is vnreaſonable, wicked and naught, and the cauſe by them alledged is fained, that is, that none of them are catholike, but euery one of them hereticall, erroneous, or ſlanderous.

24 Not for that the electors, or the moſt part of them haue conſented together with liuely voice, according to the cuſtome of men vpon the perſon of any, therefore that perſon is lawfully elect, or therefore is the true and manifeſt ſucceſſor and vicar of Peter the Apoſtle, or of any other the Apoſtles in the eccleſiaſticall office. Wherefore, whether the electors haue either well or euill made their election, it behoueth vs to beléeue the ſame, by the works of him that is elected. For in that that euery one that worketh more meritoriouſly to the profit of the church, he hath ſo much the more greater authority from God.

Election maketh not the ſucceſſor of Peter, but imitation.

25 There is not ſo much as one ſparke of appearance, that there ought to be one head, ruling and gouerning the church in ſpirituall cauſes, which ſhould alwaies be conuerſant in the church militant: for Chriſt without any ſuch monſtrous heads, by his true diſciples ſparſed through the whole world, could better a great deale rule his church.

One head of the vniuerſall church beſide Chriſt, hath no foundation in all ſcripture.

26 The Apoſtles and faithfull prieſts of God, haue right worthily in all things neceſſary to ſaluation, gouerned the church before the popes office toke place, and ſo might they do againe, by like poſſibility vntill Chriſt came to iudgement, if the office ſhould faile.

Let euery one that is ſuſpected in the foreſaid articles, or elſe otherwiſe found with the aſſertion of them, be examined in manner and forme as followeth.

The forme and manner of the popes inquiſition.

IN primis, whether hee knew Iohn Wickliffe of England, Iohn Hus of Bohemia, and Ierome of Prage, or any of them, and how he came by the knowledge of them: whether that during the liues of them, or any of them, they had either béen conuerſant with them, or found any friendſhip at their hands.

2 Item, whether hee knowing them, or any of them to be excommunicat, did willingly participate with them: eſteeming and affirming the ſame their participation to be no ſinne.

Hereſie to pray for Iohn Wickliffe or Iohn Hus, &c.

3 Item, whether that after their deaths, hee euer prayed for them them or any of them, openly or priuily, doing any worke of mercy for them, affirming them to be either saints, or else to be saued.

4 Item, whether he thought them, or any of them to be saints; or whether that euer he spake such words, and whether euer he did exhibit any worship vnto them as vnto saints.

5 Item, whether he beleeue, hold and affirme, that euery generall councell, as also the councell of Constance, doth represent the vniuersall church.

Heresie not to beleeue the councell of Constance.

6 Item, whether he doth beleeue, that that which the holy councell of Constance representing the vniuersall church, hath and doth allow in the fauor of the faith, and saluation of soules, is to be approued & allowed of all the faithfull christians: and that whatsoeuer the same councell hath condemned, and doth condemne to be contrary both to the faith and to all good men, is to be beleeued, holden, and affirmed for condemned, or not.

7 Item, whether he beleeueth that the condemnations of John Hus, John Wickliffe, and Jerome of Prage, made aswell vpon their persons, as their bookes and doctrine, by the holy generall councell of Constance, be rightly and iustly made, and of euery good catholike man, are so to be holden and affirmed, or not.

8 Item, whether he beleeue, hold, and affirme, that John Wickliffe of England, John Hus of Bohemia, & Jerome of Prage, were heretikes or not, and for heretikes to be nominated and preached, yea or not; and whether their bookes and doctrines were and be peruerse or not: for the which, together with their pertinacie, they were condemned by the holy sacred councell of Constance for heretikes.

9 Item, whether he haue in his custody any treatises, small workes, epistles, or other writings in what language or tongue soeuer, set forth and translated by any of these heretikes, John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome, or any other of their false disciples and followers, that he may deliuer them to the ordinaries of that place, or his commissary, or to the inquisitors vpon his oth. And if he say that he hath no such writting about him, but that they are in some other place, that then you sweare him to bring the same before his Ordinary, or other aforenamed, within a certaine time to him prefixed.

10 Item whether hee knoweth any that hath the treatises, workes, epistles, or any other writings of the aforesaid John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome, in whatsoeuer tongue they are made or translated, and that he detect & manifest the same, for the purgation of their faith and execution of iustice.

11 Item, especially let the learned be examined, whether he beleeueth that the sentence of the holy councell of Constance vpon the 45. articles of John Wickliffe, and the 30. articles of John Hus be not catholike: which saith that some of them are notorious and hereticall, some erroneous, other some blasphemous, some slanderous, some rash and seditious, some offensiue to godly eares.

12 Item, whether he beleeueth and affirmeth, that in no case it is lawfull for a man to sweare.

13 Item, whether he beleeueth, that at the commandement of a iudge or any other, it is lawfull to take an oth to tell the truth in any conuenient cause, although it be but purging of infamy, or not.

14 Item, whether he beleeueth that periury wittingly committed, vpon what cause soeuer, whether it be for the safegard of his owne life, or of any other mans life, (yea although it be in the cause and defence of the faith) be a sinne or not.

15 Item, whether a man contemning purposedly the rites of the church, and the ceremonies of exorcisme, of catechisme, and the consecration of the water of Baptisme be deadly sinne or not.

16 Item, whether he beleeue, that after the consecration of the priest in the sacrament of the altar vnder the figure of bread and wine, be no materiall bread and wine; but in all points the same very Christ which was crucified vpon the crosse, and sitteth vpon the right hand of the father.

17 Item, whether he beleeue, that after the consecration made by the priest vnder the onely forme of bread, and besides the forme of wine, be very flesh of Christ and his bloud, his soule and his deitie, and so whole Christ as he is: and in likewise, vnder the forme of wine, without the forme of bread, be the very flesh of Christ and his very bloud, his soule, and deitie, and so whole Christ, and the same body absolutely vnder euery one of those kinds singularly.

Heresie to minister in both kinds.

18 Item, whether he doth beleeue, that the custome of houseling of the lay people vnder the forme of bread onely, obserued of the vniuersall church, and allowed by the onely councell of Constance, be to be vsed, and not without the authority of the church, at mens pleasures to be altered, and that they that obstinately affirme the contrary to this, are to be punished as heretikes, or not.

19 Item, whether he beleeue that those which contemne the receiuing of the sacraments of confirmation, or extreme vnction, or else the solemnization of matrimony, commit deadly sinne or not.

20 Item, whether he beleeue that a christian man, ouer and besides the contrition of heart, being licensed of a conuenient priest, is bound to confesse himselfe onely to a priest, and not to any lay man, be he neuer so deuout or good, vpon the necessitie of saluation.

21 Item, whether he beleeue, that in the cases before put, a priest may absolue a sinner confessing himselfe, and being contrite, from all sinnes, and enioyne him penance for the same.

22 Item, whether he beleeueth, that an euill priest, with due maner and forme, with the intention of doing, doth verily consecrate, doth verily absolue, doth verily baptise, and doth verily dispose all other sacraments euen as the church doth.

23 Item, whether he beleeue that S. Peter was the vicar of Christ, hauing power to bind and to loose vpon the earth.

24 Item, whether he beleeue that the pope being canonically elect, which for the time shall be, by that name expressly be the successor of Peter or not, hauing supreame authority in the church of God.

25 Item, whether he beleeue that the authority or iurisdiction of the pope, an archbishop or a bishop, in binding and loosing, be more then the authority of a simple priest or not, although hee haue charge of soules.

Heresie to denie the popes indulgences.

26 Item, whether he beleeue, that the pope may vpon a iust and good cause, giue indulgences and remission of sinnes to all christian men, being verily contrite and confessed, especially to those that goe on pilgrimage to holy places and good deeds.

27 Item, whether he beleeue, that by such grant the pilgrims that visit those churches, and giue them any thing, may obtaine remission of sinnes or not.

28 Item, whether he beleeue that all bishops may grant vnto their subiects, according as the holy canons doe limit, such indulgences, or not.

Heresie not to worship images.

29 Item, whether he beleeue and affirme, that it is lawfull for faithfull christians to worship images and the relikes of saints, or not.

30 Item, whether he beleeue that those religions which the church hath allowed, were lawfully and reasonably brought in of the holy fathers, or not.

31 Item, whether he beleeueth that the pope, or any other prelat for the time being, or their vicars, may excommunicat their subiect ecclesiasticall or secular for disobediente or contumacy; so that such a one is to be holden and taken for excommunicat, or not.

32 Item, whether he beleeue, that for the disobedience and contumacy of persons excommunicat, increasing; the prelats or their vicars in spirituall things haue power to aggrauate and to reaggrauate, to put vpon men the interdict, & to call for the secular arme: and that the same secular arme or power ought to be obedient to the censures, by their inferiors called for.

33 Item, whether he beleeue that the pope and other prelats, or else their vicars, haue power in spirituall things to excommunicat priests, and lay men that are stubborne and disobedient, from their office, benefice, or entrance into the church, and from the administration of the sacraments of the church, also to suspend them.

These popes will be sure to lose nothing.

34 Item, whether he beleeue that it is lawfull for ecclesiasticall persons without committing sinne, to haue any possessions and temporall goods: and whether he beleeue that it is not lawfull for lay men to take away the same from them by their authority: but rather that such takers away and inrochers vpon ecclesiasticall goods, are to be punished as committers of sacriledge, yea although such ecclesiasticall persons liue naughtily that haue such goods.

Wealthy wickednes maintained.

35 Item, whether any such taking away or inrooching vpon any priest rashly or violently made, although the priest be an euill liuer, be sacriledge, or not.

36 Item, whether he beleeue that it is lawfull for lay men of whether sex soeuer, that is, men and women, to preach the word of God, or not.

The pope neither preacheth himselfe, nor yet will suffer other good priests to preach.

37 Item, whether he beleeue that it is lawfull to all priests freely to preach the word of God wheresoeuer, whensoeuer, and to whosoeuer it shall please them, although they be not sent at all.

38 Item, whether he beleeue that all mortall sinnes, and especially such as be manifest and publike, are to be corrected and to be extirpat, or not.

Furthermore, we will, command, and decree, that if any by secret information, by you or any other to be receiued, shall be found either infamed or suspected of any kind of the pestiferous sect, heresie, and doctrine of the most pestilent men John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome of Prage, the archheretikes aforesaid, or of fauoring, receiuing, or defending the foresaid damned men whilest they liued on the earth, their false followers and disciples, or any that beleeueth their errors, or any that after their death pray for them or any of them, or that nominateth them to be amongst the number of catholike men, or that defendeth them to be placed amongst the number of the saints, either by their preaching, worshipping, or other waies, wherein they deserue to be suspected: that then they by you or some of you, may be cited personally to appeare before you or some of you, without either proctor or doctor to answer for them, an oth being openly taken by them as is aforesaid, to speak the plaine and meere verity of the articles aboue written, and euery of them, or other opportune, as case & circumstance shall require, according to your discretion; as you or any of you shall see expedient expedient to proceed against them, or any of them, according to these presents, or otherwise canonically, as you shall thinke good.

Also that you doe publish solemnly, and cause to be published, these present letters, omitting the articles and interrogatories herein contained, in the cities and other places of your diocesse, where conueniently you may, vnder our authority, and there to denounce, and cause to be denounced all and singuler such heretikes, with their abettors and fauorers of their heresies and errors, of what ser or kind soeuer, that doe hold and defend the said errors, or doe participate any manner of way with heretikes, priuily or apertly, of what state, dignity, or condition soeuer he or they be, patriarke, archbishoppe, king, quéene, duke, or of what other dignity either ecclesiasticall or secular hee bee: also with their aduocates and procurators wholsoeuer, which are beleeuers, followers, fauorers, defenders, or receiuers of such heretikes, or suspected to be beleeuers, followers, fautors, defenders, or receiuers of them, to be excommunicat euery sunday and festiuall day, in the presence of the people.

Papa spirat minas & cædes.

Furthermore, that you diligently cause to be inquired by the said our authority, vpon all and singuler such persons both men and women, that maintaine, approue, defend, and teach, such errors, or that be fauorers, receiuers and defenders of them, whether exempt or not exempt, of what dignity, state, preheminence, degree, order, or condition soeuer. And such as you shall finde in the said your inquisition, either by their owne confession, or by any other meane to be diffamed, or otherwise infected with the spot of such heresie or error, you through the sentence of excommunication, suspension, interdict, and priuation of their dignities, personages, offices, or other benefices of the church, and fées, which they hold of any church, monastery, and other ecclesiasticall places, also of honors and secular dignities and degrées of sciences or other faculties, as also by other paines and censures of the church, or by waies and meanes what soeuer else shall séeme to you expedient, by taking and imprisoning of their bodies, and other correctall punishments wherewith heretikes are punished, or are wont and are commanded by canonicall sanctions to bee vsed: and if they bee clerkes, by degradation, doe correct and punish, and cause them to bee corrected and punished with all diligence.

Furthermore, that you do rise vp stoutly and courageously against such heretikes, and the goods as well of them, as of the lay men, according to the canonicall sanction made against heretikes and their followers, vnder the which we will and command them and their partakers to be subiect. And also such persons as shall be infamed of the heresies or errors aforesaid, or any of the premisses, shall be bound to purge themselues at your arbitrement: but the other, which either be witnesses, or by their owne confessions, or other allegations or probations, shall be conuicted of the foresaid heresies or articles, or of any the premisses, they shall be compelled to reuoke and abiure publikely and solemnly the said articles and errors, and to suffer condigne penance and punishment, yea euen to perpetuall imprisonment, (if néed be) for the same.

See here the dragon casting out whole flouds to swallow vp the saints.

And to the intent that they shall not nourish any kind of heresies hereafter, either in word, déed, or gesture, or shall induce other either in word or déed, priuily or apertly, directly or indirectly to beléeue the same, they shall be forced to put in sufficient surety. Who, if it so chance that they will not publikely and solemnly renounce and abiure their articles and errors, and take at your hands condigne penance, though it be to perpetuall or tempozall punishment, according to your discretion, neither will be contented to put in sufficient surety that they will not hereafter hold nor nourish these errors and heresies, neither will induce other by word or déed, priuily or apertly, directly or indirectly, or by any other maner of colour to beléeue the same: that then you shall proceed against them, according to the quality of their errors and demerits: yea and if you see it so expedient, as against heretikes, and as infected with heresie, by our authority, according to the canonicall sanctions summarily, & simply and plainly, sine strepitu & figura iudicij, and of office, all appellation or appellations whatsoeuer ceasing, and that you punish the same, according to the sanctions and traditions canonicall, yea if néed be, in leauing and committing them to the secular power: and against such as be superiors or learned doctors, laying the censures of ecclesiasticall excommunication, all appellation set aside, also inuocating, if néed shall require, aid of the secular arme: The constitution as well of our predecessor pope Boniface 8. of blessed memorie, wherein is decreed that no man without his citie or diocesse (except in certaine cases) or in places being one daies iourney distant from thence where he inhabiteth, shall bee called into iudgement, and that no man doe presume to depute Iudges from the see apostolike, without the citie and diocesse where they are deputed to proceed against any: or do presume to commit their authority to any other person or persons, or to fetch and remoue any man beyond one daies iourny from out his diocesse where he dwelleth, or at most two daies iourny, if it be in a generall councell: as also all other constitutions of any bishop of Rome, touching as well Iudges delegat, as persons not to be called to iudgement beyond a certaine number: or else any other edict, indulce, priuiledge, or exemption generall or speciall granted from the apostolike see, for any person or persons not to be interdicted, suspended, or excommunicated, or cited vp to iudgement without the compasse of certaine limits: or else whatsoeuer thing otherwise may hinder, stop, or impeach your iurisdiction, power, and free proceeding herein by any meanes to the contrary notwithstanding. Pope Martin 5. contrary to pope Boniface 8.

Pope Martin indoeth the acts and edicts of all other popes.

¶ This bloudy and abominable commission of pope Martin, which I haue copied out of a certaine old monument remaining in the hands of Master Hacklupt, student in the Temple, séemeth to be directed and giuen out to the publike destruction of all faithfull christian men, about the latter end and breaking vp of the councell of Constance, anno 1418. By the which, the prudent reader hath this to note and consider, what labor, what policie, what counsell, and what lawes haue béen set, what waies haue béen taken, what seuerity hath béen shewed, how mens power, wit, and authority of the whole world haue conspired together from time to time, continually by all manner meanes to subuert and supplant the word and way of the Lord: and yet notwithstanding man hath not preuailed, but all his force and deuised policies haue béen ouerthrowne, dispatched, and with the counsell of Achitophel and Ammon, haue béen brought to nought, and contrary to the furie of the world, the Gospell of Christ hath still increased. Neither yet for all this, will the pope cease to spurne and rebell still against the kingdome of Christ, and of his gospell, against which, neither he, nor yet the gates of hell shall euer preuaile. The Lord of hosts be mercifull to his poore persecuted flocke, Amen.

Note how anti-christ rageth and riseth against Christ.

Mans power and counsell too weake against Christ.

Against this pestilent bull and inquisition of pope Martin the great antichrist, I thought good here to adioyne and annex another contrary writing of the Bohemians, bearing the name and subscription of Procopius, Conradus, and other captains of the Bohemians, which séemeth not long after the death of Zisca, to be written against the pestiferous see of Rome, the tenor whereof here followeth.

A fruitfull and christian exhortation of the Bohemians to kings and princes, to stir them vp to the zeale of the Gospell.

An exhortation of the Bohemians.

The almighty God the father, by his welbeloued Sonne Iesus Christ, may in his holy spirit open the vnderstanding both of you and of all christians, and lighten your hearts with the light of his doctrine of righteousnesse, and may make you to continue therein, surely established to the end. This we desire of you for your saluation, all ye honorable, wise, and honest Noblemen, and all the comminalty, yea rich and poore, heare and consider with diligent héed the words of this present letter, which is sent vnto you from the country of the Bohemians. It is manifest and well knowne to you and many other cities, kings, princes, and lords, that now a certaine number of yeeres, there hath béen great discord betwixt vs and you; and there haue béen some which haue moued you by letters, and prouoked you to make warre against vs, and to destroy vs. And as well on your part as ours, many men as well noble as vnnoble, haue faithfully lost their liues. Yet neuer hitherto haue ye in any part vnderstood our faith by our owne confession, neither whether we be able to proue the same out of the Scriptures, yea or no: and yet in the meane time kings, princes, lords and cities haue sustained great damage. And hereof we greatly maruell that you doe so much trust and beléeue the pope and his priests, which giue you drinke full of poison, and such comfort as no man can vnderstand, in that they say that they will giue you forgiuenesse of all your sinnes, and great grace and pardon, to this end, that you should warre vpon vs and destroy vs: whereas their graces and pardons are none other then great lies, and a great seducing of the body and soule of all them that beléeue them, and put their trust in them. This we would proue vnto them, and ouercome them by the holy Scripture; and we would suffer, that wholsoeuer is desirous to heare the same, should heare it. For the pope and all his priests herein deale with you as the diuell would haue done with our Lord Iesus Christ. Of whom Luke writeth in his fourth chapter, that he brought him vpon an high hill, and shewed vnto him in the twinckling of an eye, all the kingdomes that are in the compasse of the earth, and said vnto him: I will giue thee, &c. So the diuell deceiueth the pope, and all the priests with the riches of the world, and worldly power: And they thinke they can giue grace and pardon when they will: and they themselues shall neuer finde fauour before Almighty God, except they repent and make amends, because of their great deceiuing of Christendome. And how can they giue that to others, which they themselues haue not? So did the diuell, who was rich in promising, and poore in giuing. And like as the diuell is not ashamed to tell a lie, so all they are not ashamed to speake that which shall neuer bee found true, nor be proued by the holy scriptures, because for no cause they stirre vppe kings, princes, lords and cities to make warre against vs, not to the end that the christian faith should thereby thereby be defended, but because they feare that their secret vices and heresies shall be disclosed and made manifest. For if they had a true cause, and a godly loue to the christian faith, they would then take the bookes of the holy Scripture, and would come vnto vs, and ouercome vs with the weapons of Gods word, and that is our chiefe desire. For so did the apostles of our Lord Iesus Christ, who came to the Paganes and Iewes, and brought them from their infidelity to the true faith of our Lord Iesus Christ; and this they did in the spirit of meeknesse, as the apostle Paul writeth in the 6. chap. to the Galat. Brethren if any man be agreeued, &c. So ought they also to doe, if they perceiued that they were iust and wee vniust. And if wee would not abide instruction: then they might take to them kings, princes, lords, and imperiall cities, and resist vs according to the commandements of the holy Scripture. But this is the subtle defence of all the bishops and priests, that they say that master Hus and Hierome which were burnt at Constance, were ouercome of the holy father the pope, and of the whole councell: For ye must vnderstand that they were not ouercome by the holy Ghost, but vniustly, with wrongfull violence, which God may yet hereafter grieuously punish in all them that gaue their counsell and aide thereto. And they say it ought not to be suffered, that we should be heard in confessing our faith. How may that be proued by the holy Scripture, since Christ heard the diuell, as it is written in the fourth chapter of Matthew? And they are not better then Christ, nor we worse then the diuell. If they bee iust and haue the truth with them (as they say they haue) and wee bee vnrighteous, why doe they feare, since the truth ought not to bee afeard of falshood, as Esdras writeth in his second booke, the third chapter: Zorobabel declared that truth is of all things the most mightie, and ouercommeth all things. For Christ is the truth; John 14. I am the way, the truth, &c. And the diuell is the father of lies; John 8. He is a lier from the beginning, and neuer abode in the truth, and there is no truth in him. Therefore if the pope and his priests haue the truth, let them ouercome vs with the word of God. But if they haue lies, then they cannot long abide in all their presumption. Wherefore, wee exhort and beseech all the imperiall cities, all kings, princes, noble men, rich and poore, for Gods sake, and for his righteousnesse, that one of them write hereof to an other, and that there may bee some meanes made, how wee may commune with you safely and friendly, at some such place as shall bee fit both for you and vs, and bring with you your bishoppes and teachers, and let them and our teachers fight together with the word of God, and let vs heare them, and let not one ouercome the other by violence or false subtiltie, but onely by the word of God. And if your bishops and teachers haue better proofes of their faith out of the holy Scripture, then we, and our faith be found vntrue, we will receiue penance and satisfaction, according to the Gospell. But if your bishops and teachers bee ouercome of ours by the holy Scripture, then doe yee repent and hearken to vs, and hold with vs. And if your bishops and teachers will cease from their spirituall pride, and repent and make satisfaction: then will we helpe you according to our power, and will compell them, either to ioyne with vs, or else we will expell them out of Christendome. And if your bishops and teachers will say, that it is not lawfull for lay men to heare such reasoning, or to be present at it: that may you vnderstand to tend to no other end, but that they feare they should be ouercome and put to shame in the sight of you: For if they knew that they should ouercome therein, out of doubt they would desire that euery man should heare it, and thereby their glory should become the greater, and their fame and praises should bee encreased vpon the earth. And if your bishops and teachers counsell you to come to no hearing with vs, then doe it whether they will or no, and suffer not your selues at any time to be so foolishly seduced with their folish pardons, but tarie at home in your houses with your wiues and children. And let the pope of Rome come to vs with all his cardinals and bishops, and with all his priests, with his owne person and power to warre with vs, and let themselues deserue the absolution of sinnes, grace, and pardon, which they preach to you (for they haue great need of forgiuenesse of sinnes, grace, and pardon) and by the grace of God wee will giue them pardon enough as they shall neede. But their subtill excuse is this: they say that it belongeth not to priests to fight with bodily weapons: and true it is that belongeth not to them: but it belongeth as little to them to stir vp, to counsell, and to fortifie others thereto: For Paul saith in the first to the Rom. and in the fifth to the Galath. That all that do such things are worthy of everlasting death

And if ye will not determine to do any other thing then to fight against vs, then will wee take the Lord to our helpe and his truth, and we will defend it to the death, and we will not be afraid for the excommunication or curse of the pope, or his cardinals, or of the bishops, because wee know that the pope is not God, as he maketh himselfe, that hee can curse and excommunicate when hee will, or blesse when hee will: who hath now these many yeares cursed and excommunicated vs, and yet notwithstanding, God and his gratious blessing hath beene our helpe. But peraduenture ye will say, that though wee see that bishops and priests bee euill and wicked, yet wee cannot lacke them: for who should baptise our children, who should heare confessions, and minister the holy Sacraments? and then also wee should bee within the excommunication of the pope and of his bishops. Welbeloued, ye needs to take no care for these matters. The excommunicating of the pope hurteth you nothing. Feare yee the excommunicating of God, and the Lord will prouide for those things well enough. If yee would banish euill bishops and priests, yee should haue good priests which should baptise your children, heare confessions, and minister the holy mysteries, because when the diuell is banished, then place is made for the holy Ghost: So when ill bishops and priests shall bee banished, then place shall bee made for good priests and bishops. Also, your bishops and priests say; that wee are miscreants and heretickes, and that we beleeue not on Purgatorie, vpon the virgine Marie, nor vpon the saints: wherein they say ill, for wee will proue by the holy Scripture, that we know better by Gods grace how we ought to beleeue vpon Purgatorie, and vpon Marie the mother of our Lord, and vpon his welbeloued saints, then they can tell vs. Also they say, that we will not be obedient vnto the pope. Truelie when hee shall become holie and iust, then wee know well that wee ought to bee obedient to him in all things, and not before. They say also that wee destroy Gods holie seruice, in that wee destroy monasteries, banishing thence the wicked monks and nuns. Truely wee did it, thinking once that they were holie, that they did the reuerend seruice of God; but after that wee well perceiued and considered their life and workes, then wee perceiued that they were false lowlie hypocrites, and wicked builders on high, & sellers of pardons and masses for the dead, and such as deuoured in themselues the sinnes of the people. And whereas they said that they rise at midnight when other men sleepe, and pray for the sinnes of the people: forasmuch as their selling of their praiers and masses for the dead for gifts, is no better then hypocrisie and heresie; therefore if wee doe speake against them and destroy their monasteries, we doe not therein destroy the seruice of God, but rather the seruice of the diuell, and the schooles of heretickes. And if yee knew them as wee know them, yee would as diligently destroy them as we doe. For Christ our Lord did not ordaine any such order, and therefore it must needs come to passe that shortly it shall be destroyed, as our Lord saith in the Gospell of saint Mat. 15. chap. Euerie plant which my father hath not planted, shall be rooted vp. We desire you also that yee would diligently consider the articles here written, wherein your bishops and priests are guiltie.

The first article is, that when your bishops will ordaine priests, they doe it not except he that is to bee made priest haue sufficient liuing, either inheritance left him of his parents or of benefices: whereas notwithstanding, Christ would that priests should bee poore, forasmuch as it is enough for the scholler to bee as his master is, and for the seruant to bee as his lord is: and the bishops will that they should be rich vpon earth, which is vniust before the Lord.

The 2. article is, that bishops take money of such as are to be ordained; but saint Peter did therefore sharpely rebuke Simon Magus, when he would haue giuen him money, as it is written in the eighth of the Acts.

The third article is, that they that come to be priests enter into their priesthood, not for Gods seruice sake, because they meane to preach and increase it among the christian people, so as the people may bee edified and made better: but rather for an idle life: and that they may eate well and drinke well, and that they may be honoured and reuerenced vpon earth. For euery one waiteth vpon his priest as a theefe and a robber, as John writeth in his tenth chapter.

The 4. article is of excommunication, which the pope and all his priests take to themselues, and therewith fetter and bind all christian people as they will, and they thinke that whosoeuer they excommunicate or curse, he is accursed and excommunicate before God: And wee will proue by the holy Scripture, that they themselues are excommunicate and accursed before God, because they keepe not the commandement of the loue of God, whereof the apostle writeth in the 1. to the Corinthians, the 16. chap. If any man loueth not our Lord Iesus Christ, he is excommunicate in the day of the comming of the Lord. For they cannot excommunicate you, who are alreadie bound and excommunicate before God and his saints; and therefore why feare ye their excommunication?

The 5. article is, that they take gifts for to pray for the dead, and to say masse for their soules. This is a wickednesse and heresie before the Lord, & all they that contribute to them to this end, doe wickedly, for that hereby priests become merchants of praiers and of masses: and herewith is all the church of Rome poysoned and defiled. For if they would pray for the dead, and say masse for their soules, yet no man ought to hire them thereto, forsomuch as they ought to take no gifts, neither little nor great. And euery one that taketh rewards to this end, to redeeme soules out of Purgatorie, doe therewithall cast their owne soules downe into hell. And they that giue any thing to that end, doe altogether lose that which they giue. And with such diuellish subtiltie, the pope with all his priests haue deceiued, spoiled, and disherited kings, princes, lords, and knights, and good houlholders and many other, of their lawfull inheritances, because their ancestors and progenitours gaue it to colledges, monasteries and churches, that they might make memorials of them, and to sing or say praiers or masses for their soules, that they might bee redeemed out of Purgatorie. And with such goods, bishops, canons, and monasteries haue made themselues so rich, that now they fall at variance, with cities and princes: and whereas they should procure peace betwixt cities and rulers, there they are the first that begin warre: and as long as they haue such goods, they will neuer cease to be at strife with lords and cities, neither will they begin to teach you the true foundation of the truth. For they doe as a dog, which as long as he holdeth a bone in his mouth and gnaweth it; so long hee holdeth his peace and cannot barke: Euen so, as long as they haue this bone of pleasant riches, it will neuer be well in the world. Wherefore all kings, princes, and imperiall cities should doe a great worke of godlinesse and mercie, if by them they were compelled to doe this, as the dogge is when the bone is taken from him.

And therefore ye noble men, kings, princes, lords, imperiall cities, and all the communaltie, both rich and poore, if yee haue beene asleepe, yet now awake and open your eyes and behold the subtiltie of the diuell, how hee hath blinded the church of Rome, and take againe that is yours, and not theirs. The subtilty of the diuell in making the church rich. Eccles. 19.

The 6. article is, that they are full of pride and of high mind, which is manifestly knowne, by their long, costly, and superfluous garments, wherein they walke very vnlike to Christ our Lord, who had a garment without a seame, and to the welbeloued John Baptist, who had a garment of Camels haire: and they will be honoured and worshipped, and they preach and say that priesthood ought to be honoured; and so it ought indeed to be: but there are none that doe so much slander and abase it, as they themselues, with their euill workes, gay apparell, and with their euill words, wherein they passe all other men. Paul saith the first to Tim. the 3. chap. Let the Elders that gouerne well, be honoured with double honour, chiefly they that labor in the word and doctrine of the Lord. Consider, that he saith, They that gouerne well.

Popish priests with their long and sumptuous gownes more like to the Pharisies then Christ. 1. Tim. 6.

Honor in well gouerning.

The 7. article is, that they are couetous from the highest to the lowest, and for couetousnesse they preach many foolish deeds and manifest lies, and sell the holy Sacraments, which is a great heresie: for God commanded that they should giue freely. Paul writeth in the first to Timothie: couetousnesse is the roote of al mischiefe, wherunto many haue beene giuen, and therefore they are separated from the faith and haue denied the truth.

The popes church poysoned with couetousnesse. 1. Tim. 1.

The 8. article is, that they commonly are called notorious whoremongers. This is manifestly seene in their concubines and children, which walke openly in all mens sight, and make many mens wiues whores, or corrupt their daughters being virgins, and make them priests harlots and ribalds.

The popes church poysoned much with whoredome.

The 9. article is, that they are full of diuellish enuie, and especially in all monasteries they haue great enuie and hatred amongst themselues, because when any thing is giuen or disposed to one monasterie or colledge, then there are others that hate it, and enuie at it, and would more gladly haue it themselues: Like as among dogs, when any thing is giuen to the one and not to the other, which the other seeing, enuieth his fellow, and the other likewise will rather deuour all himselfe, then giue any part to his fellow. Wherefore it were well that they were brought from that great sinne of enuie in giuing nothing vnto them: And it were better that their possessions were taken from them, and that they should do that which the Lord spake to his disciples saying: Go ye and preach the Gospell to all men.

The popes church and monasteries commonly poysoned with diuellish enuie.

The 10. article is, that they are idle, and chiefly the bishops, canons, and other prelats, which will not labour diligently in the holy Scripture, wherewith they might cure the miseries of Christendome, whereto they haue bound themselues, and they eate the bread thereof in idlenesse, because when other men watch and labour to maintaine themselues and their little ones, then are they with their lemmons, or else they walke in some citie, carying hawkes on their fists, or else they sit at the good wine with their concubines, and there they sing and play the Lucians, and eate of the best; and therefore all that willingly bring and giue to them shall bee made partners of that curse which is giuen them of God, because they eate their bread vniustly, whereof Paul writeth in the 2. to the Thessal. the 3. chapter: Hee that laboureth not, let him not eate.

The popes church poysoned with idlenesse and bellicheere.

The 11. article is, that they are notorious liars, because to the end that they may please men, they tell many tales and lies, which in the holy Scripture haue no foundation nor proofe. Of such writeth John in the Apocal. 21.

The popes church infamous with notorious lies.

The 12. article is, that they doe not rightly giue or minister to the people the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and they giue it not as God hath instituted it and commanded. This is a great and a diuellish sinne and too great malapertnesse.

The popes church erreth in diminishing one part of the Sacrament.

Herein wee would ouercome them, with the testimonies of the Euangelists: I say wee would ouercome the pope, and all his priests, with the authorities of Marke, Luke, and Paul, Romaines 13. and wee would suffer, that kings, princes, lords, and all that are willing to heare, should heare it.

The 13. article is, that they sit in spirituall iudgement, and then many times they iudge according to fauour, and not according to the righteousnesse of God, that they take bribes, giuing sentence for him, which in Gods sight hath the wrongfull cause. Woe bee to such sentences, as it is written in Isay 5. Woe be to you that, &c.

The popes church charged with partiality.

The 14. article is, that they sit hearing confessions, and when there come to them vsurers, raueners, and theeues, they take bribes of them of their ill gotten goods, to spare them: and they willingly suffer them in cities and townes. And likewise of adulterers and other notorious whoremongers, and whores, and they neuer let or stay them in their great sinnes, to the end that the Scripture may bee fulfilled in them, which saith: Gifts and the loue of money doe draw to hell, and doe blind the eyes of iudges.

The 15. article is, that they receiue tithes of men, and will of right haue them, and preach and say that men are bound to giue them tithes; and therein they say falsly: For they cannot proue by the new Testament, that our Lord Jesus Christ commanded it, and his disciples warned no man to doe so, neither did themselues receiue them. But although in the old Testament, it were commanded to giue tithes, yet it cannot thereby be proued, that christian men are bound thereto: For this precept of the old Testament had an end in the first yeere of our Lord Jesus Christ, like as the precept of circumcision. Wherefore welbeloued, consider and see, how your bishops seduce you and shut your eyes with things that haue no proofe. Christ saith in the 11. of Luke: Giue almes of those things that remaine, but he said not, giue the tenth of the goods which ye possesse, but giue almes. But when they heare the word, they may say as the lawyer said to Christ: Master when thou saiest so, thou giuest offence, Luke 11.

He meaneth of claiming tithes by meere necessitie of the old law; and not by the politike law of princes.

The 16. article is, that they in many places lend money or goods to haue treasure or vsurie, and they haue in cities and townes, yeerely payments and perpetuall reuenues, as great princes and lords. Wherein they do against the Gospell, which saith, Doe not ye possesse gold nor siluer. And whereas they lend for gaine and vsurie, against that speaketh the Lord, Deuteronom. 24. Lend not to vsurie to thy brother, &c. Yee honest, discreet, and welbeloued lords, all the aforesaid articles we will proue against the pope, and all his priests, with many testimonies of the holy Scripture, which for breuities sake, wee haue not here mentioned. But note yee chiefly these 4. articles, for which we striue, and desire to defend them to the death.

The popes church charged with vsurie.

The first article is, that all publike, and customable mortall sinnes, ought to be forbidden and prohibited to all priests and laie men, according to the commandement of the holie Scripture.

The second article is, that riches ought to bee taken from the pope and all his priests, from the highest to the lowest, and they ought to be made poore, as the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ were: who had nothing of their owne, neither possessions in this world, neither worldly power.

He meaneth the immoderate riches and temporall possessions.

The third article is, that the word of God ought to be free for euery man appointed and ordained thereto, to preach and reade in all places, whither they shall come, without resistance of any man, or without any inhibition of either spirituall or earthly power, openly or manifestly.

When appointed to preach may preach though the pope forbid them.

The fourth article is, that the body of our Lord Jesus Christ ought to bee deliuered to euery christian as our Lord hath ordained it, and as the holy Euangelists haue written. We haue also vnderstood that there shall be a councell in Basill: Wherefore let no man bee exalted, but let them diligently keepe their wiues, their daughters, and their virgins from bishops, priests, and monks. And doe not thinke that there is made any holy assemblie of bishops and priests for the common commoditie and profit of Christendome, but onely to this end, that they may hide their secret vices and heresies, with the cloake of hypocrisie, and let and hinder the righteousnesse of God, which is much contrarie to them: and for this cause consider ye diligently, that they will not make an holy assemblie, but the congregation of Satan. And take yee heede that it be not done as some did at Constance, who tooke money of bishoppes and prelats, and suffered them to sleepe with their wiues. Yee welbeloued and honest lords, if yee find any thing in these foresaid articles or words written somewhat sharpely, we did it not to offend or contemne you, but to the end that yee should diligently consider and deuise, how christendome is so ill kept and led by the priests of this present age. Our Lord Jesu Christ keepe you both in bodie and soule. Amen. In the yeere of our Lord, one thousand foure hundreth and thirtie.

When the pope holdeth his councell, let men looke to their wiues and daughters where the councell is kept.

Now

Now to prosecute the warres of the Bohemians againe: After Zisca was dead, whereof we did intreat before, there was great feare, sorrow, and lamentation in the armie, the souldiors accusing fortune which gaue ouer such an inuincible captaine to be ouercome with death. Immediatlie there was a diuision in the host, the one part chosing Procopius Magnus to be their captaine, the other part saying, that there was none could be found worthie to succeede Zisca: whereupon they chusing out certaine to serue the warres, named themselues Orphans.

The armie of Zisca diuided.

Thus the Thaborites being diuided into two armies, the one part retained their old & accustomed name, and the other by meanes of the death of their captaine, named themselues Orphans. And albeit, that oftentimes there was dissension betweene them, yet whensoeuer any forraine power came towards them, they ioyned their powers together in one camp, and defended themselues. They seldome went vnto any fenced townes, except it were to buie necessaries, but liued with their wiues and children in their campe and tents. They had amongst them many carres, the which they vsed as a Bulwarke: For whensoeuer they went vnto battell, they made two wings of them, which closed in the footmen. The wings of the horsemen were on the outside, and when as they saw their time for to ioyne battell, the wagon men which ledde the wings, going forth vnto the Emperours standard, and compassing in such part of their enemies as they would, did close themselues in together, whereby the enemies being inclosed, so that they could not be rescued, they were partlie by the footmen, and partly by the men that were in the carres, with their darts slaine. The horsmen fought without the fortification: and if it happened that they were oppressed or put to flight, by and by the carres opening themselues, receiued them as it were into a fensed citie: and by this meanes they got manie victories, forsomuch as their enemies were ignorant of their policies.

The order and policie that the armie of Zisca vsed in warre after his decease.

These two armies went forth, the one into Silesia, and the other into Morauia, and returned againe with great pray, before their enemies knew of their comming. After this they besieged the towne of Swetley in Austrich, where as the Thaborites and the Orphans, two nights continuallie assaulted the walles without ceasing; but Albert duke of Austrich comming with his host to ayde the citizens, they fought by the space almost of foure houres, the valiantest warriours being slaine on both parts. At the length the battaile was broken off, and the Thaborites lost their carres, and Albert was put out of his campe and tents. Within a while after, Procopius Magnus, came againe and inclosed the citie of Rhetium in Austria with a notable siege. They of Prage were in his armie, and Boslaus Cygneus, of whom we spake before, was slaine there with a dart, and the citie of Rhetium was taken by force, sacked and burnt. The Burgraue of Malderburge lord of the towne, was also taken & caried vnto Prage, where also he died in prison.

Procopius Magnus.

These things thus done, the Emperour sent for the nobles of Boheme: which went vnto him vnto a towne of Hungarie, called Posonium in the borders of Austria, vpon the bankes of the riuer of Danubius: but they would not enter into the towne, but remained without the towne in their tents; whither as the Emperour going out vnto them, communed much with them as touching his right and title, and the recouering of his fathers kingdome, promising if there were any cause, which did alienate the Bohemians mindes from him, that he would take away all the occasion thereof. They made answere, that he had made warre vpon them without cause, and that he had suffered their countrey men contrarie to his promise, to be burnt at Constance not being heard, and the kingdome to be contumeliously interdicted, and the Nobles of Boheme to be condemned by the church of Rome as heretikes: and that he should thinke the force and power of the Bohemians not to be so small, but that they would prouide for their owne honor. Whereunto the Emperour answered verie gentlie, and offered them a generall councell, wherein they might declare their innocencie, if they would submit themselues to the iudgement of the vniuersall church: but the Bohemians which were nowe become valiant victors in armes, would not now bee ouercome with words; and so nothing being finally concluded, the Emperour returned home.

Sigismund the emperor which burned Hus & Hierom before, now is faine to intreat for his kingdome.

The death of J. Hus & Hierom reuenged.

Then pope Martin perceiuing the Gospell to increase dailie more & more, sent the Cardinall of Winchester an English man, borne of a noble house, into Germany to moue them vnto war against the Bohemians. Whereunto the Emperour also did assist him.

The Cardinall of Winchester sent into Germany to raise war against the Bohemians.

There were three armies prouided. In the first army were the dukes of Saxonie, and the lower cities.

Three armies set against the Bohemians.

The second armie which was gathered of the Franconians, was vnder the conduct of the Marques of Brandenburge.

The third army was led by Otho the archbishop of Treuers, whom the Rhenenses, the Bauarians, and the Imperiall cities of Swenia followed. These armies entring into Boheme, in three seuerall parts, after they were passed the wood, they ioyned together and pitched before Pilsna. This towne a certaine learned and eloquent protestant, named Prichicho, the night before had wonne from the Papists: wherfore the armie was determined first to recouer that citie, before they would goe any further. But when as newes came vnto the host, how the Protestants had gathered an armie, and come with all speed towards them: they fled before they saw their enemies, and went vnto Tacouia, leauing behind them their warlike engines with a great pray. The Cardinall was not yet come into the campe, but meeting them in their flight at Tacouia, he maruelled at the cowardlie flight of so many Noble and valiant men, desiring them that they would turne againe vnto their enemies, which, he said, were farre weaker then they. Which thing when he had long trauailed about in vaine, he was faine to be a companion with them in their flight. They were scarcely entred the wood, when as the Bohemians comming vpon them, set vpon their rereward. Then was their flight much more disordered and fearfull then before, neither did they leaue flying before the Bohemians left following. Then all impediment or let being taken away, they vanquished Tacouia: and hauing obtained great store of warlike engines, they destroyed Pilsna. And when they would haue returned home by Franconia, they had great summes of money sent vnto them that they should not waste or destroy the Countries of Bamberge and Noremberge: whereby the host of the Bohemians was greatly enriched.

The popes army flieth.

Like captaine like souldiours.

Sigismundus the emperor hauing newes of these things, went straight vnto Noremberge, and gathered there new aid and help. Also Pope Martine sent Julian the cardinall of saint Angell into Germany with his ambassade, to make warre against the Bohemians, and that hee should in the Councell of Basill, which doth now shortly draw on, be president in the Popes name. He entring into Germany, went straight to Noremberge to the emperour, where as many of the Nobles of Germany were assembled.

Anno 1421

The pope raiseth war the second time against the Bohemians.

There was a new expedition decreed against the Bohemians, against the eight Kalends of Julie, and Fredericke Marquesse of Brandenburge appointed Generall of that warre, which should follow the Cardinall. Hee entred into Boheme by the way that leadeth vnto Thopa, and Albertus prince of Austrich was appointed to bring his armie through Morauia.

A new warre raised by the pope against the Bohemians.

In this expedition was Albert and Christopher of Bauaria, and Fredericke Dukes of Saxony, John and Albert princes of Brandenburge, with their father which was Generall of those warres. Also the bishops of Hyperbolis, Bamberge and Eyslen. Also the company of the Sweuians, which they called the companie of Saint George, and the magistrates of the imperiall cities, the bishops of Mentz, Treuers, and Colen sent their aides, and with them the chieftaines of their prouinces. It is said that the number of their horsemen were aboue fortie thousand. But their footmen were not full so many, for the Germans for the most part doe vse to fight their battels on horsebacke.

The number of the popes army against the Bohemians.

Also Rhenatus prince of Lorain promised to come to these warres, but being letted by his ciuill warres, forsomuch as he went about to vanquish the earle of Mandome, whereby hee could not keepe his promise, neither the countie Palatine of Rheine, which did aide and succour the earle of Mandome, could not goe against the Bohemians. The cardinall staying for them, deferred his iourney vntill the Kalends of August. In the meane time, Albert leading his armie out of Austria, vnderstanding that the cardinall was not present at the day appointed, and seeing himselfe vnable to encounter with the Bohemian power, he returned backe againe. After this the cardinall entred into Boheme with an huge armie, and destroyed many of the protestants townes, killing men, women and children, sparing neither old nor young: notwithstanding, this his tyrannie was exercised in the vttermost borders of Boheme, for his captaines feared to enter farre into the land. The Bohemians allsoone as they had heard tell that their enemie was come, made readie, and gathered their host with all speed, and laid siege to a tower called Stiltiuerge, and brought it vnder subiection.

Cardinal Julian with a maine host entreth Boheme.

The cruell slaughter done by the cardinal.

In the mean season there fell such a marueilous sudden feare amongst al the papists throughout the whole camp, that they began most shamefullie to run away before any enemie appeared in sight. The cardinal Julianus marueiling at this most sudden feare, and what should moue so great an armie to flie, went about vnto the captains, exhorting them to put on armor, to order their battels, and couragiously to abide their enemies, saying: they did not fight for the glorie of their kingdome, or for the possession of lands, but for their liues, and honour, and * religion of Christ, and for the saluation of soules. How ignominious a thing is it (saith he) for the Germans to flie in battell, whose courage and valiantnesse all the world doth extoll? It were much better for to die, then to giue place to any enemies, before they were seene: for they can by no meanes liue in safetie within the wals, which giue place vnto their enemie in the field; for it is the weapon that defendeth a man and not the wals, & except they would euen presently defend their liberty with the sword, they should shortly be in greater bondage, more miserable than any death. But this exhortation was all in vaine, for feare had put away all boldnesse: for the ensignes were snatched vp, and as though there had beene no captaine in the host, euery man ranne headlong away. No man regarded any commandement, neither once tooke his leaue of his captaine, but casting away their armour with spéedie slight they ran away, as though their enemie had béen at their backes. The cardinall also, although it were against his will, was forced to doe the like.

The cardinals armie ranne away for feare.

Thus the protestants by the feare of their enemies made the more bold & couragious, pursued them through the woods, and had a great pray and spoile of them. Notwithstanding, Albertus, when he heard tell that the cardinall was entred into Boheme, with all speed came againe out of Austrich with his armie, and besieged the strong towne of Prezorabia: but when he vnderstood how the cardinall was fled, he left off his purpose, and returned through Morauia, which was not yet subiect vnto him, and destroyed aboue fiftie townes, with fire and sword, tooke many of their cities by force, and spoiled them, committing great murther and slaughter, and so afflicted them that they tooke vpon them his yoke, and promised to be subiect and obedient to him vnder this condition, that as touching religion he would be bound to do that which the councell of Basill should determine.

Great slaughter in Boheme by duke Albert.

Then was there an ambassade sent out of Boheme vnto Basill, where as Sigilmund held the councell, who during the time of the warres, had kept himselfe at Norembergе. When as he should take his iourney vnto Rome to be crowned emperour, he wrote letters vnto the nobles of Boheme, wherein was contained, how that he was a Bohemian borne, and how he was not more affectioned to any nation, then to his owne, and that he went to Rome for none other cause but to be crowned, the which his honour should also be a renowne to the Bohemians, whom to aduance it hath beene alwaies his speciall care.

The councell of Basill.

A letter of the Emperour to the Bohemiãs.

Also, how that through his endeuor the councel was begun at Basill, exhorting all such as were desirous to bee heard as touching religion, that they should come thither, and that they would not maintaine any quarrell contrarie to the holy mother church, that the councell would louingly and gently heare their reasons; that they should onely endeuor themselues to agree with the Synode as touching religion, and reserue and kéepe a quiet and peaceable kingdome for him, against his returne: Neither should the Bohemians thinke to refuse his regiment, whose brother, father, and vncle, had reigned ouer them, and that he would reigne ouer them after no other meane or sort, then other christian kings vsed to doe.

The councell of Basill also wrote their letter to the Bohemians, that they should send their ambassadors which should shew a reason of their faith, promising safe-conduct to goe and come, and free libertie to speake what they would. The Bohemians in this point were of two opinions; for the protestants and almost all the common people said, it was not good to goe, alledging the examples of John Hus and Hierome of Prage, which going vnto Constance vnder the safe-conduct of the emperour, were there openly burned. But the nobilitie following the mind of Maynardus, prince of the new house, said, that they ought to goe vnto the councell, and that they are not to bee suffred which had inuented those new and strange opinions of faith, and new kind of religion, except they would render account of their doings and sayings before the vniuersall church, and defend those things, which they had openly taught before learned men. This opinion tooke place, and an ambassade of three hundred horse was sent vnto Basil. The chiefe whereof were William Colca a valiant knight, and Procopius surnamed Magnus, a man of worthie fame for his manifold victories. John Rochezana preacher of Prage, Nicolas Galecus minister of the Thaborites, and one Peter an Englishman, of excellent prompt and pregnant wit. The people came in great number out of the towne, and many out of the Synode and councell, attending before the gates to sée the comming of this valiant and famous people: othersome gathered together in great number into the streetes where as they should passe through. The matrons, maides and children, filled the windowes and houses to behold and sée, and to maruell at their strange kind of apparell, and stout couragious countenances, saying that it was not vntrue which was reported of them: notwithstanding all men beheld Procopius, saying, this is he which hath ouerthrowne the papists in so many battels, which hath subuerted so many townes, and slaine so many men, whom both his enemies, and also his owne souldiers, doe feare and reuerence: also, that hee was a bold, valiant and inuincible captaine, which could not bee ouercome with any terrour, labour or trauell.

The receiuing of the Bohemians at Basill.

Procopius famous among the Germaines.

These Bohemian ambassadours were gently receiued. The next day after, cardinall Iulianus sending for them vnto the councell house, made a gentle, long, and eloquent Oration vnto them, exhorting them to vnitie and peace, saying, that the church was the spouse of our Sauiour Christ, and the mother of all faithfull, that it hath the keyes of binding and loosing, and also that it is white and faire, without spot or wrinkle, and cannot erre in those points which are necessarie to saluation, and that he which doth contemne the same church, is to be counted as a prophane Ethnicke, and Publican, neither can this church be represented better by any meanes then in this councell. He exhorteth them also to receiue the decrees of the councell, and to giue no lesse credit vnto the councell then vnto the Gospell, by whose authoritie the Scriptures themselues are receiued and allowed. Also that the Bohemians which call themselues the children of the church, ought to heare the voice of their mother, which is neuer vnmindfull of her children: how that now of late they haue liued apart from their mother; albeit (said hee) that is no new or strange thing, for there haue been many in times past which haue forsaken their mother, and yet séeking after saluation haue returned to her againe: That in the time of Noes flood, as many as were without the arke perished: that the Lords passeouer was to be eaten in one house: that there is no saluation to bee sought for out of the church, and that this is the garden and famous fountaine of water: whereof whosoeuer shall drinke, shall not thirst euerlastingly: That the Bohemians haue done as they ought, in that they haue sought the fountaines of this water at the councell, and haue determined now at length to giue eare vnto their mother. Now all hatred ought to cease, all armour and weapon is to be laid apart, and all occasion of war vtterly to bee reiected: For the fathers would louingly and gently heare whatsoeuer there they would say in their owne cause or quarrell, requiring onely that they would willingly receiue and embrace the good counsels and determinations of the sacred Synode: whereunto not onely the Bohemians, but also all other faithfull christians, ought to consent and agrée, if they will be partakers of eternall life.

This Oration of the cardinall, was heard and very well allowed of the fathers. Whereunto the Bohemians answered in few words, that they neither had contemned the church nor the councels: that the sentence giuen at Constance against those which were vnheard, doth diminish nothing of the christian religion: that the authoritie of the fathers hath alwaies remained amongst them inuiolate; and whatsoeuer thing the Bohemians had taught, to bee confirmed by the Scriptures and Gospell, and that they are now come to manifest their innocencie before the whole church, and to require open audience, where as the laity may also be present. Their request was granted them: and being further demanded in what points they did disagree from the church of Rome, they propounded foure articles.

The Bohemians answere to the cardinals oration.

First, they affirmed, that al such as would be saued, ought of necessitie to receiue the communion of the last Supper vnder both kinds of bread and wine.

The second article, they affirmed all ciuill rule and dominion to be forbidden vnto the clergie by the law of God.

The third article, that the preaching of the word of God is free for all men, and in all places.

The fourth article, as touching open crimes and offences which are in no wise to be suffered for the auoiding of greater euill.

The articles wherein the Bohemians differed from the church of Rome.

These were the only propositions which they propounded before the councell in the name of the whole realme. Then an other ambassador affirmed that hee had heard of the Bohemians diuers and sundrie things offensiue to christian eares, amongst the which this was one point, that they should preach that the inuention of the order of begging friers was diabolicall.

Then Procopius riling vp, said, neither is it vntrue, for if neither Moses, neither before him the Patriarchs, neither after him the prophets, neither in the new law Christ and his apostles, did institute the order of begging friers, who doth doubt but that it was an inuention of the diuell, and a worke of darkenesse?

This answere of Procopius was derided of them all: And cardinall Iulianus went about to proue that not onely the decrées of the Patriarches and prophets, and those things which Christ and his apostles had instituted to be only of God, but also all such decrées as the church should ordaine, being guided through the holy Ghost, be the workes of God. Albeit, as he said, the order of begging friers, might séeme to bee taken out of some part of the Gospell. The Bohemians chose out foure diuines which should declare their articles to bee taken out of the Scriptures. Likewise on the contrarie part there were foure appointed by the councell. This disputation continued fiftie daies, where many things were alledged on either part, whereof, as place shall serue, more hereafter (by the grace of Christ) shall be said, when we come to the time of that councell.

Certaine appointed by the Bohemians and the councell to dispute.

In the meane season, while the Bohemians were thus in long conflicts with Sigilsmund the emperour and the pope, fighting for their religion, vnto whom, notwithstanding all the fulnesse of the popes power was bent against them, God of his goodnesse had giuen such noble victories, as is aboue exprest, and euer did prosper them so long as they could agrée among themselues: as these things (I say) were doing in Boheme king Henrie the fifth, fighting likewise in France, albeit for no like matters of religion, fell sicke at Boys, and died, after hee had reigned nine yéeres, fiue monethes, three weekes weekes and odde daies from his coronation. This king in life and in all his doings was ſo deuout and ſeruiceable to the pope and his chaplaines, that he was called of many the prieſts: who left behind him a ſonne being yet an infant nine moneths and fiftéene daies of age, whom hee had by quéene Katharine daughter to the French king, married to him about two or thrée yeeres before. The ſixth Part or Section, pertaining to the laſt three hundred yeares.

A Preface to the Reader.

According to the fiue ſundrie diuerſities and alterations of the church, ſo haue I diuided hitherto the order of this preſent church ſtorie into fiue principall parts, euery part containing 300. yeeres. So that now comming to the laſt 300. yeeres, that is, to the laſt times of the church, counting from the time of Wickliffe: Foraſmuch as in the compaſſe of the ſaid laſt 300. yeeres, are contained great troubles and perturbations of the church, with the maruellous reformation of the ſame through the wondrous operation of the almightie; all which things cannot be comprehended in one booke: I haue therefore diſpoſed the ſaid latter 300. yeeres into diuers bookes, beginning now with the ſixth booke, at the reigne of king Henry the 6. In which booke beſide the grieuous and ſundry perſecutions raiſed vp by Antichriſt, to be noted, herein is alſo to be obſerued, that whereas it hath of long time beene receiued and thought of the common people, that this religion now generally vſed, hath ſprung vp and riſen but of late, euen by the ſpace (as many do thinke) of 20. or 30. yeares, it may now manifeſtly appeare, not onely by the Acts and Monuments heretofore paſſed, but alſo by the hiſtories hereafter following, how this profeſſion of Chriſts religion hath beene ſpread abrode in England of old and ancient time, not only from the ſpace of theſe 200. late yeeres, from the time of Wickliffe, but hath continually from time to time ſparkled abrode, although the flames thereof haue neuer ſo perfectly burſt out, as they haue done within theſe hundred yeeres and more: As by theſe hiſtories here collected and gathered out of Regiſters, eſpecially of the dioces of Norwich, ſhall manifeſtly appeare: wherein may be ſeene what men, and how many both men and women within the ſaid dioces of Norwich, haue beene, which haue defended the ſame cauſe of doctrine, which now is receiued by vs in the church. Which perſons although then they were not ſo ſtrongly armed in their cauſe and quarrell, as of late yeeres they haue beene, yet were they warriers in Chriſts church, and fought for their power in the ſame cauſe. And although they gaue backe through tyrannie, yet iudge thou the beſt good Reader, and refer the cauſe thereof to God, who reuealeth all things according to his determinate will and appointed time.

King Henry 6. Anno 1422

This yong prince being vnder the age of one yéere, after the death of his father, ſucceéded in his reigne and kingdome of England, Anno 1422. and in the eight yéere was crowned at Weſtminſter: and the ſecond yeere after was crowned alſo at Paris, Henrie biſhoppe of Wincheſter, cardinall, being preſent at them both, and reigned 38. yéeres, and then was depoſed by Edward the fourth, as hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall bee declared in his time. In the firſt yéere of his reigne was burned the conſtant witneſſe bearer and teſtis of Chriſts doctrine, William Taylor, a prieſt, vnder Henry Chicheſley archbiſhop of Canturbury. Of this William Taylor I read, that in the daies of Thomas Arundell, hee was firſt apprehended, and abiured. Afterward in the daies of Henry Chicheſly, about the yeere of our Lord, 1421, which was a yéere before his burning, the ſaid William Taylor appeared againe in the conuocation before the archbiſhop, being brought by the biſhop of Worceſter, being complained of to haue taught at Brikstow theſe articles following.

Ex ſchala mundi. Ex Regiſt. Cant.

William Taylor the firſt time apprehended. William Taylor againe appeareth before the archbiſhop: Three articles firſt obiected to William Taylor.

First, that whoſoeuer hangeth any Scripture about his necke, taketh away the honor due only to God, and giueth it to the Diuell.

Secondly, that no humane perſon is to bee worſhipped, but onely God is to be adored.

Thirdly, that the ſaints are not to be worſhipped nor inuocated.

Vpon theſe articles the ſaid William Taylor being examined, denied that hee did preach or hold them in way of defending them, but only did commune and talke vpon the ſame, eſpecially vpon the ſecond and third articles, onely in way of reaſoning, and for argument ſake. And to iuſtifie his opinion to be true in that which he did hold, hee brought out of his boſome a paper or libell written, wherein were contained certaine articles, with the teſtimonies of the Doctours alledged, and exhibited the ſame vnto the archbiſhop. Who then being bid to ſtand aſide, the archbiſhop conſulting together with the biſhops and other prelats, what was to be done in the matter, deliuered the writings vnto maſter John Caſtle, and John Rikinghale, the two Vicechancellors of Oxford, and Cambridge, and to John Langdon monke of Canturbury. Who aduiſing with themſelues, and with other Diuines, about the articles and allegations, on the Monday following, preſented the ſaid articles of William Taylor, to the archbiſhop and prelates, as erroneous and hereticall. Whereupon William Taylor being called before them, in concluſion was contented to reuoke the ſame, and for his penance was by them condemned to perpetuall priſon.

Notwithſtanding, through fauour they were contented, that he ſhould be releaſed from his carcerall indurance, in caſe he would put in ſufficient ſurety in the kings chancerie, and ſweare that he ſhall neuer hold or fauour any ſuch opinions hereafter. And thus the ſaid William Taylor, appointed to appeare the nert Wedneſday at Lambeth before the archbiſhop, to take his abſolution from his long excommunication, during the time from Thomas Arundell, appeared againe before him; where hee laying aſide his Arunlouſa, that is, his cloke, his cap, and ſtripped vnto his dublet, kneeled at the feéte of the archbiſhop. Who then ſtanding vp, and hauing a rod in his hand, began the Pſalme Miſerere, &c. his chapleins anſwering the ſecond verſe. After that was ſaid the collect, Deus cui proprium, &c. with certaine other prayers. And ſo taking an oth of him, the archbiſhop committed him to the cuſtodie of the biſhop of Worceſter, to whom power and authority was permitted to releaſe him, vpon the conditions aforeſaid. And thus was William Taylor for that time abſolued, being enioyned notwithſtanding to appeere at the nert conuocation whenſoeuer it ſhould be, before the ſaid archbiſhop or his ſucceſſor that ſhould follow him.

The forme of canonicall abſolution in the church vſed againſt them that were excommunicate.

In the meane time, while William Taylor was thus in the cuſtodie of the biſhop of Worceſter, there paſſed certaine writings betweene him, and one Thomas Smith prieſt at Brikstow, in the which writings William Taylor replied againſt the ſaid Thomas, concerning the queſtion of worſhipping of ſaints. Upon the occaſion of which replie, being brought to the hands of the biſhop of Worceſter, William Taylor began anew to be troubled, and was brought againe before the publike conuocation of the clergie, by the ſaid biſhop of Worceſter, to anſwere vnto his writings. This was Anno 1422, the 11. day of February. Unto the which conuocation the ſaid William being preſented, his writings were read to him; which he would not, nor could not deny to be of his owne hand writing.

The tenour and effect of whole writing onely tended to proue, that euery petition and prayer for any ſupernatural gift, ought to be directed to God alone, and to no creature. Albeit in this his writing hee did not vtterly denie, that it was not lawfull in any reſpect to pray to ſaints (and bringeth for the ſame Thomas Aquine) but onely in reſpect of that worſhip, which is called Cultus latriæ: And further so prosecuteth his mind herein, that he seemeth little or nothing to differ from the superstition of the papists: as most plainely appeareth by his owne words, saying: Nunquam tamen negaui, aut negare intendo, merita aut sanctorum suffragia tam beatorum quam viantium, tam viuis, quam mortuis ad hoc dispositis, quantum possunt, suffragari, vel proficere; quia hoc est elicibile ex Scriptura, quæ non fallit, & ex consona ratione, &c. And moreouer he inferreth the example of Moses, who prayed vnto God, alledging the merits of Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, which were dead, &c. And furthermore, passing from the testimonie of Hierome, and alledging the example of Steuen, saith: Quod nunc magis exauditur pro veneratoribus suis, quam tunc exauditus est pro lapidatoribus. And at length hee commeth to this conclusion, proouing by saint Austin, in this maner: Ne igitur cum impijs & idololatris in veteri testamento, in circuitu ambulemus, nunquam deueniendo ad centrum, sanum est quod faciamus secundum consilium Apostoli sic dicentis: Accedamus cum fiducia ad thronum gratiæ eius, vt misericordiam consequamur & gratiam inueniamus in auxilio opportuno, &c. That is: And therefore lest we runne about in circles with the wicked, and with the idolaters of the old Testament, and neuer come to the center, therefore it is wholesome and good counsell, that wee follow the mind of the apostle, saying: Let vs resort with boldnesse vnto the throne of his grace, that we may obtaine mercie, and find grace in time of opportune helpe, &c.

The opinion of William Taylor concerning worſhipping of ſaints.

Cultus latriæ, that is, worship which is onely due to God.

Aug. super Psal. 21.

Thus much out of the foresaid writing of William Taylor I haue excerped, to the intent that the indifferent Reader, vsing his iudgement herein, may see how little matter was in this, wherefore he should be condemned by the papists. And yet notwithstanding the same writing being deliuered by the archbishop, to the foure orders of friers of London to be examined, was found erroneous and hereticall in these points.

4. articles by the foure orders of friers laid against William Taylor

First, that euery prayer, which is a petition of some supernaturall gift or free gift, is to be directed onely to God.

2 Item, that prayer is to be directed to God alone.

3 Item, to pray to any creature is to commit Idolatrie.

4 Also, an other opinion there was much like to the other, to make vp the fourth; so that although all these opinions agreed in one, yet to make vp a number euery order of the foure sorts of friers, thought to find out some matter to offer vp to the archbishop against him, lest one order should seeme more cunning or pregnant, in finding out more then could another: or else perchance lest any of them should seeme to fauor the party, in bringing nothing against him, as the rest had done.

❧ The burning of William Taylor priest.

When the Saturday was come, which was the 20. day of Februarie, vpon the which day the foure orders were appointed to declare their censure vpon the articles in the chapiter house of Pauls, first appeareth frier Tille, for the black friers, then frier Winchelsey, then frier Lowe, after frier Ashwell, each frier for his order seuerally bringing his heresie, as is aboue specified.

Thus the verdict of these foure orders being giuen vp to the archbishop, and seuerally each order comming in with his heresie, which was the 20. day of Februarie: hereupon commeth downe a writ from the king, directed to the lord Maior and Sheriffes of London, De hæretico comburendo, dated the first day of March, Anno the first of his reigne. The copie whereof remaineth in the records of the Tower, beginning thus: Rex Maiori & Vicecomitibus. Whereupon the said William Tailor condemned as a relapse, first was degraded, and after to be burned, and so was committed to the secular power. Who then being had to Smithfield, the first day of March, with christian constancie, after long imprisonment, there did consummate his martyrdome, 1422.

William Taylor degraded.

William Taylor martyr burned in Smithfield.

The maner of his degrading was all one with the degrading of John Hus before: for the papists vse but one forme for all men. First degrading them from priesthood, by taking from them the chalice and patine. From deaconship, by taking from them the gospell booke and tunicle. From subdeaconship, by taking from them the epistle booke and Tunicle. From Acolutheship, by taking from them the Cruet and candlestick. From an exorcist, by taking away the booke of Exorcismes or Gradual. From the sextonship, by taking away the church doore key and surplis. And likewise from Benet, in taking away the surplis, and first tonsure, &c. All which they orderly accomplished vpon this godly martyr, before his burning.

The popes maner of degradation.

Iohn Florence a Turner.

IOhn Florence a Turner, dwelling in Shelton, in the diocesse of Norwich, was attached for that he held and taught these heresies here vnder written (as they called them) contrary to the determination of the church of Rome.

John Florence a Turner.

In primis, that the pope and cardinals haue no power to make or constitute any lawes.

Item, that there is no day to bee kept holy, but only the Sunday which God hath hallowed.

Item, that men ought to fast no other time, but of the Quatuor temporum.

Item, that images are not to be worshipped, neither that the people ought to set vp any lights before them in the churches, neither to go on pilgrimage, neither to offer for the dead, or with women that are purified.

Item, that curats should not take the tithes of their parishioners, but that such tithes should bee dunded amongst the poore parishioners.

He meaneth they should not claime such tithes by any exaction.

Item that all such as sweare by their life or power, shall be damned, except they repent.

The dispiling of Iohn Florence.

Upon Wednesday being the second day of August in the yeere of our Lord, 1424. the said John Florence, personally appeared before William Bernam, chancellor to William bishop of Norwich, where as he proceeding against him, obiected the first article touching the power of the pope and cardinals: to which article the said John Florence answered in this maner. If the pope liued vprightly as Peter liued, he hath power to make lawes: otherwise I beleeue hee hath no power. But being afterward threatned by the iudge, he acknowledged that hee had erred, and submitted himselfe to the correction of the church, and was abiured, taking an oth that from that time forward he should not hold, teach, preach, or willingly defend any errour or heresie contrarie to the determination of the church of Rome, neither maintaine, helpe, or aide any that shall teach or hold any such errours or heresies, either priuilie or apertly; and for his offence in this behalfe done, he was enioyned this penance following.

{Anno 1424}

Three

The maner of this diſpling was with a white rod, thrice laid vpon the head of the penitentiary.

Three ſundaies in a ſolemne procellion in the cathedrall church of Norwich, hee ſhould be diſpled before all the people. The like alſo ſhould be done about his pariſh church of Shelton, three other ſeuerall ſundaies, he being bare headed, bare foted and bare necked, after the maner of a publike penitentiarie, his body being couered with a canuas ſhirt and canuas breeches, carrying in his hand a taper of a pound waight; and that done he was diſmiſſed.

Richard Belward of Eriſam in the dioceſſe of Norwich.

RIchard Belward of Eriſam, in the dioceſſe of Norwich, was accuſed for holding and teaching theſe errors and opinions here vnder written, contrary to the determination of the church of Rome.

He meaneth the wicked biſhops of that time, whoſe curſes God did diſalle.

In primis, that eccleſiaſticall miniſters and Ordinaries haue no power to excommunicat, neither can excommunicat. And albeit that a biſhop doe excommunicat any man, God doth abſolue him.

This proueth ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle to be no traitor.

Item, that hee held the erroneous opinions and concluſions, that ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle held when he was in priſon, and affirmed that ſir Iohn Oldcaſtle was a true catholike man, and falſly condemned and put to death without any reaſonable cauſe.

Item, that ſuch as goe on pilgrimage, offering to images made of wood and ſtone, are excommunicat, becauſe they ought to offer to the quicke, and not to the dead: and that the eccleſiaſticall miniſters, that is to ſay, the curats doe ſell God vpon Eaſter day, when as they receiue offerings of ſuch as ſhould communicate before they doe miniſter the ſacrament vnto them.

Item, that he counſelled diuers women, that they ſhould not offer in the church for the dead, neither with women that were purified.

The words of the Regiſter.

Item, that he blamed diuers of his neighbors that refuſed his doctrine, ſaying vnto them: Truly ye are fooles that denie to learne the doctrine of my ſect, for your neighbors which are of my ſect, are able to confound and vanquiſh all other that are of your ſect.

Item, that the ſaints which are in heauen ought in no caſe to be praied vnto, but only God.

Item, that the ſaid Richard keepeth ſchooles of Lollardy in the Engliſh tongue, in the towne of Wichingham, and a certaine parchmentmaker bringeth him all the bookes containing that doctrine, from London.

The fifth day of July 1424. the ſaid Richard Belward was brought before Iohn biſhop of Norwich, ſitting in place of iudgement, where as the foreſaid articles were obiected againſt the ſaid Richard, which he there denied: whereupon the biſhop appointed him another day to purge himſelfe, the monday next after the feaſt of Saint Margaret: vpon which day being the 24. of July, in the yeere aforeſaid, he appeared againe before the biſhop, and brought with him nine of his neighbors to purge him vpon thoſe articles, and there did ſolemnly purge himſelfe. And afterward, forſomuch as the ſaid biſhop ſuſpected the ſaid Richard Belward greatly of Lollardy, he commanded him there preſently to ſweare vpon the Euangeliſts, that from that day forward he ſhould not wittingly preach, teach, or defend any error or hereſie, contrary to the church of Rome, neither aid, aſſiſt, fauor or maintaine, priuily or apertly, any manner of perſon or perſons, that ſhould hold or maintaine the ſaid errors or hereſies. In the preſence of maſter William Bernam, Iohn Wadden, Robert Serle and Iohn Berne eſquire, and other of his neighbors which came vnto his purgation.

Iohn Goddeſell of Dichingham.

In like manner Iohn Goddeſell of Dichingham parchmentmaker, was detected and accuſed vpon the ſame articles, and thereupon brought before the biſhop: where as hee denying them, purged himſelfe by his neighbours, as Richard Belward before had done, being ſworne alſo in like manner, as he was, and ſo was diſmiſſed and ſet at liberty, vntill the yeere of our Lord 1428. when as he was againe apprehended, accuſed and abiured, as ſhall be more at large declared in the hiſtorie when wee come to that yeere. Sir Hugh Pie alſo, chaplaine of Ludney in the dioceſſe of Norwich, was likewiſe accuſed and brought before the biſhop of Norwich the fifth day of July, anno 1424. for holding of theſe opinions following

Sir Hugh Pie priеſt.

That the people ought not to goe on pilgrimage.

Item, that the people ought not to giue almes, but onely vnto ſuch as beg at their doores.

Image of the croſſe not to be worſhipped.

Item, that the image of the croſſe and other images are not to be worſhipped. And that the ſaid Hugh had caſt the croſſe of Bromeholt into the fire to be burned, which he tooke from one Iohn Welgate of Ludney. Which articles, as is aforeſaid, being obiected againſt him, he vtterly denied: whereupon he had a day appointed to purge himſelfe by the witneſſe of three lay men, and three prieſts. That ſo done, he was ſworne as the other before, and ſo diſmiſſed.

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1428. king Henry the 6. ſent downe moſt cruell letters of commiſſion vnto Iohn Ereter and Iacolet Germaine, keeper of the caſtell of Colcheſter, for the apprehending of ſir William White prieſt, and others ſuſpected of hereſies, the tenor whereof hereafter enſueth.

The copie of the kings letters directed to Iohn Exeter, and Iacolet Germaine, keeper of the caſtell of Colcheſter, for the apprehending of ſir Willliam White prieſt, and other (as they called them) Lollards.

A letter of the king.

HEnry by the grace of God king of England and of France, Lord of Ireland, to his welbeloued Iohn Exeter, and Iacolet Germaine, keeper of the caſtell of Colcheſter, health.

Ye ſhall vnderſtand that we fully truſting vnto your fidelitie and circumſpections, haue appointed you ioyntly and ſeuerally to take and arreſt William White prieſt, and Thomas, late chaplaine of Setling, in the county of Norfolke, and William Northampton prieſt, and all other whatſoeuer they bee that are ſuſpect of hereſie or Lallardie, whereſoeuer they may be found within the liberties or without, and ſtraightway being ſo taken, to ſend them vnto our next gaile or priſon, vntill ſuch time as we ſhall haue taken other order for their deliuery: And therefore we ſtraitly command you, that ye diligentlie attend about the premiſſes, and fulfill the ſame in forme aforeſaid. Alſo we charge and command all and ſinguler Iuſtices of peace, Maiors, Shiriffes, Bailiffes, Conſtables, and all other our faithfull officers, by the tenor of theſe preſents, that they doe aſſiſt, aid and counſell you and euery of you, in the execution of the premiſſes, as it ſhall be comely for them. In witneſſe whereof, we haue cauſed theſe our letters patents to be made. Witnes my ſelfe at Weſtminſter, the 6. of July, the 6. yeere of our raigne.

By vertue of which commiſſion wee finde in old monuments, that within ſhort ſpace after, Iohn Ereter, which was appointed one of the commiſſioners, attached ſir perſons in the towne of Bungay in the dioceſſe of Norwich, and committed them to William Day, and William Roe, Conſtables of the towne of Bungay, to be ſent within ten daies following vnder ſafe cuſtody, vnto the caſtell of Norwich. Whoſe names through the antiquity of the monument were ſo defaced, that we could not attaine to the perfect knowledge of them all: onely three names partly remained in the booke to be read, which were theſe.

¶ Iohn Waddon of Tenderdon, in the countie of Kent, Bartlemew, monke of Erſham, in the county of Norfolke, Corneleader a married man. William Scuts.

These three were in the cuſtody of the duke of Norfolke, at his caſtell of Fremingham.

Beſides theſe, we alſo find in the ſaid old monuments within the dioceſſe of Norfolke and Suffolke, ſpecially in the townes of Beckles, Erſham, and Ludney, a great number both of men and women to haue been vered and caſt in priſon, and after their abiuration, brought to open ſhame in churches and markets, by the biſhop of the ſaid dioceſſe called William, and his chancellor William Bernham, Iohn Ereter being the Regiſter therein; ſo that within the ſpace of three or foure yeers, that is, from the yeere 1428. vnto the yeere 1431. about the number of 120. men and women were examined and ſuſtained great veration for the profeſſion of the chriſtian faith: of whom ſome were only taken vpon ſuſpition only, for eating of meates prohibited vpon vigill daies, who of their purgation made, eſcaped more eaſily away, and with leſſe punihment, whoſe names here follow ſubſcribed.

William biſhop of Norwich, William Bernham his chancellor.

These forenamed persons and souldiers of Christ, being much beaten with the cares and troubles of those daies, although they were constrained to relent and abiure, that is, to protest otherwise with their tongues, then their hearts did thinke, partly through correction, and partly through infirmity (being as yet but new trained souldiers in Gods field) yet for their good will they bare vnto the truth, although with their tongues they durst not expresse it, we haue thought good that their names should not be suppressed, aswell for other sundry causes, as specially for this: either to stop the mouthes of malignant aduersaries, or to answer to their ignorance; who following rather blinde affection, then the true knowledge of times and antiquities, for lacke of knowledge, blame that they know not, accusing the true doctrine of the word of God for newelty, and carping the teachers thereof for new broched brethren. Who, if they did as well foresee times passed, as they be vnwilling to follow times now present, they should vnderstand as well by these stories as other before, how this doctrine of the grace of God lacking no antiquity, hath from time to time continually sought to burst out, and in some places hath preuailed, although in most places through tyranny and the malice of men, Christs proceedings haue been suppressed and kept vnder from rising, so much as mens power and strength ioyned with craft and subtiltie, could labour to keepe downe the same: as here by these good men of Northfolke and Suffolke, may well appeare. For if the knowledge and the good towardnesse of those good men, had had the like libertie of time, with the helps of like authority, as wee haue now, and had not been restrained through the iniquity of time and tyranny of prelats, it had well appeared how old this doctrine would haue been, which now they contemne and reiect for the newnesse thereof: neither needed Boner to haue asked of Thomas Hawkes, & such other, where their church was for fortie yeeres agoe, in as much as for forty yeeres agoe, and more, within the country of Northfolke and Suffolke, was then found such plenty of the same profession and like doctrine which we now professe. And thus much for the number of the names of these persons.

Boner might see the church here in this age, more then forty yeeres, before he was borne,

Now as touching their articles which they did maintaine and defend: first, this is to be considered, as I finde it in the registers, such society and agreement of doctrine to be amongst them, that almost in their assertions and articles there was no difference. The doctrine of the one was the doctrine of all the other; what their articles were, partly it is shewed in the leafe before: and partly here followeth to be declared more at large.

Although it is to be thought concerning these articles that many of them either were falsly obiected against them, or not truly reported of the notaries, according as the common maner is of these aduersaries, where the matter is good, there to make heresie, and of a little occasion, to stir vp great matter of slander, as they did before by the articles of Iohn Wickliffe and Iohn Hus, and others mo: So in like manner it seemeth they did in the articles of these men, either mistaking that which they said, or misunderstanding that which they meant, especially in these two articles concerning baptisme and paying of tithes. For whereas they speaking against the ceremoniall and superfluous traditions then vsed in baptisme, as salt, oile, spittle, taper, light, crismes, exorcising of the water, with such other, accounted them as no materiall thing in the holy institution of baptisme, the notaries slanderously deprauing this their assertion, to make it more odious to the eares of the people, so gaue out the article, as though they should hold, that the sacrament of baptisme vsed in the church by water, is but a light matter and of small effect.

These men are falsly slandered about baptisme.

Againe, in speaking against the christening the midwiues vse in priuat houses, against the opinion of such as thinke such children to be damned, which depart before they come to their baptisme, they are falsly reported, as though they should say, that christian people bee sufficiently baptised in the blood of Christ, and neede no water, and that infants bee sufficiently baptised, if their parents be baptised before them. Which thing is so contrary to the manifest word, that it is not to be thought any to be so ignorant of the Gospell, that euer would or did affirme the same.

Moreouer, they thought or said peraduenture, that in certaine cases, tithes might be withholden from wicked priests sometime, and be conferred to better vses, to the behoofe of the poore: Therefore they are falsly slandered, as saying and affirming that no tithes were to be giuen to the ministers and curats of the churches.

The papists are but quarrell pickers.

And likewise for matrimony, wherein they are reported to hold and affirme, as though it consisted onely in the mutuall consent betwixt the man and the woman, needing no other solemnizing in the publike church, and all because (as it is like) they deemed it to be a sacrament. Other articles were obiected against them, as these which hereafter follow.

Articles.

That auricular confession is not to be made vnto a priest, but vnto God only, because no priest hath any power to absolue a sinner from his sinne.

Item,

In this article is meant, that the wicked be in the church, but not of the church.

Item, that the catholike church is onely the congregation of the elect.

These were the articles which were generally obiected against them all, wherein they did so agree in one vniforme faith, that whatsoeuer one did hold, all the other did maintaine and hold the same. By the which their consent and doctrine it appeareth, that they all receiued it of some one instructer, who was William White: which being a scholler and follower of Iohn Wicklike, resorted afterward into this country of Norfolke, and there instructed these men in the light of the Gospell. And now, as wee haue declared the names and articles of these good men, so it remaineth somewhat to speake of their troubles how they were handled, beginning first with William White.

William White priest.

wil. White martyr. Anno 1428. Ex Waldeno. Eccles. 50.

THis William White being a follower of Iohn Wicklike, and a priest, not after the common sort of priests, but rather to be reputed amongst the number of them, of whom the wise man speaketh: He was as the morning starre in the middest of a cloud, &c. This man was well learned, vpright, and a well spoken priest. He gaue ouer his priesthod and benefice, and toke vnto him a godly young woman to his wife, named Ioane: notwithstanding hee did not therefore cease or leaue from his former office and duty, but continually laboured to the glory and praise of his spoule Christ, by reading, writing and preaching. The principall points of his doctrine were these, which he was forced to recant at Canturburie.

That men should seeke for the forgiuenesse of their sinnes only at the hands of God.

That the wicked liuing of the pope and his holinesse, is nothing elle but a diuellish estate and heauy yoke of antichrist, and therefore he is an enemy vnto Christs truth.

That men ought not to worship images, or other idolatrous paintings.

That men ought not to worship the holy men which are dead.

The Romish church aptly resembled to the cursed figge tree.

That the Romish church is the fig tree which the Lord Christ hath accursed, because it hath brought forth no fruit of the true beliefe.

That such as weare coules, or be annointed or shorn, are the lanceknights and souldiers of Lucifer: and that they all, because their lamps are not burning, shall be shut out, when as the Lord shall come.

Upon which articles he being attached at Canturbury vnder the archbishop Henry Chichesly, in the yeere of our Lord 1424, there for a certaine space stoutly and manly witnessed the truth which he had preached: but like as there hee lost his courage and strength, so afterward he became againe much more stouter and stronger in Iesus Christ, & confessed his own error and offence. For after this, he going into Norfolke with his said wife Ioane, and there occupying himselfe busily in teaching and conuerting the people vnto the true doctrin of Christ, at the last, by the meanes of the kings letters sent downe for that intent and purpose, he was apprehended and taken, and brought before William bishop of Norwich, by whom he was conuict, and condemned of 30. articles, and there was burned in Norwich, in the month of September, an. 1424.

The burning of William White.

This William White and his wife, had his most abode with one Thomas Pore of Ludney. This man was of so devout and holy life, that all the people had him in great reuerence, and desired him to pray for them: insomuch that one Margaret Wright confessed, that if any saints were to be prayed to, she would rather pray to him then to any other. When he was come vnto the stake, thinking to open his mouth to speake vnto the people, to exhort and confirme them in the verity, one of the bishops seruants stucke him on the mouth, thereby to force him to keepe silence. And thus this good man receiuing the crowne of martyrdome, ended this mortall life to the great dolor and griefe of all the good men of Norfolke. Whose said wife Ioane, following her husbands steppes according to her power, teaching and sowing abroad the same doctrine, confirmed many men in Gods truth: wherefore she suffered much trouble and punishment the same yeere at the hands of the said bishop.

The bishops man smiteth him on the mouth, exhorting the people.

About the same time also was burned father Abraham of Colchester, and Iohn Waddon priest, for the like articles.

Father Abraham, Iohn Waddon priest, martyrs and burned.

Concerning them which abiured, how and by whom they were examined, what depositions came in against them, and what was the order and maner of the penance inioyned them, here it might be set out at large: but for auoiding of prolixity, it shall be sufficient briefly to touch certaine of the principals, whereby the better vnderstanding may be giuen to the reader, after what maner and order all the other were intreated.

First, amongst them which were arrested and caused to abiure in this yeere afore specified, 1428. was Thomas Pie, and Iohn Mendham of Aldborough, who being conuict vpon diuers of the articles before mentioned, were inioyned penance to be done in their owne parish church, as by the bishops letter directed to the deane of Rhodenhall, and the parish priest of Aldborough doth more at large appeare, the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The copy of the bishop of Norwich his letter.

A letter of the bishop of Norwich.

WIlliam by the sufferance of God bishop of Norwich, to our welbeloued sonnes in Christ the deane of Rodenhall of our dioceſſe, and to the parish priest of the parish church of Aldborough of the same our dioceſſe, health, grace and benediction. Forsomuch as we, according to our office lawfully proceeding to the correction and amendement of the soules of Thomas Pye and Iohn Mendham of Aldborough of the dioceſſe aforesaid, because they haue holden, beleeued and affirmed, diuers and many errors and heresies, contrary to the determination of the holy church of Rome, and the vniuersall church and catholike faith, haue enioyned the said Thomas and Iohn, appearing before vs personally, and confessing before vs iudicially that they haue holden, beleeued and affirmed, diuers and many errors and heresies, this penance hereunder written, for their offences to be done and fulfilled in maner, forme and time hereunder written, according as iustice doth require, that is to say, six fustigations or displings about the parish church of Aldborough aforesaid, before a solemne procession six seuerall sundaies, and three displings about the market place of Hereſtone of our said dioceſſe three principall market daies, bare necked, head, legges and feet, their bodies being couered onely with their shirts and breeches, either of them carrying a taper in his hand of a pound waight, as well round about the church, as about the market place, in euery of the foresaid appointed daies; which tapers the last sunday after their penance finished, wee will that the said Iohn and Thomas

Thomas do humbly and deuoutly offer vnto the high altar of the parish church of Aldborough at the time of the offertorie of the high Masse the same day, and that either of them going about the market place aforesaid, shal make foure seuerall pauses or staies, and at euery of those same pauses, humbly and deuoutly receiue at your hands three dusplings. Therefore we straitly charge and commaund you and either of you, ioyntly and seuerally by vertue of your obedience, that euery sunday and market day, after the receit of our present commandement, you doe effectually admonish and bring forth the said Thomas Pye and Iohn Mendam to begin and accomplish their said penance, and so successiuely to finish the same in maner and forme afore appointed. But if they will not obey your monitions, or rather our commandements in this behalfe, and begin and finish their said penance effectually, you or one of you shall cite them peremptorilie, that they or either of them appeare before vs or our commissarie, in the chapel of our palace at Norwich, the 14. day after the citation so made, if it be a court day, or else the next court day following, to declare if they or any of them haue any cause why they should not be excommunicate for their manifest offence in this behalfe committed, according to the forme and order of law, and further to receiue such punishment, as iustice shall prouide in that behalfe. And what you haue done in the premisses, whether the said Thomas and Iohn haue obeyed your admonitions, and performed the said penance or no: we will that you or one of you which haue receiued our said commandement, for the execution thereof, doe distinctly certifie vs betweene this and the last day of Nouember next comming. Dated at our palace of Norwich vnder our commissaries seale, the 8. day of October, An. 1428.

This (gentle Reader) was for the most part, the order of their whole penaunce: howbeit, some were often times more cruelly handled: and after their penaunce they were banished out of the diocesse, and othersome more straitly tied by longer imprisonment, whereof we will briefly rehearse one or two for example.

Iohn Beuerley alias Battild.

IOhn Beuerley alias Battild a labourer was attached by the vicar of Southereke, the parish priest of Waterden and a lawyer, and so deliuered vnto maister William Barnam the bishops commissarie, who sent him to the castle of Norwich there to be kept in irons: where as afterward he being brought before the Commissarie, and hauing nothing proued against him, he toke an oth, that euery yeere afterward he should confesse his sins once a yeere to his curate, and receiue the Sacrament at Easter, as other christians did: and for his offence was inioyned that the Friday and Saturday next after he should fast bread and water, and vpon the Saturday to be *whipped from the palace of Norwich, going round about by Tomes lands, and by S. Michaels church, by Cottlerew, and about the market, hauing in his hand a ware candle of two pence, to offer to the image of the Trinitie after he had done his penance. And for so much as he confessed that he had eaten flesh vpon Easter day, and was not shriuen in all Lent, nor receiued vpon Easter day, the Iudge enioyned him that he should fast Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday in Whitson-weeke, hauing but one meale a day of fish and other white meats, & after this penance so done, he should depart out of the diocesse, and neuer come there any more.

John Beuerley

*Alias fustigated.

Iohn Skilley of Flixton, miller.

IOhn Skilley of Flixton miller, being apprehended and brought before the bishop of Norwich the 14. day of March, 1428. for holding and maintaining the articles aboue written, was thereupon conuict and forced to abiure; and after his abiuration solemnly made (which heere to auoid tediousnes I omit) he had a most sharpe sentence of penance pronounced against him, the effect whereof being briefly collected, was this: That for so much as the said Skilley was conuict by his owne confession, for holding and maintaining the articles before written, and for receiuing certaine good and godly men into his house, as sir William White priest, and Iohn Wadden, whom they called famous, notorious, and damnable heretikes, and had now abiured the same, being first absolued from the sentence of excommunication which he had incurred by meanes of his opinions, he was enioyned for penance 7. yeeres imprisonment in the monasterie of Langley, in the diocesse of Norwich. And for so much as in times past, he vsed vpon the Fridaies to eat flesh, he was inioyned to fast bread & water euery Friday, by the space of that seuen yeeres to come; and that by the space of two yeeres next immediatly after the 7. yeeres expired, euery Wednesday in the beginning of Lent, and euery Maundie thursday, he should appeare before the bishop or his successor, or commissarie for the time being, in the cathedrall church of Norwich together with the other penitentiaries, to do open penance for his offences.

John Skilley. The penance of John Skilley.

Besides these there were diuers other of the same company which the same yeere were forced to like abiuration and penance. And so to proceed to the next yeere following, which was 1429. there ensueth a great number in the same register, which were examined and did penance in like sort, to the number of 16. or 17. In the number of whom was Iohn Baker, otherwise called Vsher Tunstall, who for hauing a booke with the Pater noster, the Aue and Creed in English, and for certaine other articles of fasting, confession and inuocation contrarie to the determination of the Romish Church, after much vexation for the same, was caused to abiure and sustaine such penaunce, as the other before him had done.

The storie of Margery Backster.

AMother was Margerie Backster, wife of William Backster Wright in Wartham, the same yeere accused: against whom, one Ioane wife of Cliffeland, was brought in by the bishop, and compelled to depose, and was made to bring in, in forme following.

Margerie Backster.

First, that the said Margerie Backster did informe this deponent, that she should in no case sweare, saying to her in English, dame beware of the Bes, for euery Bee will sting, and therefore take heed you sweare not, neither by God, neither by our ladie, neither by none other saint: and if yee doe contrary, the Bee will sting your tongue and venome your soule.

A woman brought in for witnesse in the popes court. The Bee will sting.

Item, this deponent being demanded by the said Margery, what she did euery day at Church, she answered that shee kneeled downe and said 5. Pater nosters, in worship of the crucifix, and as many Aue Maries in worship of our ladie. Whom Margerie rebuked, saying: You do euil to kneele or pray to such Images in the Churches, for God dwelleth not in such Churches, neither shall come downe out of heauen, and will giue you no more reward for such prayer, then a candle lighted and set vnder the couer of the font, will giue light by night to those which are in the Church: saying moreouer in English, Leaud wights, of stocks hew and forme such crosses and Images, and after that, leaud painters glere them with colours. And if you desire so much to see the true crosse of Christ, I will shew it you at home in your owne house. Which this deponent being desirous to see, the said Margery stretching out her armes abroad, said to this deponent: this is the true crosse of Christ, and this crosse thou oughtest and maist euery day, behold and worship in thine owne house, and therefore it is but vaine to run to the Church to worship dead crosses and Images.

Against Images.

Item, this deponent being demanded by the said Margery how she beleeued touching the Sacrament of the altar, said that shee beleeued the Sacrament of the altar after the consecration, to be the very bodie of Christ in forme of bread. To whom Margerie said: Your beleefe is nought: For if euerie such Sacrament were God, and the very bodie of Christ, there should be an infinite number of Gods, because that a thousand priests and more doe euery day make a thousand such Gods, and afterward eate them, and void them out againe by their hinder parts filthilie stincking vnder the hedges, where as you may find a great many such gods, if you will seeke for them. And therefore know for a certaintie, that by the grace of God it shall neuer be my God, because it is falsly and deceitfullie ordeined by the priests in the church, to induce the simple people to idolatry: for it is only materiall bread.

The sacrament is not God.

Moreouer, the said Margerie said to this deponent, that Thomas of Canturbury, whom the people called S. Thomas, was a false traitor and damned in hell, because hee iniuriously endowed the Churches with possessions, and raised vp many heresies in the Church, which seduce the simple people; and therefore if God be blessed, the said Thomas is accursed: and those false priests that say that hee suffered his death patiently before the altar, doe lie: For as a false coward ly traitor he was slaine in the church doore as he was flying away.

Tho. Becket a traitor.

Thomas Becket slaine, not before the altar, but in his flying.

Moreouer, this deponent saith, that the said Margery told her that the cursed Pope, Cardinals, Archbish. and Bishops, and specially the Bishop of Norwich and others that support and maintaine heresies and Idolatrie, raigning and ruling ouer the people, shall shortly haue the verie same or worse mischiefe fall vpon them, then that cursed man Thomas of Canturbury had. For they falsly and cursedlie deceiue the people with their false mammetries and lawes, to extort mony of the simple folke to sustaine their pride, riot and idlenesse. And know assuredlie that the vengeance of God will speedilie come vpon them, which haue most cruellie slaine the children of God, Father Abraham, and William White, a true preacher of the law of God, and Iohn Wadden, with many other godlie men: which vengeance had come vpon the said Caiphas, the Bishop of Norwich and his ministers, which are members of the diuell, before this time, if the Pope had not sent ouer these false pardons vnto those parties, which the said Caiphas had falsilie obtained to induce the people to make procession for the state of them and of the Church. Which pardons brought the simple people to cursed idolatrie.

Father Abraham, William White, Iohn Wadden.

Item, the said Margerie said to this deponent, that euerie faithfull man or woman is not bound to fast in Lent, or other daies appointed for fasting by the Church, and that euerie man may lawfully eate flesh and all other meates vpon the said daies and times: and that it were better to eate the fragments left vpon Thursday at night on the fasting daies, then to go to the market to bring themselues in debt to to buy fish: and that pope Siluester made the Lent.

Item, the said Margery said to this deponent, that William White was falsly condemned for an heretike, and that he was a good and holy man, and that he willed her to follow him to the place of execution, where as she saw that when he would haue opened his mouth to speake vnto the people to instruct them, a diuell one of bishop Caiphas seruants strucke him on the lips, and stopped his mouth, that he could in no case declare the will of God.

Will. White willing to speake at the stake, was strucken on the mouth.

Item, this deponent saith, that the said Margery taught her that she should not goe on pilgrimage, neither to our lady of Walsingham, nor to any other saint or place.

Also this deponent saith, that the said Margery desired her that she and Joane her maid would come secretly in the night to her chamber, and there she should heare her husband reade the law of Christ vnto them; which law was written in a booke that her husband was wont to reade to her by night, and that her husband is well learned in the christian verity.

Also that the same Margery had talked with a woman named Joane Welk, and that the said woman is in a good way of saluation.

Also that the said Margery said to this deponent: Joane, it appeareth by your countenance, that you intend to disclose this that I haue said vnto you: and this deponent sware that she would neuer disclose it, without the said Margery gaue her occasion. Then said Margery vnto this deponent; if thou doe accuse mee vnto the bishop, I will doe vnto thee as I did once vnto a certaine frier a Carmelite of Yarmouth, which was the best learned frier in all the country. Then this deponent desired to know what she had done to the frier. Vnto whom Margery answered, that she had talked with the said frier, rebuking him because he did beg, saying; that it was no almes to giue him any good thing, except hee would leaue his habit, and goe to the plough, and so he should please God more, then following the life of some of those friers. Then the frier required of the said Margery, whether shee could teach him or tell him any thing else. Then the said Margery (as shee affirmed to this deponent) declared to this frier the gospels in English, and then the frier departed from her. After this, the same frier accused the said Margery of heresie; and shee vnderstanding that the frier had accused her, accused the frier againe, that he would haue knowne her carnally; and because she would not consent vnto him, the frier had accused her of heresie. And moreouer she said, that her husband would haue killed the frier therefore: and so the frier for feare held his peace, and went his way for shame.

Against auricular confession.

This Margery also said, that she had often times bin fainedly confessed to the Deane of the fields, because he should thinke her to be a woman of good life; and therefore he gaue the said Margery often times mony. Then this deponent asked her whether she had confessed her sinnes to a priest or not. And she answered, that she had neuer offended any priest, and therefore she would neuer confesse her selfe to any priest, neither obey him, because they haue no power to absolue any man from their sinnes, for that they offend daily more grieuously then other men; and therefore that men ought to confesse themselues only vnto God, and to no priest.

Against Image worship.

Item, that the said Margery said to this deponent, that the people did worship diuels which fell from heauen with Lucifer, which diuels in their fall to the earth, entred into the Images which stand in the churches, and haue long lurked and dwelled in them: so that the people worshipping those Images, commit idolatry.

Item, she said more to this deponent, that holy bread and holy water were but trifles of no effect or force, and that the bels are to be cast out of the church, and that they are excommunicat which first ordained them.

Moreouer, that she should not be burned, although she were conuict of Lollardy, for that shee had a charter of saluation in her body.

Also the said deponent saith, that Agnes Bethem her seruant, being sent to the house of the said Margery the saturday after Ashwednesday, the said Margery not being within, found a bealle pot standing ouer the fire, with a peece of bacon and otemeale seething in it, as it is said Agnes reported to this deponent.

There were also besides this deponent, diuers other sworn and examined vpon the said Margery, as John Grimley and Agnes Berthem, seruants to William Clifland, which all together confirmed the former depositions.

Thus much we haue thought good to note as concerning Margery Backster, which we haue gathered out of the old monuments and registers. But what became of her after this her accusation, because we finde no mention made in the said registers, we are not able to declare.

The same yeere also were the like depositions made by one William Wright against diuers good men, as here followeth.

John Pery, John Bungay, John Usher.

First this deponent saith, that William Taylor told John Pery of Ludney, in the house of John Bungay of Weghton, in the presence of John Bungay, Robert Grigges wright of Wartham, and John Usher, that all the good men of Wartham which were fauorers and helpers to that good man William White are euill troubled now a daies, and that the said William White was a good and holy doctor: and that the best doctor after him was William Euerden, which wrought with the said William Taylor of Ludney, by the space of one moneth, and that the first sunday of the same moneth, the said William Euerden did sit all day vpon the table at worke, saying to the said William Taylor, that he would not goe to church to shew himselfe a Scribe or a Pharisie: and the second sunday he put on gentlemans apparell, and went to Norwich to hearken how the bishop and his ministers vsed the poore christians there in prison.

Will. Euerden.

Also the said William Wright, deposed that William Taylor of Ludney was one of the sect, and went to London with sir Hugh Pie, and had conuersation oftentimes with sir William White, hauing often conference vpon the Lollards doctrine.

Will. Taylor of Ludney.

Item, that Amie, wife of Thomas Poone, is of the same sect, and fauored them, and receiueth them often, and also the daughter of Thomas Poone is partly of the same sect, and can reade English.

The wife and daughter of Tho. Poone.

Item, that Richard Fletcher of Beckles, is a meet perfit doctor in that sect, and can very well and perfitly expound the holy Scriptures, and hath a booke of the new law in English, which was sir Hugh Pies first.

Rich. Fletcher.

Item, that Nicolas Belward, sonne of John Belward, dwelling in the parish of Southelam, is one of the same sect, and hath a new testament which he bought at London for foure marks and forty pence, and taught the said William Wright and Margery his wife, and wrought with them continually by the space of one yere, and studied diligently vpon the said new Testament.

Nic. Belward. A new testament then cost forty marks, and forty pence.

Item, that Thomas Gremner, Turner of Dychingame, is perfect in that sect and law.

Tho. Gremner.

John Clarke the younger of Bergh, had the bedding and apparell of William Euerden in his custody, after the returne of William White from Bergh, and is of the same sect.

John Clarke.

Item, William Bate, Taylor of Sething and his wife, and his sonne, which can read English very well, are of the same sect.

Wm. Bate.

Item, William Skruing of Sething, receiued Joane the wife of William White into his house, being brought thither by William Euerden, after their departure from Wartham.

Wm. Skruing.

Item, William Osborne of Sething, John Reue glouer, and Bawdwin Cooper of Beckles are of the same sect.

Wm. Osborne, John Reue, Bawdwin Cooper.

Item John Pert, late seruant of Thomas Poone, is of the same sect, and can reade well, and did reade in the presence of William White, and was the first that brought sir Hugh Pie into the company of the Lollards, which assembled oftentimes together at the house of the said Thomas Poone, and there conferred vpon their doctrine.

John Pert.

Item, sir Hugh Pie bequeathed to Alice, seruant to William White, a new Testament, which they then called the booke of the new law, and was in the custody of Oswald Godfrey of Colchester.

Sir Hugh Pie priest.

John Perker, mercer of a village by Ipswich, is a famous doctor of that sect. Also he said, that father Abraham of Colchester is a good man.

John Perker.

Item the said William Wright deposeth, that it is read in the prophecies amongst the Lollards, that the sect of Lollards shall be in a maner destroied: notwithstanding at the length the Lollards shall preuaile and haue the victory against all their enemies.

Prophecie.

Also he said, that Tucke knoweth all of that sect in Suffolke, Norfolke and Eller.

Besides these, there were many other the same yere troubled, whose names being before erpressed in the table of Norfolke men, here for breuities sake we omit further to intreat of, passing ouer to the next yere following, which was 1430. Ex Regist. Norw.

Ex Regist. Norw.

John Burrell, seruant to Thomas Poone of Ludney, in the diocesse of Norwich, was apprehended and arrested for heresie the 9. day of September, in this yere of our Lord 1430. and examined by master William Bernam the bishops commissary, vpon the articles before mentioned, and diuers others hereafter following obiected against him.

John Burrell.

In primis, that the catholike church is the soule of euery good christian man.

Item, that no man is bound to fast the Lent or other fasting daies appointed by the church, for they were not appointed by God, but ordained by the priests: and that euery man may eat flesh or fish vpon the same daies indifferently, according to his owne will, and euery friday is a free day to eat both flesh and fish indifferently.

Lent fast, fish daies.

Item, that pilgrimage ought not to be made, but only vnto the poore.

Pilgrimage to the poore.

Item, that it is not lawfull to sweare, but in case of life and death.

Item, that masses and prayers for the dead, are but vaine, for the soules of the dead are either in heauen or hell: and there is none other place of purgatory but this world. Vpon the which articles he being conuict, was forced to abiure ture, and suffered like penance, as the other before had done.

Tho. Woone of Ludney.

THomas Woone of Ludney, was apprehended and attached for suspition of heresie, against whom were obiected by the bishop, the articles before written, but specially this article, that he had familiarity and communication with diuers heretikes, and had received, comforted, supported, and maintained diuers of them, as sir William White, sir Hugh Pye, Thomas Pet, and William Callis priests, with many other more vpon the which articles, he being conuict before the bishop, was forced to abiure, and receiued the like penance, in like manner as before.

Wil. White, Hugh Pye, Tho. Pert, Wil. Callis, priests persecuted.

Rob. Grigges of Wartham.

In like maner, Robert Grigges of Wartham was brought before the bishop the 17. day of February, in the yeere aforesaid, for holding and affirming the foresaid articles, but specially these hereafter following.

Articles.

That the sacrament of confirmation ministred by the bishop, did auaile nothing to saluation.

That it was no sinne to withstand the ordinances of the church of Rome.

That holy bread and holy water were but trifles, and that the bread and the water were the worse for the conjurations and characters which the priests made ouer them.

Upon which articles he being conuict, was forced to abiure, and receiued penance in manner and forme as the other had done before him.

John Finch of Colchester.

The like also (albeit somewhat more sharpe) happened vnto John Finch of Colchester, the 20. day of September, who albeit he was of the diocesse of London, being suspect of heresie, was attached in Ipswich in the diocesse of Norwich, and brought before the bishop there, before whom he being conuict of the like articles, as all the other before him, was enioyned penance, three displings in solemne procession about the cathedrall church of Norwich three seuerall sundaies, and three displings about the market place of Norwich three principall market daies, his head, necke, and feet being bare, and his body couered only with a short shirt or vesture, hauing in his hands a taper of wax of a pound waight, which the next sunday after his penãce, he should offer to the Trinity: and that for the space of three yeers after, euery Ashwednesday and Maundy Thursday, he should appeare in the cathedrall church of Norwich, before the bishop or his vicegerent, to doe open penance amongst the other penitentiaries for his offences.

Popish penance.

There were besides these men which we haue here rehearsed, diuers and many other, who, both for the concordance of the matter, and also for that their articles and punishments were all one, wee haue thought good at this time to passe ouer, especially forsomuch as their names be before recited in the catalogue.

{Anno 1430} Rich. Houeden martyr.

ABout the same time, euen the same yeere 1430. shortly after the solemne coronation of king Henry the sixth, a certaine man named Richard Houeden a woll winder, and a citizen of London, receiued also the crowne of martyrdome.

Which man when hee could by no perswasions bee withdrawne or plucked backe from the opinions of Wickliffe, hee was by the rulers of the Church condemned for heresie; and as Fabian writeth, burned hard by the Tower of London.

Nicolas Canon of Eye.

Nicolas Canon of Eye. {Anno 1431}

NOw to proceed in our story of Norfolke and Suffolke, in following the order of yeeres, we finde that in the yeere of our Lord 1431. one Nicolas Canon of Eye was brought before the bishop of Norwich for suspition of heresie, with certain witnesses sworne to depose against him touching his maners and conuersation, which witnesses appointing one William Chrystopher to speake in the name of them all, he deposed in maner and forme following.

First, that on Easter day, when all the parishioners went about the church of Eye solemnly in procession, as the manner was, the said Nicolas Canon as it were mocking and deriding the other parishioners, went about the church the contrarie way, and met the procession.

Deposicions.

This article he confessed, and affirmed that he thought he did well in so doing.

Item, the said Nicolas asked of master John Colman of Eye, this question: Master Colman, what thinke you of the sacrament of the altar? To whom the said Colman answered: Nicolas, I thinke that the sacrament of the altar is very God and very man, the very flesh and very bloud of our Lord Jesus Christ vnder the forme of bread and wine. Vnto whom Nicolas in derision said: Truly if the sacrament of the altar be very God and very man, and the very body and bloud of our Lord Jesu Christ, then may very God and very man be put in a small rome; as when it is in the priests mouth, that receiueth it at masse. And why may not wee simple men, as well eat flesh vpon fridaies, and all other prohibited daies, as the priest to eat the flesh, and drinke the bloud of our Lord euery day indifferently? The which article, the said Nicolas denied that he spake vnto master Colman, but vnto a monke of Hickelney: and furthermore, he thought he had spoken well in that behalfe.

If the sacrament be very flesh, then the priests eat flesh on Friday.

Item, that on Corpus Christi day, at the elevation of high masse, when all the parishioners and other strangers kneeled downe, holding vp their hands, and doing reuerence vnto the sacrament, the said Nicolas went behinde a piller of the church, and turning his face from the high altar, mocked them that did reuerence vnto the sacrament.

This article he also acknowledging, affirmed that he beleeued himselfe to doe well in so doing.

Item, when his mother would haue the said Nicolas holst vp his right hand, and to crosse himselfe from the crafts and assaults of the diuell, forsomuch as he deferred the doing thereof, his mother tooke vp his right hand and crossed him, saying: In nomine patris, filij, & spiritus sancti, Amen. Which so ended, the said Nicolas immediatly deriding his mothers blessing, tooke vp his right hand of his own accord, and blessed him otherwise, as his aduersaries report of him. This article the said Nicolas acknowledged to be true.

Nicolas Canon turned his backe to the sacrament.

Item, that vpon Allhallowe day, in the time of elevation of high masse, when as many of the parishioners of Eye lighted many torches, and carried them vp to the high altar, kneeling downe there in reuerence and honor of the sacrament, the said Nicolas carrying a torch, went vp hard to the high altar, and standing behind the priests back saying masse, at the time of the elevation he stood vpright vpon his feet, turning his back to the priest, and his face toward the people, and would doe no reuerence vnto the sacrament. This article he acknowledged, affirming that he thought he had done well in that behalfe. All which articles the bishops commissary caused to be copied out word for word, and to be sent vnto master William Worsted, prior of the cathedrall church of Norwich and to other doctors of Diuinity of the order of begging friers, that they might deliberate vpon them, and shew their mindes betweene that and thursday next following. Vpon which thursday, being the last of November, the yeere aforesaid, the said Nicolas was againe examined before master Barnam and diuers other, vpon two other articles which he had confessed vnto J. Exceter notary, and Tho. Gerulken bacheler of Diuinity, and others. Whereof the first article was this: that the said Nicolas Canon being of perfit mind and remembrance, confessed that he doubted whether in the sacrament of the altar were the very body of Christ or no. This article he confessed before the commissary to be true.

Another examination of Nicolas Canon.

Item, that he being of perfit mind and remembrance, beleeued that a man ought not to confesse his sinnes to a priest. This article he also confessed that he doubted vpon.

Articles obiected.

Now remaineth to declare what these doctors aforesaid concluded vpon the articles: whose answere vnto the same was this.

First of all, as touching the first article, they said that the article in the same termes as it was propounded, is not simply an heresie, but an error.

The iudgement of the prior and doctors vpon his articles.

Item, as touching the second article, the doctors agree as in the first.

Item, as touching the third article, they affirme that it is an heresie.

Vnto the fourth article, they answered as vnto the first and second.

An heresie by doubt worded.

Item, the doctors affirme the fifth article to be an heresie.

Item,

the Sacrament be the perfect bodie of Christ or no.

Item, as touching the sixth article, the doctors conclude, that if the said Nicolas being of perfect mind and remembrance, did doubt whether the Sacrament of the altar were the verie perfect bodie of Christ or no, then the article is simplie an heresie.

Nicolas Canon declared an heretike.

Whereupon the said Commissarie declared and pronounced the said Nicolas Canon vpon the determination of the foresaid doctors, to be an heretike, and thereupon forced the said Nicolas to abiure all the said articles. That done, he enioyned the said Nicolas penance for his offences, three disiplings about the cloister of the cathedrall church of Norwich, before a solemne procession, bare headed and bare foote, carrying a taper of halfe a pound in his hand, going after the manner aforesaid, like a meere penitentiarie: the which his penance, the iudge commanded should be respited vntill the comming of the bishop into his diocesse, and that in the meane time he should be kept in prison, to the end that he should not infect the flock with his venime and poison of errors and heresies.

Penance enioyned to Nicolas Canon.

Thus haue we briefly discoursed vnto you, the great troubles and afflictions, which happened in Norfolke and Suffolke by the space of those foure yeeres before mentioned, hauing drawne out briefly for euerie yeere, certaine notable examples, sufficient for the declaration of all the rest, for so much as their opinions being nothing different, their penance and punishment did also nothing differ, otherwise then by those particular examples may be plainly seene.

THe same yeere also was Paul Craw a Bohemian taken at Saint Andzeiwes by the bishop Henrie, and deliuered ouer to the secular power to be burnt, for holding contrarie opinions vnto the church of Rome touching the Sacrament of the Lords supper, the worshipping of Saints, auricular confession, with other of Wickliffes opinions.

❋ The storie of Thomas Rhedon, a French man, and a Carmelite frier, burnt in Italie for the profession of Christ.

Thomas Rhedonensis, martyr. Ex Antonin. 3. part. hist. fol. 165.

WE haue declared before, how this cruell storme of persecution which first began with vs in England, after it had long raged heere against many good and godly men, it brake out and passed into Boheme, and after within a short time, the fire of this persecution increasing by little and little, inuaded Scotland, and from thence now with greater force and violence, this furious deuouring flame hath entred Italy, and sufereth not any part of the world to be free from the murther and slaughter of most good and godly men. It hapned about this time, that one Thomas Rhedon, a frier of that sect, which taketh his name of the mount Carmelus, by chance came with the Venetian ambassadors into Italy. This man, although he was of that sort and sect, which in stead of Christians, are called Carmelites, yet was he of a far other religion, and vnderstood the word of God, iudging, that God ought not to be worshipped, neither in that mount, nor at Jerusalem only, but in spirit and truth. This man being a true Carmelite, and sauouring with his whole hart that new sweet musse of Jesus Christ, with earnest study and desire seeking after a christian integrity of life, prepared himselfe first to go into Italy, trusting that he should find there, or else in no place, some, by whose good life and liuing he might be edified and instructed. For where ought more abundance of vertue and good liuing to be, then in that place, which is counted to be the fort and fountaine of all religion? And how could it otherwise be, but that where as so great holines is professed, whereupon all mens eyes are bent, as vpon a stage, where as Saint Peters seate is, and is thought to be the ruler and gouernour of all the church, all things should flourish and abound worthie of so great expectation in that place? This holy man hauing these things before his eyes, and considering the same with himselfe, forsoke his owne countrie and citie, and went vnto Rome, conceiuing a firme and sure hope, that by the example of so many notable and worthie men, he should greatly profit in godlines and learning: but the successe of the matter did vtterly frustrate his hope, for all things were cleane contrarie. Whatsoeuer he saw, was nothing else but meere dissimulation and hypocrisie. In stead of gold, he found nothing but coales: and for to say the truth, he found nothing else there but gold and siluer. In stead of heauenly gifts, there raigned amongst them the pompe and pride of the world. In place of godlines, riot. In stead of learning and studie, slothfulnes and superstition. Tyrannie and hautinesse of mind had possessed the place of apostolike simplicitie: that now there remained no more any place or libertie for a man to learne that which he knew not, or to teach that which he perfectly vnderstood. Finally, all things were turned arse verse, all things happned vnto him contrarie to his expectation whersoeuer he went. But nothing so much offended this good mans mind, as the intolerable ambition, and pompous pride in them, whom example of humilitie should especially commend and praise to the whole world. And albeit that he saw heere nothing, which did accord and agree with the rule of the Apostles: yet these things did so much passe all measure and patience, that he could by no meanes refraine his tongue in so great abuse and corruption of the church, seeing such ambitious pride in their buildings, apparell, in their palaces, in their daintie fare, in their great traines of seruants, in their horse and armour, and finally in all things pertaining vnto them. Which things, how much they did varie from the prescript rule of the Gospell, so much the more was this good man forced to speake. Albeit he did wel vnderstand how little he should preuaile by speaking: for if admonition would profit any thing at all, the boks of Wickliffe and diuers other were not wanting. The famous testimonies of John Hus, and of Jerome of Prage, and their blod shed for the same, was yet present before their eyes: at whose most effectuall exhortations, they were so little correct and amended, that they seemed twice more cruell then they were before. Yet all this could not feare this good man, but that in so necessarie and wholesome an office, he would spend his life if need should be. So by this meanes, he which came to be a scholar vnto others, was now forced to be their teacher. And he which determined to follow other mens liues & maners, had now contrariwise set before them his life to be marked and followed. For he liued so amongst them, that his life might be a rule vnto them all, and so taught, as he might also be their schoolemaster. For euen as Paul had forshewed vnto such as desired to liue godly in Christ, that they should suffer persecution, such like reward hapned vnto this man. He gaue vnto them the fruit of godlinesse, which they should follow: they againe set vpon his head the diademe of martyrdome. He shewed them the way to saluation, and they for the benefit of life rewarded him death: and whereas no rewards had been worthie for his great labours and trauels, they with most extreame ignominie persecuted him euen vnto the fire. For when as by continuall preaching he had gotten great enuie and hatred, the rulers began to consult together, by what meanes they might circumuent this mans life. Heere they had recourse to their accustomed remedies: for it is a peculiar and continuall custome amongst the prelats of the church, that if any man did displease them, or that his talke be not according to their mind, or by any meanes hurtfull, or a hinderance to their lucre and gaine, by and by they frame out articles of some heresie, which they charge him withall. And like as euery liuing thing hath his peculiar and proper weapon to defend himselfe from harme, as nature hath armed the Boze with his tuskes, the Hedghog with his prickles, the Lion is feared for his clawes, the Dog for his biting, the Bull fighteth with his hornes, neither doth the Asse lacke his houes to strike withall: euen so this is the only armour of the bishops, to strangle a man with heresie, if he once go about to mutter against their will and ambition: which thing may be easily perceiued and seene in this most holy man, beside a great number of other. Who, when as now he began to ware grieuous vnto them, and could no longer be suffered: what did they? straightwaies flie vnto their old policies, and as they had done with Hus, and Jerome of Prage, euen so went they about to practise against this man. They ouerwhelme him with suspition, they seeke to intangle him with questions, they examine him in iudgement, they compile articles against him, and lay heresie vnto his charge, they condemne him as an heretike, and being so condemned, they destroy and kill him. This was their godlines: this was the peaceable order of those Carmelites. Whose religion was to weare no sword nor shield, notwithstanding, they did beare in their hearts malice, rancour, vengeance, poison, craft and deceit, sharper then any sword. With how great care and policie is it prouided by law, that none of these clergie men should fight with sword in the streets? when as in iudgement and accusations (where as it is not lawfull for a man to oppresse his brother) there is no murtherer which hath more readie vengeance, or that doth more vilely efface his brothers soule then they. They shead no blod themselues, they strike not, nor kill, but they deliuer them ouer vnto others to be slaine. What difference is there I pray you, but that they are the authors, and the other are but the ministers of the cruell fact? they kill no man as murtherers do. How then? Although not after the same sort, yet they do it by another meane.

That abominations are vsed at Rome.

That the vniust excommunication of the pope, is not to be feared: and those which do not obserue the same, do not sinne or offend.

Ex Antonin. 3. part hist. fol. 165.

But yet there lacked a minister for these articles: albeit he could not long be wanting at Rome, where all things are to be sold, euen mens soules. For this office and ministerie, there was no man thought more meete, then William of Rowne, cardinall of Saint Martins in the mount, Vicechancellor of the court of Rome. Eugenius at that time was pope, who had a little before succéeded pope Martin aboue mentioned. Before the which Eugenius, this godly Rhedonensis the Frenchman, was brought, and from thence sent vnto prison. And againe after his imprisonment, and diuers and sundrie grieuous torments, he was brought before the Iudges. The Wolfe sate in iudgement, the lambe was accused. Why? because he had troubled the spring: But heere need not many words. This good Thomas, not being able to resist the malice of these mightie potentates, had offended enough, and was easily conuict and condemned to be burned, but in such sort, as first of all he should be depriued of all such degrées as he had taken of priesthood: For it is counted an vnlawfull thing, that a priest should be punished with prophane punishment, whenas notwithstanding it is lawfull enough for priests to put any lay man to death, be he neuer so guiltlesse.

W. Cardinalis Rhotomagensis his persecutor. Thomas Rhedonensis brought before pope Eugenius.

How religiously and earnestly do they foresée, that the maiestie of priestly dignitie should not in any case be hurt? But how little care haue they, that their consciences be not hurt with false iudgements, and oppressing the guiltlesse? Wherefore, before that he should come vnto punishment, this good man must be degraded. The order and maner of this popish degrading, is partly before touched in the storie of William Taylor, fol. 606.

After that it had pleased the bishops to degrade this man from the degrées wherewith before they had consecrated him, and thought not that sufficient, by and by after they depriued him of his life also, and burned him foure yéeres after that he came to Rome. In the yéere of our Lord, 1436.

And thus through the cruelty of these most tyrannous prelats, this blessed martyr died. After the death of pope Martine, who raigned fourtéene yéeres, succéeded Eugenius, the fourth of that name, about the yéere of our Lord 1431. Of whom Antoninus thus writeth, that he was much giuen to wars, as may well declare his conflicts and fighting with the Romans: also the battels betweene the Venetians and the Florentines.

Pope Eugenius the fourth.

This pope began first to celebrate the councell of Basill, which councell Martine his predecessour had before intended, according to the institution of the councell of Constance. Notwithstanding, the said Eugenius perceiuing afterward, this councell of Basill not to fauour him and his doings, and fearing some detriment to come to him by the same, afterward laboured by all subtill practise to dissolue and interrupt the said councell, and from Basill to translate it first to Ferraria, then to Florentia, more néere to his owne sée of Rome. Concerning the which councell of Basill, for so much as we haue begun heere to make mention, it shall be no great digression out of the way, to discourse something thereof (the Lord so permitting) more at large, so much as for the most principall matters thereof shall séeme sufficient or necessarie to be knowne.

¶ Here followeth the order and maner of the councell of Basill, touching the principall matters concluded therin, briefly collected and abridged heere in this present booke: the rest wherof we haue referred vnto our former edition, wherein the full discourse of the whole disputation is to be seene more at large, for such as haue list and leasure to see more therof.

The councell of Basill. Ex Aeneas Siluio. Ex Cochlaeo in hist. Hussit. Ex paralipom. Abbat. Vsperg.

IN the thirtie ninth session of the councell of Constance (as is before mentioned, page 547.) it was decréed and prouided concerning the order and times of such generall councels as should hereafter follow: The first that should next ensue, to be kept the fifth yéere after the said councell of Constance: The second to be holden the seuenth yéere after that, and so orderly all other to follow successiuely from ten yéere to ten yéere. Wherefore, according to this decrée, followed a generall councell, fiue yéeres after the councell of Constance, celebrate and holden at Sene, vnder pope Martine, an. 1424. but it soone broke vp. After the which councell, the terme of seuen yéeres being expired, another councell was holden at Basill, in the yéere of our Lord 1431. The which councell is noted to haue béen the most troublesome, and to haue endured longer then anie other councel before time celebrate and holden in the church. This councell continued almost the space of seuentéene yéers: wherein it was concluded, as before in the councell of Constance, that the generall councels were aboue the pope, and both of these two councels did attribute the chiefe authoritie in decrééing and determining vnto the generall councell: which is the cause that the contrarie part doth derogat so much from the authoritie of this présent councell.

When as pope Martine the fifth had appointed Julian, cardinall and deacon of Saint Angell, his legat, to celebrate and hold a generall councell at Basill for the reformation of the church, and rooting out of heresies, within short space after pope Martine died, in whose seat Eugenius the fourth succeeded, who confirmed vnto the said cardinall Julian, the same authoritie which his predecessour before had giuen him. Vnto this councell of Basill being begun, came the emperour Sigismund, who during his life time, with his présence and authoritie, did protect and defend the said Synode. After the emperors death, pope Eugenius altering his former mind and purpose, would transport the councell vnto Bononie, and thereby hinder the successe of the councell of Basill. And first he held a contrarie councell at Ferraria, and afterward at Florence: For after the death of the emperor Sigismund, there were no princes or noble men, that had any care or regard of the councell. Eugenius the pope pretended causes, as touching the Grékes, which should come vnto the councell, and the vniting of their church vnto the West church, the which Grékes would in no wise passe the Alpes: Also as touching his owne incommoditie, that he could not come vnto Basill, being so long a iourney, and that all his men might haue easie accesse vnto Bononia, and that amongst the Germains (which in their owne countrie are so intractable) nothing can be attempted for their reformation: whereupon he cited cardinall Julian, and the fathers of the councel vnto Bononia, vnder great penaltie. They againe cited the pope, that either he should come himselfe vnto the councell, or send Ambassadors vnder the like penaltie. For this cause the ambassadours of Albert king of the Romaines, and of the other princes of Germanie, assembled together first at Norenberge, and when as they could determine nothing there, they assembled againe at Frankford, to appease the dissension betweene the councell and the pope: for it was thought, that the Electours of the empire might best assemble and meet in that place. In the meane time the emperours ambassadours, and the ambassadours of the Electors, went vnto Basill, and hauing conference with the ambassadours of the other princes which were there, they did earnestly exhort the fathers of the councell, that they would embrace and receiue the vnitie, which they would offer. The request of the princes was, was, that the fathers would transport the counсell, and go vnto another place: the which only thing pope Eugenius seemed alwaies to seeke and desire, that thereby he might either diuide the fathers of the counсell, or take way their libertie.

The prelats of the counсell refused the popes request.

Notwithstanding, this sacred Synode thought good neither to denie the princes request, nor to grant that which pope Eugenius required. During this doubt, the emperours ambassadours, the bishops of Patauia and Augusta, (being much required and stirred thereunto) appointed a noble and valiant baron called Conrade Weinsperge, by the kings commandement, to be protector and defender of the counсell, and the fathers. Whereby as the enemies perceiued the emperours mind to be alienate from the pope, so the fathers of the counсell vnderstood his good will towards them, for so much as he would not haue sent them a protectour, if he had not iudged it a lawfull counсell: neither againe would he haue iudged it a counсell in Basill, if he had giuen credit to pope Eugenius. But by meanes of a great pestilence which began to grow, the assemblie that should haue bẽn holden at Frankford, was transported vnto Mentz. The ambassadors of the princes also thought good to go thither, if they might find any meanes of vnitie, whereby they might vnite and knit the pope againe vnto the counсell.

The princes assembled at Mentz, to make vnitie betweene the counсel and the pope.

The assemblie was verie famous; for there were present the archbishops of Mentz, Collen, and Treuers, Electours of the sacred empire, and all the ambassadours of the other Electours. Notwithstanding, the archbishop of Collen was the chiefe fauourer of the counсell in this assemblie, who with all his labour and diligence went about to bring the matter vnto a good end. Rabanus the archbishop of Treuers shewed himselfe somewhat more rough. The sacred Synode also thought good to send thither their ambassadours, and appointed out the Patriarke of Aquileia, the bishop of Aicene, and the bishop of Argen: diuines, John Segouius, and Thomas de Corcellis, with diuers others. There was no man there present which would name himselfe the ambassadour of Eugenius: Albeit there were many of his fauourers and friends come thither, both from the counсell, and also out of Florence, the which albeit they had sworne to the contrarie, yet fauoured they more Eugenius then the counсell. But the chiefe Hercules of all the Eugenians, was Nicolas Cusanus, a man singularly well learned, and of great experience. After diuers consultations had, the Electours of the empire, and the ambassadours of the other princes of Germanie, thought good to giue out commandement throughout their whole nation and countrie, that the Decrees of the counсell of Basill should be receiued and obserued.

Whilest these things were thus debated at Mentz, there sprang a certaine verie doubtfull question amongst the diuines which remained at Basill, whether Eugenius might be called an heretike, which had so rebelliously contemned the commandements of the church. Hereupon they gathered themselues together, disputing long amongst themselues, some affirming, and othersome holding the negatiue part. Vpon this their disputation, there arose three seuerall opinions, some affirming that he was an heretike, othersome, not only an heretike, but also a relapse. The third sort would neither grant him to be an heretike nor a relapse. Amongst these Diuines, the chiefe and principall both in learning and authoritie, was the bishop of Ebrun, ambassadour of the king of Castile, and a certaine Scotish abbat: which, as two most valiant champions, subdued all their enemies, so that all the rest did either consent vnto their arguments, or gaue place vnto them, and so their determination toke place, and Eugenius was pronounced both an heretike and relapse. Eight conclusions were there determined and allowed amongst the Diuines, which they called verities: the copie whereof they did diuulgate throughout all christendome.

Three opinions touching the pope.

When the ambassadours of the counсell were returned from Mentz, and that certaine report was made of the allowing of their decrees, the fathers of the counсell thought good to discusse the conclusions of the diuines more at large. Whereupon by the commandement of the deputies, all the maisters and doctors and clergie, were called together, with all the residue of the prelats, into the Chapterhouse of the great church, there openly to dispute and discusse Eugenius heresie. The which thing sore grieued the bishop of Millaine, fearing lest this disputation would worke the depriuation of Eugenius, the which, as he said, he had alwaies letted for feare of a schisme. Wherefore he ceased not by all manner of waies to labour, to stop and trouble the matter, exhorting them that were absent by his letters, and encouraging those that were present by his words, to the defence of Eugenius. But at the last, there was a great assemblie in the Chapterhouse, some comming thither to dispute, and othersome to heare. This disputation continued fiue daies, both forenoone and afternoone, amongst whom cardinall Lodouicus archbishop Arelatensis, was appointed as Iudge and Arbiter of the whole disputation: who beside many other notable vertues, was both valiant and constant. Nicolas Amici, which was also a proctor of the faith, a famous man amongst the diuines of Paris, demanded of euery man what their opinion was. John Deinleffil, publike Notarie, wrote euery mans sentence and iudgement. The conclusions of the Diuines which were the ground and foundation of their disputation, were these here following.

Conclusions of the disputation.

1 It is a veritie of the catholike faith, that the sacred generall counсell hath power ouer the pope, or any other prelate.

2 The pope cannot by his owne authoritie, either dissolue, transport, or prorogue the generall counсell being lawfully congregate, without the whole consent of the counсell: and this is of like veritie.

3 He which doth obstinately resist these verities, is to be counted an heretike.

4 Pope Eugenius the fourth hath resisted these verities, when as at the first, by the fulnesse of his Apostolike power he attempted to dissolue or to transport the counсell of Basill.

5 Eugenius being admonished by the sacred counсell, did recant the errors repugnant to these verities.

6 The dissolution or translation of the counсell attempted the second time by Eugenius, is against the forsaid verities, and containeth an inexcusable error touching the faith.

7 Eugenius in going about to dissolue and transport the counсell againe, is fallen into his before reuoked errors.

8 Eugenius being warned by the Synode, that he should reuoke the dissolution or translation the second time attempted: after that his contumacie was declared, persevering in his rebellion, and erecting a counсell at Ferraria, shewed himselfe thereby obstinate.

These were the conclusions which were read in the Chapterhouse before the fathers of the counсell. Vpon the which, when they were desired to speake their minds, they all in a manner, confirmed and allowed them. Notwithstanding, Panormitane archbishop disputed much against them. Likewise did the bishop of Burgen the king of Arragons Almoner. Yet did they not gainsay the three first conclusions, but only those wherein pope Eugenius was touched. This Panormitane as he was subtill, so did he subtilly dispute against the last conclusions, indeuouring himselfe to declare that Eugenius was not relapsed, and had great contention with the bishop of Argens, John Segouius, and Francis de Fure, Diuines. He diuided the articles of the faith into three sorts: straitly, as in the Creed: largely, as in the declarations made by the church: most largely of all, as in those things which rise of the premisses; affirming, that Eugenius did by no meanes violate his faith in his first dissolution that he made, because it is not contained in the Creed, neither yet in the determinations of the church, that the pope cannot dissolue the councels: and that it seemeth not vnto him to rise of the determinations before made, but rather of the decrees of the counсell of Constance. And further, that this, as a case omitted, is reserued for the pope to be discussed, for so much as in ỹ chapter beginning Frequens, it appeareth that the place where the counсell should be kept, ought to be chosen by the pope, the counсell allowing the same, and nothing is thereof at all spoken. And if peraduenture Eugenius had offended in the first dissolution, notwithstanding he ought to be holden excused, because he did it by the counсell of the cardinals, representing the church of Rome: whose authoritie hee said to bee such, that the iudgement thereof should be preferred before all the world. Neither had there bẽn any sacred counсell found to haue proceeded against Eugenius as an heretike, and that is an euident signe, that the counсell hath not thought him to haue swarued from the faith, neither to haue any occasion that he should be called heretike for his errors reuoked; and that he himselfe hath read the whole text, that the pope did not reuoke the dissolution as contrarie vnto the faith, but as breeding offence: Also that the last dissolution hath no such cause in it, for so much as likewise he had done it by the counсell of the cardinals, and for the vniting of the Greekes, that he might not be compelled in a criminall cause, to answere by his procurator, when as he being letted by sicknesse, could not come personally. So, for as much as in the first dissolution Eugenius hath fallen into no errour of faith, he cãnot be perswaded that he can be called a relapse, for so much as he neither in the first, neither yet in the second dissolution did violate his faith.

Panormitane speaketh against the pope.

Articles of faith diuided into three sorts.

Panormitane preferreth the iudgement of the cardinals of Rome, before all the world.

The pope pretendeth the vniting of the Greekes, when he meaneth another thing.

This Oration of Panormitane was more praised then allowed of all men. Notwithstanding, this effect it wrought, that afterward this word relapse was taken out of the conclusions, and in stead thereof this word prolapse put in. Neither durst Panormitane himselfe, altogether excuse Eugenius of heresie, but defended more the first dissolution, then the second: yet departed he not without answere: for John Segouius an expert Diuine, rising vp, answered him reuerently as was comely for such a prelat. Hee said, hee granted that which Panormitane had spoken touching the diuision of the Articles of the faith into three points, for because it made for his purpose. For if those things are to be holden for articles of faith, said hee, which may be gathered of the determinations of the Church, it were manifest that the conclusions whereupon wee now contend, redound and come of the determinations of the Church: that is to say, of the counсell of Constance: for, if therein the pope bee made subiect vnto the generall councell, who is it that will say that the pope hath power ouer the councell which is aboue him: or that Eugenius ought to remaine pope, because hee could not dissolue the councell which is aboue him, without the consent thereof? The which article vndoubtedly, he hath violate and broken. And if any man will say that in the first dissolution this article was not violate, because there was no declaration made thereof, let him which so thinketh, thus vnderstand: that the bishop of Rome ought not onely to know the plaine and manifest, but also the secret and hidden things of the faith; for hee being the vicar of Christ, and the head of all other, ought to instruct and teach all men. But if so be hee will not, then hee shall be conuicted for being head, because hee continued long in the dissolution after the declaration of the councell, neither did consent vnto the determination of the church; and therefore, if peraduenture hee did not erre in the faith, in dissoluing of the councell, yet did he erre in perseuering in the same, as it manifestly appeareth by the saying of Clement oftentimes alleaged by Panormitan, wherein it is said, that hee which liueth rebelliously, and neglecteth to doe good, is rather a member of the diuell then of Christ, and rather an infidell then a true beleeuer: so that Eugenius by disobeying the church, may worthily be called an infidell. Neither is it true that the pope hath not offended in the faith: Forsomuch, as well in that answere which beginneth Cogitanti, as also in the answere which beginneth Sperant, made vnto the popes ambassadours, these words are manifest: this article concerneth faith, and wee had rather die then through cowardlines to giue place. By the which saying it is euident, the Synode to haue sufficiently admonished the pope that hee did against the faith, and therefore it seemed ỹ afterward when as Eugenius reuoked the dissolution, hee also reuoked the errour of faith contained in the same. There are also diuers offences sprung and risen through the errour of faith: for some say that the pope is vnder the councell, other some denie it, and this diuersitie of doctrine bringeth offence. Also it is expressie against the authoritie of the councell, that the pope did reuoke the assertions made in their name.

The pope neglecting to doe good, is a member not of Christ, but of the diuell.

And albeit in such reuocations, the stile and order of iudgements is not obserued, notwithstanding it doth suffice in such case, when as the councell doth proceede against the pope, in which case onely the truth is to bee obserued, neither is the councell subiect vnto any politius law, that it ought to obserue any tearmes or iudiciall orders. Also hee said that he vtterly contemned that singular glose which did preferre the pope before all the world, so that it might well be called singular, which decreed so foolish and fond things and vnworthie to be followed of any man: and that he did much maruell of Panormitane, and other Doctors of those dates, which whilest they went about to extoll the authority of the glosses, do abase the same by adding a singularity thereto: for that glosse is singular which is alone. But who would not more esteeme a glosse constantly written and agreeable in all places, then that which in any one place teacheth any thing which may seeme to bee an errour; and that as touching the verity and truth: Saint Hierome a graue and ancient Doctor is contrary to this glosse, who doubteth nothing at all, but that the world, as touching authority, is aboue the city it selfe, that is to say, Rome.

Councels bound to no politius law.

Segouius, could scarcely finish this his Oration without interruption; for Panormitane oftentimes interrupting him, went about to confute now this and now that reason. Whereupon the bishop of Argen rising vp, a man not onely eloquent, but also of a stout courage, troubled Panormitane in his reasons and arguments, and put him from his purpose: yet they proceeded so farre, that they passed the maner of disputation, and did not abstaine from opprobrious taunts.

When the bishop of Argen chanced to say that the bishop of Rome ought to be the minister of the church, Panormitane could not suffer that: insomuch that hee so forgot himselfe that day, and his knowledge (which otherwise was great) did so faile him, that he was not ashamed to say and affirme, that the pope was lord ouer the church. Whom Segouius answered: Marke (saith hee) O Panormitane, what thou saiest: for this is the most honourable title of the bishop of Rome, wherein he calleth himselfe the seruant of the seruants of God. Which is gathered vpon this point, when as Christ said vnto his disciples, when they demanded of him which of them was the greatest, you know hee answered them: The princes of the people haue rule and dominion ouer them, but amongst you it is not so, &c. Wherein hee doth vtterly prohibite lordship and dominion; and Peter which was the first vicar of Christ, saith: Feede the flocke of Christ which is committed vnto you, prouiding for them not by compulsion, but willingly. And immediately after hee said, not as lords ouer the clergie. For if Christ the Sonne of God, came not to bee ministred vnto, but to minister and to serue, how then can his vicar haue any dominion, or bee called lord, as you Panormitane will affirme: forsomuch as the disciple is not aboue his master, nor the seruant aboue his lord. And the Lord himselfe saith: Be ye not called masters, forsomuch as your onely master is Christ, and he which is the greatest among you, shall be your seruant. Panormitane being somewhat disquieted with this answere, the councell brake vp and departed.

The next day, there was a generall congregation, and they returned all againe vnto the chapter house after dinner, whereas the archbishop of Lions, the kings Orator being required to speake his mind, after he had by diuers and sundrie reasons proued Eugenius to be an hereticke, he bitterly complained, detesting the negligence and ignaure of those that had preferred such a man vnto the papacie, and so moued all their hearts which were present, that they al together with him did bewaile the calamities of the vniuersall church.

The French kings ambassadour.

Then the bishop of Burgen, the ambassadour of Spaine, diuided the conclusions into two parts, some he called generall, and othersome personall, disputing very excellently as touching the three first conclusions, affirming that he did in no point doubt of them, but only ỹ the addition which made mention of the faith, seemed to be doubtfull vnto him. But vpon this point he stayed much, to proue, that the councell was aboue the pope. The which, after he had sufficiently proued both by Gods law and mans law, he taught it also by physicall reason, alledging Aristotle for witnesse. He said, that in euery well ordered kingdome, it ought specially to be desired, that the whole realme should bee of more authority then the king; which if it happened contrary, it were not to bee called a kingdome, but a tyrannie: so likewise doth he thinke of the church, that it ought to be of more authority then the prince thereof, that is to say, the pope. The which his Oration hee vttered so eloquently, learnedly, and truely, that all men depended vpon him, and desired rather to haue him continue his Oration, then to haue an end thereof.

The bishop of Burgen.

The councell aboue the pope.

But when as he entred into the other conclusions, hee seemed to haue forgotten himselfe, and to bee no more the same man that he was; for neither was there the same eloquence in his words, neither grauity in oration, or cheerefulnes of countenance, so that if he could haue seene himselfe, he would peraduenture greatly haue maruelled at himselfe. Euery man might well see and perceiue then the power and force of the truth, which ministred copy of matter vnto him, so long as he spake in the defence thereof. But when as hee began once to speake against her, she take away euen his naturall eloquence from him. Notwithstanding Panormitane, and the bishop of Bergen, shewed this example of modesty, that albeit they would not confesse or grant the last conclusions to bee verities of faith: yet they would not that any man should follow or leane vnto their opinion, which were but meane diuines; but rather vnto the opinions of the diuines. But the king of Arragons Anner, being a subtill and craftie man, did not directly dispute vpon the conclusions, but picking out here and there certaine arguments, sought to let and hinder the counsell. Against whom, an abbat of Scotland, a man of an excellent wit, disputed very much: and Thomas de Corcellis, a famous Diuine, alledged much against him out of the decrees of the sacred councell, & with a certaine modest shamefastnes, alwaies beholding the ground, did very largely dispute in the defence of the conclusions.

The force of truth which appeared also in Eneas himselfe the writer hereof, although afterward when he was pope, he denied the same.

Note what it is, a man to labour against his knowledge.

But now to auoid tediousnes, I will onely proceed to declare arguments, whereby the conclusions were ratified and confirmed, not minding to intreats of the fiue last conclusions, which concerne the person of Eugenius, but onely vpon the three first, whereunto I will adioyne certaine probable arguments, gathered out of the disputation of the fathers. In the first conclusion is the greatest force, and first to be discussed: touching the which, two things are to be required, and examined. The one, whether the generall councell haue authority ouer the pope. The other, whether the catholike faith commandeth it to be beleeued. As touching that the pope is subiect to the generall councell, it is excellently well proued by the reason before alledged, by the bishop of Burgen. For the pope is in the church, as a king in his kingdome: and for a king to be of more authority then his kingdome, it were too absurd: Ergo, neither ought the pope to bee aboue the church. For like as oftentimes kings which doe wickedly gouerne the commonwealth, and exercise cruelty, are deprined of their kingdomes; euen so it is not to bee doubted, but that the bishops of Rome may be deposed by the church, that is to say, by the generall councels.

The conclusions of the disputation.

The first conclusion.

A king is not of more authority then is his kingdome.

Neither do I herein allow them, which attribute so ample and large authority vnto kings, that they will not haue them bound vnder any lawes; for such as so doe say, bee but flatterers, which doe talke otherwise then they thinke. For albeit that they doe say that the moderation of the law is alway in the princes power: that doe I thus vnderstand, that when as reason shall perswade, he ought to digresse from the rigour of the law: for he is called a king, which careth and prouideth for the common-wealth; taketh pleasure in the commodity and profit of the subiects, and in all his doings hath respect to the commodity of those, ouer whom he ruleth: which if he doe not, he is not to be counted a king, but a tyrant, whose property it is onely to seeke his owne profit: for in this point a king differeth from a tyrant, that the one seeketh the commodity and profit of those whom he ruleth, and the other onely his owne. The which to make more manifest, the cause is also to be alledged, wherefore kings were ordained.

These kind of flatterers came now in our dates.

Bishops of Rome are heretikes.

Pope Honorius the second.

At the beginning (as Cicero in his Offices saith) it is certaine, that there was a certaine time when as the people liued without kings. But afterward, when lands and possessions began to be diuided according to the custome of euery nation, then were kings ordained for no other cause, but only to exercise iustice. For when as at the beginning, the common people were oppressed by rich and mightie men, they ranne by and by to some good and vertuous man, which should defend the poore from iniurie, and ordaine lawes, whereby the rich and poore might dwell together. But when as yet vnder the rule of kings, the poore were oftentimes oppressed, lawes were ordained and instituted, the which should iudge neither for hatred nor fauour, and giue like eare vnto the poore as vnto the rich: whereby we do vnderstand and know, not only the people, but also the king to be subiect to the lawes. For if we do see a king to contemne and despise the lawes, violently rob and spoile his subiects, deflоure virgins, dishonest matrones, and doe all things licentiously and temeariously: do not the nobles of the kingdome assemble together, deposing him from his kingdome, set vp another in his place, which shall sweare to rule and gouerne vprightly, and be obedient vnto the lawes? Verily as reason doth perswade, euen so doth ✠ vse therof also teach vs. It seemeth also agreeable vnto reason, that the same should be done in the church, that is to say, in the councell, which is done in any kingdome. And so is this sufficiently apparent, which we haue before said, that the pope is subiect vnto the councell.

But now to passe vnto the arguments of Diuinitie, the foundation of the matter which we do intreate vpon, are the words of our Sauiour Iesus Christ in diuers places, but specially where as he speaketh vnto Peter: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam, & portæ inferni non præualebunt aduersus eam: that is, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it. Vpon which words it seemeth good to begin this disputation, for so much as some were wont to alleage these words, to extoll the authoritie of the bishop of Rome. But (as it shall by and by appeare) the words of Christ had another sense and meaning then diuers of them do thinke, for he saith: and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it. Verily this is a great promise, and these words of the Lord are of great importance. For what greater word could there haue been spoken, then that the gates of hell should not preuaile against the Church? These gates of hell, as Saint Hierome saith, doe signifie sinnes. Wherefore if sinnes cannot preuaile against the Church, neither can any maligne spirits preuaile against the same, which haue no power at all ouer mankind, but only through sinne. And for that cause, whereas it is said in Iob, that there is no power vpon the earth that may be compared vnto the power of the maligne spirit, whereby it followeth that the power of the Church is aboue all other power.

We may also vpon the same saying, reason after another sort: for so much as the gates of hell, that is to say, sinnes, cannot preuaile against the Church, the Church thereby is declared to be without sinne: the which cannot be spoken of the pope which is a mortall man, for so much as it is written, Seuen times in the day the iust man doth offend: If the Church bee without spot because it cannot be defiled with sinne, who is it that will preferre a sinfull man before an vndefiled Church? Neither let vs giue eare vnto those which will not referre these words of Christ vnto the Church, where as he saith, Orauí pro te Petre, vt non deficiat fides tua: That is to say, Peter I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith should not faile thee. For as Saint Augustine saith in the exposition of the Psalmes, Certaine things are spoken as though they seemed properlie to pertaine vnto the Apostle Peter, notwithstanding, they haue no euident sense but when they are referred vnto the Church, the person whereof he is vnderstood figuratiuely to represent. Whereupon in another place in the questions of the new and old Testament, vpon the words, Rogaui pro te Petre, I haue prayed for thee Peter: What is doubted? Did he pray for Peter, and did he not pray for Iames and John, beside the rest? It is manifest that vnder the name of Peter, all other are conteined. For in another place of Saint John he saith: I pray for them whom thou hast giuen me, and I will that wheresoeuer I am, they shall be also with me. Whereupon we do oftentimes by the name of Peter vnderstand the Church, which we do nothing at all doubt to be done in this place: otherwise the truth could not consist, for so much as within a while after, the faith of Peter failed for a time by the denial of Christ, but the faith of the Church, whose person Peter did representi, did alwaies perseuere inuiolate.

As touching the bishops of Rome, if time would suffer vs, we could rehearse many examples, how that they either haue been heretikes, or replenished with other vices. Neither are we ignorant how that Marcellinus at the emperours commandement, did sacrifice vnto Idols, and that another (which is more horrible) did attaine vnto the Papacie by a diuelish fraude and deceit. Notwithstanding, the testimonie of Paul vnto the Hebrewes shall suffice vs at this time, who saith, euery bishop to be compassed in with infirmitie, that is to say, with wickednesse and sinne. Also the testimonies of Christ himselfe do approue that the Church remaineth alwaies without sinne: for in Matthew hee saith, I am with you euen vnto the end of the world. The which words were not only spoken vnto the Apostles (for they continued not vnto the end of the world) but also vnto their successours: neither would Christ then signifie that he was God, dispersed throughout all the world, as he is also perceiued to be amongst sinners, but would declare a certaine gift of grace through his assistance, whereby he would preserue the holy Church consisting amongst his Apostles and their successors, alwaies immaculate and vndefiled.

The church is without sinne, and the pope is a sinner.

And againe in another place; I (saith he) will pray, and he shall giue you another comforter, that he may remaine with you for euer, euen the Spirit of truth whom the world cannot receiue, because the world seeth him not, neither knoweth him, but you shall know him, because he shall remaine with you. The which words being spoken vnto the Disciples of Iesus, are also vnderstood to bee spoken vnto their successours, and so consequently vnto the Church. And if the Spirit of truth be continuallie in the Church, no man can denie, but that the Church ought to continue vndefiled. By the same authoritie also that Christ is called the spouse of the Church, who seeth not, but that the Church is vndefiled? For the husband and the wife (as the Apostle saith) are two in one flesh, and (as he doth also adde) no man hateth his owne flesh: thereby it commeth to passe, that Christ cannot hate the Church, for so much as she is his spouse, and one flesh with him, and no man can hate himselfe: Ergo, the Church doth not sinne; for if it did sinne, it should be hated, for sinners the Lord doth hate. The which authorities being gathered together, we ought with the Apostle to confesse that the Church of God hath neither spot nor wrinkle. Also he writing vnto Timothie, affirmeth the Church to be the pillar and foundation of the truth: whereupon in this song of the spouse it is said: My friend thou art altogether faire and beautifull, neither is there any spot in thee.

The church one flesh with Christ.

The church is without spot or sinne, is to be vnderstood not by nature, but only by imputation.

These words peraduenture may abash some, that I do go about to proue the Church to be without sinne. For when as the Church doth containe all men which are called Christians, which also doe agree and come together in one beliefe of faith, and participation of the Sacraments, I doe feare lest some men will thinke, that I do affirme all men to be without sinne: which is so farre from my meaning, that I doe verily thinke the contrarie to be most true. For I suppose, that there is no man in the Church being clothed in this mortall flesh, without sinne. Neither doe these things varie or dissent among themselues: For the Church hath this gift, that albeit euerie part and member thereof may sinne, yet the whole bodie cannot sinne. For there be alwaies good men in the Church, the which, albeit that they be subiect vnto humaine fragilities, not withstanding they haue so perfect a gift of sincere and pure vertue, that subduing all carnall desires and affections, they keepe themselues a pleasant and acceptable sacrifice vnto God. Neither do I consent or agree vnto the opinion of diuers, which affirme that the virgin Marie onely perseuered in faith at the Lords passion. Whereupon diuers haue not been ashamed to say that the faith might be so debilitate and weakened, that it should returne to one only old woman. Whose opinion or rather madnesse, Saint Paul seemeth openly to reiect, writing thus vnto the Romans: Do ye not know (saith he) what the Scripture writeth of Helias, how incessantly he called vpon God against the children of Israel, (saying) O Lord, they haue slaine thy Prophets, and digged downe thine altars, and I alone am left, and they seeke after my soule? But what answere receiued he of God? I haue left vnto my selfe yet seuen thousand men, which haue not bowed their knees vnto Baal. What other thing doth this answere of God declare, then that it is a foolish opinion of them which thinke the church of God to be brought vnto so small a number? We ought to beleeue the words of Christ, which are altogether repugnant vnto those men who affirme that the Virgin only did perseuere in faith. For Iesus said vnto his Father, O holy Father, saue them in thy name, whom thou hast giuen mee, that they may be one as we are one. When I was with them, I kept them in thy name: I haue kept them that thou gauest vnto me, and none of them perished, but onely the sonne of perdition. And I doe not desire that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest preserue them from euill.

The errour of those which say that only the virgin Marie did perseuere constant at the time of Christs passion.

The Church without sinne, how to be vnderstood.

Behold, Christ prayeth that his disciples should not fall, but should be preserued from euill, and he so praying, without doubt is heard: for he saith in another place, I know that thou hearest me. But how is he heard, if all those for whom he praieth, swarued at the time of his passion? As for example: by what meanes did Christ hanging vpon the crosse, commend his dearely beloued mother vnto John, if so be he were either then swarued, or should by and by after haue swarued from the faith? Moreouer, did not the Centurion by and by crie out and say, truly this is the Sonne of God? The Iewes also which at that time were farre distant from Ierusalem, might both be called faithfull, and also saued by their faith: seeing that (as the Apostle saith) men are bound vnto the Gospell, after it is once knowne and reuealed vnto them. But let vs leaue these men, and speake of that which is more likely, and let vs iudge that there hath been and is a great number of good men in the Church, and by them as by the more worthie part, let vs name the Church holy and immaculate, the which doth comprehend as well the euill as the good. For the Church is compared vnto a net, which is cast into the sea, and gathereth together all kind of fishes.

The church comprehendeth both the euill and good. Matth. 20.

And againe it is compared vnto a king, which made a marriage for his sonne, and sent forth his seruants to call those which were bidden vnto the wedding, and they gathered together good and euill, as manie as they could find. Wherefore, their opinion is erroneous, which affirme, that only good men be comprehended in the Church: the which if it were true, it would confound all things, neither could we vnderstand or know were the Church were. But for so much as the Scripture saith, no man knoweth whether he be worthie of loue or hatred, their opinion is more to be allowed and truer, which include all the faithfull in the Church: of whom, although a great part be giuen to voluptuousnesse and auarice, yet some notwithstanding are cleane from deadly sinne. The which part, as it is the most worthie, it giueth the name vnto the church, to be called most holie: which is so often done, that we are commanded to sing in our Creed, vnam sanctam Catholicam & Apostolicam Ecclesiam, that is to say, one holy Catholike and Apostolike Church: the which article, the Synode of Constantinople added vnto the rest: Wherefore if the Church be holie, it is also without sinne. But to returne to our former purpose, this word Sanctum, which signifieth holie (as Macrobius alleaging Trebatius, affirmeth) is sometimes taken for religious, and sometimes for cleane and vncorrupt. And after the same manner, we call the church holy, as the Apostle Peter calleth it immaculat, as we reade in the famous Epistle of Clement.

This saying of Ecclesiastes is not so to be translated, and also serueth to another sense then is heere meant.

To this end also tendeth that which is spoken by Saint Paul, that Christ is the head of the church: For if the church should wholly sinne, she should not agree with her head Christ, who is in no point defiled. This also Christ himselfe would signifie vnto vs in Matthew, when he commendeth the house which was builded vpon the strong rocke, against the which, neither the windes, neither the stormes could preuaile. In the house of God (saith the Apostle) which is the Church builded vpon the strong rocke, which rocke (as the said Apostle declareth) is Christ. Who then is so vnshamefast, that he will affirme the church, which is founded vpon Christ, to be subiect to sinne? and will not rather crie out with the Prophet and say, Domine, dilexi decorem domus tuæ: That is to say, O Lord, I haue loued the beautie of thy house? Hereupon wrote John Chrysostome this golden sentence: The church neuer ceaseth to be assaulted, neuer ceaseth to be laid in wait for: but in the name of Christ it hath alwaies the vpper hand, and ouercame. And albeit that other doe lie in wait for it, or that the floods doe beate against it, yet the foundation which is laid vpon the rocke, is not shaken. Saint Hilarie also saith, that it is the propertie of the church to vanquish when it is hurt, to vnderstand when it is reproued, to be in safetie when it is forsaken, and to obtaine victorie, when as it seemeth almost ouercome. Thus by manie reasons and testimonies, it is proued that the church doth not erre: which is not spoken or affirmed of the bishops of Rome, so that this reason doth make the pope subiect vnto the church, for it is conuenient, that the lesse perfect be subiect vnto the more perfect. There be also manie other testimonies and reasons, whereof we will now somewhat more intreate.

Christ is the rocke whereupon the church is builded.

He proueth by authoritie the pope to be vnder the councel.

If authoritie be sought for, saith Saint Hierome (for I willingly occupie my selfe in his sentences, as in a most fertill field) the world is greater then a citie. What then I pray you Hierome? Is the pope mightie because he is head of the church of Rome? His authoritie is great, notwithstanding the vniuersall church is greater, which doth not only comprehend one citie, but also the whole world. Hereupon it followeth, that if the church be the mother of all faithfull, then she hath the bishop of Rome for her sonne: otherwise, as Saint Augustine saith, he can neuer haue God for his father, which will not acknowledge the church for his mother. The which thing Anacletus vnderstanding, called the vniuersall church his mother, as the writers of the canons do know. And Calixtus saith: As a Sonne he came to do the will of his Father, so we doe the will of our mother, which is the church. Whereby it appeareth, that how much the sonne is inferiour to the mother, so much the church is superiour or aboue the bishop of Rome.

If the church be the mother, the pope must be her sonne.

The church being the spouse, the pope cannot be the head thereof, but he must also be the head of Christ, for so much as Christ and his spouse be both one.

Also we haue said before, that the church was the spouse of Christ, and the pope we know to be a vicar: but no man doth so ordaine a vicar, that he maketh his spouse subiect vnto him, but that the spouse is alwaies thought to be of more authoritie, then the vicar, for so much as she is one body with her husband, but the vicar is not so. Neither will I here passe ouer the words of Saint Paul vnto the Romans: Let euerie soule (saith he) be subiect vnto the higher powers: Neither doth he herein except the pope: For albeit that he be aboue all other men, yet it seemeth necessarie that he should be subiect to the church. Neither let him thinke himselfe hereby exempt, because it was said vnto Peter by Christ, Whatsoeuer thou bindest, &c. In this place, as we will hereafter declare, he represented the person of the church, for we find it spoken afterward vnto them: Quodcunque ligaueritis super terram, ligatum erit in cœlis: that is, Whatsoeuer ye shall bind vpon earth, shall be also bound in heauen. And furthermore, if all power be giuen of Christ, as the Apostle writeth vnto the Corinthians, it is giuen for the edifying of the church, and not for the destruction therof: why then may not the church correct the pope, if he abuse the keyes, and bring all things vnto ruine?

The exposition of this place, quodcunque ligaueritis.

The church may depose the pope if he abuse the keyes.

Adde hereunto also another argument. A man in this life is lesser then the Angels, for we reade in Matthew of John Baptist, that he which is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater then he. Notwithstanding Christ saith in another place, that amongst the children of women there was not a greater then John Baptist. But to proceed: men are forced by the example of Zacharias, to giue credit vnto Angels, lest through their misbeliefe they be stricken blinde as hee was. What more? The bishop of Rome is a man: Ergo, he is lesse then the Angels, and is bound to giue credit to the Angels. But the Angels learne of the church, and doe reuerently accord vnto her doctrine, as the Apostle writeth vnto the Ephesians: Ergo, the pope is bound to do the same, who is lesse then the Angels, and lesse then the church, whose authoritie is such, that worthily it is compared by Saint Augustine vnto the Sunne: that like as the Sunne by his light doth surmount all other lights, so the church is aboue all other authoritie and power. Whereupon Saint Augustine writeth thus: I would not beleeue the Gospell, saith he, if the authoritie of the church did not moue me thereunto: the which is not in any place found to be spoken of the bishop of Rome, who representing the church, and being minister thereof, is not to be thought greater or equall to his Lord and master. Notwithstanding, the words of our Sauiour Christ doe specially proue the bishop of Rome to be subiect to the church, as we will hereafter declare: For he sending Peter to preach vnto the church, said, Go, and say vnto the church. To the confirmation of whose authoritie, these words doe also pertaine: He that heareth you, heareth me. The which words are not only spoken vnto the Apostles, but also vnto their successours and vnto the whole church.

The church and not the pope compared to the Sunne.

Whereupon it followeth, that if the pope do not hearken and giue eare vnto the church, hee doeth not giue eare vnto Christ, and consequently he is to be counted as an Ethnicke and Publican. For as Saint Augustine affirmeth, when as the church doth excommunicat, hee which is so excommunicate is bound in heauen, and when the church loseth, hee is losed. Likewise if hee be an heretike, which taketh away the supremacie of the church of Rome, as the Decrees of the councell of Constance doth determine, how much more is he to bee counted an heretike, which taketh away the authoritie from the vniuersall church, wherein the church of Rome and all other are contained? Wherefore it is now euident, that it is the opinion of all men before our dates (if it may be called an opinion, which is confirmed by graue authors) that the pope is subiect vnto the vniuersall church. But this is called into question, whether hee ought also to be iudged of the generall councell. For there are some, which, (whether it be for desire of vaine glorie, or that through their flatterie they looke for some great reward) haue begunne to teach new and strange doctrines, and to exempt the bishop of Rome from the iurisdiction of the generall councell. Ambition hath blinded them, whereof not onlie this present Schisme, but also all other Schismes euen vnto this day haue had their originall. For as in times past the greedie desire and ambition of the papacie, brought in that pestiferous beast, which through Arrius then first crept into the church, euen so they do specially nourish and maintaine this present heresie, which are not ashamed to begge. Of the which number, some crie out and say, the workes of the subiects ought to be iudged by the pope, but the pope to be reserued only vnto the iudgement of God. Others said, that no man ought to iudge the high and principall seat, and that it cannot bee iudged either by the emperour, either by the clergie, either by any king or people. Other affirme, that the Lord hath reserued vnto himselfe the depositions of the chiefe bishop. Others are not ashamed to affirme that the bishop of Rome although hee carrie soules in aduer so great number vnto hell, yet hee is not subiect vnto any correction or rebuke.

The popelie he do not hearken to the church, is an Ethnicke and Publican.

It is to be feared lest the church hath had many such popes.

Whether the pope is to be iudged by the generall councell, &c.

These are the canons and the schoole diuines, and begging friers.

Diuersitie of iudgements touching the bishop of Rome.

And because these their words are easilie resolued, they run straightwaies vnto the Gospell, and interprete the words of Christ, not according to the sense and meaning of the holie Ghost, but according to their owne will and disposition. They do greatly esteeme and regard this which was spoken vnto Peter: Tu vocaberis Cephas; that is, Thou shalt be called Cephas: by this which word, they make him the head of the church. Also I will giue thee the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, and whatsoeuer thou shalt bind vpon earth, &c. I haue prayed for thee Peter, that thy faith should not faile. And againe, Feede my sheepe: Cast thy net into the deepe: Be not afraid, for from henceforth thou shalt be a fisher of men: Also that Christ commanded Peter as the prince of the Apostles, to pay toll for them both: and that Peter drew the net vnto the land, neglecting the expositions of the fathers.

land, ful of great titles: that only Peter drew out his sword for the defence of Christ. All which places these men do greatlie extoll, altogether neglecting the expositions of the fathers: the which if (as reason were) they would consider, they should manifestly perceiue by the authorities aforesaid, that the pope is not aboue them when they are gathered together in councell, but when they are separate and diuided.

But these things being passed ouer, forsomuch as answer shall appeare by that which hereafter shall follow, wee will now declare what was reasoned of by the learned men vpon this question. But first wee would haue it knowne, that all men which are of any name or estimation, doe agree, that the pope is subiect to the Councell, and for the proofe thereof they repeate (in a manner) all those things which were before spoken of the Church: for they suppose all that, which is spoken of the Church, to serue for the generall Councell: And first of all,

Those things which were spoken of the Church, serue also for the generall Councell.

they alleage this saying of the Gospell, Dic Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the Church. In the which place it is conuenient to vnderstand, that Christ spake vnto Peter, instructing him what he should do as touching the correction of his brother. Yee saith, if thy brother offend or sinne against thee, rebuke him betweene thee and him alone. If hee giue eare vnto thee, take with thee brother: but if he doe not giue eare vnto thee, take with thee one or two, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all truth may stand: if then he will not giue eare vnto thee, Dic Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the Church.

What shall we vnderstand by the church in that place? shall we say that it is the multitude of the faithful dispersed throughout the whole world? My yoke is pleasant, saith the Lord, and my burden is light. But how is it light, if Christ command vs to doe that which is impossible to bee done? For how could Peter speake vnto the Church which was dispersed, or to seeke out euery Christian scattered in euery towne or citie? But the meaning of these words is farre otherwise, and they must be otherwise interpreted: for which cause it is necessarie that wee remember the double person, which Peter represented, as the person of the high bishop, and a priuat man. The sense and meaning of his words are euident and plaine enough of themselues, that they need no supplement or alteration. Wee must first marke and see, what this word Ecclesia signifieth, the which we do find but only to be twice spoken of by Christ: once in this place, and againe when as he said vnto Peter: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam: That is: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my Church. Wherefore the Church signifieth the conuocation or congregation of the multitude. Dic Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the Church. That is to say, tell it vnto the Congregation of the faithfull: the which forsomuch as they are not accustomed to come together, but in a generall Councell, this interpretation shall seeme very good, Dic Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the church, that is to say, Dic generali Concilio, tell it vnto the generall Councel.

In this case I would gladly heare if there be any man, which doth thinke these words to bee more properly expressed in any prelate, then in the Councell, when as they must put one man for the multitude: which if it be admitted in the Scriptures we shall from henceforth find no firme or stable thing therein. But if any man doe maruell at this interpretation, let him search the old writers, and hee shall find that this is no new or strange interpretation, but the interpretation of the holie fathers and old doctors, which haue first giuen light vnto the Church, as pope Gregorie witnesseth (a man worthy of remembrance, both for the holinesse of his life, and his singular learning) whose words are these, written in his Register vnto the bishop of Constantinople: And we (said he) against whom so great an offence is committed through temerarious boldnesse, doe obserue and keepe that which the truth doth command vs, saying, Si peccauerit in te frater: that is, If thy brother doe offend against thee, &c. And afterward he addeth more, If my rebukes and corrections be despised, it remaineth that I doe seeke helpe of the Church. The which words do manifestly declare the Church here to bee taken for the generall Councell. Neither did Gregorie say, that he would seeke help of the Church that is dispersed abroad in euery place, but of that which is gathered together, that is to say, the generall Councell; for that which is dispersed abroad, cannot bee had, except it bee gathered together. Also pope Nicolas reproouing Lotharius the king for adultery, said: If thou doest not amend the same, take heed that wee tell it not vnto the holy Church.

The Church taken for the generall Councell.

In the which saying pope Nicolas did not say, that hee would go throughout the world to certifie euery one, man by man: but that he would call the Church together, that is to say, the generall Councell, and there would publish and declare the offence of Lotharius, that he which had contemned the popes commandements, should feare the reuerence of the generall Councell. I could recite an infinite number of witnesses for that purpose, the which all tend vnto one end: but this one testimonie of the Councell of Constance shall suffice for them all, wherein it is said, that not onelie the pope in the correction of his brother is remitted vnto the Councell, when as hee cannot correct him of himselfe: but also when as any thing is done as touching the correction of the pope himselfe, the matter ought to be referred to the Councel. Whereby it appeareth our interpretation to be most true, which doth expound the Church to be in the generall Councel. Hereupon in the Acts of the Apostles, the congregations which were then holden, were called the Church. Also in the Councell of Nice, and in other Councels, when as many should bee excommunicated, alwaies in manner, this sentence was adioyned: Hunc excommunicat Catholica & Apostolica Ecclesia: The Catholike and Apostolike Church doth excommunicate this man. And hereupon that title is giuen vnto the Councels whereby we do say, that the generall Councell doth represent the vniuersall Church. Wherefore the lawes and decrees of the Councell are called the lawes of the Church, for that the Church doth not set forth any lawes in any other place, then in the generall Councell: except wee will call the popes constitutions the lawes of the Church, which cannot be properly said but of the councel: whereas, albeit all those which are of the Church do not assemble and come together, yet the most part of them are accustomed to be there present, and in those which come, the whole power of the Church doth consist: Whereupon we reade in the Acts of the Apostles: It pleased the Apostles and Elders with all the Church. For albeit that all the faithfull were not there present (because a great number of them remained at Antioch) yet notwithstanding it was called the whole Church, because the whole power of the Church consisted in the Councell. Thus for this present it is sufficient that wee vnderstand by the Church the generall councell.

The acts of the Apostles. The Councell of Nice.

The title of the Councels.

The constitutions of the bishops of Rome are not the lawes of the Church.

And now to returne vnto our purpose, let vs heare what our Sauiour saith vnto Peter: If thy brother doe offend against thee, vnto this text following, tell it vnto the church: and let vs vnderstand the councell by the Church. Who is greater in this place, he which is sent vnto the councell, or the councell, whereunto Peter was sent? The veritie doth remit the bishop of Rome vnto the generall councell. And why so? verily because the bishops of Rome should not disdaine to acknowledge some power in earth, to bee aboue them, the which they should consult withall in matters of importance, and agree vnto the determinations thereof. Whereupon Peter is also called by another name Simon, the which, as Rabanus in his Homilies writeth, is interpreted in the Hebrew tongue, obedience, that all men might vnderstand obedience to be necessary, euen in the bishop of Rome.

By the Church the councell is vnderstood.

Simons obedience necessary in the bishops of Rome.

The authoritie of the councell of Constance might suffice vs in this point: but we thinke it good to say a little vpon this matter, and to leaue no place open for our aduersaries: which whilest they go about to maintaine the insatiable wilfulnesse of one man, preferring a priuate wealth before a common commoditie, it is incredible how great errors they doe stirre vp. Against the which, besides many other, Zacharias bishop of Chalcedon, a man both famous and eloquent, did earnestly striue: Who in the great and sacred Synode of Chalcedon, when as the sentence of the bishop of Rome was obiected vnto him, that the canon of pope Nicolas and other patriarks was aboue the councell, he replied against it. And Zosimus the pope saith thus as touching the decrees of the generall councell: The authority of this seat cannot make or alter any thing contrary to the decrees of the fathers. Neither doth hee heere speake of the decrees of the fathers, which are dispersed abroad in cities or wildernesse, for they doe not bind the pope: but of them which are made and published by the fathers in the generall councell. For the more manifest declaration whereof, the words of pope Leo, the most eloquent of all the bishops of Rome, are here to be annered, who wrote vnto Anatholius, that the decrees of the councell of Nice, are in no part to be violate and broken: thereby (as it were) excluding himselfe and the high patriarke.

The fauourers and maintainers of the pope goe about to maintaine and preferre the pleasure and profit of one before a common commoditie.

The authoritie also of Damasus vpon this sentence, is more manifest, writing vnto Aurelius the archbishop, as Isidorus declareth in the booke of councels, whose worthy saying as touching the authoritie of the Synode is this: That they which are not compelled of necessity, but of their owne will either frowardly do any thing, either presume to doe any thing, or willingly consent vnto those which would doe any thing contrary and against the sacred canons, they are worthilie thought and iudged to blaspheme the holy Ghost. Of the which blasphemy, whether Gabriel which calleth himselfe Eugenius, be presently partaker, let them iudge which haue heard him say, that it is so farre from his office and dutie to obay the generall councels, that he saith hee doth then best merite and deserue, when as hee contemneth the decrees of the councell. Damasus addeth yet moreouer. For this purpose, saith hee, the rules of the sacred canons, which are consecrated by the spirit of God and the reuerence of the whole world, are faithfully to be knowne and vnderstood of vs, and diligently loked vpon, that by no meanes, without a necessity which cannot be eschued (which God forbid) we do transgresse any of the decrees of the holy fathers. Notwithstanding, we daily see in al the popes bulles and letters, these words, Non obstante: that is to say, notwithstanding: which no other necessitie hath brought in, then onely vnsatiable desire of gathering of mony. But let them take heed to these things which be the authors thereof.

The pope can abide no generall councels.

Non obstante in the popes bulles.

But now to returne againe vnto Damasus, mention is made made in the Epistles of Ambrose bishop of Millaine of a certaine Epistle, which is said to be written by Damasus, vnto the iudges deputed by the Councell of Tapua, where hee declareth that it is not his office, to meddle with any matter which hath been before the Councell. By the which saying hee doth manifestlie reproue all those which affirme and say the bishop of Rome to be aboue the Councell. The which if it were true, Damasus might haue taken into his hands the cause of Bonosius the bishop to determine, which was before begun by the Councell: but for somuch as the Councell is aboue the pope, Damasus knew himselfe to be prohibited. Whereupon Hilarius also acknowledging the Synode to be aboue him, would haue his decrées confirmed by the Councell. Also the famous doctor S. Augustine in his epistle which he did write vnto Glorius and Eleusius, and Felix the Grammarian, declareth the case. Cecilianus the bishop, was accused by Donatus, with others. Melchiades the pope with certaine other bishops absolued Cecilian, and confirmed him in his bishoprieke. They being moued with those doings, made a schisme in the parts of Africa. S. Augustine reprooueth them, which hauing another remedie against the sentence of the pope did raise a schisme, and doth inuey against them in this manner: Behold, let vs thinke those bishops which gaue iudgement at Rome, not to haue been good iudges: there remained yet the iudgement of the vniuersall Church, whereas the cause might haue been pleaded euen with the iudges themselues, so that if they were conuict not to haue giuen iust iudgement, their sentence might be broken.

The Councell to be aboue the pope.

The full iudgement of the Church is not to be found, but in the generall Councell.

Whereby it appeareth, that not onelie the sentence of the pope alone, but also the pope with his bishops ioyned with him, might bee made frustrate by the Councell: for the full iudgement of the vniuersall Church is not found elsewhere, then in the generall Councell. Let not any man doubt, in that S. Augustine seemeth heere onelie to speake of bishops: for if the text of his epistle bee read ouer, hée shall find the bishop of Rome to bee comprehended amongst the other bishops. It was also prohibited by the Councels of Africa, that the bishops of Rome should not receiue or heare the appeales of any which did appeale from the Councell: which altogether declare the superioritie of the Councell. And this appeareth more plainlie in the Acts of the Apostles, where as Peter is rebuked by the congregation of the Apostles, because hée went in to Cornelius a Heathen man, as if it had not been lawfull for him to attempt any great matter without the knowledge of the congregation: and yet it was said vnto him as well as others: Ite & Baptizate, &c. Go and baptise. But this seemeth to make more vnto the purpose, which S. Paul writeth vnto the Galathians, where as he saith, he resisted Peter euen vnto his face, because hee did not walke according to the veritie of the Gospell. Which words if they be well vnderstood, signifie none other thing by the veritie of the Gospell, then the Canon of the Councell decreed amongst the Apostles: for the Disciples being gathered together, had so determined it. Whereupon S. Paul doth shew, that Peter ought to haue obayed the generall Councell.

No appeale to be made from the Councell to the pope. Acts 13.

Gal. 2. Peter constrained to obey the generall Councell.

The decree of the Councell of Constance.

But now to finish this disputation, we will here adioyne the determination of the Councell of Constance, the which Councell aforesaid, willing to cut off all ambiguitie and doubts, and to prouide a certaine order of liuing, declared by a solemne decrée that all men, of what estate or condition so euer they were, yea, although that they were popes themselues, bee bound vnder the obedience and ordinances of the sacred generall Councels. And although there be a certaine restraint, where as it is said, in such things as pertaine vnto the faith, the extirpation of schisme, and the reformation of the Church, as well in the head as in the members: notwithstanding this amplificatiue clause which is adioyned, is to be noted, Et in pertinentibus adea, that is to say, withall the appertenants. The which addition is so large, that it containeth all things in it, which may bee imagined or thought. For the Lord said thus vnto his Apostles, Goe yée forth and teach all people. He did not say in three points onelie, but teach them to obserue and keepe all things whatsoeuer I haue commanded you. And in another place he saith, not this or that, but whatsoeuer yée shall bind, &c. which all together are alleaged for the authoritie of the Church and generall Councels. For the preferment whereof, these things also come in place: He that heareth you, heareth me. And againe: It it is giuen vnto you to know the mysteries of God. Also, Where 2. or 3. be gathered in my name &c. Again, Whatsoeuer yée shall aske, &c. O holie father, saue them whom thou hast giuen mee, &c: And, I will be with them euen vnto the end of the world. Also out of Saint Paul these places are gathered: We are helpers of God, &c. Which hath made vs apt ministers of the new testament, &c. And he appointed some Apostles and some Prophets, &c. In all which places both Christ and the Apostles speake of the authoritie of many, which all together are alleaged for the authoritie of the vniuersall Church.

The pope bound vnder the obedience of the generall Councell.

Diuers places rehearsed out of the Gospels and Apostles, for authoritie of the Church and generall Councels aboue the pope.

But for so much as that Church being dispersed and scattered abroad, cannot decrée or ordaine any thing: therefore of necessitie it is to be said, that the chiefe and principall authoritie of the Church, doth consist in the generall Councels, where as they assemble together. And therefore it was obserued in the primitiue Church, that hard and waightie matters were not intreated vpon, but only in the generall Councels and congregations. The same is also found to bee obserued afterward. For when as the Churches were diuided, generall Councels were holden. And in the Councell of Nice, we do find the heresie of Arrius condemned. In the Councell of Constantinople the heresie of Macedonius. In the Councell of Ephesus, the heresie of Nestorius. In the Councell of Chalcedon, the heresies of Eutychius were also condemned: for so much as they thought the iudgment of the bishop of Rome, not to suffice to so great, and waighty matters: and also they thought, the sentence of the Councell to bee of greater force, then the sentence of the pope, for so much as he might erre as a man: but the Councell, wherein so many men were gathered together, being guided with the holy Ghost, could not erre. Also it is a very excellent saying of Martianus the Emperor, which serueth for that purpose, whose words are these: Truly he is to be counted a wicked and sacrilegious person, which after the sentence of so many good and holy men, will sticke to withdraw any part of his opinion. For it is a point of mere madnesse, at the noone time and faire day light, to seeke for a fained light: for hee which hauing found the truth, séeketh to discusse any thing further, séeketh but after vanities and lies.

Weighty matters intreated but only in generall councels.

The pope not sufficient of himselfe to conuince or iudge heretickes.

The pope may erre.

Now I thinke it is euident enough vnto all men, that the bishop of Rome is vnder the Councell. Notwithstanding some do yet still doubt, whether he may also be deposed by the Councell or not: For albeit it be proued that he is vnder the Councell, yet for all that, will they not grant, that he may bee also deposed by the Councell. Wherefore, it shall bee no digressing at all from our purpose, somewhat to say vpon that matter: and first of all, to speake of these railers, which are yet so earnest for the defence of the bishop of Rome: which being vanquished in one battell, still renew another, and contend rather of obstinacie then of ignorance. They would haue heere recited againe, that which we haue before spoken, as touching the prééminence of the bishop of Rome, or the patriarch. And as there are many of them more full of words then eloquent, they stay much of this point, whereas Christ said vnto Peter: Tibi dabo claues regni cœlorum; I will giue thée the keies of the kingdome of heauen, and whatsoeuer thou shalt bind vpon earth shall be bound in heauen: as though by those words he should be made head ouer the other. And again they doe amplifie it by this: Pasce oues meas: Fæd my sheep, which they doe not find to be spoken to any other of the Apostles. And because it is said that Peter was the chiefe and the mouth of the Apostles, therefore they iudge it well spoken, that no man shall iudge the chiefe and principall see: being all of this opinion with Boniface, which said, that the pope ought to bee iudged for no cause, except he be perceiued or knowne to swarue from the faith, although he doe carry innumerable people with him headlong into hel, there to be perpetually tormented: as though he could not open the kingdome of heauen to others, if any other could shut it against him, neither that he could fede other if he himselfe lacked pasture.

Whether the pope may be deposed by the Councel or not.

The places, Tibi dabo claues regni cœlorum, Pasce oues meas, make nothing for the popes supremacie.

But we count these as things of no force or difficulty. For S. Augustine in the Sermon of the nativitie of Peter and Paul saith in this wise: Our Lord Jesus Christ before his Passion, chose his disciples (as ye do know) whom he called brethren. Amongst those, Peter alone almost in euery place represented the person of the Church, and therefore it was said vnto him, Tibo dabo claues regni cœlorum: That is to say, Unto thée will I giue the keies of the kingdome of heauen. These keies did he not receiue as one man, but as one hee receiued them for the Church. And in another place, where hee writeth of the Christian agonie, he saith: The keies of the kingdome of heauen were giuen vnto the Church, when as they were giuen vnto Peter: And when as it was spoken vnto him: Amas me? Pasce oues meas: That is to say, Louest thou me? fæde my sheepe: it was spoken vnto them all. And Saint Ambrose in the beginning of his pastorall, saith: Which sheepe and which flocke, the blessed Apostle S. Peter tooke no charge of alone, but together with vs, and we all together with him. By which words the foundation and principall arguments of those flatterers, are vtterlie subuerted and ouerthrowne. For if Peter represented the person of the Church, we ought not to ascribe the force of these words vnto Peter, but vnto the church. Neither do I see how that can stand, which Boniface doth affirme, for it is farre distant from the truth, except it bee vnderstood otherwise then it is spoken.

The popes supremacie confuted.

Peter representeth the person of the Church, and not of the pope.

The keies giuen to the Church, and not to one man.

Pope Boniface erreth.

But it may peraduenture séeme a great thing vnto some, that it is said, the bishop of Rome to be the head of the militant Church. For as in the bodie of man, Physitions do neuer giue counsell to cut off the head for any manner of sickines and disease, although it be neuer so full of vlcers, or infected: so in this mysticall bodie of the Church, the head ought alwaies to be kept: and albeit it be neuer so wicked, yet is it to be suffered and borne withall. But now conuert this argument: If it were possible in the bodie of man, when one head is taken away, to find another to put in his place, as we see it may be done in the church, should not heads then be oftentimes changed for diuers diseases? Moreouer, if we will thus reason, that the head of the church should be in respect of his body, as the head of man man in respect of the body of man: then doth it necessarily follow, that the head being dead, the body must also die; as is manifest in the body of man: So should it grow into an absurdity to confesse that the pope being dead, the church also should be dead: the which how far it dissenteth from the truth, it is most manifest. Therefore whatsoeuer other men say, I am not of opinion with them, which affirme the bishop of Rome to be head of the church, except peraduenture they doe make him the ministeriall head: for wee doe reade that Christ is the head of the church, and not the pope; and that he is the true head, immutable, perpetuall, and euerlasting, & the church is his body, whereof the pope himselfe is also a member, and the vicar of Christ; not to the destruction, but to the maintenance and edifying of the same body of Christ. Wherefore if he be found a damnable destroier of the church, he may be deposed and cast out, because he doth not that he was ordained to do: and we ought, as pope Leo saith, to be mindfull of the commandement giuen vs in the Gospell: that if our eye, our foote, or our right hand doe offend vs, it should be cut off from the body. For the Lord saith in another place: Euery tree which bringeth not forth fruit, shall be cut downe and cast into the fire. And in another place also it is said vnto vs: Take away all euill and wickednesse from among you. It is very iust and true which is written in the Epistle of Clement, vnto James the brother of our Lord, that he which will be saued, ought to be separate from them which will not be saued.

They vote which say, that the pope cannot be deposed for any other cause then for heresie.

But for the more manifest declaration hereof, wee must haue recourse to that which is spoken by the Lord in the Gospel of John: I am the true vine, saith the Lord, and my father is the husbandman, and ye are the branches: euery branch therefore that bringeth not forth fruit in me, my father will cut off. These words were spoken vnto the Apostles, amongst whom also Peter was present, whom the Lord would haue cut off, if hee brought not forth his fruit. Also Saint Hierome vpon these words of Matthew: Unsauory salt is profitable for nothing, but to be cast forth and troden of swine. Whereupon in the person of Peter and Paul, he saith thus: It is no easie matter to stand in the place of Peter and Paul, and to keepe the chaire of them which raigne with Christ. This vnsauory salt, that is to say, a foolish prelat, vnsauory in preaching, and foolish in offending, is good for nothing but to be cast forth, that is to say, deposed, and to be troden of swine, that is, of wicked spirits, which haue dominion ouer the wicked and naughty prelats, as their owne flocke and heard. Behold, this testimonie of Hierome is plaine and euident. Let him be cast out, saith he.

Fruitlesse branches are to be cut off.

If the pope be vnsauory salt, he is to be cast away.

He expoundeth and speaketh it of the prelat, which vsurpeth the place of Peter, and so consequently of the bishop of Rome, who being vnsauory in preaching, and foolish in offending, ought to be deposed (as Hierome affirmeth) from his degree and dignity. Neither as some doe dreame, is he to be deposed for heresie only. Isidorus in the booke of Councels, rehearseth a certaine Epistle of Clement the successor of Peter, written vnto James the Apostle, where as the said Clement referring the words of Peter vnto himselfe, saith thus: If thou be occupied with worldly cares, thou shalt both deceiue thy selfe, and those which shall giue eare vnto thee: for thou canst not fully distribute vnto euery man those things which pertaine vnto saluation: whereby it shall come to passe, that thou as a man for not teaching those things which pertaine vnto saluation, shalt be deposed, and thy disciples shall perish through ignorance. Notwithstanding in another place, in stead of this word deposed, it is found, thou shalt be punished: which two words, if they be well vnderstood, doe not much differ, for deposition is often times vsed in the place of punishment. But peraduenture some will here obiect, that this Epistle is not to bee iudged Clements, because it is said to bee written vnto James, who as the ecclesiasticall history affirmeth, was dead before that Peter was put to death. But Clement might thinke that James was aliue when as he wrote: which were farre distant asunder, and messengers of the christians came not often vnto Rome. Moreouer, there is mention made of this Epistle in diuers places of the decretals, as most true, and therefore it shall be nothing from the purpose to rehearse other sayings out of the same Epistle; where hee saith, that he which liueth rebelliously, and refuseth both to learne and to doe good, is rather a member of the diuell then of Christ, and doth shew himselfe rather to be an infidell then a faithfull christian. Upon which words, the gloss which Panormitane calleth singular, and is much allowed, saith, that if the crime or offence of the bishop of Rome be notorious, whereby the church is offended, if he be incorrigible, he may be accused thereof. If then he may be accused, Ergo also he may be punished, and according to the exigent of the fault deposed: otherwise he should be accused in vaine.

The words of Peter to Clement.

The epistle of Clement to James doubted.

The pope may and ought to be both accused and punished for ill doing.

Now is there no more any place of defence left for our aduersaries, but that the pope may be deposed. Notwithstanding it is not yet euident whether hee may be deposed by the councell or no, which we now take in hand to discourse. And first of all, the aduersaries will grant this vnto vs, that the bishop of Rome may be deposed by the church, for so much as the pope being the vicar of the church, no man doubteth but that a lord may put out his vicar at his will and pleasure: neither is it to be doubted but that the pope is more truly called the vicar of the church, then of Christ. But if the church may depose the pope, Ergo the councell also may doe the same. Also the gloss which Panormitane in his writing doth so greatly commend, hath this sentence: that the generall councell is iudge ouer the pope in all cases. Likewise the most sacred synod of Constantinople, which is allowed of all men, doth appoint the bishop of Rome to be vnder the iudgement of the councell: and the councell to iudge and determine of euery doubtfull matter or question that doth arise concerning the bishop of Rome. Neither let any man doubt hereof, because this word deposition is not mentioned: for it is said of euery doubtfull matter or question: for if the synod doe iudge of euery doubt; Ergo it shall also iudge, whether the pope shall be deposed or no; for that may also come in doubt. And because wee will not seeke examples farre off, Iohn 23. whom all the world did reuerence, was deposed of his papacy by the councell of Constance. Neither yet was he condemned for any heresie, but because he did offend the church by his manifold crimes, the sacred synod thought good to depose him: and euer since continually, the church hath proceeded by like example, that their opinion might cease, which affirme that the pope cannot be deposed but only for heresie.

The pope is rather to be called the vicar of the church, then of Christ.

Pope Iohn 23. deposed, and yet for no heresie.

But here is yet one thing not to be omitted, that certaine men doe affirme the generall councels to be of no effect, except the pope doe call and appoint them, and his authority remaine with them. Whereupon they said that Dioscorus did rebuke Palchasius the bishop of Cicill, and legat of pope Leo, because that he did enterprise without the authority of the Apostolike see, to call a councell at Ephesus. They also alledge another testimony of the synod of Chalcedon: where as, when mention was made of the councell of Ephesus, all the bishops cried out, saying: We ought not to call it a councell, because it was neither gathered by the Apostolike authority, neither rightly kept. By the which authorities, they which say that the councels cannot bee holden without the consent of the pope, doe thinke themselues marueilously armed. Whose sentence and opinion, if it take place and preuaile as they desire, it shall bring with it the great ruine and decay of the church. For what remedy shall we finde, if that a wicked pope doe disturbe the whole church, destroy soules, seduce the people by his euill examples, if finally he preach contrary vnto the faith, and fill the people full of heresies, shall wee prouide no stay or stop for him? Shall we suffer all things to run to ruine and decay with him? Who would think that the bishop of Rome would congregate a councell for his owne correction or deposition? for as men are prone vnto sinne, so would they also sinne without punishment. But when as I doe peruse ancient histories, and the acts of the Apostles, I doe not finde this order, that councels should be gathered only at the will of the pope: for the first councell of all, after that Matthias was substitute in the place of Iudas, was not congregate at the commandement of Peter, but at the commandement of Christ, who commanded the Apostles that they should not depart from Ierusalem, but looke for the promise of the father.

Whether councels may be congregated without the authority of the pope.

They erre that say the pope ought only to appoint the councels. Marke wherefore the popes will haue no generall councell.

The 1. councell of the Apostles.

The second councell as touching the election of the deacons, Peter alone did not congregate, but the twelue Apostles: for it is written; The twelue Apostles calling together the multitude, &c.

The 2. councell of the Apostles.

The third councell, which was holden as touching the taking away of circumcision and other ceremonies of the law, was gathered together by a generall inspiration: for it is written The Apostles and Elders came together, &c.

The 3. councell of the Apostles.

The fourth councell, where as certaine things contained in the law are permitted, seemeth to be gathered by Iames: and so discoursing throughout all, there can nothing be found in the primitiue church, whereby it should appeare that the authority of congregating of councels, should pertaine only vnto bishops of Rome. Neither afterwards in the time of Constantinus Magnus, and other emperors, was the consent of the bishops of Rome greatly required to the congregating of councels; and therefore it is written thus of the synod of Chalcedon: The sacred and vniuersall synod gathered together at Chalcedon, the chiefe citie of the prouince of Bethunia, according vnto the grace of God, and the sanctions of the most godly and christian emperors Valentinian and Martian, doth not make any mention of the bishop of Rome, although his consent were there.

The 4. councell of the Apostles.

Generall councels in times past congregated by emperors, and not by popes.

Whether the pope may be deposed by the councell or no.

Wherefore, if the pope would resist, and would haue no councell congregate, yet if the greater part of the church doe iudge it necessary to haue a councell, the councell may be congregate whether the pope will or no. The councell holden at Pisa, was not congregate by the authority and consent of any pope, when as Gregory did condemne it, and Benedict cursed it. The same also may be said of the councell of Constance, which was assembled by the authority of pope Iohn, who in respect of the Spaniards was no true pope. And if the councell of Pisa were no true councell, pope Iohn was no true pope: Whereupon his consent to the congregation of the councell of Constance, was of no effect. Moreouer, it is more then folly to affirme, that when the pope hath once giuen his consent

If the greater part of the church doe consent, a councell may be holden whether the pope will or no.

consent, if it should be called backe, that the Councell should then cease, for then it is no more in his power to reuoke his consent: And of necessitie he must be obedient vnto the Councell, whereof he is a member, and giue place vnto the greater part: and if he separate himselfe from the consent of the greater part, and depart from the vnitie of the Church, he maketh himselfe a schismaticke.

How the pope is a schismaticke

Now, to come vnto the second conclusion: if it be true, as it is indeed, that the pope is vnder the Councell, how can the pope then dissolue, alter and transport the Councel, against the will of the same? For with what countenance can we say, that the inferior hath power ouer the superior? How can the Synode correct the pope, if the pope may dissolue the Synode contrarie to the will thereof? Admit that the pope be libidinous, couetous, a louer of war and discord, and a most mortall enemie vnto the Church, and the name of Christ, how can the councell remoue him, if he haue authoritie to dissolue the Councell? For allone as euer that the bishop of Rome shall vnderstand that in the Councell they doe intreat or talke of his correction or punishment, straightwaies he wil seek remedie by dissoluing the Councell. For as Macrobius saith: he that hath libertie to doe more then is fit or necessarie, will oftentimes doe more then is lawfull. If so be that the bishop of Rome may exempt himselfe from correction by dissoluing or transporting the Councell, it followeth that the Councell is not aboue him. Therefore we must either denie that which is afore said, that the pope is vnder the Councell, or else denie that the pope hath power to dissolue the Councell, contrarie to the will and determination of the Councell.

The pope cannot dissolue a generall Councell against the will of the same.

The saying of Macrobius.

And as this first conclusion is most true, so are al other conclusions false, which seeme to impugne the same. Wherefore the second conclusion of the diuines is also manifest: albeit that some do admit it in certaine cases, and in other some exclude it againe. For if we do admit, that for certaine causes the pope may dissolue the Councell contrary to the will and determination thereof, that is to say, to make the pope iudge of the Councell, it were cleane contrary vnto the first conclusion.

Whether the pope in certaine cases may dissolue the Councell.

Now it is proued that the Councell is aboue the pope, and cannot be dissolued by the pope without consent thereof. Now we must further see, whether it be an article of our faith to beleeue it: which matter hath respect vnto the third conclusion. For there haue been many, which albeit they did confesse these two conclusions to bee true, yet they doubted whether it were a veritie of the Catholike faith or no. Therefore this second part must be confirmed. And we must see whether it be an article of faith that the pope be vnder the Councell. Which being proued, it shall also appeare to bee an article of faith, that the pope cannot dissolue the Councell without the consent thereof. Which consequent none of the contrary part hath refuted. First of all therefore we must inquire what faith is, that we may thereby the better vnderstand, what pertaineth thereunto.

The definition of faith.

Faith, as the diuines do define it, is a firme and stedfast cleauing vnto things, beleeued by the authoritie of him that speaketh. If then we beleeue, as is afore said, that the pope of Rome is vnder the Councell, some authoritie doth moue vs thereunto: so is it the faith of him which beleeueth it. But the question is not whether it bee an article of faith only, but whether it bee an article of the Catholike faith. Wherefore we must againe enquire what the catholike faith is. This word catholike is a Greeke word, and signifieth vniuersall. The Catholike faith, that is to say, the vniuersall faith, is not so called because that euery man holdeth it, but because euerie man ought to beleeue it. For all men doe not beleeue that God is incarnat, but euery man ought so to beleeue. And albeit that many be against this faith, yet doth it not cease to be vniuersall. For what writeth the Apostle vnto the Romans? If some of them haue not beleeued, doth their misbeleefe make the faith of God vaine? God forbid. Verily God is true, but euery man is a lier. Therfore to beleeue that the pope is vnder the Councell, is a point of the catholike faith, although some thinke the contrary: for we are bound to beleeue it, forsomuch as it is taken out of the Gospell. For we are not bound only to beleeue those things which are noted to vs in the Creed, but also all those things which are contained in the holy scriptures, whereof we may not denie one iot. And those things which we alleage for the superioritie of the generall Councell, are gathered out of the sayings of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, and the Epistles of S. Paul: Ergo, we are all bound to beleeue it. And to proue that these things are taken out of the Gospel, the Councell of Constance doth witnes, the which groundeth his authoritie vpon these words: Dic Ecclesiæ, that is to say, Tell it vnto the Church. And, Where two or three are gathered together in my name, &c. And, What soeuer yee shal bind, &c. with other such like texts.

The definition of the catholike faith.

Rom. 3. Catholicke what it is.

Whereupon pope Martine the fourth being yet at Constance, vnder the licence of the Councell, sent out his bulles, which doe reckon vp the articles, whereupon they ought to be examined, which had fallen into any heresie; amongst the which articles he putteth this article: whether he doe beleeue the sacred generall Councell to haue power immediatelie from God, and that the ordinances thereof are to bee receiued of all faithfull Christians; which if any man would denie, hee should bee counted an heretick. Wherefore, when as the sacred Synode of Constance doth set forth this veritie, as touching the superioritie of the generall Councell, what should let, but that wee also should confesse the same to be a verity of the catholicke faith? For the catholicke Church being congregate at Constance, receiued that faith, that is to say, beleeued it by the authoritie of him which spake it, that is, Christ and his Saints.

The Councell of Constance. Vide supra, pag. 599.

To this purpose also serue very well the words of the Synode of Chalcedon, written in this manner: It is not lawfull for him that is condemned by the whole Synode to nominate any bishop. The determination pleaseth all men. This is the faith of the fathers. He that holdeth any opinion contrary vnto this, is an heretick. And againe, it is a rule, that it is not lawfull to appeale from the elect and chosen Synode.

The words of the Councell of Chalcedon, whereby he is declared an heretick that holdeth any opinion contrary to the Councel.

Marke the manifest witnesse of this most sacred Synode, which said, that hee is an heretick, which holdeth any opinion contrarie vnto the Councell: But he is no heretick, except he refuse the catholicke faith: Ergo, it was the catholicke faith to beleeue that it was not lawfull to appeale from the sacred Councell. But how was the same any point of the catholick faith? Verily forsomuch as the sacred Synode perusing ouer the holy Scriptures, hath receiued this conclusion out of the words of Christ and other holy fathers. And like as the Synode of Chalcedon took their conclusion out of the holy Scriptures, so did the Councell of Constance, this we now reason vpon. And like as the one is an article of the catholike faith, so is the other also. And he which holdeth any opinion contrarie to either of both, is an heretick.

Furthermore, they seeme vnto mee to dreame and dote, which confessing them to bee verities, will not confesse them to bee verities of faith. For if they bee verities, I pray you whereof are they verities? Truly not of Grammar, much lesse of Logike; and from Astronomie and Physicke they are farre distant. Neither is there any other man but a diuine, that will grant this veritie, whom Scripture doth force vnto it of necessitie, if hee doe beleeue Christ, or his Apostles. Therefore this is a veritie of the catholicke faith, which all men ought to embrace; and he which obstinatelie resisteth against the same, is to be iudged an heretick, as the third conclusion doth affirme. Neither let any man thinke it hard or cruell, that hee should be called an heretick which goeth about to derogate any thing from the power of the generall Councell, which is confirmed by so many testimonies and authorities. Also Panormitan alleageth S. Hierome, saying: Hee which vnderstandeth the Scripture otherwise then the consent of the holy ghost doth require, albeit he do not depart from the church may be called an heretick.

Panormitan is noted, and very well nipped by his owne supposition.

Whereupon it followeth, that he which vpon the words of Christ, saying vnto Peter, Dic Ecclesiæ. i. Tell it vnto the church, doth not vnderstand by the church the generall councell, vnderstandeth it otherwise then the sense of the holy Ghost doth require, and thereby may be noted as an heretick. And to proue that the sense of the holy Ghost is otherwise then he doth iudge it, the councel of Constance doth declare: The which interpreting those words, Dic Ecclesiæ. i. Tel it vnto the church, spoken by the holy Ghost, vnderstandeth them to be spoken of the generall councel. By these and many other waightier reasons the 3. afore said conclusions seemed true vnto the diuines, and through them they also allowed the residue.

Tel the church, that is to say, the generall Councell.

Now haue we sufficiently said, as touching that which was before promised: neither doe I thinke any man now to be in doubt of these 3. first conclusions. Now to returne againe vnto our storie, it is our purpose to declare those things which happened after the conclusions of the diuines: for there are many things worthie of remembrance, which also may happily be profitable vnto the posteritie.

When the disputation was ended and a finall conclusion of these matters euen at hand, the archbishop of Millaine and Panormitane with the residue of their fellow ambassadors of the king of Arragon, and duke of Millaine, armed themselues with all their power to let the matter, exhorting all men of their faction to withstand it with stout and valiant stomackes.

And first of all, allsoone as the congregation was assembled together, the bishop of Burgen exhorted them to deferre the conclusion, and to tarry for the Ambassadors of other prouinces, which would returne from Mentz.

The bishop of Burgen.

After him Panormitane with a graue and Rhetoricall Oration, spake (in a manner) as followeth.

Panormitans oration.

I haue (said he) had a commandement by the Prophet, to crie without ceasing; Which Prophet said: Cry out, cease not, lift vp thy voice as a trumpet. If that in any matter at any time before, he ought to haue cried, this matter specially which is now in hand lacketh crying and roring out, when as the state of the vniuersall Church is intreated vpon, either to be preserued, or vtterlie ouerthrowne: and that hee hath cried so much in this matter, that hee doubted not, but the saying of Dauid was fulfilled in him, where hee saith: Laboraui clamans, raucæ sunt factæ fauces meæ: I haue laboured, crying out, that my iawes are become hoarce.

Notwith-

Notwithstanding that hee would both now, and as often as neede should require, without ceasing still crie out, and speciallie now in this most difficult and waightie matter: wherein he required the sacred Councell gently to heare both him, and the Ambassadours of other princes: Adding moreouer foure things to bee considered in all requests made of any man. The which he also required the fathers now presentlie, to marke and consider: Who it is that maketh the request. What is required. Why it should be required: and what effect would come by the request either granted or denied. As touching the first point he said: The most noble kings and excellent princes with their prelats to be of great power: and then reckoned vp the king of Castile, the king of Arragō, the duke of Millaine, and the bishops of the same princes, rehearsing also the merits and good deeds of the said kings, and also of the duke of Millaine. But when as hee came to make mention of the prelats, he could not refraine himselfe, but began to wax somewhat hot, saying, that the greatest number of prelats were on his part. For if the bishops & abbats were counted, it were not to be doubted, but the greatest part of them would haue this present matter deferred: and forsomuch as the whole power of the Councell doth consist in the bishops, it is not to be suffered, that they being neglected and contemned, that should be concluded, which pleased the greater part of the inferiors: For the keies (said hee) were giuen to the apostles, and to their successors, which are the bishops: also, that there are three kinds of Synods, episcopall, prouinciall, and generall, and none of all these without bishops.

Foure things to be considered in euery request.

Panormitane would haue dignitie to be considered in Councell, and not voices.

Wherefore the manner and order of the present Councell seemed vndecent, where as things were not waighed according men excell in dignitie, but by most voices: Notwithstanding according to the most famous epistle of Clement, the bishops were the pillers and keies of heauen, and the inferiors had no determining voice, but only a consultatiue voice with them: wherefore there would bee a great offence in this behalfe, if a matter of faith should be determined without the bishops: in which matter not onely the bishops, but also the secular princes ought to be admitted. And for so much as they, in the name of their princes desired to bee admitted to the examination of this present matter, and would examine the matter more fullie, he complained greatly how vnworthy a thing it was that they should be contemned or despised.

Panormitane seemeth to delay the proces against the pope.

After many things spoken to this end and effect, he passed ouer to the second part of his oration, declaring what it was that he required: not gold, nor siluer, neither pretious stones, neither prouinces nor kingdoms, neither a thing hard to bee done, but that only the delay of the sacred Councel was required, and that the fathers would stay in the proceasse against the pope, and in the conclusion and determination of matters which are now in hand. Neither should the delay be long, but only vntill the returne of the Ambassadors from Mentz, whom he knew well would returne very shortly. That this was but a small matter, and to be small intreatie, because there was no danger in it. And also it should seeme iniurious, not to tarrie for the ambassadors of the princes which were then at Mentz, whenas they were not absent for their owne priuate commoditie, but about the affaires of the common-wealth, and the commoditie of peace: neither had he forgotten, that at their departure they had desired, that during their absence, there should be nothing renued concerning the matters of Eugenius.

The third part of Panormitans oration.

Then immediatly adioyning the third part of his oration, wherefore this delay was required, he concluded, that it was not required for the priuate commoditie of any one man, but for a common-wealth: not to cause any trouble or vnquietnes, but for the better examination of the matter, that all things might passe with peace and quietnesse, that the matter might be so much the more firme and stable, by how much it is ratified and allowed by the consent of many. And so hee proceeded to the last part of his argument, requiring the fathers that they would consider and waigh in their minds the effect that would follow, if they should grant or denie this request. For (saith he) if yee shall denie this small petition of the princes, they all will be agreeued therewith, and take this repulse in ill part. They will say, they are contemned of you, neither will they bee obedient vnto you, or receiue your decrees. In vaine shall yee make lawes except the princes doe execute them, and all your decrees shall be but vaine: yet would I thinke this to be borne withall, if I did not feare greater matters to ensue. What if they should ioyne themselues with Eugenius, who not onely desireth to spoile you of your liuings, but also of your liues: Alas, what slaughter and murther doe the eies of my mind behold and see: Would God my opinion were but vaine. But if you do grant and consent vnto their petitions, they will think themselues bound vnto you: they will receiue and embrace your decrees, and whatsoeuer you shall require of them shall be obtained. They will forsake your aduersary, they will speak euill of him and abhorre him: but you they will commend and praise, you they will reuerence: vnto you they will wholly submit themselues: and then shall follow that most excellent fruit of reformation and tranquillitie of the Church. And thus he required the matter to bee respited on all parts. At the last hee said, that except the Ambassadors of the princes were heard, he had a protestation written, which he would command to be read before them all.

Perswasions of Panormitane.

When Panormitan had made an end of his oration, Lodouicus the protonotarie of Rome rose vp, a man of such singular wit and memory, that he was thought not to be inferior vnto any of the famous men aforetime. In somuch that he had alwaies in memorie whatsoeuer he had heard or read, and neuer forgat any thing that he had seene. This man first commending Panormitan, said: that he came but the day before from the baths, & that it seemed vnto him a strange thing which was now brought in question: wherein hee desired to heare other mens minds, and also to bee heard of others, and that those prelates which were at Mentz should be taried for, to be present at the discussing of this matter, in the name and behalfe of their princes, which prelats were men of great estimation, and the orators of most mightie princes.

The praise of Lodouicus the Protonotary.

Hee allowed also the saying of Panormitane touching the voices of the inferiours, that it seemeth not to bee against the truth, that only bishops should haue a deciding or determining voice in Councels. And albeit that some in this disputation doe thinke that, which is written in the 15. chapter of the acts, to be their force or defence: notwithstanding he was nothing moued therewith, nor toke it to be of any effect, albeit it was said: It seemed good vnto the holy Ghost and to vs; whereas both the Apostles and the elders were gathered together: whereby it appeared, that the others had a deciding voice with the Apostles. For he said, that there was no argument to be gathered of the Acts of the Apostles, whose examples were more to be maruelled at, then to be followed: and that it doth not appeare there, that the Apostles called the elders of dutie, but that it is onelie declared that they were there present: whereupon nothing could be inferred. And that it seemed vnto him, that the inferiours in the councell of Basill, were admitted to determine with the bishops but of grace and fauour onelie, because the bishops may communicate their authoritie vnto others. He alleaged for testimonie, the bishop of Cancen, a man of great authoritie, who would not suffer any incorporation, or fellowship of the meaner sort, and therefore, neither any inferior, neither himselfe, which as yet was not made bishop, to haue any deciding voice in the Councell. Wherefore forsomuch as the matter was waightie, which was now in hand, and that the bishops spake against it, he required the Councell that they would of necessitie stay and tarrie for the Ambassadors of the princes comming from Mentz.

Bishops onely to haue determining voice in Councels.

His oration was so much the more grieuous, in that manie were touched with his words, and speciallie in that point, that hee said, the Apostles were not to be followed: for that all men did impugne as a blasphemy. But here a man may marueil, that a man of such excellencie, alleaged no more or better matter. But in this point the memorie of the man is to be pardoned, which did not willingly speake in this matter, and desired nothing somuch, as not to obtaine that which he intreated for. After him many other spake their minds, but all to this end, that they might protract the time, and deferre the conclusion of these matters.

It is no maruel why he alleaged no more, or better matter: for of naught bee leather no man can make a good shooe.

And note here how God withdraweth his gifts, when men dissemble and cloke the truth.

Then Lodouicus the cardinall Arelatensis, a man of marueilous constancie, and borne for the gouernance of generall Councels, gathering together the words of all the orators, spake in this wise: Most reuerend fathers, this is no new or strange businesse, nor begun to day or yesterday. For it is now many weekes agoe, since the conclusions were disputed vpon amongst the diuines, and sent vnto Mentz, and to all other parts of the world. After this, they were disputed vpon sire dates continuallie, and fully discussed, and after that not without great delay approued by the deputies, and as the truth seeketh no corners, so all things were done publikely and openlie. Neither can any man pretend ignorance, neither are the prelats or Princes contemned: For wee called all that were present at Basill, and exhorted all the rest for to bee present. And forsomuch as mention is made of the most noble king of Castile: who is it that is ignorant, that the kings Orators were there present: The bishop of Burgen and Ebrun, men of singular learning and eloquence, and you also Panormitane your selfe, which heere represent the person of the most famous king of Arragon, were twice present your selfe in the chapter house, and disputed twice most subtillie, and twice declared your mind, what you thought in that matter. What doe you desire any more: Also out of the territorie of the duke of Millaine, there was present the archbishop of Millaine, who albeit, he be no Ambassadour, yet how famous a prelate hee is, you are not ignorant. When he had spoken these words, the archb. being somewhat moued, said vnto him: My lord cardinall, you supplie the roome of a president no better, then I do the place of a dukes orator, and began to taunt him with many words. But the Cardinall, (as hee was a man most patient, and would not be prouoked to anger by any meanes) said: this is it that I euen now desired. For if the archbishop bee an Ambassador, then hath the duke no cause to complaine, which had his orator present at the discussing of those matters.

Truth seeketh no corners.

The patience and answers of Arelatensis.

I passe ouer other princes, because they do not complaine.

Notwithstanding, the most Christian K. of France, had there the bishop of Lions, a graue and sober man, his Ambassadour at the disputation. As for other princes, I see no cause why they should be tarried for, which knowing the Councel to be congregate for such matters as pertaine vnto faith, doe not thinke it absurd, that the doubtfull matters of faith should bee declared in the Councell: Whereunto if they had been willing to come, they would haue been present ere this.

Why this matter should néede so much discussing, as some will haue, I do not vnderstand. For if I be well remembred, Panormitane and also Ludouicus, haue oftentimes affirmed in this place, euen the very same thing which the conclusions signifie. And if any of them now will goe about to gainsay it, it will happen vnto them, as it did vnto Didimus. To whom, when as on a time, hee repugned against a certaine history, as vaine and friuolous, his owne booke was deliuered vnto him, wherein the same was written: So likewise these two men (meaning Panormitane and Ludouicus the Protonotary) although they be excellently learned, and eloquent: yet may they be confuted by their owne writings. Besides this: there are Synodall epistles and decrees of this Councell, which are full of such conclusions. What is it then whereupon any difficultie can bee raised? What is it that may be impugned? Shall wee now bring that againe in doubt, which hath so often been declared, affirmed, and decréed? But (say they) the princes and Ambassadors are absent, which are bishops, by whose presence the decrées should bee of more authoritie. Well, they are not onely absent which are gone to Ments: but almost an infinit number of others, dispersed throughout the whole world: whom if we should tarry to looke for, nothing at any time should be decréed. They are all called vnto the Councell: they might haue come if they would. To those that are present, power is giuen, and they ought to debate these matters. If any man will say, that they which are absent, are about the affaires of the common-wealth: truely wee sent them not thither, but they went rather against the will of the Councell, then with the consent thereof.

Didimus reprehended that which was in his owne booke found.

He meaneth Panormitane and Ludouicus the Protonotary.

And admit that they had been sent by the Councell: yet were not our power so much restrained, but that we might reforme the Church, for otherwise there should neuer any thing be done in the Councell: forsomuch as alwaies some are sent out by the Councell, and some are alwaies to be looked and taried for, and therefore wee must either doe nothing at all, or send out no prelats from the councel. Whereas he said, that prelats, and specially bishops are contemned, that is most far frō the truth, for they haue the chiefe and first places. They speake first, and giue their voices first of all vnto all things: and if so be they do speak learnedly and truly, all the inferiors without any gainesaying did some follow their mind.

Neither peraduenture shall it be found vntrue, that there was neuer any Synode, which did more amplifie the power and authoritie of bishops then this. For what haue the bishops been in our daies, but only shadowes? Might they not well haue béen called shepheards without the sheepe? What had they more then their miter and their staffe, when as they could determine nothing ouer their subiects? Verily in the primitiue Church, the bishops had the greatest power and authoritie: but now was it come to that point that they excéeded the common sort of priests onely in their habit and reuenues. But we haue restored them againe to their old state, we haue reduced the collation of benefices againe vnto them: we haue restored vnto them the confirmation of elections: we haue brought again the causes of the subiects to be heard, into their hands: I haue made them bishops which were none before. What cause is there then, that the bishops should say, they are contemned of the Councell? Or what iniurious thing haue we at any time done vnto them? But Panormitan saith, that forsomuch as most bishops are on his part, and few against him, the conclusion is not to be determined by the multitude of the inferiors: but let Panormitan remember himselfe, that this is no new kind of procéeding.

Marke Ye bishops, the Councel of Basill contendeth for you and ye will not vnderstand it.

This order of procéeding, the Councell ordained from the beginning, neither hath it been changed at any time since. And this order, Panormitane, in times past hath pleased you well enough, when as the multitude did follow your mind. But now, because they doe not follow your mind, they doe displease you. But the decrées of the Councell are not so mutable, as the wils of men. Know yee moreouer, that the very same bishops which doe consent with you in word, doe not consent with you in mind, neither speake the same secretly, which they now doe openly. They doe feare that which you told them at home in their countrie, that except they would follow your mind, they should displease the king. They feare the power of the prince, and to bee spoiled of their temporalties: neither haue they frée libertie to speake as is requisite in Councels. Albeit if they were true bishops, and true pastors of soules, they would not doubt to put their liues in venture for their sheepe, neither bee afraid to shed their bloud for their mother the Church.

This was a true Cardinall: out of whose mouth the veritie did speake, which feared not the threatnings of princes, neither sought any worldly glory or dignitie.

Marke what worldly pompe, dignitie and wealth had brought the prelats to in those daies.

But at this present (the more is the pitie) it is too rare to find a prelate in this world, which doth not preferre his temporalties before his spiritualties: with the loue whereof, they are so withdrawne, that they study rather to please princes then God, and confesse God in corners, but princes they will openly confesse. Of whom the Lord speaketh in his Gospell: Euery one, saith he, that confesseth me before men, I will confesse him before my father which is in heauen. And contrariwise, the Lord will not confesse him before his father which is afraid to confesse the Lord before men. Neither is it true which Panormitan saith, most bishops to be on his part; for here are many bishops proctors whom hee doth not reckon, because they are not of his opinion. Neither is the dignitie of the fathers, to be respected in the Councell, as he saith, but onely reason, nor any thing more to be looked for then the truth: neither will I for my part, preferre a lie of any bishop, be he neuer so rich, before a veritie or truth of a poore priest. Neither ought a bishop to disdaine, if he be rude or vnlearned, that the multitude doth not follow him, or that the voice of a poore learned and eloquent priest should be preferred before his. For wisdome dwelleth often vnder a bare and ragged cloke, then in rich ornaments and apparell.

Note here the great godlinesse and most Christian saying of this good bishop.

Truth many times dwelleth vnder the ragged cloke.

Wherefore I pray you my Lord bishops, do not so much contemne your inferiors; for the first which died for Christ, the which also opened vnto all other the way of martyrdome, was no bishop but onely a Leuite. As for that which Ludouicus and Panormitane doe alleage touching the voices of bishops, I know not where they haue it. Wherefore I desire them that they would tell me, where they haue found it. But if we repeat the examples of old Councels, we shall find that the inferiors were alwaies present with the bishops. And albeit that Ludouicus doe forbid vs the examples of the Apostles, I stay my selfe most vpon their doings. For what is more comely for vs to follow, then the doctrine and customes of the primitiue Church? It is said therefore in the 15. chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, It seemed good vnto the holy Ghost, and to vs. The which word (to vs) is referred vnto them which are before named, the Apostles and the Elders. Neither this word, (it séemed good) signifieth in this place consultation, but decision and determination; whereby it appeareth, that other beside the bishops had determining voices. In another place also of the said Acts, when as the Apostles should intreat vpon any waightie matter, they durst not determine by themselues, but the rest called together the multitude.

Strouen the first marryd.

Note the sinceritie of this good bishop, which staied himselfe vpon the examples of the primitiue Church, and not vpon customes and popes.

Here Ludouicus saith, that it doth not appeare that the Apostles called other of necessitie: but I say vnto him, how knowest thou that they did not call them of necessitie? But forsomuch as both parts are vncertain: nothing doth prohibit vs to follow the Apostles. For seeing that all things were written for our learning, it appeareth that the Apostles would giue vs example, that in waightie matters we should admit our inferiours. And therefore in all Councels which were celebrate and holden afterwards, we find that priests were also present: as in the Councell of Nice, which of all other was most famous, Athanasius being then but onely a priest, withstood the Arrians, and infringed their arguments: Albeit, there were also other priests. And albeit mention be made of three hundred twentie two bishops, yet it is not denied, but that the inferiors were there, whom I thinke to be omitted for this cause, for that they were almost innumerable: for as you know well enough, the denomination for the most part, is taken of the most worthie.

Athanasius being but a priest, and no bishop, vanquished an archbishop.

In the Synode of Chalcedon (which was counted one of the foure principall Synods) it is said that there were present 600. priests: the which name is common both vnto bishops and priests. In other Councels the name both of bishops and priests is omitted, and mention made onely of fathers, which hath the same signification that this word Elders had in the Acts of the Apostles. We haue also a testimonie of the ecclesiasticall history, how that there was a Councell gathered at Rome of lx. bishops, and as many priests and deacons against the Nouatians, which called themselues Cathari. Also, when Paul ỳ bishop of Antioch, in the time of Galiene the emperor, preached that Christ was a man of common nature, the Councell assembled against him in Antioch: whereunto there came bishops out of Cesarea, Cappadocia, out of Pontus, Asia, and from Ierusalem, and many other bishops, priests and deacons: and it is said, that for that cause the Councell was often holden.

The name of priests or elders common both to bishops and priests.

Paul bishop of Antioch.

And at the last, in the same place, vnder Aurelius the emperour, Paul was condemned of all Christian Churches which were vnder heauen: neither was there any man, which did more confound the said Paul, then Malchion a priest of Antioch, which taught Rhetorike in Antioch. But to make no long digression from the matter, wee haue most euident testimonies, for the defence of the inferiours. For the chiefe and principall amongst all the diuines, Saint Austen vpon the words of Matthew, where as Christ saith vnto Peter, I will giue thee the keies of the kingdome of heauen, saith, that by those words the iudiciall power was giuen, not onely vnto Peter, but also to the other Apostles, and to the whole Church the bishops and priests. If then priests haue a iudiciall power in the Church, what should let that they haue not also a determining voice in the Councels? The famous doctor Saint Hierom doth also agree with Saint Austen, whose words are these

Paul the heretick condemned.

S. Augustines mind vpon this sentence, Tibi dabo claues regni cœlorum.

vpon the epistle of Paul vnto Titus. Before that difference was made in religion by the instigation of the diuell, or that it was spoken amongst the people, I hold of Paul, I of Apollo, and I of Cephas, the churches were gouerned by the common consent and counsell of the priests: for a priest is the verie same that a bishop is. Wherefore all bishops ought to vnderstand, that they are of greater power then priests, rather by custome then by the dispensation of the truth of God, and that they ought to rule the church together. And this wee doe also gather out of Paul vnto Titus, which maketh so much concordance betweene bishops and priests, that oftentimes he calleth priests bishops; whereby it doth euidently appeare, that priests are not to be excluded from the conuentions of bishops, and determinations of matters. Albeit as Saint Hierome writeth, that bishops only by custome are preferred before priests, it may be, that a contrarie custome may take away that custome: For if priests ought to rule the church together with the bishops, it is euident that it also pertaineth vnto them to decide and determine the doubtfull matters of the church.

Bishops are of greater power then priests, rather by custome then by dispensation of truth.

Bishops and priests ought to rule the church together.

Wherefore the testimonie of Saint Paul is euident: for (as he writing vnto the Ephesians, saith:) If Christ instituted his Apostles, Prophets, Pastours, and Teachers to the worke of the ministerie, for the edifying of his church vntill such time as we should meet him, for this purpose that there should be no doubt in the diuersitie of doctrine, who doubteth then, but that the gouernance of the church is committed vnto others together with the Apostles? Let these our champions now hold their peace, and seeme to be no wiser then they ought to be. The memoriall of the councell of Constance, is yet freshly in memorie, where as diuers of vs were present, and I my selfe also which was neither cardinall nor bishop, but only a doctor, where I did see, without any maner of doubt or difficultie, the inferiours to be admitted with the bishops, to the deciding of hard and doubtfull matters. Neither ought we to be ashamed to follow the example of that most sacred and great councell, which also followed the examples of the councell of Pisa, and the great councell at Lateran, wherein it is not to be doubted, but that the priests did iointly iudge together with the bishops.

Aeneas Siluius.

Moreouer, if abbats, as we do see it obserued in all councels, haue a determining voice, which notwithstanding were not instituted by Christ: why should not priests haue the same, whose order Christ ordained by his Apostles? Hereupon also, if only bishops should haue a determining voice, nothing should be done, but what pleased the Italian nation, the which alone doth exceed all other nations, or at the least is equall with them, in number of bishops. And howsoeuer it be, I iudge it in this behalfe to bee a worke of God, that the inferiours should be admitted to the determinations: for God hath now reuealed that vnto little ones which he hath hidden from the wise.

Note that abbats were not instituted by Christ.

Italy surmounteth all other nations in number of bishops.

Behold you do see the zeale, constancie, vprightnesse, and magnanimitie of these inferiours. Where should the councell now be, if only bishops and cardinals should haue their voice? Where should the authoritie of the councels be? where should the catholike faith be? where should the decrees and reformation be? for all things haue now a long time been vnder the will of Eugenius, and he had now obtained his wicked and naughtie purpose, except these inferiours, whom you now contemne, had withstood him. These are they which haue contemned the priuation made by Eugenius. These, I say, are they which haue not regarded his threatnings, spoile and persecution. These are they which being taken, imprisoned and tormented, haue not feared to defend the truth of the councell; yea euen these are they, who albeit they were by Eugenius deliuered ouer for a prey, yet would they still continue in the sacred councell, and feared not to suffer warre, famine, and most cruell pestilence: and finally, what thing is it, that these men haue not willingly suffered for the right and equitie of the councell? you might haue heard this inferiour sort euen in the middest of their tribulatiõs, with a loud voice crie out and say, Albeit that al men become obedient vnto that subuerter of the church Eugenius, and that euery man do depart from the veritie of the faith and constitutions of the fathers, consenting vnto the commandements of Eugenius, yet we and our brethren will be constant, and doubt not to die for the truth and traditions of the holy fathers, the which indeed they haue done. Neither could they be feared with threatnings, or discouraged with any spoiles, neither could any feare or hope turne them from their most blessed purpose: And (to speake somewhat of mine owne order) whether anie cardinals haue done the like or no, that iudge you.

Note the terrible persecution of those daies, and the great constancie of the godly, for the truths sake.

O zeale of faith, worthie the crowne of martyrdome!

As for bishops, whom Panormitan alone would haue to determine, you see how few of them are on our part, and euen they which are heere present, are not able, by vertue to ouercome iniquitie, they feare the terrene power, and commit offence with their hak. Haue yee not heard how they all said, they would consent vnto the kings will and pleasure? But the inferiours are they which haue had truth, righteousnesse, and God himselfe, before their eyes, and they are greatly to be commended for shewing themselues such men vnto the church of God. But why doe I defend the cause of these inferiours? When as some will also exclude those bishops which are but bishops by name and title, and haue no possession of the church, from our companie, not vnderstanding that whilest they go about to put backe those men, they do condemne Peter, and the other Apostles, who (as it is euident) were long without any great flocke, neither was Rome vnto Peter, nor Jerusalem vnto James, at any time wholly obedient: for at that time no great number of people, but a small flocke beleeued in Christ.

Eccles. 7.

The bishops feare the earthly power, but no God.

For, I pray you, what is that we should require of these bishops? They haue no flocke: but that is not their fault. They haue no reuenues: but money maketh not a bishop, and as the Lord saith, Beati pauperes spiritu: that is, Blessed are the poore in spirit. Neither was there any rich bishops in the primitiue Church, neither did the ancient Church reiect Dionysius bishop of Millaine, Eusebius bishop of Vercelles, or Hilarie bishop of Pictauia, although they were neuer so poore, and banished without a flocke. But if we will grant the truth, the poore are more apt to giue iudgement then the rich, because that riches bring feare, and their pouertie causeth libertie. For the poore men do not feare tyrannie as our rich men do, which being giuen ouer vnto all kind of vanities, idlenesse and sloth, will rather denie Christ, then lacke their accustomed pleasures: * whom not their flocke, but their reuenues make bishops, delighting so much in riches, that they iudge all poore men vnhappie. But, as Cicero saith; Nothing can happen better vnto a wise man, then mediocritie of substance. Whereupon it is written in the Gospell, It is easier for a Camell to passe thorow a needles eye, then for a rich man to enter into the kingdome of heauen.

The bishops of the primitiue church what they were. Poore men more meet to giue iudgement then rich: for riches, wealth, and dignitie bringeth feare: but pouertie causeth libertie.

* The bishops in this age of the church, what they are.

But now to returne to a more full declaration of Panormitans words, I determine to passe ouer two points which he propounded in the beginning of his oration, that is: Qui petant, & cur petant, that is, who maketh the petition, and for what cause they make their petition. We grant that they are great men, and men of power, and (as he doth affirme) that they haue deserued good of the church; neither do I doubt but that they are moued thereunto, with a sincere affection. But whether it be a small matter that is required, or that the same effects would rise thereupon, which he spake of; it is now to be enquired. A delay (saith he) is required: a delay for a few daies. A small matter: a matter of no importance: a matter easie to be granted. Notwithstanding let Panormitan heere marke well, that he requireth a delay in a matter of faith. The verities are alreadie declared: they be alreadie discussed and determined. If now there should be but a little delay, it would grow to a long delay: for oftentimes the delay of one moment, is the losse of a whole yeere; hereof we haue many examples. Hannibal when he had obtained his victorie at Cannas, if he had gone straight vnto Rome, by all mens iudgements, he had taken the citie. But for so much as he did deferre it vntill the next day, the Romans hauing recouered their force againe; he was shut out, and deserued to heare this opprobrie:

In matters of faith and religion, there ought to be no delaies.

Vincere scis Hannibal, vti victoria nescis.

Hannibal thou knowest victorie to get,
But how to vse it thou knowest not yet.

Likewise the French men, after they had taken Rome and besieged the Capitoll, whiles that they greedilie sought to haue great summes of money, and delayed the time in making of their truce, Camillus comming vpon them did most shamefullie driue them out againe. But what need I to rehearse old stories, whenas our owne examples are sufficient for vs? Wee know your selues how often these delayes haue been hurtfull vnto you, and how often the delay of a few daies hath growne to a long tract of time. For now this is the eighth yeere that you haue spent in delaies: and you haue seen, that alwayes of one delay another hath sprung and risen. Wherefore I do require, that Panormitan should consider, that the conclusion being this day disturbed, we know not whether it will be brought to passe hereafter againe or no: manie impediments or lets may rise. Neither doth Panormitan say, that this delay being obtained, he would afterward consent with his fellowes vnto the conclusions: for he denieth that he hath any commandement thereunto; and (which is more to be considered) he saith that the ambassadours at their returne from Mentz, may bring such newes, whereby these conclusions may be omitted: as though any thing were more excellent then the truth.

The eighth yeere of the councell of Basill. How subtillie they sought delaies.

The which thing doth manifestly declare, that they do not seeke delayes for the better examination of the matter, but for to impugne the conclusions the more stronglie. Neither do I agree with Panormitan, as touching the effects which hee said should rise either of the deniall, or granting of the requests: For I see no cause why the princes should so greatly require any delay. There are no letters of any prince come vnto vs as touching such request, neither is there anie man lately come from them, neither is it greatlie materiall vnto them, but that the matters of faith should be determined. But this is a most pernicious conclusion which Panormitan hath made, and not to be looked for at the hands of those most godly princes, where as hee saith, if wee doe please them, they will take our part. If contrariwise, they will decline vnto Eugenius, and wholly resist and rebell against vs. This is a maruellous word, and a wonderfull conclusion, altogether vnworthie to be spoken of such a man. The decrees of the councell of Constance are, that all manner of men, of what state or condition soeuer they be, are bound to the ordinances and decrees of the generall councels. But Panormitans words do not tend to that effect, for he would not haue the princes obedient vnto the councell, but the councell to be obedient vnto the princes.

The decrees of the councell of Constance.

Alas, most reuerend fathers, alas, what times and daies, what maners and conditions are these? Into what miserie are we now brought? How shall we at any time bring to passe, that the pope being Christs vicar, and (as they say) another Christ in earth, should be subiect vnto the councell of the christians, if the councell it selfe ought to obey worldly princes? But I pray you look for no such things at the princes hands. Do not beleeue that they will forsake their mother the church. Do not thinke them so farre alienate from the truth, that they would haue iustice suppressed.

If these things seeme so vntollerable, what shall we say, when as they make the pope a God?

The conclusions whereupon the controuersie is, are most true, most holy, most allowable. If the princes do refuse them, they do not resist against vs, but against the holy Scriptures, yea and against Christ himselfe: which you ought neither to beleeue, neither was it comely for Panormitan so to say. Panormitan (by your licence be it spoken) you haue vttered most cruell words, neither do you seeme to go about any other matter, then to inculcate terror and feare into the minds of the fathers: for you haue rehearsed great perils and dangers, except we submit our selues vnto the princes.

They which teach this doctrine, are heretikes and schismatikes: but blessed are those heretikes, for theirs is the kingdome of heauen.

But you most reuerend fathers, shall not be afraid of them which kill the bodie, the soule they cannot kill: neither shall ye forsake the truth, although you should shed your blood for the same. Neither ought we to be any whit more slacke in the quarrell of our mother the church, and the catholike faith, then those most holy martyrs, which haue established the church with their blood. For why should it be any grieuous matter vnto vs to suffer for Christ, which for our sakes hath suffered so cruell and grieuous death? Who when he was an immortall God, void of all passions toke vpon him the shape of a mortall man, and feared not for our redemption to suffer torments vpon the crosse. Set before your eyes the prince of the Apostles, Peter, Paul, Andrew, James, and Bartholomew: (and not to speake only of bishops) Marke what Stephen, Laurence, Sebastian and Fabian did. Some were hanged, some beheaded, some stoned to death, other some burned, and others tormented with most cruell and grieuous torments suffered for Christs sake. I pray you for Gods sake let vs follow the example of these men. If we will be bishops and succeed in honour, let vs not feare martyrdome. Alas what effeminate hearts haue we? Alas what faint hearted people are we? They in times past by the contempt of death, conuerted the whole world, which was full of gentilitie and idolatrie: and we through our sluggishnesse and desire of life, do bring the christian religion out of the whole world into one corner; and I feare greatly, lest the little also which is left, we shall lose through our cowardlinesse: if that by following Panormitans mind, we do commit the whole gouernance and defence of the church vnto the princes. But now plaie the stout and valiant men in this time of tribulation, and feare not to suffer death for the church, which Curtius feared not to do for the citie of Rome: which Mencetheus for Thebes, and Codrus for Athens, willingly toke vpon them.

A christian exhortation to constancie and martyrdome.

This came to passe twentie three yeeres after, when Christendome lost Constantinople, and all the East parts vnto the Turkes.

Examples of good men dying for their countrie.

Not only the martyrs, but also the Gentiles might moue and stir vs to cast off all the feare of death. What is to be said of Theremeus the Athenian? with how ioyfull heart and mind, and pleasant countenance, did he drinke the poison? What say you vnto Socrates that most excellent Philosopher? did he either weepe or sigh, when he supped vp the poison? They hoped for that which we are most certaine of: Not by dying to die, but to change this present life for a better.

Truly we ought to be ashamed, being admonished by so many examples, instructed with so great learning, yea and redeemed with the pretious blood of Christ, so greatly to feare death.

Cato writeth not of one or two men, but of whole legions, which haue chearefully and couragiously gone vnto those places, from whence they knew they should not returne. With like courage did the Lacedemonians giue themselues to death at Thermopylis, of whom Simonides writeth thus:

Dic hospes Spartanos te hic vidisse iacentes,
Dum sanctis patriæ legibus obsequimur.

Report thou stranger, the Spartaines heere to lie,
Whiles that their countrie lawes they obeyed willingly.

The noble Lacedemonians.

Neither iudge the contrarie, but that the Lacedemonians went euen of purpose vnto death: vnto whom their captaine Leonidas said: Ye Lacedemonians, go forward couragiously, for this day we shal sup together with the infernal Gods. But I most reuerend fathers, do not inuite you vnto the infernals as he did his Lacedemonians, but vnto the celestiall and euerlasting ioyes of Paradise, if that you can suffer death for the truths sake, and patiently abide the threatnings of these princes, if there be any threatnings at all. I call you vnto that eternal glorie: where as there is no alteration of state, nothing decayeth or fadeth: where all good and perpetuall things doe abound: where as no man wanteth, no man enuieth another, no man stealeth from another, no man violently taketh from another, no man banisheth, no man murdereth, and finally no man dieth. Where as all men are blessed and happie, all are of one mind and one accord, all are immortall, all are of like estate, and that all men haue, euery man hath, and that euerie man hath, all men haue. Which things if we will consider, we shall truly answere Panormitan, as Theodorus Cyrensis is said to haue answered Lysimachus the king, when he threatned to hang him: who said, I pray you threaten these horrible things vnto your courtiers; as for Theodorus, it maketh no matter whether he rot aboue the ground or vnder the ground. So likewise let vs answere vnto the princes, if there be any that doe threaten vs, and let vs not feare their torments.

The blessed state of the life to come.

The worthie answere of Theodorus Cyrenensis.

What doth a longer life preuaile to helpe vs? No man hath liued too short a time, which hath obtained the perfect gift of vertue. And if the death which a man suffereth in the quarrell of his countrie, seemeth not only to be glorious amongst the Rhetoricians, but also happie and blessed, what shall we say for these deathes which are sustained for the countrie of all countries, the church? Truely, most reuerend fathers, it is too much that our aduersaries do perswade themselues of you, for they iudge you fearefull, sluggish, and faint hearted: and therfore they do obiect princes vnto you, because they thinke that you will not suffer hunger, thirst, exile in the quarrell and defence of the church. But I thinke you will esteeme it no hard matter, for the obtaining of euerlasting life, to do the same which shipmen do for the obtaining of transitorie riches, to put themselues in danger of the sea and wind, and suffer most cruell stormes.

No death to be feared for Christs church.

The hunters lie abroad in the nights in the snow, in the hils and woods, and are tormented with cold: yet haue they none other reward, but some wilde beast of no value or price. I pray you what ought you then to do, whose reward shall be Paradise? I am ashamed of our ignauie, when as I reade that women, yea euen yong maidens haue violently obtained heauen through their martyrdome, and we are made afraid only with the name of death. This riuer of Rheine which runneth along by the citie, in times past hath carried eleuen thousand virgins vnto martyrdome. In India (as Cicero writeth) when anie man was dead, his wiues (for there they had many wiues) came into contention who should be burned with him: and the whom he loued best, hauing vanquished the other, all the rest ioyfully following her, was cast into the fire with the dead carcase of her husband and burnt. The other which were ouercome, departed full of heauinesse and sorrow, wishing rather to haue died then liue.

Example of Mariners and Hunters.

Example of the eleuen thousand virgins.

The which courage we now taking vpon vs for Christs sake, will answere Panormitan euen as the Lacedemonians answered Philip, who when as by his letters he threatned them, that he would stop all that which they went about, they asked him whether he would also let them to die. Therefore as you are excellent men, so vse your vertue, which is alwaies free, and remaineth alwaies inuincible. For you doe know that power is giuen you of the Lord, and strength from the most highest: who will take account of your workes, and examine your thoughts: vnto whom ye should be carefull to render a good account, iudging rightly and keeping the law of righteousnesse, and in all things walking according to the will of God, and not according to the will of men.

And whereas the ambassadours of Eugenius, do openly preach and declare a new doctrine, extolling the bishop of Rome aboue the vniuersall church, to the end that ignorant soules be not snared, ye shall not cease or leaue to publish the three first conclusions, following the example of the Apostle Paul, which would in no point giue place vnto Peter when he walked not according to the Gospell. As for the other matters, which do respect the only person of Eugenius (because Panormitan and the other Ambassadors of the princes, shall not say that we doe passe our bounds) ye shall deferre them for this present.

When as cardinall Arelatensis had made an end of his oration, there was a great noise, crying out and brawling euery where. The Presidents commandements were not regarded, neither was the accustomed order obserued: for sometimes they spake vnto Panormitan, sometime vnto Lodouicus: no man was suffered to speake, but in halke the bishops brawled with bishops, and the inferiours with their fellowes. All was full of contention and debate: which when as Lodouicus the Patriarch of Aquileia perceiued, a man of no lesse courage and stomack, then of nobility and birth, being also a duke, for the zeale which he bare vnto the vniuersall church, turning himselfe vnto Panormitan and Lodouicus the Protonotarie, said: Doe not thinke the matter shall so passe, you know not not yet the manners of the Germaines, for if you go forwards on this fashion, it will not be lawfull for you to depart out of this countrey with whole heads. With which words Panormitan, Ludouicus, and the archbishop of Millaine, being stricken (as it were with lightning from heauen) rose vp and said: Is our libertie thus taken from vs? What meaneth it that the Patriarch doth threaten vs, that our heads should be broken? And turning themselues vnto Iohn earle of Dierstein, which then supplied the protectors place, they demanded of him whether he would defend the councel, and preserue all men in their libertie, or no?

The earle of Dierstein.

The praise of the citizens of Basill.

The citizens also and Senatours, were present to prouide and foresee that no offence should rise, for the cittizens obserued alwaies this order, that they would be present in all affaires, which they supposed would breed dissension, foreseeing specially that no tumults should rise, otherwise then with words. They vsed alwaies such a maruellous foresight and prouidence, that no man vnto this day, could haue any cause against them, to complaine for violating their promise. Wherefore if at any time any cittizens haue deserued wel at the hands of the church, surely this praise is to be giuen vnto the Basilians. These men together with Iohn earle of Dierstein, being present in the assemblie of the fathers, gaue a signe of preseruation of their libertie. The earle (albeit he was moued at the strangenesse of the matter, for he would not haue thought so great contentions could haue risen amongst wise men) answered by his interpreter, that they all should bee of good chære. For the emperours safe-conduct should bee obserued and kept euen to the vttermost: neither should the Patriarch, nor anie other once violate the libertie, or take away the assurance granted by the emperour. Notwithstanding he desired the Patriarch that he would call backe his words againe, and not to speake any more in such sort. But that famous father, being nothing at all moued, or troubled, committed his whole mind vnto Iohn de Bacheilleine, auditor of the chamber, a man both graue and eloquent, to be declared. Who affirmed that the Patriarchs mind was not to threaten anie man, or disturbe the libertie of the councell, but to mone the fathers vnto constancie, that they should be mindfull of the reformation, which they had promised vnto the whole world, and not to say one thing to day, and another to morrow: for if they would so do, it were to be feared, lest the lattie seeing themselues deluded, and despairing of reformation should rise against the clergie.

Therefore he monisheth the fathers to foresee and prouide for the perill, that they should not depart from the councell, nothing being determined or done: and finally he desired pardon, if in his words he had offended either against the councell, Panormitane, or any other man. Whereby he declared it to be true which is commonly said, that humilitie is the sister of nobilitie: both which did verie excellently appeare in this man. Yet for all this, could not the humilitie of the Patriarke stop or stay their noise or cries: for as often as mention was made of reading the Concordatum, great noise and rumours were still made, for to stop the same. Then Amodeus archbishop of Lions, and primate of all France, a man of great reuerence and authoritie, being touched with the zeale of faith, which he saw there to be stopped and suppressed, said: Most reuerend fathers, I haue now a great occasion for to speake: for it is now seuen yeeres or more, that I haue been amongst you, yet haue I neuer seene the matter at that point which it is now at, most like vnto a miracle; for euen presently I doe behold most wonderfull signes of miracles; for it is no small matter that the lame doe walke, the dumbe doe speake, and that poore men preach the Gospell. Whereupon I pray you commeth this sudden change? How happeneth it that those which lie lurking at home, are now suddenlie start vp? Who hath giuen hearing to the deafe, and speech to the dumbe? Who hath taught the poore men to preach the Gospell? I doe see heere a new sort of prelats come in, which vnto this present haue kept silence, and now begin to speake. Is not this like to a miracle? I would to God they came to defend the truth, and not to impugne iustice.

Humilitie sister to nobilitie.

Amodeus archbishop of Lions.

Anno 1438

Bishops that lie at home, haue tongues here to speake for the pope.

But this is more to be maruelled at then any miracle, that I do see the best learned men of all, impugne our conclusions which are most certaine and true: And they which now reproue them, in times past allowed them. You are not ignorant how that Lodouicus the Protonotarie preached these verities at Louaine and at Collen, and brought them from thence, confirmed with the authorities of the Vniuersities. Wherefore albeit that he be now changed, yet is the truth in no point altered. And therefore I desire you and beseech you all, that ye will not giue eare vnto these men, which albeit they are most excellently learned, yet haue they no constancie in them: which doth adorne all other vertues.

Marke how they are turned backe which sometime fauoured the truth and are now become liers and flatterers. Constancie lacked in diuers of this councell.

When he had ended his oration, Lodouicus the Protonotarie rising vp, said: It is most true that I brought those verities, but you doe call them verities of faith, which addition seemeth verie doubtfull vnto me. When he had spoken these words cardinall Arelatensis required that the Concordatum of the twelue men should be read, and many whispered him in the eare, that he should go forward, and not alter his purpose.

Then Panormitan, as soone as the Concordatum began to be read, rising vp with his companions and other Arragons, cried out with a loud voice, saying; You fathers do contemne our requests, you contemne kings and princes, and despise prelats; but take heed lest whilest that ye despise all men, you be not despised of all men: You would conclude, but it is not your part for to conclude. We are the greater part of prelats, we make the coūcell, and it is our part to conclude; and I in the name of all other prelats do conclude, that it is to be deferred and delayed. With this word, there sprang such a noise and rumour in the councell as is accustomed to be in battell with the sound of trumpets and noise of horsemen, when as two armies ioine. Some cursing that which Panormitan went about, othersome allowing the same: So that diuersitie of minds made diuers contentions.

Panormitan speaketh like himselfe.

Then Nicolas Amici, a Diuine of Paris, according vnto his office, said; Panormitan, I appeale from this your conclusion, to the iudgement of the councell heere present, neither do I affirme any thing to be ratified which you haue done, as I am readie to proue, if it shall séeme good. The contrarie part séemed now to be in the better place, for they had alreadie concluded. The other part had neither concluded, neither was it séene how they could conclude amongst so great cries and vproares. Notwithstanding amongst all this troublous noise, Iohn Segouius, a singular Diuine of the Vniuersitie of Salamantine lacked not audience: for the whole councell was desirous for to heare him: wherefore all men as soone as he rose vp kept silence, and he perceiuing that they were desirous to heare him speake, began in this sort.

Nicolas Amici, a Diuine of Paris.

Most reuerend fathers, the zeale and loue of the house of God forceth me now to speake: and I would to God that I had been either blind, this day, not to haue séene those things which haue happened, or that I had been deafe, that I should not haue heard those words, which haue been spoken. Who is it that is so stonie or hard hearted, which can abstaine from teares, when as the authoritie of the church is so spoiled, libertie taken away both from vs and the councell, and that there is no place giuen vnto the veritie? O sweet Iesu, why hast thou forsaken thy spouse? Behold and looke vpon thy people, and helpe vs if our requests are iust.

The oration of Segouius.

We come hither to prouide for the necessitie of the church, we require nothing for our selues, and our desire is only that truth might appeare. We trusted now to haue concluded vpon the verities which were sometimes allowed in the sacred deputations. The Orators of the princes are present, and require the conclusions to be deferred. But we be not vnmindfull of those things which Ambrose wrote vnto Valentinian the emperour in this manner: If we shall intreate vpon the order of the holy Scripture and ancient times past: who is it that will denie but that in case of faith (I say in case of faith) the bishops ought to iudge vpon christian emperours, and not emperours vpon bishops? Neither do we admit their petition but vpon most vrgent causes: Notwithstanding we heard them patiently and willingly, whilest that they did speake, euen so long as they would.

Ambros. ad Valentinianum.

How farre and wherein bishops ought to iudge vpon emperors.

But now if any of our part would speake, by and by he is interrupted, troubled and letted. What honestie is this? what modestie or grauitie? is it lawfull so to do in the councell? Where is the decree of the councell of Tholose now become? (where are our decrées, which do not only prohibit tumults, but also all small bablings and talke?) They say, it is because we contemne them: but they are they, which not only contemne the councell, but also resist the same. The Patriarch spake but one small word against them, and that of no euil intent or purpose, and by and by they complained that their libertie was broken: but they, when as they do enforce the councell, when as they forbid the President to speake, and will not suffer the ordinances to be read, do not iudge that they do any thing contrarie to the libertie of the councell. They say, they are the councell themselues, and yet they intreat the councell. These things do not I vnderstand: for if they be the councell, why do they intreate themselues? If they be not the councell, why do they not suffer the councell for to speake? Why doe they not looke for an answere of him to whom they make their petitions?

He excuseth the Patriarch.

Truly this is too much violence, and certes our patience is also too much, to suffer such excesse euen in the face of the church. But this doth most of all grieue me, and this do I most maruell at, that Panormitan, a man of singular wit and doctrine, did conclude without any discussing or deciding of the deputies, and without the examination of the twelue men, or anie rite or order. The which except mine eyes had beheld and séene, I would scarcely beleeue, if any other man should report it vnto me, of him: Neither do I yet know, whether I may sufficiently credit my selfe, the matter séemeth so horrible: for I doe not sée by what authoritie his conclusion doth stand, except it be by the authoritie of his king, whom he saith will haue it so. But you most reuerend fathers, take heed that ye bring in no such custome: for so it shall come to passe, that in all matters, a fewe froward prelats shall haue one to conclude for them.

He meaneth Panormitan, which did conclude without the examination of twelue men.

And albeit Panormitan hath proued (as hée thinketh) by strong reasons, that the verity ought to be deferred, yet notwithstanding I doe require you most reuerend fathers to follow the example of the Apostle, who (as Arelatensis hath verie well declared) would not giue one houres respite vnto Peter, when he swarued from the truth of the Gospell. The faith is speedily to be relieued and holpen, neither doth any thing sustaine more danger by delaies, then faith doth. For heresies except they be roted out at the first, when they are once growne, are hardly taken away. Wherefore I desire you spéedilie to helpe and aide. Hoise vp your sailes, and launch out your oares. What should we tarrie looking for either the prelats or the princes? You are now in conflict: I onely desire that you would hasten vnto the victorie. Regard not the threatnings of those princes, neither the opprobries of those contumelious persons: for you are blessed, saith the Lord, when as men curse you and persecute you, speaking all euill against you, making lies and slanders vpon you for my sake; reioyce and be glad, for great is your reward in heauen. What is it I pray you that the princes doe so much obiect against vs? Is not our Lord God able to take vs out of the furnace of hote burning fire, and deliuer vs out of the hands of those princes? I beseech you most reuerend fathers and louing brethren, haue no lesse hope in Iesus Christ, then Sidrach, Misach, and Abednago had, which feared not that old king Nabuchodonosor: and let the princes know, that the most high ruleth ouer the kingdoms of men, and giueth them vnto whom he pleaseth. God beholdeth all things from aboue; he is (I say) in the middest amongst vs; wherefore are ye then afraid? Be of good courage, and shew your selues as a strong wall for the church of God: suffer not the faith to perish vnder your hands. The almightie God is present with you. Hée is present that will defend you. Feare not them which séeke onely to kill the bodie. Doe iustice and equitie, and be assured that he will not deliuer you ouer into the hands of the backbiter and slanderer. Againe I say vnto you, shew your selues valiant and stout: Defend your mother the church. And vnto thée, O thou president I say, that thou oughtest rather to please God then man, for if thou depart thence without a finall conclusion, know assuredly that thou shalt render account in the strait iudgement of God. And thus without any more words, hee sate downe in his place.

Paul would giue to Peter no respite when he swarued awrie.

Marke the great constancy and christian zeale of this man.

An exhortation to constancie.

In the meane time, many graue and ancient men had exhorted Panormitan that he should giue ouer his conclusion. The bishop of Burgen was verie instant and earnest with him, that he should make vnitie and concord amongst the fathers, and went about to make an vnitie with al men. But neither the fathers of the councell were determined to depart without a conclusion, neither Panormitan was minded to alter his intent and purpose. All things were disturbed, neither did the prelats sit in their seats, as they were accustomed, but as euery mans affection led him. Some went to the cardinall Arelatensis, some vnto Panormitan and exhorted them, as if they had been princes or rulers of armies. Then Arelatensis knowing the matter to be in danger, and that there was no readie way to make a conclusion, thought to vse some policie, to appease the tumult.

The bishop of Burgen seeketh concord.

How men be readie to heare newes.

Note the godly policie of the cardinall.

The conclusion of the councell.

Most reuerend fathers, said he, we haue receiued newe letters out of France, which declare vnto me miraculous things: that there are incredible newes spring vp there, which if you will giue me willing audience, I will declare vnto you. By this meanes there was a sudden silence throughout the whole councell, and by this maruellous policie he made all men attentiue to heare. When as he saw he had frée libertie to speake, without either fable or historie of any letters sent, he opened the whole order of the matter, and as it is requisit in an Orator, came by little and little to the principall point, saying; that Eugenius his messengers filled all France, preaching a new doctrine, and extolling the authoritie of the bishop of Rome, aboue the generall councels: against whom, except spéedie remedie were found, it would come to passe, that many would giue credit vnto them, and therefore the sacred councell ought of necessitie, to prouide remedie, and of necessitie to conclude vpon the verities which were examined, that thereby the temeritie of the Eugenians might be repressed; which verities, albeit they were eight in number, yet was it not the fathers intent to conclude vpon them all, but only the thrée first: euen as I also (saith he) héere do conclude, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost.

When he had finished his Oration, with a chéerefull and merrie countenance rising vp, he departed. Some of them kissed him, and some of them kissed the skirts of his garments. A great number followed him, and greatly commended his wisdome, that being a French man borne, had that day vanquished the Italians, which were men of great policie. Howbeit this was all mens opinion, that it was done rather by the operation of the holy Ghost, then by the cardinals owne power. The other of the contrarie faction, as men bereft of their minds, hanging downe their heads, departed euery man to his lodging. They went not together, neither saluted one another: so that their countenances declared vnto euery man that they were ouercome. Something more also is reported of Panormitan, that when he came to his lodging, and was gone vnto his chamber, he complained with himselfe vpon his king, which had compelled him to striue against the truth, and put both his soule and good name in danger of losing; and that in the middest of his teares and complaints he fell asléepe, and did eat no meat, vntill late in the euening for verie sorrow for that he had neither ignorantly, neither vnwillingly impugned the truth.

After this there was great consultation amongst the Eugenians, what were best to be done in this matter. Some thought good to depart and leaue the councell; other some thought it méeter to tarrie, and with all indeuour to resist that nothing should further be done against the Eugenians: and this opinion remained amongst them. The next day after, being the fifteenth day of April, the archbishop of Lions and the bishop of Burgen, calling together the prelats into the chapter house of the great church, began many things as touching peace. The bishop of Burgen perswaded that there should be deputations appointed that day, vnto whom the archbishop of Lions should giue power to make an agrément. Vnto whom answere was made, as they thought, very roughly, but as other iudged, gently, but notwithstanding iustly and truly: For, they said there could be no vnitie or concord made, before the aduersaries confessed their fault and asked pardon therefore.

The bishop of Lions and Burgen.

The first answere of the councell.

The day following, the said bishop of Burgen, with the other Lombards and Cathelans, went vnto the Germaines, and from thence vnto the Senate of the citie, speaking much as touching the prohibiting of schismes. The Germaines referred themselues to those things which the deputation should determine. The Senate of the citie (as they were great men of wisdome, which would do nothing without diligent aduice and deliberation) answered, that the matter pertained not vnto them, but vnto the councell: the fathers whereof were most wise men, and were not ignorant what pertained vnto the christian faith; and if there were any danger toward, it should be declared vnto the councell and not to the Senate: For they beléeue that the Elders of the councell, if they were premonished, would foresée that there should no hurt happen: as for the Senate of the citie, it was their duetie only to defend the fathers and to preserue the promise of the citie. With this answere the bishop of Burgen departed.

The answere of them both.

In the meane time the fathers of the councell had drawne out a forme of a decrée vpon the former conclusions, and had approued the same in the sacred deputations. By this time the princes orators were returned from the assemblie at Ments, and holding a councell among themselues, they had determined to let the decrée. The ninth day of May there was a generall conuocation holden, whereunto all men resorted, either part putting forth himselfe vnto the conflict.

The forme of the decree is written and approued.

The princes Ambassadours were called by the bishop of Lubecke and Conrade de Winsperg the protectour, into the quier, and there kept: where as they intreated of a vnitie and by what meanes it might be had, and there they tarried longer then some thought to doe: the which matter gaue occasion to bring things well to passe, beyond all expectation. The only forme of the decrée was appointed to be concluded that day; whereupon, as soone as cardinall Arelatensis perceiued the congregation to be full, and that the twelue men had agreed, and that there was a great expectation with silence, he thought good not to delay it for feare of tumult, but commanded by and by the publike concordances to be read. Wherein this was also contained, that the cardinall Arelatensis might appoint a Session whensoeuer he would. Which being read, he being desired by the promotors, concluded according as the manner and custome is. The ambassadours of princes being yet in the quier, as soone as they vnderstood how the matter passed, being verie much troubled and vexed, they brake off their talke, imputing all things to the bishop of Lubeck, which of purpose had kept them in the quier and protracted the time. Whereupon they entring into the congregation, filled the church full of complaints.

The policie of the cardinall Arelatensis.

First of all, the Orator of Lubecke complained both in his owne name and the name of the protector, as touching the conclusion, and required that the councell would reuoke the same. If that might be granted, he promised to intreat a peace, and to bee a proctour betweene the councell and the ambassadours of the princes. But the archbishop of Turnon said, that it séemed vnto him euery man to haue frée libertie to speake against that law which should be promulgate, vntill the Session, when the canons should be consecrated and receiue their force: when as the bishops in their pontificalibus, after the reading of the decrée in the Session, should answere that it pleased them: otherwise the demand which was made by the promoters in the Session, to be but vaine: and for that the conclusions were not yet allowed in the Session, therefore hée said that he might without rebuke speake somewhat as touching the same; and that it was a great and hard matter, and not to be knit vp in such a short time, and that he had the knowledge thereof but euen now: notwithstanding that hee being an archbishop ought to haue knowne the matter, that at his returne home, he might informe the king and also instruct those which were vnder him. And that hee and his fellowes before any Session should be: would both heare and be heard of others. Neither doth it seeme good vnto him that the Session should be holden, before report were made of those things which the ambassadors of the princes had done at Ments, which would peraduenture be such as might alter and change the minds of the fathers. Then the bishop of Conce ambassadour of the king of Castile, which was also lately returned from Ments, a man of great vnderstanding, but lacking vtterance, grieuously complained that the prelats were contemned. Neither had it been (said he) any great matter if they had been tarried for, which not without great danger and expences, went to Ments, not for their pleasure, but of necessitie. And afterward as it were smiling, he said, how mad am I that would haue the prelats to be tarried for, vntill they returne from Ments, when as they are not tarried for, whilest they came out of the quier of the church: do therefore as ye list. If there rise any offence or mischiefe hereupon, neither are we the ambassadours of Castile to be blamed, neither can any man of right impute any thing to our most noble king.

The bishop of Concen speaketh.

Heere were it long to repeate, with what rebukes and taunts they inueighed against the cardinall Arelatensis: but especially the bishop of Millaine railed most cruelly vpon him, saying ỳ he fostered & maintained a rable of Sophisters and Schoolemasters, and that he had concluded in matters of faith with them: calling him also another Catalin, vnto whom all desperate and naughtie persons had refuge, that he was their prince, and ruled the church with them: and that he would not giue eare vnto the ambassadours of the most noble princes, or to the most famous prelats in this most waightie matter. Albiganensis a bishop and a man of great nobilitie, descended of the emperours blood, albeit he had neuer alienate his mind before from the councell: yet lest he should seeme to dissent from other ambassadours of the princes, made the like complaint as touching the attempt of the prelats. After this it came vnto Panormitan to speake, who as he had a greater vehemencie in speaking, so also he did declare a more angrie stomacke and mind: for in the beginning of his Oration, he seemeth not to goe about according to the precept of Orators, to get the good will of the hearers, but rather their hatred: for he said that our Sauiour shewed foure signes in the Gospell, whereby we should know the good from the reprobate: for he which is of God (saith he) heareth the words of God, but you heare not the words of God, because ye are not of God. And againe, he that doth euill hateth the light. And in another place also, by their fruits you shall know them. And a good tree cannot bring forth euill fruit.

Marke what the truth must suffer.

O marueilous despite and contumelie in a bishop! for if Arelatensis had kept whores or concubines, he would haue praised him: but to maintaine learned me was a great offence.

All which sayings hee wrested against the fathers of the councell, because they would not heare the words of God, that is to say, the words of peace which the ambassadours had spoken, because they fled from the light in the absence of the ambassadours, priuily concluding, and because in their deputation they had not holden and kept the holy day but had concluded thereupon, also because they had the vpper hand in the foresaid conclusion, not by reason, but by deceit. As touching the fruits, he said that the fathers themselues should meditate and consider how that, if their fruits were not good, they also themselues were not good: and that hee did see another councell at hand, where as he feared lest these conclusions should be reuoked, as the fruit of an euill tree: and therefore, they ought not so suddenlie to proceed in so waightie matters: and that he would be yet more fullie heard before the Session, as well in his owne name, because he was an archbishop, as in the name of his prince, which raigned not ouer one kingdome alone but ouer many: Also he said that he heretofore by his words, deeds and writings, hath extolled the authoritie of the councell: and that he feared, lest by these meanes, the authoritie thereof should be subuerted. At the last he required pardon if he had offended the fathers of the councell, for so much as verie sorrow and griefe forced him to speake so.

The fathers of the councell slandered by Panormitan. Foure signes to know the good from the bad.

Looke if it be not spoken of them in the Gospell, where mention is made of the beast which is fallen into the ditch.

What is it that ambition will not do?

The Abbat Virgiliacensis would haue made answere to those things which Panormitan had touched, concerning his deputation: but Arelatensis thought good that all the contrarie part should speake first, amongst whom, last of all Ludouicus the Protonotarie, the Homer of lawyers rose vp. And albeit that he spake vnwillingly, yet when he had begun, he could not refraine his words. And whiles he went about to seeme learned and eloquent, he vtterly forgot to be good. Hee said that the councell ought to take heed, that they intreated no matter of faith, against the prelats, lest any offence should follow, for that some would say it were a matter of no force or effect. For albeit that Christ chose twelue Apostles and seuentie Disciples, notwithstanding in the setting forth of the Creed, onlie the Apostles were present, thereby (as it were) giuing example, that the matters of faith did pertaine onely vnto the Apostles, and so consequently vnto bishops. Neither that they ought hastily to proceed in matters of faith, which ought to be cleerely distinct, for so much as Peter affirmeth the triall of faith to be much more pretious then gold, which is tried by the fire. And if the bishops be contemned, which are called the pillars and keyes of heauen, the faith cannot seeme to be well proued or examined. But at length he confessed, Ludouicus the Protonotarie in labouring to seeme learned, forgot to be good.

The Apostles principally gathered the Creed.

that the inferiours might determine with the bishops, but denied that the least part of the bishops with the most part of the inferiours might determine any thing. From thence he passing to the matter of faith, said, that those verities whereupon question was now had, are articles of faith, if they were verities of faith. And for so much as euerie man should be bound for to beleeue those, therefore he would be better instructed and taught in that matter which he should beleeue as an article of faith. Neither should it be comely for the councell to denie him his request, which according to the rule of the Apostle, ought to bee readie to giue account vnto euerie man which shall require it, touching the faith, which it holdeth.

After euery man had made an end of speaking, the cardinall Arelatensis calling his spirits together, made an Oration, wherein he answered now the one, and now the other. And first of all he commended the desires of the Imperiall ambassadours, which offered to entreate a peace and vnitie; but neither necessitie, nor honestie (he said) would suffer those things which are concluded to be reuoked. He answered also, that the petition of the ambassadours of France is most iust, in that they required to be instructed touching the faith: and that the councell would grant their request, and send vnto them certaine Diuines, which should instruct them at home at their lodgings: but the matter was alreadie concluded, and could no more be brought in question, that the Session was onelie holden, rather to beautifie the matter, then to confirme the same. And as touching that which the bishop of Concen so greatly complaineth of, hee doth not much marueil: for hee could not know the processe of the matter, when hee was absent, who being better instructed, hee supposed would speake no more any such words, for so much as a iust man would require no vniust thing. Also that his protestation had no euill sense or meaning, in that he would not haue it imputed, neither vnto him, neither vnto his king, if any offence should rise vpon the conclusions. Notwithstanding it is not to be feared that any euill should spring of good workes. But vnto the bishop of Millaine he would answere nothing, because he saw him so moued and troubled, for feare of multiplying of more grieuous and hainous words. As for Panormitan hee reserued vnto the last. But vnto Ludouicus the Protonotarie, which desired to be instructed: he said, he willed him to be satisfied with the words which were spoken vnto the bishop of Turnon.

Notwithstanding, he left not this vntouched which Ludouicus had spoken concerning the Apostles Creed. For albeit that in the setting forth of the Creed, the Apostles be only named, yet it doth not follow (saith he) that they only were present at the setting forth thereof. For it happeneth oftentimes that princes are commended and praised as chiefe authors and doers of things, whenas notwithstanding they haue other helpers; as it appeareth in battels, which although they are fought with the force of all the souldiers, yet the victorie thereof is imputed but vnto a few. As in these our daies, they do ascribe all things which the armie doth either fortunately or wisely, vnto Nicolas Picenius, that most valiant captaine, which hath obtained so manie famous victories: albeit that oftentimes other haue been the inuenters of the policie, and workers of the feate. And therefore Ludouicus ought to know and vnderstand, that they are not only articles of faith which are contained in the Creed, but all other determinations made by the councels, as touching the faith. Neither is he ignorant, that there be some articles of the Creed which we now vse in the church, that were not put to by the Apostles, but afterward by generall councels: as that part wherein mention is made of the holy Ghost, which the councell of Lions did adde; in which councell also it is not to be doubted, but that the inferiours did iudge together with the bishops. But for so much as he had sufficiently declared that matter in the congregation before passed, he would stay no longer thereupon. But comming vnto Panormitan, hee rehearsed his words: Qui ex Deo est, verba Dei audit, Hee that is of God, heareth Gods word, which is very well taken out of the Gospell, but not well applied vnto the councell (said he:) for hee firmely beleeued, that his predecessors haue iudged, the holy Ghost to be in the middest of the councels, and therefore the words of the councels to be the words of the holy Ghost: which if any man do reiect, he denieth himselfe to be of God. Neither doth the councell hate the light, which doth all things publikely and openly, whose congregations are euident vnto all men, neither doth it as the conuenticles of the aduersaries, admit some, and exclude other some. Moreouer, the thing which is now in hand, was begun to be intreated of for two monethes ago, and first the conclusions were largely disputed vpon in the Diuinitie schooles, and afterward sent vnto Ments and other places of the world.

Panormitan wounded with his owne dart.

After all this, the fathers were called into the Chapter house of the great church, to the number of an hundred and twenty: amongst whom Panormitan which now complaineth, was also present, and according to his manner, did learnedlie and subtilly dispute, and had libertie to speak what he would. Likewise in the deputations, euery man spake his mind freely, and in the deputation where Panormitan was, the matter was three daies discussed. After this the twelue men did agree vpon it, and the generall congregation did conclude it. Neither hath there been at any time any thing more ripely or exactly handled, both openly, and also without any fraud or deceit. And whereas the deputation did sit vpon a holy day, there is no hurt in that, neither is it any new or strange thing, forasmuch as they haue often holden their Session vpon festiuall daies, when as the matter hath had haste, and specially for that the matter of faith hath no holy daies. And further he said, that he did not conclude craftily and deceitfully, in the congregation, as Panormitan hath reported, but publikely and openlie at the request of the Promoters. Neither hath any man any iust cause to complaine vpon him, for so much as when he was made president, he was sworne that alwaies when three or foure of the deputations did agree, he should conclude thereupon. And for so much as he had alreadie concluded, in diuers causes touching the pope, he saw no cause why he should not conclude in the matter of faith, for that he was a cardinall, and did weare his red hat for this purpose, that he should shed his blood in the defence of the faith. Neither hath he done any thing now against the pope, for that omitting the fiue conclusions touching Eugenius, hee had concluded but onely the generall conclusions: which except he had done, the fathers should haue had iust cause to complaine against him (in that they trusting in his fidelitie and faithfulnesse, had chosen him President) if by him they should now be forsaken in this most necessarie cause of faith. And turning himselfe vnto the people, he desired the fathers to be of good comfort, for so much as hee would neuer forsake them, yea although he should suffer death: for he had giuen his faith and fidelitie vnto the councell, which he would obserue and keepe: neither should any mans flattery or threatnings put him from his purpose: that he would be alwaies readie to do whatsoeuer the councell should command him, and neuer leaue the commandements of the deputies by any meanes vnperformed.

Arelatensis concluded not, but at the request of the promoters.

These foure deputations were foure sorts of chosen men, which did discusse and determine those things which the fathers did conclude vpon. Verily this is no Babylonical cardinall, but of the immaculate spouse Jesus Christ.

He speaketh to the whole counsell.

As touching that Panormitan had extolled the authoritie of the councell, hee said that he was greatly to be thanked. But yet he ought to vnderstand and know the authoritie of the councell to be such, as cannot be augmented or increased by any mans praise or commendation, or be diminished by anie opprobrie or slander. These things thus premised, he commanded the forme of the decree to be read. Then Panormitan and those which tooke his part, would needs haue a certaine protestation to be first read. There was great contention on euerie side. Notwithstanding at the last Arelatensis preuailed, and the forme of the decree was read vnto this word, Decernimus, that is to say, we decree. Then Panormitan rising vp, would not suffer it to be heard any further: And the bishop of Catania cried out saying, that it was vncomely that Arelatensis, with a few other bishops by name, should conclude the matter. The like did also all those which fauoured Panormitan. The cardinall of Terraconia also (which vntill that time had holden his peace) did grieuously rebuke his partakers, that as men being asleepe or in a dreame, they did not reade the protestation, and commanded by and by one of his familiars to reade it. But like as the aduersaries before did perturbe the reading of the concordances, so would not the fathers of the councell now giue place to the reading of the protestation. Which when Albiganensis did consider, he commanded the writing to be brought vnto him, and as he began to speake, suddenly Arelatensis rose vp, with a great number of the fathers to depart: which thing pleased the cardinall of Terraconia and Panormitan verie well, for that they hoped that they alone with their adherents, should remaine in the church. They exhorted Arelatensis to reuoke the conclusion, and to make another.

Euerie man may determine in matters of faith, hauing the Scripture on his part.

Contention in the councell about reading of the protestation.

There was in that congregation in his place George the Protonotarie of Bardarina, sitting somewhat beneath his vncle, the cardinall of Terraconia, a man but yong of age, but graue in wisedome, and noble in humanitie: who as soone as he saw the cardinall Arelatensis rise, hee determined also to depart, and when as his vncle called him, commanding him to tarrie, he said; God forbid father that I should tarrie in your congregation, or do any thing contrarie to the oth which I haue taken. By which words he declared his excellent vertue and nobilitie, and admonished our men which remained, of those things which they had to do. His voice was the voice of the holy Ghost, and words more necessarie, then could bee thought. For if he had not spoken that word, the fathers of the councell had peraduenture departed, and gone their way, and the other remaining in the church, had made another conclusion which they would haue affirmed to haue been of force, because they would say the last conclusion was to be receiued. But many being warned by the words of the Protonotarie, and calling to remembrance the like chance of other councels before, called backe againe the multitude which were departing, and cried vpon the cardinall and the Patriarch to sit downe againe, and that they should not leaue the church void and quiet for their aduersaries. Whereupon suddenly all the whole multitude sate downe, and the gates were shut againe. In the meane time Mattheus Albiganensis a bishop, read the protestation to none else but to himselfe alone, for it could not bee heard for noise: which being ended the Lombardes and the Cathelanes confirmed the protestation. When the cardinall of Terraconia said that he did agree to that dissension, they maruelled at that saying. And when some smiled and laughed at him: What, said he, ye fooles do ye mocke me? do not the ambassadours of my king dissent from you? What do you maruell then if I do say I consent vnto their dissension: And with these words, he and almost all the Aragons, Lombardes and Cathelanes departed, all the other taried still. And albeit it was somewhat late (for it was past two at afternoone) Arelatensis seeing the congregation quiet, commanded the affaires of priuate persons to be read, as the manner is: which being ended, hee commanded also the publike affaires to bee read, and willed the conclusions and the forme of the decree to be read againe. There remained in the congregation, the ambassadours of the empire and of France, talking together of their affaires. Notwithstanding the bishop of Turnon heard mention made of the conclusions, and turning himselfe to the bishop of Lubecke, said: Loe, the matters of faith are now in hand againe, let vs go hence I pray you that we be not an offence vnto others, or that we be not said to dissent from the other ambassadours. To whom the bishop of Lubecke answered: Tarrie father, tarrie heere, are not the conclusions most true? Why are you afraid to be here for the truth? These words were not heard of many, for they spake them softly betweene themselues. Notwithstanding I heard it, for I sitting at their feet, did diligently obserue what they said. Arelatensis, after all things were read, which he thought necessarie, at the request of the deputies concluded, and so making an end, dismissed the congregation. Twice it is declared, with how great difficulty Arelatensis concluded, for so much as neither the matter, nor the forme could be concluded without dissension:* and the conclusions were miraculous, and past all mens hope, but were obtained by the industrie of Arelatensis, or rather by the speciall gift of the holy Ghost.

The affaires of the councell are read.

Eneas Syluius being present collected this. Arelatensis concludeth heere, as he did also before, not without the consent of the deputies according to the order of the councell.

* Eneas, you did not so praise this councell after you were bishop your selfe.

After this, it was determined betweene the Lombardes and Aragons to abstaine from the deputations for a certaine time, which they did not long obserue, notwithstanding the deputations were holden verie quietly for a certaine space, neither was there any thing done worthie of remembrance vntill the fifteenth day of May, during which time, all meanes possible were sought to set a concord betweene the fathers, but it would not be. Then Nicolas Amici promoter of the faith, was called into the congregation, and briefly rehearsed those things which were done the daies before, and declared how that Arelatensis might point a session. Wherefore, for so much as delay in matters of faith was dangerous, he required that a session should be appointed against the morrow after, requiring the cardinall for his dignities sake, in that he was called the principall of the church, and the other bishops, that (as they had promised in their consecration) they would not now shrinke from the church in these waightie affaires, and suffer the faith to be oppressed: but the other inferiours he required vpon their oth which they had taken, to shew themselues faithful and constant herein. Then againe there fell a great contention vpon these words: for Arelatensis, as he was required, did appoint a Session, and exhorted all men to be there present in their robes. The bishop of Lubecke rising vp, made a protestation in his owne name, and also in the name of his protector, that he would not consent, that there should be any Session, if it should in any part derogate from ỹ agreement had at Ments. Gregorius Miles also, his fellow ambassadour, consented to this protestation. When as the proctor of the councell appointed by the emperor, vnderstood himselfe for to be named by the bishop of Lubecke, he maruelled a while what the matter should be. But being certified by an interpreter, he answered that he would in no case consent vnto the protestation of the bishop of Lubecke, and that he did not know any thing of their doings at Ments: also that he was sent by the emperour to the sacred councell, and hath his charge which he doth well remember, and would be obedient thereunto. After whom the bishop of Concense, according to his accustomed manner, made his protestation, and after him also followed Panormitan. Whose words before I will repeat, I desire that no man would maruell that I make mention so often of Panormitan: for it is necessary to declare the matter in order as it was done.

It happened in these matters, euen as it doth in warlike affaires: for as there, such as are most valiant and strong, and doe most worthie feats, obtaine most fame, as in the battell of Troy, Achilles and Hector: so in these spirituall wars and contentions, those which most excel in learning and eloquence, and do more then other, should be most renowned and named: for on the one part Panormitan was prince and captaine; on the other, Arelatensis: but his owne will made not the one captaine, but only necessitie, for it behoued him to obey his prince. Notwithstanding he was not ignorant of the truth and veritie, neither did he resist willingly against it: for I haue seene him oftentimes in his librarie complaine of his prince, that hee followed other mens councell. When as his time came to speake, he said that he did not a little maruell why why the protector of the faith, should require the prelats to haue a session, which was nothing pertaining to his office, and that he ought not to vsurpe the presidents place. And againe, he complained touching the contempt of the prelats, for the matter did presently touch the state of the apostolike see, and for that cause the sée ought to be heard before any Session bee holden. Neither it is to be regarded (said he) that the councell of Constance seemeth to haue decreed, that it should now be spoken of, forsomuch as pope Iohn was not heard at Constance, neither any man else, to speake for the see: by which words he seemed both to contemne and bring in doubt all the decrees of that most great and sacred Synode of Constance: therefore there was a great tumult, and all men cried out with one voice, saying: that the Synode of Constance is holy, and the authoritie thereof ought to be inuiolate. But he being still instant, with a stout and haughtie courage, affirmed, that the matter could not be finished without the ambassadors of the princes, and that the princes ought to be heard in a matter of faith. And againe, that the ambassadours themselues cannot consent, forsomuch as in the Colloquie holden at Ments they had promised during the treatie of peace by them begun, they would receiue and allow nothing that the pope should either doe against the councell, or the councell against the pope: and that he doubted not, but that the three first conclusions declared Eugenius an heretike, insomuch that it was euident, that Eugenius did vehemently resist the two first. And therefore forsomuch as the Session was not yet holden, and that it was lawfull for euery man before that Session to speake what hee will, he desired and required them most instantly, that there might be no Session as yet holden. Vnto whom Arelatensis answered, that it was not to be doubted, but that the promoter of the faith, by his office might call the prelats to determine a matter of faith, and specially forsomuch as the deputation of the faith and the whole councell, had so giuen him in commandement.

As touching the prelats, hee saith, that albeit without all doubt bishops haue chiefe authoritie: yet notwithstanding it is accustomed in councels, not to make any conclusion in the name of the bishops, but in the name of the whole councell: and the vniuersall Church hath decreed certaine lawes in this councell, which should remaine inuiolate. Neither let the bishops thinke the presence of the inferiors grieuous vnto them, whenas oftentimes vnder a bare and torne coat, wisedome lieth hid: and vnder rich vestures and ornaments, follie lurketh. Bishops ought also to be mindfull of the saying of Domitius, which (as Saint Hierome reporteth) said: Why should I esteeme thée as a prince, if thou doest not regard mee as a Senator? For the bishops ought to esteeme priests as priests, if they will haue reuerence done vnto them as bishops. Neither ought the princes to be loked for, to the deciding of this matter, forsomuch as the Church is not congregated in the name of the princes, but in the name of Christ, which hath not receiued his power from princes, but immediatly from God: to the defence whereof, he should perceiue the inferiors to be no lesse encouraged then the bishops, for that hee did well vnderstand and know, that they would not only spend their temporall goods, but also their liues for the defence thereof. As for some bishops, rather then they will lose any part of their temporalities, they will sell the libertie of the Church vnto the princes, and make them iudges and lords ouer the councell. As touching the acts at Ments, hee doth not regard them, forsomuch as (as it is said) they accounted without their host: for hee saith, he doth not vnderstand how this can bee, that they had decreed neither to obay the pope, nor the councell. The one or the other they must needs bee obedient vnto: for there is no third tribunall, whereunto any obedience is due in these matters which concerne the faith and the saluation of soules: And finally, that the church would not suffer, that their affaires and matters of faith should bee determined by the iudgement of princes: for the holy Ghost is not subiect vnto princes, but princes vnto him: and vpon this conclusion hee would not feare, neither the losse of his goods, neither any death or martyrdome. And whereas Panormitane doth now shew himselfe so great a defender of Eugenius, he saith, that hee doth not a little maruell at it, for that in times past, no man hath more published Eugenius his errors then he: by whose speciall labour and counsell, both a decrée monitorie, and also the suspension was admitted and set out against Eugenius: And now, whereupon this sudden change should come: hee saith, that he was vtterly ignorant, forsomuch as neither Eugenius had altered his life, neither could the church continue in such a schisme. Wherefore hee desired Panormitane diligently to consider, whether he spake according to his conscience or not: for (saith he) the conclusions which now shall bee decreed, are most general: neither is there any mention in them of the pope: and moreouer the veritie of faith is contained in them: against the which if Eugenius did contend, it were more meet that the pope should bee corrected, then the veritie omitted. And thus he making an end all were warned to come the next day vnto the Session. The protector also desired the sacred councell, that none should be suffered to bring any weapon to the Session. Forsomuch as he was readie to obserue the safe-conduct of the emperour, and together with the Senate of the citie, to prohibite all quarellers for doing of iniurie.

When the 16. day of May was come, all they whom the Session contented and pleased, assembled at the houre. The ambassadours also of the princes were come together into the quier of the Church, to attempt further what they could doe; and sending the bishop of Lubecke & Concense, and the deane of Turnon, an excellent learned man, they offered themselues to be present at the Session, if that the deposition of Eugenius might yet be deferred foure moneths. Who, when they had receiued a gentle answer of Arelatensis, and the other principals, returning again vnto the ambassadors, they would onely haue the first conclusion decreed, and thereupon sent againe vnto Arelatensis: vnto whom answere was made, that the chiefe force did consist in the two other conclusions, and that the councell would specially determine vpon them. If the ambassadours would not be present, they should vnderstand, that the concord was broken by them, which would not obserue that which they had offered. With which answere they departed, and the Session began to bee celebrate. There was no prelat of the Aragone present at it, neither out of Spaine, and out of Italie, onely the bishop of Gzolletane, and the abbat of Dons, which for their constancie and stedfast good will toward the vniuersall church, could not be changed from their purpose: but of doctors and other inferiors, there were a great number of Aragons, and almost all the inferiors of Spaine and Italie, (for the inferiors feared not the princes, as the bishops did) and then the worthy stoutnesse of the Aragons and Cathelanes appeared in the inferiour sort, which would not shrinke away in the necessitie of the church. Of the two other nations there were onely present twentie bishops. The residue lurked in their lodgings, professing the faith in their hearts, but not in their mouthes. Arelatensis considering afore what would come to passe, caused prayers to be made, and after their prayers made vnto almightie God, with teares and lamentation, that he would send them his holy spirit to aid and assist them, they were greatly comforted and encouraged. This congregation was famous, and albeit that there were not many bishops present, yet all the seats were filled with the bishops proctors, archdeacons, presidents, priors, priests and doctors of both lawes, which I iudged to be about the number of 400. or more: amongst whom there was no noise, no chiding, no opprobrious words or contention, but one exhorted another to the profession of the faith, and there appeared a full and whole consent of them all to defend the Church. The bishop of Mallia a noble man, read the decrée, which was attentiuely harkned vnto, and not one word interrupted. When it was ended, Te Deum laudamus was sung with great ioy and gladnes, and so the session dissolued, which was in number the xxxiij. session, and amongst all the rest the most quiet and peaceable.

The day following, being the xxiij. of May, the princes ambassadors without all mens expectation, came vnto the generall congregation, by that their doing at the least, giuing their assent vnto the Session before passed. In celebrating whereof, if the fathers had erred, it had not been lawfull for the princes and ambassadors, to haue holden the councell with those fathers. But it was thought that they were touched with remorse of conscience, and euen now to detest and abhorre that which they had done: as it was not hidden to the ambassadors of the Empire and France. For the bishop of Lubecke said, that the cause of his absence was, for that hee was appointed by the emperours commandement, to intreat a peace: Wherefore it was not comely for him to be present at any businesse, whereby he should be vexed or troubled, with whom the peace should be intreated. Notwithstanding, he did much commend the Session before holden, and beléeued the decrée therein promulgate to be most good and holy, and the verities therein contained to be vndoubted: and said, that he would sticke thereunto both now and euer, euen to the death. But the bishop of Turnon, a man both learned and eloquent, speaking for him and his fellowes, said, that he heard how that they were euil spoken of amongst some, in that they had not honoured their king in that most sacred session, whom it becommed specially to exalt and defend the faith: which also for that cause aboue all other kings was named most Christian: notwithstanding, he said that they had a lawfull excuse, in that it was conuenient that they, which were sent to intreat peace, should doe nothing whereby their ambassage should be stopped or letted. Also there are two kinds of iniustice (said hee) whereby either things are done that should not bee done, or things that should bee done are not done. The first doth not alwaies bind, because it is conuenient to haue respect of time, place, and person. But the last doth alwaies bind, wherein he said, they were not culpable. But as touching the first point, they might séeme vnto some to haue erred, because they were not present at the session: but yet in this point they had sufficient to answere, forsomuch as if they had been present at that session, they should haue been vnmeet to haue intreated any peace with Eugenius: And therefore albeit they were wanting at so holie a businesse in that point they followed the example of Paul, which albeit he desired to be dissolued, and to be with Christ, yet for the further profit and aduancement of the Church, it was deferred. So likewise wise he said, that they had now done, for that they were not absent because they doubted of the conclusions (which they iudged to be most true and holy, and whereunto they would sticke euen vnto the death) but because they would not be vnmē: for the treatie of peace for which they came: and yet that which they had not done in their owne persons, they had fulfilled (said hee) by their seruants and household, whom altogether they commanded to reuerence that Session. I would that I had been then in the place of some great prelat; surely they should not haue gone vnpunished, which thought to haue plaied bo peepe. For what doth the declaration of the truth hinder the treatie of peace? Or if it doe hurt, why is hee not counted as great an offender, which consenteth to him that declareth the truth, as he which doth declare it? What shall we need any further testimonie? for now the ambassadors of the princes haue declared Eugenius to be an enemie vnto the truth. But to passe ouer these things, it is sufficient that Eugenius wrote afterward vnto the king of France, that hee did vnderstand the bishop of Tournon to become his enemie.

Æneas, you should haue vsed such seueritie when you were pope.

Behold, the princes ambassadours declare Eugenius an enemie vnto the truth.

After that the bishop of Tournon had made an end, cardinall Arelatensis gaue thanks vnto God, which had so defended his Church, and after great stormes and clouds, had sent faire and cleare weather: and commending the good will of the emperour and the king of France toward the Church, he also praised the bishop of Lubeck and Tournon, for that oftentimes in the councell, and also of late at Mentz, they had defended the authoritie of the councell. But speciallie hee commended this their present doings, that they had openly confessed the truth, and had not sequestred themselues from the faith of the Church.

Arelatensis commendeth the ambassadors.

Afterward, he entring into the declaration of the matter, said, that he was at Pysis and at Constance, and neuer saw a more quiet or deuout Session then this; affirming that this decree was most necessarie, to represse the ambition of the bishops of Rome, which exalting themselues aboue the vniuersall Church, thought it lawfull for them to doe all things after their owne pleasure, and that no one man from henceforth should transport the councell from one place to another, as Eugenius attempted to doe, now to Bononia, now to Florentia, then againe to Bononia, after to Ferraria, and after that againe to Florentia; and that hereafter the bishops should withdraw their minds from the carefulnes of temporall goods, (which as hee himselfe did see) had no mind at all on spirituall matters: and therfore by how much this session was most holy and necessarie, by so much more the assent of the ambassadours was most laudable and acceptable to all the fathers. These words thus spoken, hee rose vp, and the congregation was dissolued.

This councell was gathered to take away the ambition of the bishops of Rome, that they should not think they might doe all things according to their owne pleasure: and further to reuoke them from the care of temporall things vnto spirituall things, which now they regarded not.

Now after that Gabriel Condulmarius was deposed from the bishoprick of Rome, the principall fathers of the councell being called together in the chapter-house of the great Church consulted together, whether it were expedient that a new bishop should be created out of hand, or deferred for a time. Such as thought good that the election should bee done with speed, shewed how dangerous a thing it was for such a congregation to be without a head: also what a pestiferous sickenes was in all the citie, which not onely consumed young men and children; but also men of middle age, and old men in like manner; and that this plague came first by strangers vnto the poore of the citie, and so infected the rich, and now was come vnto the fathers of the councell: amplifying moreouer, and encreasing the terror thereof, and making the thing worse then it was, as the manner is. Neither doth the decree (said they) any thing let or hinder, wherein it is prouided that there should be delay of 60. daies after the see is void: for that is to bee vnderstood when as the see is void, at such time as there is no councell holden: neither ought we to tarrie or make any delay, lest the princes being perswaded by Gabriel, should resist: Vnto whom the deposition of Gabriel, and the election of some other, is to be certified all vnder one message. The other which thought good that there should bee a delay said: that the councell did lacke no head, forsomuch as Christ was the head thereof: neither did lacke a ruler, forsomuch as it was gouerned by the presidents and other officers: and that no mention should bee made of any pestilence in such case, seeing that, vnto stout and strong men, death is not to bee feared, neither can any thing daunt or feare them which contend for the christian faith. As for that pestilence which doth now encrease and grow in the citie, forsomuch as iudgement is now giuen, it is to be hoped that it will allwage, which was thought to haue come for the neglecting of iustice. Also that in so doubtfull a matter, they ought rather to vse the princes against their will, then to neglect them: and that it is not to bee feared, but that in this case, God will helpe those that are stout and valiant. The matter being thus discussed amongst them, (albeit that there were as many minds, as there were men) yet it seemed vnto them all, that it was most profitable to chuse the bishop by and by, but most honest to deferre it.

The councell doth deliberate vpon the popes election.

Lx. daies must be delaid after the see is void.

Note the Christian zeale of these mē, which would refuse no danger for Gods cause.

Hereupon John Segouius, a man of excellent learning said: Most reuerend fathers, I am diuerslie drawne by sundrie reasons to this side and that. But as I waigh the matter more deepely in my mind, this is my opinion, that to come to a a speedie election, it seemeth good, to speake after mans iudgement: but to delay it for two moneths, to speake after Gods iudgement, it seemeth much better. I doe iudge that not onelie the words, but also the meaning of our decree, ought to be obserued. Wherefore, if yee will giue any credit vnto me, follow rather dangerous honestie, then secure vtilitie: albeit that indeed, vtilitie cannot be discerned from honestie. This opinion of delay tooke place among the fathers, and they determined to stay for the space of two moneths.

Dangerous honestie preferred before secure vtilitie.

In the meane time, messengers were sent vnto the princes to declare the deposition of Eugenius by the Synode, and publish it abroad.

During this time, the corrupt aire was nothing at all purged, but the mortalitie daily increasing, many died and were sicke. Whereupon a sudden feare came vpon the fathers. Neither were they sufficiently aduised what they might do: for they thought it not to be without danger, either to depart or to tary. Notwithstanding they thought it good to tary, and also they caused other to tarrie: that since they had ouercome famine, and the assaults of their enemies on earth, they would not seeme to shrinke for the persecution of any plague or sickenes. But forsomuch as they could not all be kept there, it was politikly prouided, that the councell should not seeme to be dissolued for any mans departure. And for the more establishment of the matter, there were certaine things read before the fathers, which they called De stabilimento, whose authoritie continued long time after. When as the dog-daies were come, and that all herbs withered with heat, the pestilence daily increased more and more, that it is incredible how many died. It was too horrible to see the corses hourely caried thorough the streets, when on euery side there was weeping, wailing and sighing. There was no house void of mourning: no mirth or laughter in no place, but matrons bewailing their husbands, & the husbands their wiues. Men and women went thorough the streets, and durst not speake one to another. Some tarried at home, and othersome that went abroad, had perfumes to smell vnto to preserue them against the plague.

A great pestilence in Basill.

The common people died without number: and like as in the cold Autumne, the leaues of the trees doe fall; euen so did the youth of the citie consume and fall away. The violence of the disease was such, that ye should haue met a man merry in the street now, and within ten houres heard that hee had been buried. The number of the dead corses was such also that they lacked place to burie them in: insomuch that all the Churchyards were digged vp, and filled with dead corses, and great holes made in the parish churches, where as a great number of corses being thrust in together, they couered them ouer with earth. For which cause the fathers were so afraid, that there appeared no bloud in their faces: and specially the sudden death of Lodouicus the Protonotarie did make all men afraid, who was a strong man, and flourishing in age, and singularly learned in both lawes: whom the same enuious and raging sickenesse tooke away in a few houres. By and by after died Lodouicus the Patriarke of Aquileia, a man of great age, and brought vp alwaies in troubles and aduersity, neither could he see the day of the popes election which he had long wished for: Notwithstanding hee tooke partly a consolation in that hee had seene Gabriel deposed before his death. This mans death was grieuous vnto all the fathers; for now they said that two pillers of the councell were decaied and ouerthrowne, meaning the Protonotary and the Patriark, whereof the one by the law, and the other with his deeds defended the veritie of the councell.

Lodouicus the protonotary died of the plague.

About the same time also died the king of Arragons armer in Switzerland, a man of excellent learning, being bishop of Ebzon. The abbat of Vergilia died at Spyze, and John the bishop of Lubeck, betweene Vienna and Buda.

These two last rehearsed, euen at the point of death, did this thing worthie of remembrance. When as they perceiued the houre of their death approch, calling vnto them certaine graue and wise men, said: All you that be here present, pray to God that hee will conuert such as knowledge Gabriel for high bishop, for in that state they cannot be saued: and professing themselues that they would die in the faith of the councell of Basill, they departed in the Lord. In Boheme also departed the bishop of Constance, which was ambassadour for the councell. There was great feare and trembling throughout all the councell. There had been also in the councell, by a long time, the abbat of Dona, of the diocesse of Cumana, a man poore vnto the world, but rich vnto God, whom neither flatterings nor threatnings could turne away from his good purpose and intent, chusing rather to begge in the truth of the fathers, then to abound in riches with the false flattering aduersaries.

The bishop of Constance died.

The abbat Dona, a true abbat.

Whereupon, after the lords were departed, which gaue him his lining, he remaining still, was stricken with ỳ plague and died. Likewise a great number of the registers and doctors died: and such as fell into that disease, few or none escaped. One amongst all the rest, AEneas Syluius, being stricken with this disease, by Gods helpe escaped. This man lay three daies euen at the point of death, all men being in despaire of him: notwithstanding it pleased God to grant him longer life.

Æneas the author hereof escaped death hardly.

life. When as the pestilence was most feruent and hot, and that daily there died about one hundred, there was great intreatie made vnto cardinall Arelatensis, that hee would goe to some other towne or village neere hand: for these were the words of all his friends and houshold: What doe you most reuerend father? At the least void this wane of the moone, and saue your selfe: who being safe, all we shall also bee safe: if you die, we all perish. If the plague oppresse you, vnto whom shall we flie? Who shall rule vs: or who shall be the guide of this most faithfull flocke? The infection hath already inuaded your chamber. Your secretarie and chamberlaine are already dead. Consider the great danger, and saue both your self and vs. But neither the intreatie of his houshold, neither the corses of those which were dead could moue him, willing rather to preserue the councell with perill of his life, then to saue his life with perill of the councell: for he did know that if he should depart, few would haue tarried behind, and that deceit should haue been wrought in his absence.

The inuincible constancie and fortitude of the cardinall Arelatensis.

Wherefore, like as in warres the souldiers feare no danger, when as they see their captaine in the middest of their enemies: so the fathers of the councell were ashamed to flie from this pestilence, seeing their president to remaine with them in the middest of all dangers. Which their doings did vtterlie subuert the opinion of them, which babled abroad, that the fathers tarried in Basill to seeke their owne profit and commoditie, and not the veritie of the faith: for there is no commoditie vpon the earth which men would change for their liues: for that all such as do serue the world, do preferre before all other things. But these our fathers shewing themselues an inuincible strong wall for the house of God, vanquishing all the craftie deceits which Gabriel vsed, and ouercomming all difficulties, which this most cruell and pestiferous yeere brought vpon them, at the length all desire of life also being set apart, they haue ouercome all dangers, and haue not doubted with most constant minds to defend the veritie of the councell, euen vnto this present.

The time of the decree being passed, after the deposition of Gabriel, it seemed good vnto the fathers, to proceed to the election of another bishop. And first of all they nominated those that together with the cardinals, should elect the pope. The first and principall of the Electors was the cardinall Arelatensis, a man of inuincible constancie, and incomparable wisdome: vnto whose vertue I may iustly ascribe whatsoeuer was done in the councell: for without him, the prelats had not perseuered in their purpose, neither could the shadow of any prince haue so defended them. This man came not to the election by any fauor or denomination, but by his owne proper right. The rest of the Electours were chosen out of the Italian, French, Germaine and Spanish nations, and their cels and chambers appointed to them by lots, without respect of dignitie or person, and as the lots fell, so were they placed: Whereby it chanced a doctor to haue the highest place, and a bishop the last. Wherein the distribution of lots was very strange, or rather a diuine dispensation, reprooving the deuices of man, whereas the prelats had determined to haue the best chambers appointed for themselues, and had earnestlie contended before to haue their chambers appointed according to their dignitie.

The commendation of Arelatensis.

The councell of Marcus.

The next day after, there was a Session holden, wherein Marcus a famous diuine, made an Oration vnto the Electors, wherein he reckoned vp the manifold crimes of Gabriel, which was deposed. He endeuoured to perswade the Electors to chuse such a man, which should in all points bee contrarie vnto Gabriel, and eschew all his vices: that as hee, through his manifold reproches, was hurtfull vnto all men: so he which should bee chosen, should shew himselfe acceptable vnto all men, through iustice: and as Gabriel was couetous and full of rapine, so this man should shew himselfe continent.

There was so great a number of people gathered together to behold this matter, that neither in the Church, neither in the streets, any man could passe. There was present John earle of Dierstein, who supplied the place of the emperours protector: also the Senators of the citie, with many other noble men, to behold the same, whereof you shall heare (Christ willing) more largely hereafter. The citizens were without in armor, to prohibit that there should be no vprore made. The Electors receiued the communion together, and afterwards they receiued their oth: and the Cardinall Arelatensis opening the booke of decrees, read the forme of the oth in the audience of all men, and first of all, he taking the oth himselfe, began in this manner.

The godly oth of Arelatensis.

Most reuerend fathers, I promise, sweare and vow, before my Lord Iesus Christ (whose most blessed bodie I vnworthie sinner haue receiued: vnto whom in the last iudgement I shall giue account of all my deeds) that in this businesse of election, whereunto now by the will of the councell wee are sent; I will seeke nothing else, then the only saluation of the Christian people, and the profit of the vniuersall Church. This shall be my whole care and studie, that the authoritie of the generall councels be not contemned, that the catholike faith bee not impugned, and that the fathers which remaine in the councell, bee not oppressed. This will I seeke for: this shall bee my care: vnto this, with all my whole force and power, will I bend my selfe: neither will I respect any thing in this point, either for mine owne cause, or for any friend, but only God, and the profit of the Church. With this mind and intent, and with this heart will I take mine oth before the councell.

His words were liuely and fearefull. After him all the other Electors in their order, did sweare and take their oth. Then they went with great solemnitie vnto the Conclaue: where they remained seuen daies. The manner of their election was in this sort. Before the cardinals seat was set a deske, whereupon there stood a basen of siluer: into the which basen all the Electors did cast their schedules: which the cardinall receiuing, read one by one, and foure other of the Electors wrote as hee read them.

The other electors take their oth.

The tenor of the Schedules was in this maner: I George, bishop of Vicene do chuse such a man, or such a man, for bishop of Rome, and peraduenture named one or two: euery one of the Electors subscribeed his name vnto the Schedule, that he might thereby know his owne, and say nay, if it were contrarie to that which was spoken: whereby all deceit was vtterly excluded. The first scrutinie thus ended, it was found that there were many named to the papacie: yet none had sufficient voices, for that day there were xvii. of diuers nations nominate. Notwithstanding, Amedeus duke of Sauoy, a man of singular vertue, surmounted them all: for in the first scrutinie he had the voice of xvi. Electors, which iudged him worthie to gouerne the Church.

A scrutinie is a priuie election by voices.

Amedeus duke of Sauoy.

After this, there was diligent inquisition had in the councell touching those which were named of the electors, and as euery mans opinion serued him, he did either praise or discommend those which were nominate. Notwithstanding there was such report made of Amedeus, that in the next scrutinie, which was holden in the Nones of Nouember, the said Amedeus had 21. voices, and likewise in the 3. and 4. scrutinie 21. voices. And forsomuch as there was none found in all the scrutinie to haue 2. parts, all the other schedules were burnt. And forsomuch as there lacked but onelie one voice to the election of the high bishop, they fell vnto prayer, desiring God that he would vouchsafe to direct their minds to an vnitie and concord, worthily to elect and chuse him which should take the charge ouer the flocke of God. Forsomuch as Amedeus seemed to be neerer vnto the papacie then all other, there was great communication had amongst them touching his life and disposition. Some said that a lay man ought not so suddenlie to be chosen: for it would seeme a strange thing for a secular prince to be called vnto the bishoprike of Rome: which would also too much derogate from the ecclesiasticall state, as though there were none therein meet or worthie for that dignitie. Other some said, that a man which was married and had children, was vnmeet for such a charge. Other some againe affirmed, that the bishop of Rome ought to be a doctor of law, and an excellent learned man.

Prayer for vnitie and concord.

When these words were spoken, other some rising vp, spake farre otherwise; that albeit Amedeus was no doctor, yet was he learned and wise, forsomuch as all his whole youth he had bestowed in learning and studie, and had sought not the name, but euen the ground of learning. Then said another: If ye be desirous to be instructed further of this princes life, I pray you giue eare vnto me, which doe know him throughly. Truelie this man from his youth vpward, and euen from his young and tender yeeres, hath liued more religiouslie then secularly, being alwaies obedient to his parents and maisters, and being alwaies indued with the feare of God, neuer giuen to any banitie or wantonnesse: neither hath there at any time been any child of the house of Sauoy, in whom hath appeared greater wit or towardnesse; whereby all those which did behold and know this man, iudged and foresaw some great matter in him: neither were they deceiued. For if yee desire to know his rule and gouernance, what and how noble it hath been: First know yee this, that this man hath raigned since his fathers decease, about fortie yeeres.

Let lying Bagius be ashamed of his false inuectiue against Amedeus.

During whose time, iustice, the ladie and queene of all other vertues, hath alwaies flourished: For he hearing his subiects himself, would neuer suffer the poore to be oppressed, or the weake to be deceiued. He was the defender of the fatherlesse, the aduocate of the widowes, and protector of the poore. There was no rapine or robberie in all his territorie. The poore and rich liued all vnder one law, neither was he burthenous to his subiects, or importune against strangers throughout all his Countrie: there were no grieuous exactions of money throughout all his dominion. He thought himselfe rich enough, if his inhabitants of his dominions did abound and were rich; knowing that it was the point of a good shepheard to sheare his sheepe, and not to deuoure them. In this also was his chiefe studie and care, that his subiects might liue in peace, and such as bordered vpon him might haue no occasion of grudge.

By which policies he did not onely quietly gouerne his fathers dominion, but also augmented the same by others, which willingly submitted themselues vnto him. Yee neuer made warre vpon any, but resisting against such as made warre vpon him, hee studied rather to make peace, then to seeke any reuenge, desiring rather to ouercome his enemies with benefits, then with the sword. He married onely one wife, which was a noble virgin, and of singular beautie and chastitie. He would haue all his family to keep their hands and eies chast, and continent, and throughout all his house, honestie and integritie of manners was obserued. When as his wife had changed her life, and that he perceiued his duchie to be established, and that it should come without any controuersie vnto his posteritie, he declared his mind, which was alwaies religious, and dedicate vnto God, and shewed what will and affection hee had long borne in his heart. For hee contemning the pompe and state of this world, calling vnto him his deare friends, departed and went into a wildernesse: where as building a goodly abbey he addicted himselfe wholly to the seruice of God, and taking his crosse vpon him, followed Christ. In which place hee being conuersant by the space of many yeeres, shewed forth great examples of holinesse, wearing no other garments then such as could withstand the cold, neither vsing any kind of daintie fare, but only to resist hunger, watching and praying the most part of the night. Wherefore this prince is not newly come vnto the Church (as some doe suppose) but being a Christian borne of progenitours, a thousand yeeres and more being Christians, doth now serue God in a monastery.

Commendation of Amedeus pope elect.

But as touching that also which is spoken concerning a wife, I doe not regard it: whenas not onlie hee which hath had a wife, but hee also which hath a wife may bee elect and chosen pope. For why doe the doctors dispute, whether a married man chosen pope, ought to performe his duties toward his wife, but only because a married man might be receiued and chosen? For as you know well enough, there were many popes that had wiues: and Peter also was not without a wife. But what doe we stand about this? for peraduenture it had been better that more priests had been married, for many should be saued through mariage, which are now damned through their single life. But hereof we will (saith he) speake in another place. But this seemeth vnto me, rather to be laughed at, then worthy any answer, which is obiected touching his children: for what can children (speciallie being of great age) be impediment or let vnto the father, being a bishop? Doth not the Scripture say, Woe be vnto him that is alone, for if he fall, he hath none to helpe him vp againe? This cannot be imputed vnto the prince, for he hath two sonnes, both comelie and wise. Whereof the one is prince of Piemont, the other earle of the Gebennians: these men will rule the countrie of Sauoy in the absence of their father, and will helpe him, if he haue need, for they haue alreadie learned to rule ouer that people. I pray you what hurt is it for a bishop of Rome, to haue valiant children, which may helpe their father against tyrants? O most reuerend fathers, the more I doe behold the storme of this most peruerse and froward time, the more I doe consider the vexations and troubles which the Church is now tormented withall; I doe so much the more thinke it profitable, yea and necessarie, that this man should bee chosen prince and head: I will thinke that God hath shewed his mercie vpon vs, if I may see him haue the gouernance ouer this boat. I pray you consider into what straits wee are now driuen, with what perils wee are now vexed and tossed. What prince is it that is obedient vnto this councell? For some will not confesse that the councell is here, neither receiue our decrees: other some confesse it in their words, but by their deeds they declare it to be at Florence. For albeit that by their words and letters, they doe not denie that the Church is here, yet doe they procure promotions at the hands of Gabriel, which is deposed. This is the state of the Church: with these stormes and tempests the ship is shaken and bruised: wicked children haue risen vp against their mother, which being vnmindfull of their mothers labours and kindnesse toward them, despise her, contemne her, and beat her. What is to bee done herein? Shall we chuse a bare man, which shall rather be derided of our princes, then had in reuerence? The daies are not now, that men haue respect onely vnto vertue: for (as the Satyricall poet writeth) vertue is praised, but is coldly followed. A poore man speaketh, and they aske what he is? Truly vertue is good: but for our purpose, it must bee marked and loked vpon, whether it bee in a rich man, or a poore man: you must chuse a gouernor which may rule the ship not onely by counsell, but by power also. The wind is great: Wherefore except the counsell be good, and the power strong, the ship shall be broken, and all put in danger. The memoriall is yet fresh before our eies, that the princes do neglect the authoritie which is of no force or power. Is there not great valiantnesse shewed in this point, in that you fearing no perill or danger, either of life or goods, haue so long contended for the truth of Christ? But the most mightie and high God loketh downe from on high, and will resist this their pride. I haue often consented vnto their opinion, which said it was expedient, that the temporall dominions should bee diuided from the Ecclesiasticall state: for I did thinke that the priests should thereby be made more apt to the diuine ministerie, and the secular princes more obedient to the clergie: But forsomuch as at this present, the Churches of the world are possessed, partly by Eugenius, and partly by other tyrants, we must prouide that we chuse such a one, which may recouer againe the patrimonie of the Church, and in whom the office of Christs vicar may not bee contemned: through the shield of whose power, their contumacie may be suppressed, which contemne both veritie and reason. Whereunto no man seemeth vnto me more apt or meet, then Amadeus duke of Sauoy, which holdeth the one part of his possessions in Italie, and the other in France: Vnto whom all Christian princes are allied either by consanguinitie, or ioyned by amitie and friendship, and whose vertue, how famous it is, I haue alreadie declared. Why doe we then stay or doubt to chuse him? then whom Gabriel seareth no man more. Let him therefore perish with the sword wherewithall he hath stricken. There is no man which can more pacifie the Church then he. Doe you require deuotion in a bishop? there is no man more deuout then he. Doe you require prudence? Now ye vnderstand by his former life, what manner of man he is. If yee seeke for iustice, his people are a witnes thereof: so that whether you seeke for vertue or power, al are here present before you. Whereupon doe yee stay? Goe to I pray you: chuse this man. He will augment the faith, hee will reforme manners, and preserue the authoritie of the Church. Haue ye not heard these troubles of the Church to haue been afore spoken of, and that the time now present should be an end of all troubles? Haue ye not heard that about this time, there should a pope be chosen, which should comfort Sion, and set all things in peace? And who I pray you should he bee that could fulfill these things, except we chuse this man? Beleeue me, these sayings must be fulfilled, and I trust that God will moue your minds thereunto. Notwithstanding, doe what soeuer yee shall thinke most good and holy.

To haue a wife is no let for a good man to be elected pope. Popes haue been maried. Reade the fifth epistle of Ignatius, and you shall see that the Apostles had wiues; and Baptista Mantuanus maketh mention how that Hilarius bishop of Pictania had a wife.

Eccles. 4.

When he had spoken these words, the greatest number of the Electors seemed to consent vnto him, and his words tooke such effect, that in the next Scrutiny, the matter was finished and ended, and when the Scrutinie was opened, it was found that Amedeus, the most deuout duke of Sauoy, according to the decree of the councell, was chosen pope. Wherefore suddenlie there was great ioy and gladnesse amongst them, and all men highly commended their doings. Then the cardinall Arelatensis published vnto them the name of the elect bishop. After this, all the prelats in their robes, pontificalibus, and miters, and all the clergie of the citie comming vnto the conclaue, the electors being likewise adorned, they brought them vnto the great Church, where as after great thanks giuen vnto God, and the election againe declared vnto the people, a Hymne being sung for ioy, the congregation was dissolued.

Amedeus duke of Sauoy chosen pope.

This Amedeus aforesaid, was a man of reuerent age, of comelie stature, of graue and discreet behauiour: also before married. Who thus being elect for pope about Nouember, was called Felix the fifth, and was crowned in the citie of Basill, in the month of July. There were present at his coronation Lewes duke of Sauoy: Philip earle Gebenens. Lewes marques of Salutze: The marques of Rotelen: Conrade of Winsperghey, chamberlaine of the Empire: The earle of Dierstein: The ambassadors of the cities of Strasbrough, Berne, Friburge, Solatorne, with a great multitude of other beside, to the view of 50000. persons. At this coronation, the popes two sons did serue and minister to their father. Lewes cardinall of Hostia did set on his head the pontificall diadem, which was esteemed at 30. thousand crownes. It were long here to recite the whole order and solemnitie of the procession, or the popes riding about the citie. First proceeded the pope vnder his Canabie of cloth of gold, hauing on his head a triple crowne, and blessing the people as he went. By him went the marques of Rotelen, and Conrade of Winsperge, leading his horse by the bridle. The procession finished, they went to dinner, which lasted foure full houres, being excellently sumptuous: where the popes two sonnes were butlers to his cup: The Marques of Salutze was the steward, &c.

Of this Fœlix, thus writeth Volaterane in his third book, that he being desired of certaine of the ambassadors, if he had any dogs or hounds to shew them: he willed them the next day to repaire vnto him, & he would shew vnto them such as he had. When the ambassadours according to the appointment were come, hee sheweth vnto them a great number of poore people and beggers sitting at his tables at meat, declaring, that those were his hounds, which he euery day vsed to feed: hunting with them (hee trusted) for the glorie of heauen to come.

And thus you haue heard the state of this councell hitherto, which councell endured a long season, the space of seuentéene yeeres.

About the sixth yeere of the councell, Sigismund the emperour died, leauing but one daughter to succeed him in his kingdomes: whom he had maried to Albert the second duke of Austrich, which first succeeded in the kingdome of Hungarie and Boheme, being a sore aduersary to the Bohemians: and afterward was made Emperour, an. 1438. and raigned Emperour but two yeeres, leauing his wife which was Sigismund his daughter, great with child. After which Albert, succeeded his brother Fredericke the third duke of Austrich, in the empire, &c. whereof more (Christ willing) hereafter.

The plague at Basill in the time of the councell.

of Basill, through the disposition of God, and the worthinesse of cardinall Arelatensis, constantly endured. Albeit in the said councell were many stops and practises to impeach the same, beside the sore plague of pestilence which fell in the citie, during the said councell. In the which plague time, besides the death of many worthie men, AEneas Syluius also himselfe, the writer and compiler of the whole historie of that councell sitting at the feet of the bishops of Turnon, and of Lubecke, lay sicke three daies of the same sore, as is aboue touched, and neuer thought to escape. They that died, departed with this exhortation, desiring men to pray to God, that he would conuert the hearts of them that stucke to Eugenius as pope, against that councel, as partly is afore noted, and now repeated again for the better marking. Arelatensis being most instantly exhorted by his friends to flie that danger, could by no means be intreated to auoid, fearing more the danger of the Church, then of his owne life.

Aeneas Syluius sicke of the plague in Basill.

The constant zeale of Arelatensis to the truth.

Beside these so great difficulties and obstacles to stay and hinder this councell, strange it was to behold the mutation of mens minds. Of whom such as first seemed to fauour the councell, after did impugne it: and such as before were against it, in the end shewed themselues most friends vnto the same. The chiefe cardinals and prelats, the more they had to lose, the sooner they slipt away, or else lurked in houses or townes neere, and absented themselues for feare: so that the stay of the councell most rested vpon their proctors, doctors, archdeacons, deanes, prouostes, priors, and such other of the inferiour sort. Whereof Aeneas Syluius in his 183. epistle, maketh this relation, where one Caspar Schlicke the Emperours chancellor writeth to cardinall Julian in these words: Those cardinals (saith he) which so long time magnified so highly the authority of the Church, and of generall councels, seeming, as though they were readie to spend their liues for the same, now at the sight of one letter from their king (wherein yet no death was threatned, but onely losse of their promotions) slipt away from Basill. And in the same epistle deridingly commendeth them, as wise men, that had rather lose their faith then their flocke. Albeit (saith he) they departed not farre away, but remained about Solotorne, waiting for other commandements from their prince. Whereby it may appeare, how they did shrinke away not willingly: but the Burle (quoth hee) bindeth faster, then true honour.

Moreouer in one of the sessions of the said councell, the worthie cardinall Arelatensis is said thus to haue reported, that Christ was sold for thirtie pence: but I (said he) was sold much more deare. For Gabriel, otherwise called Eugenius pope, offered three score thousand crowns, who so would take me, and present me vnto him. And they that toke the said cardinall, afterward excused their fact by another colour, pretending the cause, for that the cardinals brother, what time the Armiakes walked Alsatia, had brought great damage to the inhabitants there, and therefore they thought (said they) that they might lawfully lay hands vpon a Frenchman, whersoeuer they might take him. At length by the bishop of Strasbrough, Rupert, and the said citie, the matter was taken vp, and he rescued. And thus farre hauing proceeded in the matters of this forsaid councell, vntill the election of Amedeus, called pope Felix the fifth, before we prosecute the rest, that remaineth thereof to be spoken, the order and course of times requireth to intermix withall the residue pertaining to the matters concluded betweene this councell and the Bohemians, declaring the whole circumstances of ỹ ambassage, their articles, disputations, and answers, which they had first in the said councel, then in their owne countrie with the councels ambassadours: also with their petitions and answers vnto the same.

The storie of the Bohemians prosecuted.

Touching the storie of the Bohemians, how they being sent for, came vp to the councell of Basill, and how they appeared, and what was there concluded and agreed, partly before hath been expressed, pag. 604. Now as leisure serueth from other matters, to returne againe vnto the same, it remaineth to prosecute the rest that lacketh, so farre as both breuitie may be obserued, and yet the Reader not defrauded of such things, principally worthie in the same to be noted and knowne.

The Bohemians then (as is before declared) hauing alwaies the vpper hand, albeit they were accused by the new bishop Eugenius, yet it was thought good that they should be called vnto Basill, where as the councell was appointed. Whereupon cardinall Julian sent thither before, John Pullmair doctour of the law, and John de Ragusio, a diuine. Who comming vnto Basill in the moneth of August, anno 1431. called by their letters vnto the councell, John, abbat of Mulbrun, and John Gelhusius, monke of the same cloyster: which men for dexteritie of their wit, and experience and knowledge of countries, were very meet and necessarie for ambassages.

Within a few daies after, Julianus also came thither, as he had promised, and immediately sent out John Gelhusius, and Hamman Offenbourg, a Senatour of Basill, first vnto the emperour Sigismund being at Feldkirch, and afterward vnto Fredericke duke of Austrich, for the appeasing of the warres betweene him and Philip, duke of Burgonie. This done, to the intent that peace being had, not onely the ecclesiasticall prelats, but also the merchants might haue safe accesse vnto Basill, and so bring in all things necessarie for sustentation.

They going on this ambassage, receiued letters from the Synode to be deliuered vnto the emperour Sigismund, whereby the Bohemians and Morauians, were called vnto the councell. These letters he by and by, caused to be carried vnto Boheme. But for so much as he himselfe went into Italie, to receiue the Imperiall crowne of the bishop, hee left William duke of Bauaria, as his deputie, to bee protectour vnto the councell. Furthermore, when as the Synode vnderstood that our men would take a peace with the Bohemians, after their most shamefull flight, they sent John Niderius a diuine, and John Gelhusius, to comfort the people which ioyned vpon Boheme, and earnestlie to mone the Morauians and Bohemians, which were before called, to come vnto the councell.

The Bohemians inuited to come to the councell.

They departing from Basill about the end of October, took their iournie toward Monacum, a towne of Bauaria: where, after they had saluted William duke of Bauaria and his brother Ernestus, and Albert the sonne of Ernestus, and had declared the commission of their ambassage, and had shewed vnto duke William, how that assone as he should come vnto Basill, the protection of the councell should bee committed vnto him by the emperour: they exhorted Fredericke, marques of Brandenberg, and John duke of Bauaria, the Senate of Noremberge, and other princes and lords, partly by letters from the councell, and partly by words of mouth, that they should by no meanes take any truce with the Bohemians, for that it might be hurtfull vnto the Church, and said they should haue aid out of hand. They desired them also in the name of the councell, that if the Bohemians would send their ambassadors vnto Basill, they would guide them, euery man through his countrie in safetie: which they promised to doe. It is incredible how all men reioyced, that the Bohemians were sent for.

After this, when as they counselled with the Senat of Noremberg, touching the sending of the councels letters vnto Boheme, it seemed best, first of all to inquire of the rulers of Egra, whether the Bohemians had made any answere to the former letters of the councell which they had sent. The rulers of Egra being aduertised by these letters, sent him which caried the councels letters into Boheme, vnto Noremberg. Hee reported how reuerently the councel of the greater citie of Prage receiued the letters, and how he was rewarded.

Wherupon they conceiued great hope of the good successe of the ambassage. Therefore the ambassadours vsing the councell of the Senat of Noremberge, and diuers others, sent the messenger backe againe vnto Egra, with their owne priuat letters, and with letters of the councell: for there was no better meane to send the letters vnto Boheme. Much trauell was taken by them of Egra, Fredericke marquesse of Brandenberge, and John duke of Bauaria, in this matter, for that they were very desirous that peace might bee had amongst all Christians. The copie of those letters, whereby the Synode did call the Bohemians vnto the councell, and other letters exhortatory of the ambassadours, and the Bohemians answere vnto the same; for breuities cause wee haue here pretermitted. The Bohemians not in all points trusting vnto the ambassadours, required by their letters, that the councels ambassadours with the other princes, would come vnto Egra, where as their ambassadours should also be present, to intreat vpon the safe conduct and other matters.

The Bohemians laboured to come to the councell.

The day was appointed for the meeting, the sunday after Easter, which was the twentie seuen day of April. Then came the ambassadours of the councell vnto Egra, with the noble princes, Fredericke Marquesse of Brandenberge, and John duke of Bauaria, with other nobles, almost to the number of 252. horse. But none of the Bohemians were present, because the inhabitants of Pilsana, and the lord Swamberg ius had not sent their safe conduct. When they vnderstood this by their letters, they brought to passe that the ambassadours of the Bohemians, Nicolaus Humpeltzius, secretary of the greater citie of Prage, and Matthew Clumpezane, president of Pielsa, should be brought forth by them of Egra, and the Elenbogenses, and so they came vnto Egra with nineteene horse, the eighth day of May. The next day after, Henry Tocqye receiued the Bohemian ambassadours before the marquesse, with an eloquent oration, taking this part of the Gospell for his Theame, Pax vobis. i. Peace bee with you. Then they propounded what great iniuries they had hitherto receiued at their hands, which was the cause of so many great slaughters on either partie, and that they were glad that yet now at the length there was some hope that they should bee heard.

After

The Bohemians require pledges.

After this, they conferred as touching the safe-conduct. The Bohemians required pledges, and that not of the common sort, but princes and nobles. Which thing, forsomuch as it did not content the ambassadors, and that the matter should so be put off, the common people of Egra began to crie out that it was long of the ecclesiasticall princes, that a concord was not made with the Bohemians: Then Fredericke marquesse of Brandenberge, and John duke of Bauaria, bound themselues of their owne good will. The like also did William duke of Bauaria, at the request of the councell. Likewise also did the councell and the emperour Sigismund. Furthermore promise was made, that all the princes and cities, should doe the like, thorough whose dominion they should come, and the citie of Basill also. The copie of which safe-conduct was afterward sent vnto Prage. This also was required by the Bohemians, that if it were possible, the emperour should be present at the councell.

The Bohemians require the emperour to be present at the councell.

This conuention at Egra continued xvj. daies. But the Bohemians, albeit they heard the councels ambassadors make great promises, yet did they not fully giue credit vnto them. Whereupon they chose out two ambassadors, Nicolas Humgolizius, and John Zaczenses, which should goe to Basill, and diligently enquire out all things. These men, Conrade bishop of Ratisbone, and Conrade Seglauer Deane of Ettein brought vnto Cattelspurge, where as the marques dwelt, being sent out by the Synode a little before, to enquire whether the Bohemian ambassadors would come or not. When they were come to Biberacke, one being ouercurious inquired of one of the Bohemian ambassadours, of what countrie he was. He answered that he was a Zaczen. There (said he) are most execrable heretickes and naughtie men, &c. Who for that slanderous word, as a breaker of the truce, was straightway caried to prison, and there should haue suffered more punishment, if the Bohemian ambassadors, and the abbat of Ebera, had not intreated for him. When they came vnto Basill, they were honorablie receiued with wine and fish. They tarried there fiue daies and a halfe. The tenth day of October, they came vnto the Synode, which was assembled at the Friers Augustines.

These ambassadors when as they were returned home with the charter of the Synode, and declared those things which they had seene, and that the matter was earnestly handled without fraud or deceit; there were ambassadors chosen to be sent vnto the councell, both for the kingdome of Boheme, and the marquesdome of Morauia, which comming vnto Tusca, were brought from thence, with xxxij. horse, and diuers noble men, vnto Chambia. From thence they came to Swenkendorph, and so vnto Noremberge, where as beside their entertainement of wine and fish, xxij. horsemen accompanied them vnto Ulmes: from thence they of Ulmes brought them vnto Biberacke, and Sulgotia: there James Tunches a knight receiuing them, brought them to Stockacum, and from thence the bands of the duke of Bauaria, brought them vnto Schafhuse. There they taking ship the fourth day of Januarie, came vnto Basill the ninth day of the same moneth. What were the names of these ambassadors of the Bohemians, which were brought vp with three hundred horse, and how they were receiued at Basill, mention is made before, pag. 604. When as they came vnto the Synode, cardinall Julian made an Oration, that whatsoeuer was in any place in doubt, the same ought to be determined by the authoritie of the councell, forsomuch as all men are bound to submit themselues to the iudgement of the holy Church, which the generall councell doth represent. Which oration was not allowed of all the Bohemians.

Then Rochezanus made an Oration, requiring to haue a day appointed when they should be heard, which was appointed the xvj. day of the same moneth. Upon which day, John Rochezanus hauing made his preface, began to propound the first article, touching the communion to bee ministred vnder both kinds, and disputed vpon the same by the space of three daies alwaies before noone. Then Wencellaus the Thaborite disputed vpon the second article, touching the correction and punishing of sinne, by the space of two daies. After whom Aldaricus priest of the Orphanes propounded and disputed vpon the third article by the space of two daies, touching the free preaching of the word of God.

The second article of the Bohemians by the second ambassadour.

The third article of the Bohemians by the third ambassadour.

The fourth article of the Bohemians by the fourth ambassadour.

Last of all, Peter Paine, an Englishman, disputed three daies vpon the fourth article, touching the ciuill dominion of the clergie, and afterward gaue copies of their disputations in writing vnto the councell, with heartie thanks that they were heard. The three last did somwhat inueigh against y councell, commending John Hus and John Wickliffe for their doctrine. Whereupon John de Ragusio a diuine, rising vp, desired that he might haue leaue to answer in his owne name, to the first article of the Bohemians. The councell consented thereunto: so that by the space of viij. daies in the forenoone, he disputed thereupon. But before he began to answere, John the abbat of Sistertia made an oration vnto the Bohemians, that they should submit themselues to the determination of the holy Church, which this councell doth represent. This matter did not a little offend the Bohemians. John Ragusinus a diuine, after schollers fashion, in his answer spake often of heresies and of heretickes. Procopius could not suffer it, but rising vp with an angrie stomach, complained openly to the councell of this iniurie. This our countrie man (saith hee) doth vs great iniurie, calling vs oftentimes heretikes. Whereunto Ragusinus answered: forsomuch as I am your countreyman both by tongue and nation, I do the more desire to reduce you againe vnto the Church. Hee was a Dalmatian borne, and it appeareth that the Dalmatians going into Boheme, tooke their name by their country which they possessed. It came almost to this point, that through this offence, the Bohemians would depart from Basill, and could scarslie bee appeased. Certaine of the Bohemians would not heare Ragusinus finish his disputation.

John Ragusinus replieth against the first article.

The Bohemians displeased with Ragusinus.

After him a famous diuine, one Egidius Carlerius, deane of the Church of Cambray, answered vnto the second article, by the space of foure daies. To the third article answered one Henricus, surnamed Frigidum ferrum, three daies together. Last of all, one Johannes Polomarius, master of the requests of the palace, answered vnto the fourth article likewise by the space of three daies, so that the long time which they vsed in disputations, seemed tedious vnto the Bohemians. Notwithstanding this answere, the Bohemians still defended their articles, and specially the first, insomuch as John Rochezanus did strongly impugne Ragusinus answer by the space of fiue daies. But forsomuch as one disputation bred another, and it was not perceiued how that by this meanes any concord could be made; the prince William duke of Bauaria, protector of the councell, attempted another remedie, that all disputations being set apart, the matter should bee friendly debated.

Egidius Carlerius answereth against the second article.

Henry Colbyzon answereth to the third article.

John Pollomarius answereth to the fourth article.

There were certaine appointed on either part to intreat vpon the concord: who comming together the eleuenth day of March, those which were appointed for the councell, were demanded to say their minds. It seemeth good, said they, if these men would be united vnto vs, and bee made one bodie with vs, that this bodie might then accord, declare and determine all manner of diuersities of opinions and sects, what is to bee beleeued or done in them.

Certaine chosen on both sides to determine the matter.

The Bohemians, when they had a while paused, said: this way seemed not apt enough, except first of all, the foure articles were exactly discussed, so that either we should agree with them, or they with vs, for otherwise it would be but a friuolous matter, if they now being united, againe disagree in the deciding of the articles. Here answere was made to the Bohemians, that if they were rightly united, and the aid of the holy Ghost called for, they should not erre in the deciding of the matter, forsomuch as euery Christian ought to beleeue that determination: which if they would doe, it would breed a most firme and strong concord and amitie on either part. But this answer satisfied them not, insomuch, that the other three rose vp, and disputed against the answers which were giuen. At that time cardinall Julian president of the councell, made this Oration vnto the Bohemian ambassadors.

The oration of cardinall Julian.

This sacred Synode, saith he, hath now by the space of ten daies, patiently heard the propositions of your foure articles; and afterward hee answered: you haue propounded, saith hee, foure articles, but wee vnderstand that beside these foure, you haue many other strange doctrines, wherein ye dissent from vs. Wherefore it is necessarie, if that a perfect vnitie and fraternitie shall follow betweene vs, that all these things be declared in the Councell, to the end that by the grace of the holy Ghost, which is the author of peace and truth, due prouision may be made therein. For we haue not gathered these things of light coniectures, but haue heard them of credible persons, and partly here are some present, which haue seene them with their own eies in Boheme, and partly we doe gather it by your owne report: For master Nicolas, which was the second that did propound, amongst other things alleaged, that J. Wickliffe was an euangelicall doctor. If yee beleeue him to be a true doctor, it followeth, that you must repute his workes as authentike: If ye doe not so thinke, it is reason that it should be opened vnto vs.

Nicolas the second propounder, charged by the cardinall for commending of John Wickliffe.

Wherefore we desire you, that you will certifie vs vpon these and certaine other points, what you doe beleeue, or what credite you doe giue vnto them. But we doe not require that you should now declare your reasons, but it shall satisfie vs, if you will answer vnto euery article by this word, Credimus, aut non credimus: that is, We beleeue, or beleeue not. Which if you will doe (as we trust you will) then we shall manifestly perceiue that you desire that wee should conceiue a good estimation of you. If there be any thing, whereof you would be certified by vs, aske it boldly, and we will giue you an answere out of hand: For we are readie according to the doctrine of Saint Peter, to render account vnto euery man which shall require it, touching the faith which we hold. Hereunto the Bohemian ambassadors answered in few words, that they came onely to propound those foure artticles, not in their owne name, but in the name of the whole kingdome of Boheme, and speake no more. Whereupon, William the noble protector of the councell, calling vnto him foure men on either part, intreated touching the pacifying of the matter,

The ambassadours of the Bohemians returne without agreement.

ter, by whose aduice, the councell decréed to send a famous ambassade, with the Bohemian ambassadours vnto Prage, whereas the people should assemble vpon sunday. But they would not receiue these conditions of peace which were offered, but made hast to depart. Wherupon the foureteenth day of Aprill, there were ten chosen out of the councell, to go with the Bohemian ambassadours vnto Prage.

It were too long here to declare what honour was done vnto these ambassadors, all the way in their iourney, and specially when they came vnto Boheme, by the citizens of Prage, when as a great number of Bohemians were assembled at Prage at the day appointed, both of the clergie, nobility and common people.

The comming of the legates to Prage.

After the comming of those ambassadours, much contention began to rise betweene the parties. First began John Rochezanus: who speaking in the publike person of the communalty, laboured to commend and preferre the foure verities of the Bohemians before propounded: charging also the prelates and priests for their slanderous obtrectations, and vndeserued contumelies, wherewith they did infame the noble kingdome of Boheme, complaining also that they would not receiue those christian verities, left and allowed by their king Wencellaus, now departed. Wherefore he required them in the behalfe of the whole nation, that they would leane off hereafter to oppresse them in such sort, that they would restore to them againe their Iosephs vesture, that is, the ornament of their good fame and name, whereof their brethren, their enemies had spoiled them, &c.

John Rochezanus speaketh.

Ex Cochleo, hist. lib. 7.

Polomar answereth to the Bohemians.

To this Polomar maketh answere againe, with a long and curious oration, exhorting them to peace and vnity of the church, which if they would embrace, all other obstacles and impediments (said he) should bee soone removed, promising also that this their vesture of honour and fame, should be amply restored againe: and afterward, if there were any doubtfull matters, they might and should be the better discussed.

The Bohemians replie againe to Polomar.

But all this pleased not the Bohemians, vnlesse they might first haue a declaration of their foure articles, which if they might obtaine, they promised then to embrace peace and concord. Which peace (said they) began first to bee broken by themselues, in that the councell of Constance by their vniust condemnation, burned John Hus, & Hierome of Prage, and also by their cruell buls and censures, raised vp first excommunication, then warre against the whole kingdome of Boheme.

Polomar extolleth the councels.

Hereunto Polomar reclaiming againe, began to aduance and magnifie the honour and dignity of generall councels. To conclude, as much as the said Polomar did extoll the authority of the councels, so much did the answere of the Bohemians extenuate the same: saying that the latter councels which are not expressed in the law of God, haue erred, and might erre, not onely in faith, but also in maners. For that which hath chanced to the greene wood, may also chance vnto the drie. But of other, the most strong pillers of the militant church, the apostles I meane: seeme all to haue erred, and the catholicke faith to haue remained three daies sound and incorrupt onely in the virgin Mary. No christian man therefore ought to bee compelled to stand to the determination of the pope or the councell, except it be in that, which is plainely expressed in the law of God. For it is euident that all the generall councels which haue beene of long time, haue reformed very few things as touching the faith, peace, and maners of the church: but haue alwaies both in their life and decrées, notoriously swarued, and haue not established themselues vpon the foundation, which is Christ. Wherefore the said Bohemians protested, that they would not simplie and plainely (God being their good Lord) yéeld themselues to their doctrine, nor to such rash and hastie decrées: lest through that their hastie and vncircumspect submission, they should bind their faith and life, contrary to the wholesome and sound doctrine of our Lord Christ Iesus. In sum, in no case they would enter into any agréement of peace, except their foure articles which they counted for euangelicall verities, were first accepted and approued. Which being obtained (said they) if they would condescend with them in the verity of the Gospel, so would they ioyne together, and be made one with them in the Lord, &c. Ex Cochleo hist. Lib. 7.

Generall councels may erre and haue erred.

The ambassadours of the councel and the Bohemians could not agree.

A declaration of 3. articles promised to the Bohemians by the councell.

When the ambassadours saw the matter would not otherwise be brought to passe, they required to haue those articles deliuered vnto them in a certaine forme, which they sent vnto the councell by three Bohemian ambassadors.

Afterward the councell sent a declaration into Boheme, to be published vnto the people, in the common assemblies of the kingdome, by the ambassadours, which were commanded to report vnto the Bohemians, in the name of the councell, that if they would receiue the declaration of those three articles, and the vnity of the church, there should be a meane found whereby the matter touching the fourth article, of the communion vnder both kinds, should be passed with peace and quietnesse.

They propounded in Prage, in an open assemblie of the nobles and commons, the declarations of the three articles in forme following.

A declaration of the councell to the Bohemians, concerning the first three articles.

For somuch as touching the doctrine of the verity, wee ought to proceed soberly and warely, that the truth may be declared, with words being so orderly conceiued and vttered, that there be no offence giuen to any man, whereby he should fall or take occasion of errour, and (to vse the words of Isidore) that nothing by obscurity be left doubtfull: whereas you haue propounded touching the inhibition and correction of sinnes in these words: All mortall sinnes, and specially open offences ought to bee rooted out, punished, and inhibited, by them whose duety it is so to doe, reasonablie and according to the law of God: here is to be marked and vnderstood, that this word (whose dutie it is) is too generall, and may be an offence and according to the meaning of the Scripture, we ought not to lay any stumbling stocke before the blind, and the ditches are to be closed vp, that our neighbours dre doe not fall therein: all occasion of offence is to be taken away. Therefore wee say that according to the meaning of the holy Scripture, and the doctrine of the holy Doctours, it is thus vniuersally to be holden: that all mortall sinnes, especially publicke offences, are to be rooted out, corrected and inhibited, as reasonablie as may be, according to the law of God, and the institutions of the fathers. The power to punish these offenders, doth not pertaine vnto any priuate person, but onely vnto them which haue iurisdiction of the law ouer them, the distinction of law and iustice, being orderly obserued.

The 2. proposition propounded by the Bohemians, with the declaration from the councell.

Punishing of publike offences how and by whom.

Note here the popes addition.

As touching the preaching of the word of God, which article you haue alledged in this forme, that the word of God should be freely and faithfully preached by the fit and apt ministers of the Lord: lest by this word (freely) occasion may be taken of disordred liberty, which as you haue often said you doe not meane) the circumstance thereof is to be vnderstood: and we say, that (according to the meaning of the holy Scripture, and doctrine of the holy fathers) it is thus vniuersally to bee beléeued: that the word of God ought freely, but not euery where, but faithfully and orderly, to be preached by the priests and Leuites of the Lord, being allowed and sent by their superiors, vnto whom that office appertaineth, the authority of the bishop alwaies reserued, who is the prouider of all things according to the institution of the holy fathers.

The 3. article of the Bohemians with the declaration from the councell.

Liberty of preaching, how far and to whom it extendeth.

As concerning the last article expressed vnder these words, It is not lawfull for the christian clergie, in the time of the law of grace, to haue dominion ouer temporall goods: we remember that in the solemne disputation holden in the sacred councell, he which was appointed by the councel to dispute, propounded two conclusions in this sort.

The 4. article of the Bohemians with the declaration from the councell.

Temporall possessions in the clergie mens hands.

First, that such of the clergie as were not religious, and had not bound themselues thereunto by a vow, might lawfully haue and possesse any temporall goods: as the inheritance of his father or any other, if it be left vnto him, or any other goods iustly gotten by meanes of any gift or other lawfull contract, or else some lawfull art.

The papists stand hard for their temporall lordships.

The second conclusion: The church may lawfully haue and possesse temporall goods, moueable and vnmoueable, houses, lands, townes, and villages, castles and cities, and in them a priuate and ciuill dominion. Your ambassadour which disputed against him, granted those conclusions, saying that they did not impugne the sense of his article, being well vnderstood, forsomuch as he vnderstandeth this article, of ciuill dominion formally meant. Whereby, and also by other things, it may be vnderstood, that those words, to haue secular dominion expressed in the foresaid article, seemeth to bee referred to some speciall maner or kind of dominion. But forsomuch as the doctrine of the church is not to bee intreated vpon by any ambiguous or doubtfull words, but fully and plainely: therefore we haue thought good more plainely to expresse that, which according to the law of God, and the doctrine of the holy Doctours, is vniuersally to be beléeued: that is to say, the two aforesaid conclusions to be true. And also, that the clergie ought faithfully to distribute the goods of the church, whose administrators they are, according to the decrées of the holy fathers: and that the vsurpation of the administration of the church goods, done by any other then by them, vnto whom the administration is canonically committed, cannot be without guilt of sacriledge.

Thus the sacred councell (said they) hath diligently gone about according to the verity of the Gospell, all ambiguity set apart, to expound the true sense of the three foresaid articles. Wherefore, if there doe yet remaine any doubt: according to the information which we haue receiued in the sacred councell, we are ready by Gods helpe (who is the principall verity) to declare the truth vnto you: If ye doe receiue and embrace the declaration of the said three articles, which is grounded vpon the verity of the holy Scripture, as you are bound, and will effectually haue a pure, simple, and perfect vnity, touching the libertie of the communion vnder both kinds, which you desire and require, which also you cannot lawfully haue, without the licence of holy church: wee haue authority from the generall councell, by certaine meanes, to intreate and conclude with you, trusting that you will shew your selues as you will continue.

The Bohemians take a deliberation of the fourth article.

These things thus declared, after the Bohemians had taken deliberation, they said that they would giue no answere vnto the premisses, before they vnderstood what should be offered them as touching the communion. Wherefore, it shall be necessarie to declare the matter, as it was written in forme following.

A declaration of the councell touching the fourth article of the communion.

In the name of God and our Sauiour Iesus Christ, vpon the Sacrament of whose most blessed last supper we shall intreate, that he which hath instituted this most blessed sacrament of vnity and peace, will vouchsafe to worke this effect in vs, to make vs that we may be one in the said Lord Iesu our head, and that hee will subuert all the subtilties of the diuell, which through his enuious craftinesse, hath made the sacrament of peace and vnity, an occasion of warre and discord, that whilest Christians doe contend touching the maner of communicating, they be not depriued of the fruit of the communion. Whereupon saint Augustine in his sermon vpon infants, in the decrees De conse. distinct. 2. Quia passus, saith thus: So the Lord Iesu Christ certified vs and willed, that wee should appertaine vnto him, and consecrate the mystery of our peace and vnity vpon the table. He that receiueth the mystery of vnity, and doth not keepe the bond of peace, doth not receiue a mystery for himselfe, but a testimony against himselfe. This we thought good aboue all things to bee premised, that the generall custome of the church, which your fathers and you also in times past haue obserued, hath a long time had and still vseth, that they which do not consecrate, communicate onely vnder the kind of bread. Which custome being lawfully brought in by the church and holy fathers, and now a long time obserued, it is not lawfull to reiect, or to change at your will and pleasure, without the authority of the church. Therefore to change the custome of the church, and to take in hand to communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds, without the authority of holy church, is altogether vnlawfull. For holy church vpon reasonable occasions, may grant liberty to communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds. And euery communion, which, being attempted without the authority and licence of the church, should bee vnlawfull, when it is done with the authority of holy church, shall be lawfull, if other things let it not: because (as the apostle saith) He that eateth and drinketh vnworthily, eateth and drinketh his owne damnation.

Consecrat. dist. 2. quia passus.

This is to set by the church aboue the Scripture.

The holy communion requireth amendment of life.

Whereupon saint Isidore in the second distinct. vpon the consecration, writeth thus: They which liue wickedly and cease not daily to communicate in the church, thinking thereby to be cleansed, let them learne that it doth nothing at all profit them to the cleansing of their sinnes. And saint Augustine in the same distinction saith, Holy things may hurt the euill, for vnto the good they are saluation, but vnto the euill, damnation. There are besides this, many other authorities. The apostle Iudas was amongst them which did first communicate, but forsomuch as hee receiued vnworthily, hauing that sinne of treason in his heart, it did profit him nothing, but the diuell by and by exercised the more power and authority ouer him. This is declared by a great reason: Which of you is it, that if you should receiue your Lord into your house, would not with all diligence and care, studie to make cleane and adorne his house, that he may receiue the lord honestly: much more he that shall receiue the Lord and Sauiour into the house of his soule, ought diligently to make cleane and decke his soule, to cleanse it by the sacrament of penance, with sorrow and contrition of heart, humblie, purely, and truely confessing his sinnes, and receiuing due satisfaction and penance, to adorne and decke the same with the purple or rich array of deuotion, that the heart being so purged and adorned with feruent desire, he may come to that most holy sacrament, wherby God reconcileth all the world vnto him.

Holy things nothing profit the wicked.

The reuerent receiuing of the sacraments.

Wherefore, the most sacred Synode admonisheth, exhorteth, and commandeth, that all priests should diligently exhort and admonish the people, and that they should vse all their care and endeauour, that no man come to that most blessed sacrament, except he bee duely prepared with great reuerence and deuotion, lest that which is receiued for the saluation of the soule, redound to the condemnation, through the vnworthy receiuing thereof.

Moreouer, Doctors doe say, that the custome of communicating vnto the people, onely vnder the kind of bread, was reasonablie introduced by the church and holy fathers, for reasonable causes, specially for the auoiding of two perils: of errour and vnreuerence. Of errour, as to thinke that the one part of Christs body were in the bread, and the other part in the cup, which were a great error. Of vnreuerence, forsomuch as many things may happen, as wel on the one part of the minister, as on the part of the receiuer: As it is said that it happened when as a certaine priest, carrying the sacrament of the cup vnto a sicke man, when he should haue ministred, he found nothing in the cup, being all spilt by the way, with many other such like chances. We haue heard moreouer, that it hath often happened, that the sacrament consecrate in the cup, hath not bin sufficient for the number of communicants, whereby a new consecration must bee made, which is not agreeable to the doctrine of the holy fathers, and also that oftentimes they doe minister wine vnconsecrate for consecrate wine, which is a great perill. By this meanes then it shall be brought to passe, that if you will effectually receiue the vnity and peace of the church, in all other things besides the vse of the communion vnder both kinds, conforming your selues to the faith and order of the vniuersall church, you that haue that vse and custome, shall communicate still by the authority of the church vnder both kinds, and this article shall be discussed fully in the sacred councell, where you shall see that as touching this article, is to be holden as an vniuersall verity, it is to be done for the profit and saluation of the christian people, and all things being thus throughly handled, then if you perseuere in your desire, and that your ambassadours do require it, the sacred councell will grant licence in the Lord, vnto your ministers, to communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds: that is to say, to such as be of lawfull yeeres and discretion, and shall reuerently and deuoutly require the same, this alwaies obserued, that the ministers shall say vnto those which shall communicate, that they ought firmely to beleeue not the flesh only to be contained vnder the forme of bread, and the blood only vnder the wine, but vnder each kind to be whole and perfect Christ.

Receiuing in both kinds permitted to the Bohemians.

The condition annexed.

Thus hitherto we haue declared the decree of the councell. As touching the other doubts and questions which were afterward moued by the masters and prelats of Boheme, the ambassadors of the councell answered thus.

Doubts or questions of the Bohemians.

First they said, that it was not the meaning of the sacred councell, to suffer the communion vnder both kinds by toleration, or as the libell of discorement was permitted to the Iewes: forsomuch as the councell intending euen to open the bowels of motherly charity, and pity, vnto the Bohemians and Morauians, doth not meane to suffer it with such kind of sufferance, which should not exclude sinne, but so to grant it, that by the authority of our Lord Iesus Christ, and of his true spouse the church, it may bee lawfull, profitable and healthfull vnto those which worthily receiue the same. Also, as touching that which was spoken by the said Bohemians of the punishing of offences, that it is in the Scriptures, how that God oftentimes stirreth vp the hearts of priuate persons to the correcting and punishing of sinnes, and so it should seeme lawfull vnto the inferiours to correct and punish their superiours: they answered, alledging the text of saint Augustine in the three and thirtith decree: He that striketh wicked men in that they are wicked, and hath cause of death against them, is the minister of God: but he which without any publike administration or office murthereth or maimeth any wicked theefe, sacrilegious, adulterous or periured person, or any other offender, shall be iudged as an homicide, and so much the more sharpely, in that he feared not to abuse and vsurpe the power not granted him of God: and truely, this city would take it much more grieuously, if any priuate man should attempt to punish an offender, and set vp a gallowes in the street, and there hang him, then if one man should kill another in brawle or quarrell. They alledged also other texts of saint Ambrose and saint Hierome agreeable to the same. They said that no man doubteth that the law of God is duly and holily appointed, and therin is simplie written, Thou shalt not steale. And notwithstanding by the commandement of God the children of Israel caried away the goods of the Egyptians, which they had borrowed of them. Also in the same law it is plainely written, thou shalt do no murther. Whereupon saint Austin in his first booke De Ciuitate Dei, proueth that it is not lawfull for any man to kill himselfe: when as he maketh example of Sampson, he answereth with these words: when as God commandeth and doth affirme himselfe to command without any doubt, who is he y wil cal obedience sin: or who will accuse the obedience to God?

Answere. Permission of both kinds granted to the Bohemians, not of sufferance, but by full authority.

Punishing of offences considered.

How and by whom offenders ought to be punished.

To do that God commandeth is obedience and no sin, though it be extraordinary. The Israelites did steale from the Egyptians without sinne. Sampson killed himselfe without sin.

Here in this proposition, you haue the words of saint Austin for answere. But let euery man well foresee, if God doe command, or that he do intimate the commandement without any circumstances, and let him proue the spirits whether they be of God. But in such cases there are no lawes to be giuen, neither are they much to be talked of, for thereby there should easily occasion rise to make sedition, and for the inferiours to rise against the superiors. For when any man had stollen any thing, or killed any man: he would say that hee was moued thereunto by the spirit of God: but without manifest proofe thereof he should be punished.

Of extraordinary commandements no generall lawes to be made.

Againe, they said that there were certaine cases wherein the laity had power ouer the clergie. It was answered, that there were certaine cases in the law, wherein the laity hath power ouer the clergie, and oftentimes ouer cardinals. For if the pope being dead, the cardinals would not enter the conclaue to elect a new pope, the king, prince, or other lord or secular power may compell them: but in these cases hee is now no priuate person, but vseth his iurisdiction by the authority of the law. The like is to be vnderstood of all other cases expressed in the law.

Obiection. Answere. How the laity hath power ouer the clergie, and wherein The pope will be iudged by his owne law.

They said further, that no common law hath any right or iustice except Gods law doe allow the same.

Obiection.

It was answered that no common law hath right or iustice, if it bee against the law of God, for because the law of God is the rule of all other lawes. But there is great cunning and knowledge in applying the rule to that which is made by the rule, for oftentimes, it seemeth that there is diuersitie in the thing made by the rule, when there is none in deede: but the the default is in the applying, because their rule is not duely applied to the thing made by it.

Obiection. As touching the article of preaching the word of God, it was moued, that oftentimes some prelats, through their owne enuie and malice, without any reasonable cause, doe inhibite a good and meet preacher that preacheth catholickely and well.

Answere. Abuse of prelats in inhibiting true preachers. Answere was made, how that they vnderstood wel enough that the abuse of certain prelats, which did inordinately behaue themselues, gaue a great occasion of those troubles. Also that they neuer heard of any such complaints in those parts, but that the prelats do fauor good preachers, and stirre them vp to preach, by intreaty, fauor, and promotion. In all such causes, there are remedies already prouided by the law: for when any man is so prohibited to vse his right, hee hath remedy to appeale: & if he do trust his appeale to be iust, he may vse his right, all violence both of the spirituall and secular power set apart; for the end of the matter shall declare if hee had iust cause to appeale. Then shall be declared that the superior hath done euill in prohibiting, and the plaintiffe iustly in doing, and the superior for his vniust prohibition shall bee punished. But if he be iustly prohibited, and that through his temerity, he do contemne the iust commandement of his superior, he is worthie to be punished with condigne punishment.

Remedy of appeale.

Obiection. Where it was moued concerning the third article, whether it were lawfull for the ecclesiasticall prelats to exercise in their proper person, the acts of secular dominion, hereunto it was

Answere. answered, that if by this word, Acts of secular dominion, are vnderstood Acts which a secular lord may doe or exercise, then

Acts of secular dominion to be exercised of the clergie, after a double respect: vel per se, vel per alium. is to be said, that a prelate may lawfully exercise some such Acts in his proper person, as to sell, to pawne or pledge, to infeofe by maner and forme ordained by law: but there are some Acts, which it is not lawfull for them to exercise in their proper person, but ought to haue afterward a vicegerent or proctor, to doe the same: whereupon there is prohibition made in the law in the Rubrike, Ne Clerus vel Monachus secularibus negotijs se immisceat, & in alijs rebus.

Obiection. It was also moued, whether that coactiue power, which ought to be exercised by a steward, &c. bee in the hands of an ecclesiasticall prelate.

Answere. Whereupon Iohn Polomair answered, that this question presupposeth another: whereof there are diuers opinions Coactiue power, whether it belongeth to the clergie, and how. amongst the doctors, in whose power the dominion of the church should be: and furthermore, whether the actions bee in the person of the tutor or proctor, or if they bee not in their person, notwithstanding by the constitution of any actor or proctor (whose exercising of those actions do giue authority vnto the actor or proctor) they be: with other difficulties, whereof it is not needfull to speake at this present. But forsomuch as hee was vrged to say his opinion: hee said, that to such as had either leisure or pleasure in disputation, and would argue against him, he would bee contented to giue the choice to take which part he would; but his opinion was rather that the dominion of church matters should be in the power of Christ: and the prelats, with the other clergie, are but canonicall administrators in maner of tutors: but they haue more power and administration then tutors, and by constituting a steward or vicegerent, &c. Their constitution being duely made, the steward or vicegerent hath the same coactiue power and exercise of iurisdiction.

Also as touching the fourth article, for the declaration of the first conclusion, it is agréed that these words, Iustè: equisita. i. iustly gotten, alledged therein, determine all things contained in the same.

The goods of the church in whose possession they be properly. 12. q. 1. cap. expedit. Also as touching the second conclusion, whereas the sacred canons and holy doctors speak thus: The goods of the church, the substance of the church, and the possessions of the church, and diuers other opinions there be amongst the doctors, in whose power the rule thereof should be, as it is noted in the Glos. Cap. expedit xij. quæst. i. they do not intend to constraine any man to any of those opinions; neither to exclude any of them, but that euery man should haue libertie, probablie to maintaine which of them he thinketh best.

The clergie be administrators, not lords of the temporalties of the church. Moreouer, the Bohemians said, that they did beléeue that the clergie are but administrators of the temporalties of the church, and not lords thereof, according to the maner of speaking of the Scriptures, holy doctors and canons. Also the Bohemians said, that in all occasions which shall hereafter rise, they would wholly stand to the determination of the iudge, agréed vpon in Egra, with one consent. In this maner did the ambassadours make answere vnto the Bohemians. At the last, after much communication had to and fro, a concord and vnity was concluded and confirmed by setting to their hands. The Bohemians promised to receiue the peace and vnity of the church, and the declaration of the three articles. This was done in the yéere of our Lord 1438. About the feast of saint Martine, it was afterward agréed both by the ambassadors of that councell, and of Boheme, that what soeuer remained, should be determined and agréed vpon, first at Ratisbona, afterward at Bruna in the dioces of Olymutes: then at Alba in Hungary, before the emperour Sigismund: but the matter could not be ended in any place.

The agreement betweene the Bohemians and the councell. Anno 1438

At the last the concord was confirmed by writing with their seales at Inglauia, a city of Morauia, the fifth day of July, in the presence of the emperor.

¶ Certaine petitions, which the Bohemians put vp last of all in the sacred councell of Basill, An. 1438. in the moneth of Nouember.

Certaine petitions of the Bohemians put vp to the councell. Anno 1438. VNto the most reuerend fathers in Christ, and our most gracious lords. Wee the ambassadours of the kingdome of Boheme, do most humbly and hartily require you, that for the perpetuall preseruation of peace and concord, and for the firme preseruation of all things contained in the composition, you will vouchsafe of your clemencie, to giue and grant vnto vs all and singuler our requests, here vnder written, with effectuall execution of the same.

First and aboue all things, we desire and require you, for the extirpation of diuers dissensions and controuersies, which will vndoubtedly follow amongst our people vnder the diuersitie of the communion, and for the abolishing of infinite euils, which we are not able to expresse, as wee haue conceiued them, that you will gently vouchsafe of your goodnesse and liberality, to giue, grant and command, vnto our kingdome of Boheme, and marquesdome of Morauia, one vniforme order of the communion vnto all men, vnder both kinds: that is to say, vnto the archbishop of Prage, the bishop of Luthomus, Olmutz, and other prelats of the kingdome and marquesdome, hauing charge of soules, and to their vicars, and also to their flocks and subiects, and that according to those things which are contained in the bull of the ambassadors, and in the compositions made in the name of the whole councell, written in the chap. Pro firmitate, where it is thus said, and all other things shal be done, which shall be meet and necessarie for the preseruation of the peace and vnity. For this done by your benefit, the whole kingdome shall be comforted aboue measure, and established in brotherly loue: whereby an vniforme subiection and obedience shall be perpetually attributed vnto the holy church.

The communion in both kinds to be generally granted. Item, we require and desire (as before) that for the auoiding of all false suspition and doubtfulnesse of many, which suppose that the sacred councell hath granted the said communion vnder both kinds vnto vs but for a time, as neither profitable nor wholesome, but as the libell of diuorcement: that you will vouchsafe, according to this chapter alledged in the compositions: First they said, that it was not the intent of the sacred councell, &c. wholesomely and speedily to prouide for our safety and your grant in this behalfe, and with the buls of your letters, to confirme that chapter together with the other pertaining to the office of your ambassadors.

To haue a good and lawfull pastor, and bishop. Item, we beseech you (as afore) that for the confirmation of obedience, and for the discipline of all the clergie, and for the finall defence and obseruation of all things determined and agréed vpon, and for the good order in spiritualties, yee will vouchsafe effectually to prouide for vs a good and lawfull pastor, archbishops and bishops, which shall séeme vnto vs most meet and acceptable for our kingdome, to execute those offices and duties.

Free communion vnder both kinds to be permitted to all princes. Item, we require you (as afore laid) that your fatherly reuerences will vouchsafe, for the defence of the worthy fame of the kingdome and marquesdome, to declare and shew our innocencie, in that they haue communicated, doe, and hereafter shall communicate vnder both kinds; to giue out, ordaine, and direct the letters of the sacred councell, in maner and forme most apt and meete for such declaration, vnto all princes, as well secular as spirituall, cities and communalties, according to the compositions, and as the lords the ambassadours are bound vnto vs for to doe.

Item, wee desire you, that in the discussing of the matter for the communion vnder both kinds, and of the commandement thereof giuen vnto all faithfull, yée will not proceed otherwise then according to the concordatum agreed vpon in Egra: that is to say, according to the law of God, the order of Christ, and his apostles, the generall councels, and the minds of the holy doctours, truely grounded vpon the law of God.

Item, we desire that your fatherly reuerences, considering the great affection of our people, will giue vs the desired liberty to communicate vnto the yonger sort, the Sacrament of the Supper. For if this vse of communicating should bee taken away, which our kingdome being godly, moued by the writings of most great and holy Doctours, and brought in by examples, hath receiued as catholicke, and exercised now a long time; verily it should raise vp an intollerable offence amongst the people, and their minds would be grieuously vexed and troubled.

The gospels and epistles to be read in the vulgar tongue. The Scriptures read in the Slauonis tongue of old time. Item, we require you (as before) that for like causes your fatherly reuerences, would vouchsafe to permit, at the least the gospels, epistles, and créed to be sung and read in the church in our vulgar tongue, before the people, to moue them vnto deuotion: for in our Slauon language it hath beene vsed of old in the church, and likewise in our kingdome.

Item, we require you in the name of the said kingdome, and of the famous Vniuersity of Prage, that your fatherly reuetences would vouchsafe to shew such diligence and care toward the desired reformation of that Vniuersity, that according to the maner and forme of other Vniuersities reformed by the church, prebends and collations of certaine benefices of cathedrall and parish churches, may be annexed and incorporate vnto the said Vniuersity, that thereby it may be increased and preferred.

A request for necessary reformation and discipline.

Item, we desire you (as before) as heartily as we may, and also (saluing alwaies your fatherly reuerence) require you, and by the former compositions we most instantly admonish you, that with your whole minds and endeauours, and with all care and studie, your reuerences will watch and seeke for that long desired and most necessary reformation of the church and Christian religion, and effectually labour for the rooting out of all publicke euils, as well in the head, as in the members, as you haue often promised to do in our kingdome, in the compositions, and as our fourth article touching the auoiding of all publicke euils, doth exact and require.

There were certaine answers prouided by the councell, to these petitions of the Bohemians, which were not deliuered vnto them, but kept backe, for what purpose & intent we know not. Wherfore, because we thought them not greatly necessary for this place, and also to auoide prolixity, we haue iudged it meet at this present to omit them. Thus haue ye heard compendiously the chiefe and principall matters intreated and done in this famous councell of Basill. And here (to conclude withall) we haue thought good to declare vnto you, for the aid and helpe of the ignorant people (which iudge many things to bee of longer time and continuance, then indeed they be; and thereupon haue established a great part of their opinions) how that, toward the latter end of this councell, that is to say, in the xxxi. Session of the same, holden the xvij. day of September, in this yeere of our Lord 1439. the feast of the conception of our Lady, was ordained to be holden & celebrate yeerely. In like case also in the 44. Session of the same councell, holden the first day of July, An. 1441. was ordained the feast of the Visitation of our Lady, to be celebrate & holden yeerely in the moneth of July. We haue also thought it good, before we doe end this story, to annex hereunto certaine decrées, profitably and wholesomely ordained in the said councell, against the inordinate giuing of the ecclesiasticall benefices and liuings by the pope, with certaine other constitutions also, fruitfull for the behalfe and edification of the church.

The conception of our Lady brought into the church.

The visitation of our Lady brought in.

Vowsons and gifts of benefices before they were voide debarred by the councell which vowsons here are called expectatiue graces.

During the time that the generall councell at Basill was so diligent and carefull about the reformation of the church, this one thing seemed good vnto them to be prosecuted and followed with an earnest care and diligence, that thorow euery church, apt and meete ministers might bee appointed, which might shine in vertue and knowledge, to the glory of Christ, and the healthfull edifying of the christian people: whereunto the multitude of expectatiue graces hath beene a great impediment and let, in that they haue beene found to haue brought grieuous troubles, diuers disorders, and many dangers vpon the ecclesiasticall state. For hereby oftentimes, scarcely apt or meete ministers haue bene appointed for the churches, which are neither knowne nor examined: and this expectation of void benefices (as the old lawes do witnesse) doth giue occasion to desire another mans death, which is greatly preiudiciall vnto saluation: besides that, innumerable quarrels and contentions are moued amongst the seruants of God: rancour and malice nourished: the ambition and greedy desire of pluralities of benefices maintained: and the riches and substance of kingdomes and prouinces marueilously consumed. Poore men suffer innumerable vexations, by running vnto the court of Rome. They are oftentimes spoiled and robbed by the way: troubled and afflicted with diuers plagues, and hauing spent their patrimony and substance left them by their parents, they are constrained to liue in extreme pouerty. Many do challenge benefices, which without any iust title (yea such indeed as ought not to haue them) obtaine and get the same: such I say as haue most craft and subtilty to deceiue their neighbour, or haue greatest substance to contend in the law. It happeneth oftentimes that vnder the intrication of these prerogatiues, attelations, and such other as doe associate these expectatiue graces, much craft and deceit is found. Also oftentimes the ministery is taken away from yong men, by their ordinary giuers, whiles that by the trouble of those contentions, and diuers discourses, running to and fro by meanes of those graces, they are vexed and troubled, the ecclesiasticall order is confounded, whiles that euery mans authority and iurisdiction is not preserued: and the bishops of Rome also, by challenging and taking vpon them too much the office of the inferiours, are withdrawne from more waighty and fruitfull matters, neither doe they diligently attend to the guiding and correction of the inferiours, as the publike vtility doth require. All which things do bring a great confusion vnto the clergie, and ecclesiasticall state, to the great preiudice and hinderance of Gods true worship, and publike saluation.

Incommenten-ces that rise by vowsons of benefices.

No controuersies to bee brought to Rome beyond

In the same councell also diuers other constitutions were made, not vnprofitable for reformation, and for remouing of certaine abuses and disorders brought in, especially by the bishop of Rome, as touching causes not to bee brought vp and translated to the court of Rome: Wherein it was decreed, that no actions nor controuersies should bee brought from other countries, to be pleaded at Rome, which were beyond 4. daies iourney distant from the said court of Rome, a few principall matters only excepted. Also, that no friuolous appeales should be made to the pope hereafter. It was moreouer in the same councell decreed, for the number, age, and condition of the cardinals, that they should not exceed the number of 24. besides them that were already, and that they should bee freely taken out of all countries: and that they should not be of kin to the bishop of Rome, or to the cardinals, nor yet blemished with any spot or crime. Also for Annates or first fruits, or halfe fruits, it was there prouided, that no such Annates or confirmation of elections, or collation of benefices, should bee paid or reserued any more to the pope, for the first yeeres voidance. All which things there agreed and concluded by them, were afterward confirmed and ratified by the French king, Charles 7. with the full consent of all his prelats, in his high court of parliament in Bitures, and there called Pragmatica Sanctio: Anno 1438. whereupon great vtility ensued afterward to the kingdome of France. Albeit in processe of time, diuers friers there were which wrote against the same. Ex lib. Pragm. Sanctionis.

No friuolous appeales to be made to the P.

Against the superfluous number of cardinals.

Against the popes first fruits.

Pragmatica Sanctio per Carolum 7.

Amongst many decrées of the said councell of Basill, in the 19. Session, there was also a decrée made touching the conuerting of Iewes and yong nouices in religion, vnto the christian faith.

Also that all ordinaries should yeerely at appointed times, prouide certaine men well learned in the holy Scriptures, in such places where Iewes and other infidels did dwell, to declare to them the truth of the catholicke faith, that they acknowleging their errour, might forsake the same: vnto the which preaching, the said ministers should compell them to resort, and to heare, vnder paine of excluding them from occupying any more in that place: prouided that the said Dioceſanes and preachers should behaue themselues towards them mercifully and with all charity, whereby they might win them to Christ, not onely by the declaring of the verity, but also in exhibiting their offices of humanity.

An act made for the conuersion of the Iewes.

And to the intent their preaching might be the more fruitfull, and that the preachers might bee the better instructed in the tongues, it was also in the same councell prouided and commanded, that the constitution made before in the councell of Vienna for learning the Hebrew, Chaldey, Araby and Greek tongues, should by all meanes be obserued and kept, and ordinary stipends prouided for them that should teach the same tongues.

An act for learning the Hebrue, Latine, and Chaldey.

An other decrée moreouer in the 20. Session was enacted, that whosoeuer was knowne or publikely noted to be a keeper of concubines, should be sequestred from all fruits of his benefices, for the space of 3. moneths: which fruits should be conuerted by the Ordinary, to the repatrations, or some other vtility of the church: and if he did not so amend, it was by the Synode decreed that he should be cleerely deposed from al his benefices.

Against priests that kept concubines.

Furthermore, the said Synode did greatly inueigh against them, which hauing the iurisdiction of the church, did not shame to suffer such whoremasters for bribes and money, still to continue in their filthinesse, &c.

By these decrees of the councell aboue specified, it is to be seene, what corruption had beene then frequented in the church of God, through the bishop and court of Rome. For the more expresse declaration whereof, we thought it not much impertinent here to infer the words of one Martin Meyre, writing to Aeneas Syluius, touching and noting the said corruptions: the tenour of whose epistle here ensueth.

In epistle of Martine Meyre to Æneas Syluius, translated into English, the Latine whereof is extant in the former edition of this booke. Ex Orth. Gra.

Vnto the reuerend father, the lord Æneas cardinall of Sene, Martine Meyr, chancellor to the bishop of Mentz, wisheth health.

I Haue vnderstood by certaine of my friends letters, that you are created cardinall. I am glad for your part, that you haue receiued so worthie rewards for your vertues. I reioyce also for my owne part, that my friend hath attained vnto such a dignity wherin he may in time to come, both helpe me and my friends: But this is a griefe vnto me, that you haue happened vpon those daies, which seeme to bee troublesome vnto the apostolicke see. For there are many complaints made vnto my lord the archbishop vpon the pope, that he will neither keep the decrees of the councell of Constance, neither of Basil, neither yet thinketh himselfe bound to the couenants of his predecessours, and seemeth vtterly to contemne our nation, and to seeke the vtter ruine thereof. For it is euident that the election of prelats, is euery where reiected: benefices and dignities, of what sort soeuer they be, are reserued for the cardinals and chiefe notaries: and you your selfe haue obtained the reseruation of three Prouinces of Germany, vnder such a forme as hath not bene accustomed or heard of. Vowsons or gifts of benefices are granted without number: yeerely stipends and halfe the reuenues are exacted without delay, and it is euident that there is more extorted then is due. The regimēts of churches are not cōmitted vnto such as best deserue them, but vnto such as offer most money for them, and new pardons are granted out daily to scrape scrape and gather together money. Tithes are commanded to be exacted without the consent of our prelats, for the Turkish war, and those matters which were accustomed to be debated and determined at home, are now caried vnto the apostolike see of Rome. A thousand waies are inuented and deuised, how the see of Rome may by subtilty and craft, extort and get gold and treasure from vs, euen as it were of the Turkes or Barbarians: wherby our nation, which was sometime famous and valiant, which by their power and blood, conquered the Romain empire, and was once the lady and queene of all the world, now being brought vnto pouerty, is made a handmaid, and become tributarie, and being now in extreme miserie, hath of long time bewailed her cruell fortune and pouertie. But now our nobles being (as it were) wakened out of their sleepe, haue begun to consider and deuise with themselues, by what meanes they might withstand this calamity, and vtterly shake off this yoke and bondage, and haue determined with themselues, to challenge againe their former libertie. This will be no small losse vnto the court of Rome, if the princes of Gernany bring to passe that which they haue deuised. Wherefore as much as I do reioyce of your late obtained dignity, so much also am I moued & grieued that these things happen in your daies. But peraduenture Gods determination is otherwise, and his will shall surely take place. You in the meane time be of good cheere, and deuise according to your wisedome, by what meanes the vehemency of these flouds may be stayed. Thus fare ye well.

From Hasthaffenberge the last day of August.

The corruption of the church of Rome detected.

Concerning the authority of this generall councell of Basill, what is to be esteemed, by the acts and fruits thereof may be vnderstood of all good men. Neither was it of any man doubted in the first beginning, so long as the pope agreed and consented vnto it: But after the pope began to draw backe, many other followed, especially of the richer sort of prelats, which had any thing to lose: whereof sufficiently hath beene said by Arelatensis the cardinall before. In the number of those vnconstant prelats, besides many other, was first cardinall Iulian, the first collector of this councell, and Vicegerent of the pope, as by his feruent and vehement letter written to pope Eugenius in defence of this councell, may well appeare: Wherin he most earnestly doth expostulate with the foresaid pope Eugenius, for seeking to dissolue the councell, and declareth in the same many causes, why hee should rather reioyce, and giue God thankes, for the godly procedings and ioyfull agreement betweene the councell and the Behemians, & so exhorteth him with manifold persuasions, to resort to the councell himselfe, and not to seeke the dissolution of the same. The copie and tenor of whose Epistle to the pope, if any be disposed to peruse the same, wee thought here good to set downe to be seene.

The authority of the councell of Basill expended.

The epistle of cardinall Iulian to the pope, in the commendation of the councell of Basill.

The copie of an epistle, which Iulian cardinall of S. Angen, and the popes ambassador into Germany, wrote marueilous boldly and freely vnto Eugenius B. of Rome, for that he went about to dissolue the councel of Basil.

Most blessed father, after the deuout kisses of your blessed feet.

NOw shal the whole world vnderstand and know, whether that your holines haue in you the bowels of fatherly loue and charity, and the zeale of the house of God, whether you be sent to make peace or discord, to congregate or disperse, or whether you be that good shepheard, which giueth his life for his sheepe. Behold the doore beginneth now to bee opened, whereby the lost sheepe may returne againe vnto their owne fold, now is there good hope euen at hand, of the reconciliation of the Bohemians. If that your holinesse, as it is your duety, do helpe and further the same, you shall obtaine great glory, both in heauen and earth. But if peraduenture you goe about to let the same (which is not to be hoped for at your hands) all men will reproue you of impiety; heauen and earth will conspire against you, all men will forsake you. For how is he to be followed, which with one word may restore peace and quietnesse to the church, and refuseth to do it? But I conceiue a better hope in you, how that your holinesse without any excuse, will with your whole heart and mind, fauour this most sacred councel, & giue thanks vnto almighty God for his great goodnesse, that this congregation hath not departed. Beholde the ambassadours of this sacred councell are returned with great ioy and gladnesse from Egra, reporting how that through the grace of the holy Ghost, they haue firmely concluded with the ambassadors of the Bohemians, that is to say, of the Prages, Orphants and Thaborites, amongst whom was also present the captaines of their enemies, and specially Procopius; That a solemne ambassade of all the estates of the realme should come vnto the councell of Basill: After that a safe-conduct is sent vnto them by the said councell in forme conditioned, which shall be done with speed, this sacred congregation is maruellous exhilarate and ioyfull. For those our ambassabours affirme, that all things were handled with such charity at Egra, and that they did see such things amongst the Bohemians, that not without cause, they doe conceiue great hope of their reconciliation.

The ambassadors of the councell are returned from Egra.

And at the last gently imbracing one another, euen with teares of gladnesse, they departed from Egra: the Bohemians requiring our ambassadors, that the matter might bee ended with all expedition. They report also, that many things happened in that treaty, which if any man heard, and did not weepe for ioy, he might well thinke himselfe to bee but smally affectioned vnto Christ. As for three of the foure articles, they seeme not to make any great difficulty vpon. As touching the 4: that is, of the communion vnder both kinds, there is good hope that they will follow the iudgement of the councell. Who is it then that dare counsell your holinesse to persеuere any longer in the purpose of dissolution? for if the councell had not bin appointed at all, for so great hope and necessity; it ought to haue bin appointed in this place. How worthie praise & commendation should your holinesse do, if that you would leaue Italy and all other affaires, and come hither in your owne person; although you should need to bee caried in a wagon or litter? The keeping and defence of the temporall patrimony of the church, may well be disposed and done by legats and vicars. This is the true patrimony of the church, to win soules. For the church is not an heap of stones & walles. Christ hath not made you a keeper of castles and forts, but a pastor of soules. Therefore you should do that in your owne person, which is most necessarie and acceptable vnto Christ, and al other things by your substitutes. For so did the apostles, which to the intent they might the more freely attend to the preaching of the word of God, did institute 7. to serue the tables, and for the ministration of other inferior things. I heare that by the grace of God, your holines doth daily recouer and amend; and if so be, as it is said, you do visit some churches on foote, ye may also come hither on horsebacke, for you cannot goe vnto any thing more profitable or concordant to your office, then to goe vnto the place, where as innumerable benefits & goodnesse may spring. Let your holinesse vnderstand and consider wherein Christ whose viear you are, and S. Peter whose successor you are, and the apostles and holy bishops, did exercise and occupie themselues; and as you do succeed them in office, so succeede them in maners. But if peraduenture your holines cannot come hither, I doe counsell you, that for so great a benefit, you would send the more part of the reuerend lords cardinals of the court of Rome, and command all other prelats to come hither. Do not let or hinder them that are willing to come, as it is reported you do, but rather allure them to come hither.

What the church is.

Your holines may beleeue me, that onely charity moueth me to counsell you in this sort: bee yee not separate from your members, nourish your children as the hen doth her chickens vnder her wings. And if so be, that you will doe nothing else, yet speake this only word, Placet: that is to say, that it pleaseth you, that the councell of Basill should goe forward. For a few daies past, there came newes hither, for the which your holines ought altogether to cease from your dissolution. The reuerend father the archbishop of Lions, hath written vnto the councel, and vnto me also, how that the prelats of France haue assembled together in the city of Bituria, and there after long and exact examination haue concluded, that the councell is lawfully congregate in this place. And that it is necessary that it should be holden and celebrate here at this present; and how the prelats of France should come vnto it: hee also directed hither the cause which moued them so to conclude, the copie whereof I suppose is sent vnto your holines by some other. Whereupon then doth your holinesse stay? You haue gone about as much as in you lay, by your messengers, letters and diuers meanes to draw backe the prelats, and haue laboured with all your endeauor to dissolue the councell; yet notwithstanding as you do see, it is encreased day by day. And the more it is forbidden, the more are al mens minds enflamed to the cõtrary. Is not this then to resist the will of God? Why doe ye prouoke the church to anger? Why do ye stir vp the christian people? vouchsafe I pray you so to doe, that ye may get the loue and fauor of the people, and not the hatred: for all nations are greatly offended when they heare these your doings. Suffer not your holinesse to bee seduced by any man, which peraduenture shall inculcate feare vnto you, whereas there is nothing at all to be doubted; or that do perswade you this to be no lawfull councel. I know I should offend your holinesse if I should go about to proue the contrary; but it is better that I doe offend you a little in words, and profit you in my deeds: for a physition layeth a burning corrosiue vnto the disease, and healeth the sore: For the medicine cannot profit except it be sharpe and bitter in tast. Vnder this hope and confidence I will not feare to declare the truth: that it being knowne, your holines may the better prouide both for your selfe and the church. It dependeth vpon the councell of Constance whether this councell be lawfull or not. If that were a true councel, so is this also. No man seemeth to doubt whether that councell were lawfull, and likewise whatsoeuer was there decreed to be lawfull: for if any man will say, that the decrees of that councell are not of force, he must needs grant, that the depriuation of pope Iohn, which was done by the force of those decrees, to be of no effect. If that depriuation were not of effect; neither was the election of pope Martine of any force, which was done he being yet aliue. If Martin were no true pope, neither is your holines, which was chosen by the cardinall that he made made, wherefore it standeth no man more vpon to defend the decrees of that councell, then your holines; for if any decree of that councell be called into doubt; by like meanes may all the rest of the decrees be reuoked. And by like meanes, shall the decrees of any other councell bee of no force and effect: for by like reason, as the faith of one councell is weakened, all the rest shal also be weakened, according to S. Augustines saying in the 9. distinction capitulo, Si ad scripturas: Then, saith he, both the faith and all other sacraments shall be put in doubt, if that there be once any doubt made of the force and power of any councell lawfully congregate. There was a decree made in the councell of Constance, intituled Frequens. Whereby it was ordained, that the first councell after that, should bee holden within 5. yeeres, and another within 7. yeeres after that againe. The councell of Constance being ended, and the 5. yeeres passed, the councel of Papia or Sene was holden; after which 7. yeeres being also run ouer, this councell is begun to bee celebrate. To what end then is it expressed in the bull of the dissolution, amongst other causes, that the 7. yeere is already past? When as of necessity it ought to be passed before the councell can be celebrate. For these words, from 7. yeere or 5. yeere, signifie according to the law, that all parts of time should be passed, and the last day looked for. Wherefore it behoued that 7. yeeres to be fully complete, before this councell of Basil should begin. Like as 5. yeeres were fully expired, before that the councel of Papia did begin. But peraduenture some man will say, that it ought to haue begun the first day after the 7. yeer was expired. For otherwise the terme of the councell is passed. But hereunto we may answere, that it is not contained in the chapter Frequens, that except it were holden the first day, it should not bee holden at all, neither can it be gathered either by the words or meaning. For it is only required that it should be holden after 7. yeeres expired, but whether it be the 2. or 3. day, or the 3. or 4. moneth after the 7. yeer, it doth satisfie the chapter Frequens. For when the first day is come, then beginneth the power and liberty to celebrate the councel, but not afore, but it is not prohibited to celebrate it after; neither doth this word, In quinquennium; that is to say, against 5. yeere, next following, which is alledged in the chapter Frequens, and seemeth to be repeated also for the 7. yeeres, for it is not vnderstood that it is necessary to be holden the first day precisely after the 7. yeere, but because it should not be vnderstood of other 7. yeeres to come. For in speaking simplie of 7. yeere, it is vnderstood of 7. yeere next ensuing. Admit also that in the chapter Frequens, any of these words had bin ioyned with immediately following, as by and by, out of hand, immediately, or straight waies after, or such other words: yet ought they to be vnderstood with a certaine moderation, & distance of time, that assoone as might be conuenient; as these words are expounded by the lawyers and doctors, for they are inlarged and restrained, according to the subiect and diuers circumstances of the matters and affaires. For it is not by any meanes likely that it was the minds of those which made the decree, that considering the long iourneys and hard preparation of such affaires, and also the manifold impediments which may happen, that they would restraine so precise a time, euen at the first day, that if it were not then celebrated, it should not be holden at all: for by such subtill meanes it should also be holden euen in the first moment and very instant after the same yeere.

Eugenius pio uoketh the church.

A strong argument against Eugenius.

But forsomuch as words are ciuilly to bee vnderstood, this sense or vnderstanding is too far disagreeable. For if any man will say, then it is commanded to be prorogued, that is also forbidden in the chapter Frequens. He that doth so argue, doth not vnderstand himselfe, nor the force of the words. It is not prorogued if it bee begunne, the second or third moneth, but rather a continuation or execution of that which is in their power. For if it were a prorogation, then forsomuch as a prorogation doth sauor of the nature of the first delay, it could not bee begun before the time prorogued; but this happeneth not in our case: for albeit it were not begun in the first moneth, but in the second and third, it is not thereby concluded that it could not be begun in the first: but if there had bin any prorogation made till the second moneth, then it could not haue been begun in ỹ first: as for example, I promise to giue an 100. pounds after Easter, afore Easter it cannot bee required, but by and by after Easter it may be required: and albeit that I bee not vrged for it, notwithstanding I doe not cease to be bound: and if so be I be demanded it in the 2. or 3. moneth after, it is not thereby vnderstood that there is any prorogation made: Neither doth it follow, but that it might haue beene demanded in the beginning, which could not haue beene done, if that there had bin any prorogation made. Also it is the nature of prorogation to be made before the first terme or day be passed. For otherwise it is no prorogation, but a new appointment. And albeit it may be said, that then it may be long delaied; it is answered, that in this point, we must stand vnto the iudgement of the church, which considering diuers circumstances would thinke the time meete. For the liberty of celebrating of councels was institute for the profit and fauor of the church. What if it should happen that when the time commeth, in the place where a councell should be kept, there be a great plague, or some siege, which should continue by the space of 3. or 4. moneths, and the pope in the meane time doth not change the place according to the forme of the chapter Frequens, and that through such impediments, the prelats did not come the first day vnto the place, or if any were comming and were taken by the way, which if they had not beene taken, had bene present at the first day in the place appointed: is it therfore to be said that the power of the councell is past? or that the impediment ceasing, and the prelats comming thither, the councell cannot be holden? that truely were greatly absurd and too much preiudicial to the church of God: but in this our case, the cause is probable why that the prelats did deferre to come at the beginning of the time appointed: for so much as when the time drew neere, pope Martine died the 20. of February. For which cause, the prelats might well doubt vpon some impediment of the councell. Also they taried looking that some should come thither in the name of the pope, because they would not tarie in that place in vaine without a president. As for the legate which was appointed for the councell, whose presence all men taried for, before hee would prepare himselfe to that iourney, he came not at the time appointed vnto the councell, but went vnto Norenberge, to persecute the Bohemians, according to the commandement of pope Martine, which had enioyned him to goe first thither before he went to Basill.

The cause of the long delay of the prelats.

And the same legate being oftentimes required at Norenberge, that he should goe to Basill to hold the councell, hee answered, that he would not goe before he had the consent of the new bishop. This was the cause of the prelats delay, neither is it greatly to be imputed vnto the prelats, which suspected that pope Martine would not haue holden the councell, and feared to bring themselues in trouble; and good cause had they so to feare, through those things which happened in the councell of Sene. For there were many things spoken which caused great suspition. It was reported vnto me that many had said, I came vnto Germany to disturbe the councell.

The councell of Sene.

Also this was pope Martines mind and intent, that albeit the councell was not begun at the beginning of March, notwithstanding the authority of holding the councell should not be void. For he whē as the time of the councel approched, willed me that I should first go vntō Boheme, before I went vnto the councell: whereof also mention is made in the bull of the consistory dissolution.

But what neede we any other proofe, then by your holines letters? which by your letters dated the 2. Kalends of Iune, and were deliuered vnto me long after the time, by the space of 3. moneths, you doe command me that my businesse being done in Boheme, I should take my way vnto Basill to hold the councell, and there to foresee vnto all things as it was enioyned me, and ordained in the councell of Constance. The same also yee repeate in the bull of the dissolution brought vnto me by the lord Parentine, the words wherof are these. Vnto your circumspection. Since your going into Germany no prelats haue assembled in Basill for the celebrating of the councell: wee gaue you in commandement that in the meane time you should be diligent about the expedition against the Bohemian hereticks, which is committed to your charge, and afterward you should come vnto Basill the place appointed for the councell, & there to rule in our place in the name of the church. What is more euidēt then this? If any thing were doubtful, by the tenor of these letters it were euidently taken away. If any man would say, that neither P. Martin nor Eugenius could confirme the councell by writing of such letters, because there was a prorogation which is prohibited by the chapter Frequēs, it is answered, that there is no prorogation, but execution of that which is in power, or a declaration that it is not necessary to hold the councel precisely euen at the beginning. Also it is no prorogation. For a prorogation is made before the terme is expired & not after: for after, it is rather called a new indiction or appointment. And if any man will say that there can bee no new indiction made, then may this be obiected; How could the councell of Bononia be newly appointed? If they wil answere, that the appointment of the councell of Bononia was of force, because the councell of Basill was dissolued by your holines, then I haue my intent. For if it were dissolued; Ergo, it was a councell before, because it presupposeth the habit. If it were a councell before, then, as hereafter shal be proued, it could not be dissolued without the consent of the councell: what can bee more answered hereunto? For the greater declaration and euidence of the matter, the abbat of Virgilia euen vpon the same day of the time appointed or afore, gathering together the prelats of the great church and many other prelats and notable men, made a solemne protestation, how the time was come to celebrate and hold the councell, and that he was come vnto Basil for the same purpose, requiring them that they would conferre and intreate together, vpon matters touching the councell, and hereupon there is a publike instrument or a testimoniall.

Within a moneth after the ambassadors of the Vniuersity of Paris came thither, and began to entreate of matters touching the councell, writing also vnto the emperor, and to the other princes of Germany, that they should send vnto the councell; which letters I my selfe did see; neither doth the small number of men let; for where as authority is, a great number is not required, according to the saying of Christ, where as 2. or 3. are gathered gathered together in my name, I am in the midst of them. Vpon the which authority, the councels are grounded. Now therfore your holinesse doth manifestly see the said obiection to be but friuolous. For to what end should any dissolution be made, if it had not been a councel? Wherefore it is not to be doubted, but that it was a lawful councell, and canonically congregate. And peraduenture it is scarsly found where any councell hath been confirmed by so many authorities as this, that is to say, by the two councels before passed, of Constance and of Sene, and confirmed by two bishops of Rome.

Besides this, I haue heard that some do report at Rome, that I could not call the prelats vnto the councell, because that clause was not added in the bull of pope Martin. I greatly maruell why this should be obiected, specially seeng that not I alone haue called them, but I together with the rest which are here assembled in the councell. It is a maruellous matter; pope Martin gaue me authority by the aduice of the councell to roote out heresies, to pacifie kingdomes, to reforme the manners of euery state of Christendome, and yet they will say that I cannot cite them. Power is giuen me to iudge and to condemne, and haue I not also power to cite? The law doth say; vnto whom any power or iurisdiction is committed, all things seeme to be committed vnto him, without the which he cannot exercise his iurisdiction; for how could all the premisses be done, if the prelats or others should not come hither? Also why is it said in the chapter, Ego enim de iureiurando, I will come vnto the synod if I be called, if he cannot be called? By whom then is it presupposed that he should be called, but only by the councell, or by him which ruleth the councell? Also the whole eighteenth distinction intreateth of no other matter, but that the bishops being called vnto the councell, if they come not, that they may bee excommunicat and suspended. Let these men reade the booke of councels of S. Isidore, and they shall finde how that in many councels, the prelats haue been called by the synod. Now it remaineth, that we should declare, whether the dissolution be of force or no. Wherein I doe agalne feare to moue your holinesse vnto anger. But charity forceth me thereunto; for peraduenture your holinesse doth thinke the dissolution to be effectuall, and therefore doe persuere in it; whereby, forsomuch as many offences may rise, my conscience doth moue me, not to hold my peace. First of all the chapter Frequens, declareth, that it is not of force; for if prorogation be forbidden and prohibited, which is a small matter, much more is dissolution; which is a greater matter: for it is a greater matter to take away, then to defer; for by proroging, a thing is but deferred, and by dissoluing, it is vtterly taken away. Also these men say, that the said constitution in the chapter Frequens, may be made void, forsomuch as soone as the councell is begun, it may bee dissolued without any thing done, as it is said that it was done at Senes; and now they say also that your holinesse hath been peruersly informed touching the dissolution. They say also, that the said dissolution doth manifestly tend to the subuersion of faith, the ruine of the church, & the trouble of the christian people. Therefore it cannot be done, neither obeied.

They say moreouer, that the said dissolution could not be made, by meanes of a certaine decree of the councell of Constance in that behalfe prouided. That in such matters as appertaine vnto faith, the extirpation of sinne, and reformation of the church in the head and in the members, that all men of what estate or condition soeuer they be, yea the pope himself, should be bound to obey the statutes, precepts, and ordinances of euerie generall councell, and except they did obey, to punish them. Marke how that these things, to haue power to determine vpon any man, to command him and punish him, if he be not obedient, are signes of superiority, in those matters which he doth decree, command or punish: and to be bound to obedience, to be subiect and obey the same, are signes of inferiority in the said cases. Ergo, in the foresaid cases, seeing that the pope, as they say, is vnder the councell, which also hath been: in that for one of the said three cases, the councell did depriue Iohn, and for the other Benedict, neither could the pope dissolue the councell; in that he is inferior vnto the councell, cannot binde or compell the superior: As in the chapter Cum inferior, otherwise it should containe in it a contradiction, that hee is bound to obey, and is not bound to obey, because he may dissolue; for how should he be obedient vnto the ordinance and decree of the councell, if he may annihilate and take away the same ordinance and decree? This councell is congregate for the rooting out of heresies, for the making of peace, and reformation of manners; and in the first session it did ordaine, that their whole intent and respect should be thereunto, and that he which should procure to let the councell, to prorogue or alter it, should be punished, and haue processe against him as against a common disturber of the peace, &c. If it may be dissolued, it is euident that they doe not obey the said ordinance, whereby this also must of necessity be granted, that if it may be dissolued, the decree of the councel of Constance is of no force.

This is also proued by another reason. No man doubteth but if any controuersie of heresie should be moued against any bishop of Rome, that he could not dissolue the councell: For if he might dissolue the councell, he could not be iudged, which were contrary to the chap. Si Pa. dist. 40. Ergo, like as it is in heresie, so is it in the two other cases. For these three were pacified by the councell of Constance: for thus speaketh the councell: as it is in the chapter, Si Papa in illo vno. And as I haue before said, the councell of Constance allowed this decree, throgh the which they depriued Peter de Luna, for making of a schisme, and pope Iohn for the deformity of his life.

And albeit there be certaine lawes that say, the principall seat cannot be iudged of any man: and againe, no man iudgeth the chiefe seat: and, no man saith vnto himselfe, why doest thou so? There are to be vnderstood in these three cases: first, that there was prouiso made for the faith in the chapter Si Papa: and in the other two points, by the decree of Constance. Otherwise it should be vnderstood, without any exception, that the first seat, &c. and then the chapter Si Papa. 40. distinct. and the said decree of Constance should be false. If the chapter Si Papa had added causes of heresies, no man would haue doubted vpon these two cases, touching the said sentence; so likewise no man ought to doubt of the decree of the councell, that it was made by the authority of the pope, and representeth the vniuersall church. And if any man would say, that in all councels the authority of the pope is excepted: I answer, that it is true, when as the person of the pope is not specially included. But if he be specially included, he cannot be excepted, because it should sauor of contradiction. Most blessed father, God is my witnesse, that I haue spoken these things with great anguish and sorrow of mind, but I am forced so to speake, that your holinesse may cease from the said dissolution, lest there might happen infinite euils in the church of God. If your holinesse did see my pure mind, my vpright conscience, and entire affection towards you, whereby I am moued to write those things, euen for verie loue you would imbrace and kisse me, and without doubt loue me as your owne sonne. I haue often said, and now do say and protest before God and man, that you will be the cause of schisme and infinite mischieses, if you doe not alter and change your mind and purpose. Almighty God preserue your holinesse in the prosperity of a vertuous man. Vnto whose feet I doe most humbly recommend me. From Basil the 5. day of Iune.

Thus endeth the epistle of cardinall Iulian, written vnto pope Eugenius. Wherein, forsomuch as mention is made, how that the Bohemians had promised to send their ambassadors vnto the councell, and as before is partly touched in the Bohemian story, their comming into Basil, and propounding of certaine articles, wherein they dissented from the pope, we doe not thinke it any thing differing from our purpose, to annex a briefe epitome, declaring the whole circumstance of their ambassage, their articles, disputations and answers which they had at the said councell of Basil, with their petitions and answers vnto the same. Faithfully translated out of Latin by F. W.

In like maner Aeneas Syluius also with his own hand and writting, not only gaue testimony to the authority of this councell, but also bestowed his labor and trauell in setting forth the whole story thereof. Notwithstanding, the same Syluius afterward being made pope, with his new honor, did alter & change his old sentence. The epistle of which Aeneas, touching the commendation of the said councell, because it is but short, and will occupy but little rome, I thought hereunder, for the more satisfying of the readers mind, to insert.

✻ An epistle of Aeneas Syluius, to the Rector of the Vniuersitie of Colen.

An epistle of Aeneas Syluius, in defence of the councell of Basil.

TO a christian man, which will be a true christian indeed, nothing ought to be more desired, then that the sincerity and pureneſse of faith, giuen to vs of Christ by our fore-fathers, be kept of all men immaculate: and if at any time any thing be wrought or attempted against the true doctrine of the Gospell, the people ought with one consent to prouide lawfull remedy, and euery man to bring with him some water to quench the generall fire: neither must we feare how we be hated or enuied, so we bring the truth. We must resist euery man to his face, whether he be Paul or Peter, if he walke not directly to the truth of the Gospell. Which thing I am glad, and so are we all, to heare that your Vniuersity hath done in this councell of Basil. For a certaine treatise of yours is brought hither vnto vs, wherein you reprehend the rudenesse, or rather the rashnesse of such, which do deny the bishop of Rome, and the consistory of his iudgement, to be subiect vnto the generall councell, and that the supreame tribunall seat of iudgement, standeth in the church, and in no one bishoppe. Such men as deny this, you so confound with liuely reasons and truth of the scriptures, that neither they are able to slide away like slippery Eeles, neither to cauill or bring any obiection against you. These be the words of Syluius.

The tribunall seat standeth not in one bishop.

Furthermore, as touching the authority and approbation of the foresaid councell, this is to be noted, that during the life of Sigismund the emperor, no man resisted this councell. Also, continuing the time of Charles the seuenth, the French king, the said councell of Basil was fully and wholly receiued thorow all France. But after the death of Sigismund, when Eugenius was deposed, and Felix duke of Sauoy was elected pope, great discords arose, and much practise was wrought.

wrought. But especially on Eugenius part, who being now excommunicat by the councell of Basil, to make his part more strong, made eighteen new cardinals. Then he sent his Orators vnto the Germans, laboring by all perswasions to dissolue the councell of Basil. The Germans at that time were so diuided, that some of them did hold with Felix, and the councell of Basil: other some, with Eugenius and the councell of Ferraria: and some were Neuters. After this, the French king being dead, which was Charles the seuenth, about the yere of our Lord 1444. the pope beginneth a new practise, after the old guise of Rome, to excite (as is supposed) the Dolphin of France by force of armes, to dissipate that councell collected against him. Who leading an army of fifteene thousand men into Alsatia, did cruelly waste and spoile the country: after that, laid siege vnto Basil, to expell and driue out the prelats of the councell. But the Heluetians most stoutly meeting their enemies with a small power, did vanquish the Frenchmen, and put them to sword and flight: like as the Lacedemonians only with three hundred did suppresse, and scattered all the mighty army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ.

Although Basil thus by the valiantnes of the Heluetians was defended, yet notwithstanding the councell through these tumults, could not continue by reason of the princes ambassadors, which shrunke away and would not tary: So that at length Eugenius brought to passe, partly through the helpe of Frederike (being not yet emperor, but laboring for the empire) partly by his orators (in the number of whom was Eneas Syluius aboue mentioned (amongst the Germans) that they were content to giue ouer both the councell of Basil, and their neutrality.

Fredericke of Austrich crowned emperor, great grandfather to this Ferdinando.

This Fredericke of Austrich being not yet emperor, but towards the empire, brought also to passe, that Felix, which was chosen of the councell of Basil, to be pope, was contented to renounce & resigne his papacy to Nicolas the fifth, successor to Eugenius, of the which Nicolas, the said Fredericke was confirmed at Rome to be emperor, and there crowned, anno 1451.

As these things were doing at Basil, in the meane season, pope Eugenius brought to passe in his conuocation at Florence, that the emperor and the patriarke of Constantinople, with the rest of the Grecians there present, were perswaded to their comming home: Insomuch, that with a publike execration, they did condemne afterward all those legats which had consented to these articles, that none of them should be buried in christian buriall: which was, anno 1439. Ex Casp. Peucer.

And thus endeth the story, both of the councell of Basil, and of the councell of Florence, also of the emperor Sigismund, and of the schisme betweene pope Eugenius, and pope Felix, and also of the Bohemians. The which Bohemians notwithstanding all these troubles and tumults aboue said, did right well, and were strong enough against all their enemies, till at length through discord, partly betweene the two preachers of the old and new citie of Prage, partly also through the discord of the messengers and captaines, taking sides one against the other, they made their enemies strong, and enfeebled themselues. Albeit afterward, in processe of time, they so defended the cause of their religion, not by sword, but by argument and disputation, that the bishop of Rome could neuer yet to this day, remoue the Thaborites and citie of Prage, from the communion of both the kinds, nor could euer cause them to keepe the conditions, which in the beginning of the councell was enioyned their priests to obserue, as testifieth Cochleus, lib. 8. hist. Huss. With whom also recordeth Antoninus, who in 3. part. hist. saith; That the doctrine of the Bohemians, which he termeth by the name of Zizania, did take so déepe roote with them, and grew so fast, that afterward, neither by fire nor sword, it could be extinct. Anton. 3. part. hist. tit. 22. cap. 10.

Ex Antonin. 3. part. tit. 22. c. 10.

Concerning the which Bohemians, briefly and in a generall sum, to recapitulate their whole acts and doings, here is to be noted, that they in their owne defence, and in the quarrell of John Hus, and Jerome of Prage, prouoked by their catholike aduersaries to war, fighting vnder Zisca their captaine, had eleuen battels with the popes side, and euer went away victors.

Ex hist. Caspari Peucer. lib. 5.

Ex Paral. Abb. Vrsp. in Epitaphio Ioan. Zisc. Moreouer, in the history of Peucer it is testified that pope Martin 5. sending for the bishop of Winchester then cardinall, had leuied 3. maine armies, intending to ouerrun all the Bohemians: one army of the Saxons vnder the prince elector, the second of the Frankones, vnder the marquesse of Brandenburge, the third of Renates, Bauarians, and Suechers, vnder Otto archbishop of Treuers. With these, Sigismund also the emperor and cardinall Iulian the popes legat (who at last was slaine in war, and being spoiled of all his attire, was left naked in the field) ioyned all their force. Who ioyning together fiue times (saith the story) with fiue sundry battels, assailed and inuaded the Bohemians: at euery which battell, fiue times the said aduersaries stricken and danted with a sudden feare, ran away out of the field, leauing their tents with all their implements and furniture behind them, before any stroke was giuen. Ex Casp. Peuc. lib. 5. Whereby it may appeare, the holy angels of God to fight for them which imbraced the sincere doctrine of Christs Gospell.

Marueilous feare fallen vpon the popes army.

Gods holy Angels pitch their tents about them which feare him. Psal. 34.

Thus the Bohemians through the mighty protection of almighty God, continued a long time inuincible, during all the life of Zisca, and also of Procopius, till at length through discord growing betweene them and their captaines Procopius and Mainardus, they were subdued vnto their enemies.

And here by the way, is not to be omitted the wicked and cruell fact of Mainardus, who after the death of Procopius, thinking to purge the realme of Boheme of those chiefe and principall souldiers, which had béen long expert and trained vp in wars, found meanes by a proclamation made, as though he would war against other countries of their enemies bordering about them, craftily to traine all them which were disposed to take wages, into certaine barnes or houels prepared for the same purpose, and so shutting the doores vpon them, the wicked dissembler set fire vpon them, and burnt of them diuers thousands, and so brought the rest by that meanes vnder subiection to the emperor during his life time, which after that continued not long. Ex Aene. Syl. The which souldiers, if they had fought so much for the catholike liberties of the pope and his church, as they had fought against him, it is maruell if the pope had not dignified them all for holy martyrs. But they that kill with the sword (saith Christ) shall perish with the sword. Notwithstanding, the cruell deceit of Mainardus, is worthy of all men to detested.

During this businesse among the bishops beyond the sea, in the meane time our bishops here also in England were not vnoccupied. Whether it be the nature of the country that so giueth, or whether the great liuings and wealthy promotions of the clergy doe draw with them a more insensible vntowardnesse in Gods religion, hard it is to say: this is manifest to all them which wil reade and marke our stories from time to time, that in England is more burning & slaying for religion and for all other matters; more blood shed among vs, then in any other land or nation in Christendome besides. After the burning of Richard Houeden, of Nicolas Canon, and of Thomas Bagly priest, aboue recorded, pag. 612. whom the bishops condemned to death, anno 1431. not long after, about the yére of our Lord, 1439, which was the eighteenth of the raigne of king Henry the sixth, they had another poore man by the backe named Richard Wiche priest, mentioned both in Robert Fabian, and also in another old English chronicle borowed of one Perminger. What his opinions were, they doe not expresse. This they record, that this Richard Wiche first was degraded, then burned at the tower hill for heresie. Some do affirme, that he before his death reuolted, but that séemeth by his burning not to be true.

Anno 1439. Richard Wiche priest, martyr. Ex Fabian. part. 7. Ex antiquo alio Chronico.

It is also testified of him, that before his death he spake (as prophecying) that the posterne of the tower should sinke; which also afterward came as he said to passe, wherefore of many of the people he was counted for an holy man: Insomuch that (as it is affirmed) they came to the place where he was burnt, and there made their oblations & praiers, and areared a great heape of stones, and set vp a crosse there by night: so that by this meanes a great clamor ran vpon the church-men, and especially vpon such as put him to death. Then to cease the rumor, the king gaue commandement to punish such as went thither on pilgrimage. The copie whereof is here to be séene as followeth.

Richard Wiche after his death taken for a saint.

Rex vicecomitibus London. & Midd. salutem. Albeit Richard Wiche late clerke, who heretofore long sithence heretically did hold, teach, and publikely preach certaine heresies and erroneous opinions in many places within our realme of England: And for the same many yeeres now past being iudicially conuicted, did before a Iudge in that behalfe sufficiently abiure all heresie generally, and afterward as a dogge returning to his vomit, did presume to maintaine, teach, and publikely preach his former errors and heresies, so that he was worthily adiudged a Relapse: And againe, being impeached for the same before the reuerend father in God Robert bishoppe of London, his lawfull Ordinary, was called forth to iudgement, and being before him, did iudicially confesse his errors and heresies: for the which cause the said reuerend father, vpon mature deliberation by him the said reuerend father first had with the aduice of the learned in the law, his assistants lawfully proceeding against the said Richard, did by his sentence definitiue, pronounce and adiudge him to be a Relapse, and did degrade him from the order and dignity of priesthood, and took from him all priestly ornaments, and depriued him of all priestly function and priuiledge (according to iustice) and last of all, turned him ouer to the secular power as the manner is: and afterwards you, by our princely commandement and warrant, did according to the law of our realme for his last punishment, consume the body of the said Richard to ashes, being a Relapse conuict, and degraded as a notorious traytour, not onely against God, but also against vs and our crowne and dignity. All which notwithſtanding, certaine our ſubiects (as we haue been ſundry times informed) being pricked forward with a diabolicall ſpirit, practiſing of all likelihood not only ſedition, but alſo idolatry within our realme, are not afraid publikely to affirme, that the ſaid Richard was altogether innocent of hereticall prauity. Nay rather they doe moſt ſhamefully with their vaine deuices, and wickedly conceiued imaginations, blaze abroad that he was, and died, a good, iuſt, and an holy man, and that he doth many miracles, (whereas indeed no ſuch miracles be done by him.) Which diſordinate perſons, we may well and vpon probable cauſes repute and deeme culpable, not only of hereticall prauity, but alſo of high treaſon, and as rebels to our perſon, Maieſtie, and violators of the peace and dignity of our realme, as with all breakers and treſpaſſers againſt the ſacred canons of the church, who dare ſo preſumptuouſly aduenture to worſhip the ſaid Richard as a Saint, whereas it is not lawfull to worſhip any manner of perſon, be he neuer ſo holy, before he be canoniſed by the authority of the biſhop of Rome. We therefore being very carefull for the good preſeruation of our peace, and deſirous to aboliſh from out al the coaſts of the ſame all maner idolatry, do charge and command you, that in certaine places within your liberties, where you ſhall thinke moſt conuenient; you cauſe forthwith proclamations to be made on our behalfe, ſtraitly charging, that no perſon from henceforth preſume to reſort to the place where the ſaid Richard was executed vnder colour of Pilgrime, or for any other cauſe of deuotion whatſoeuer, nor ſend any offering thither, nor worſhip him hereafter openly or ſecretly, nor adiudge, eſteeme, repute, name, or talke of him, as otherwiſe iuſtified or innocent, then ſuch as the ſaid reuerend father by his former definitiue ſentence hath pronounced him to be, vpon paine and penalty to be taken and reputed for an heretike, or a fauorer of heretikes, and to receiue condigne puniſhment prouided for heretikes. And that you arreſt all and euery perſon whom you ſhall finde to doe any thing contrary to this our proclamation, and the ſame ſo arreſted, commit to our priſon, there to remaine vntill wee ſhall thinke good to ſend countermaund for their deliuerance. Witneſſe the king at his Manor of Eſtampſted, the 15. day of Iuly, in the 18. yeere of his raigne.

Like writs, and to the ſame effect were directed to all the Sheriffes thorow all the realme, bearing all one and the ſame date. By the vertue of which letter, the Maior and Sheriffes did vſe ſuch diligence, that ſhortly after, that concourſe and reſting of the people was left off.

Ex Regiſt. Henr. Chicheſtel.

After the burning of this man, which was about the month of June, in the ſame yeere about Nouember, a conuocation was called by Henry archbiſhop of Canturbury, wherein was propounded among the clergy, to conſult with themſelues what way were beſt to be taken, for the remouing away the law of Premuniri facias; for ſo were the hearts then of the temporalty ſet againſt the eccleſiaſticall ſort, that where any vantage might be giuen them by the law, they did nothing ſpare, by reaſon whereof, the churchmen at that time were greatly moleſted by the ſaid law of Premuniri, and by the kings writs, and other inditements, to their no ſmall annoiance. By long cõſultation and good aduiſement, at laſt this way was taken, that a petition or ſupplication ſhould be drawne and preſented to the king, for the abolifhing of the foreſaid law of Premuniri facias, and alſo for the reſtraining of other briefes, writs, and inditements, which ſeemed then to lie heauy vpon the clergy. This bill or ſupplication being contriued and exhibited by the archbiſhop of Canturbury and of Yorke, vnto the king ſtanding in need the ſame time, of a ſubſidie to be collected of the clergy: this anſwer was giuen to their ſupplication on the kings behalfe: That forſomuch as the time of Chriſtmas then drew neere, whereby he had as yet no ſufficient leaſure to aduiſe vpon the matter, he would take therein a farther pauſe. In the meane time, as one tendering their quiet, he would ſend to all his officers and miniſters within his realme, that no ſuch briefes of Premuniri, ſhould paſſe againſt them or any of them, from the ſaid time of Chriſtmas, till the next parliament, anno 1439. Ex Regiſt. Cant.

The kings anſwer to the bill of the clergy, touching the law of Premuniri.

In my former edition of Acts and Monuments, ſo haſtily raſhed vp at that preſent, in ſuch ſhortneſſe of time, as in the ſaid booke thou maieſt ſee (gentle reader) declared and ſignified: among many other matters therein contained, there is a ſhort note made of one Eleanor Cobham, duchelle of Glocelter, and of ſir Roger Orley knight (prieſt, it ſhould haue been printed,) which two perſons, about the yeere of our Lord 1440. or the next yeere following, were condemned, the one to death, the other to perpetuall priſon. Of this little ſhort matter, maſter Cope the popes ſcout, lying in priuy wait to ſpie faults in all mens workes, whereſoeuer any may appeare, taketh pepper in the noſe, and falleth againe vnto his old barking againſt me, for placing theſe foreſaid perſons in my booke of Martyrs; but eſpecially he thinketh to haue great vantage againſt me, for that in the ſame ſtory, I doe ioyne withall one Margaret Iourdeman, the witch of Eye, condemned alſo with them the ſame time, and burned for practiſing the kings death by an image of wax, &c. To anſwere hereunto, firſt I ſay (as I before ſaid) that I profeſſe no ſuch title to write of Martyrs, but in generall to write of acts and monuments paſſed in the church and realme of England. Wherein, why ſhould I be reſtrained from the free walke of a ſtory writer, more then other that haue gone before me?

A briefe anſwer to Cope, concerning lady Eleanor Cobham.

Secondly, touching my commendation of ſir Roger Orley, and the lady Eleanor, if maſter Alane be therewith offended: I anſwere, that I commended them for fauoring and fauoring of the truth of Chriſts doctrine: For the fact, if any ſuch were in them, I do not commend them. And although I did commend them, yet neither did I it with any long tarying vpon it, nor yet altogether vpon mine owne head, without ſome ſufficient warrant of authority. For why may not I as wel beleeue John Bale, as M. Alane beleeue M. Fabian: eſpecially ſeeing I doe know, and was priuy, that the ſaid John in recogniſing his centuries, followed altogether the hiſtory of Leland. De Catalogo virorum illuſtrium; which booke being borrowed of maſter Cheeke, I my ſelfe did ſee in the hands of the foreſaid John Bale, what time we were both together, dwelling in the houſe of the noble lady ducheſſe of Richmond. Wherfore if he thinke me ſo leaud to ſpeake without mine authors, he is deceiued. And if he thinke mine authors not to be beleeued, then let this Nomothetes, or iolly Dictator, come forth and preſcribe vs a law, what authors he would haue vs to take, and what to refuſe. For elſe why is it not as free for me to credit John Bale, and Leland, as for him to credit Robert Fabian, and Edward Hall, eſpecially ſeeing they had ſeene his bookes and workes left behind him, whereupon they might better iudge, and ſo did neuer theſe?

To the third obiection.

Thirdly, for the name of Roger Orley; if Cope deny that there was any ſuch name in ſtories mentioned, but that there was one called Roger Bolingbroke, &c. hereby it may appeare, that either his prompter out of England deceiued him, or elſe that he going no further but to Fabian and Hall, lacketh no good will in him, but only a little matter to make a perfect ſycophant. And admit the ſaid name of Orley could not be found in thoſe writers, yet were it not impoſſible for a man to haue two names, eſpecially if he were a religious man, to beare the name of the towne where he was borne, beſide his owne proper ſurname. But now what if I (maſter Cope) can auouch and bring forth to you the name of Roger Orley out of ſufficient record, which you ſeeme not to haue yet read? Haue ye not then done well, and properly (thinke you) ſo bitterly to flie in my face, and to barke ſo eagerly all this while at mine ſhine in the water, hauing no more cauſe almoſt againſt me, then againſt the man in the mone? And now leſt you ſhould thinke me ſo much vnprouided of iuſt authority for my defence, as I ſee you vnprouided of modeſty and patience: write you to your prompter or ſubornor (whereſoeuer hee lurketh here in England) to ſend you ouer vnto Louane the booke of John Harding a chronicler, more ancient then either Fabian or Hall, printed in the houſe of Richard Grafton, anno 1543. where turne to the fol. 223. fac. b. lin. 19. and there ſhall you finde and reade theſe words:

Againe, the Church and the king curſedly,
By helpe of one maſter Roger Orley, &c.

By the which words, ye muſt neceſſarily confeſſe Roger Orley to be the name of the man, either elſe muſt ye needs deny the author. For otherwiſe, that maſter Roger Bolingbroke was the onely helper to the ducheſſe in that fact, by no wiſe it can ſtand with the ſtory of theſe authors, which ſay, that foure other beſides him were condemned for the ſame crime, &c. And moreouer, though the ſaid ſir Roger Orley was no knight (as I haue ſaid in my former edition) yet this ye cannot deny, by the teſtimony of them that haue ſeene his workes, but that he was a prieſt, which you will grant to be a knights fellow. And thus much for the name and condition of maſter Roger Orley.

Vid. Conſtar. 8. Bal. cap. 4.

Fourthly, as concerning Margaret Iourdeman, whom ye call the witch of Eye, ye offer me herein great wrong, to ſay that I make her a martyr, which was a witch: whereas I here profeſſe, confeſſe, and aſcertaine both you, and all Engliſh men, both preſent, and all poſterity hereafter to come, that this Margaret Iourdeman I neuer ſpake of, neuer thought of, neuer dreamed of, nor did euer heare of, before you named her in your booke your ſelfe. So far is it off, that I either with my will, or againſt my will, made any martyr of her.

To the fourth obiection.

Furthermore, I profeſſe and denounce in like maner, that neither haue you any iuſt or congrue occaſion in my booke ſo to iudge, much leſſe to raile of me. For where in erpreſſe words I doe ſpeake of the mother of the lady Young, what occaſion haue you thereby to ſlander me and my booke with Margaret Iourdeman: which Margaret, whether ſhe was a witch or not, I leaue her to the Lord. As for me, neither did I know of her then, nor did I meane of her now. But becauſe I couple her in the ſame ſtory, you ſay. To this I ſay, becauſe ſhee was the mother of a lady, I thought to ioyne her with another lady in the ſame ſtory, as in one pew together, although in one cauſe I will not ſay. And yet notwithſtanding I doe ſo couple the ſaid mother with the ducheſſe, in ſuch diſtinct difference of yeeres, that you maſter Cope might eaſily haue vnderſtood, or beſide you, no man elſe would haue thought thought the contrary, but that Margaret Iourdeman was neither here in my booke, nor yet in my memento. For the words of my story are plaine, where as the condemnation of the lady Eleanor, and of the mother of lady Young, being referred to the yeere of our Lord, 1441. I doe also in the same story (through the occasion of that lady) inferre mention of the mother of the lady Young, declaring in expresse words, that she followed certaine yeeres after, and in the end of that chapter, doe name also the yeere of her burning to be 1490. which was fiftie yeeres after the death of Onley, and Margaret Iourdeman: by the computation of which yeeres it is plaine, that no other woman could be noted in that place, but only the lady Youngs mother.

M. Cope raileth without a cauſe.

See the former edition, pag. 371.

But M. Cope continuing still in his wrangling mode, obiecteth againe, for that in my Calendar the said lady Youngs mother hath the next day in the Catalogue next after the death of Roger Onley, which day pertaineth properly to Margaret Iourdeman, which was burned the same day in Smithfield, and not to the ladies mother, &c.

What order was taken in placing the names and daies, what is that to me? If he which had the disposing of the Catalogue, did place them so in moneths, as he saw them ioyned in chapters, not perusing peraduenture nor aduising the chapters, that doth nothing preiudice the truth of my story, which sufficiently doth cleere it selfe in distincting them rightly in names and also in yeeres, as is afore declared.

The fifth obiection.

Fifthly and lastly, hauing thus sufficiently answered to your circumstances of persons, names, and times (M. Cope) I will now enter to encounter with you concerning the fact and crime obiected to the lady Duchesse, and to the rest: with this protestation before premised vnto the reader, that if the fact be true, and so done as is reported in the histories of Fabian, Hall, and Harding, I desire the reader then so to take me, as though I did not here deale withall, nor speake of the matter, but vtterly to haue pretermitted, and dispuncted the same. But forsomuch as the deed and offence laid and giuen forth against these parties, may be a matter made, and of euill will compacted, rather then true indeed: therefore I doe but only moue a question by way of history, not as defending, nor commending, nor commemorating the thing, if it be true, but only mouing the question, whether it is to be iudged true, or suspected rather to be false and forged, and so hauing briefly propounded certaine coniecturall suspicions or suppolals concerning that matter, to passe it ouer, neither medling on the one side nor on the other.

The story of the lady Eleanor and Roger Onley here pretermitted.

A question whether Eleanor the duchesse was culpable of treason against the king.

Certaine coniectures of the crime not to be true.

1. Coniecture.

The first coniecture, why it may be possible that this act of treason laid to the charge of the Duchesse, and Roger Onley, against the king, may be vntrue, is this: that the said Onley (otherwise named Bolingbroke) tooke it vpon his death, that they neuer intended any such thing as they were condemned for.

2. Coniecture.

The second coniecture: for that the lady Eleanor, and Onley seemed then to fauor and sauor of that religion set forth by Wickliffe, and therefore like enough that they were hated of the clergy. Furthermore, what hatred and practise of papists can doe, it is not vnknowne.

3. Coniecture.

The third coniecture: for that the said master Roger Onley falsly noted and accused of Necromancy, wrote a booke in purgation of himselfe, entituled, de Innocentia sua. Also another booke entituled, Contra vulgi superstitiones, recorded in Centu. 8. Bal. cap. 4. Whereupon it is not credible, that he which wrote professedly against the superstitions of the people, was ouertaken with that filth of Necromancy himselfe.

4. Coniecture.

The fourth coniecture: because this accusation against the Duchesse of Glocester, duke Humfreies wife, began not before, but after the grudge kindled betweene the cardinall of Winchester, and duke Humfrey her husband.

5. Coniecture.

Another coniecture may be hereof, for that, if the duchesse had intended any such hainous treason against the kings life, as by burning of a wax candle to consume him, it is not like (neither was there any such need) that she would haue made so many priuy to such a pernicious counsell, as the witch of Eye, master Roger Bolingbroke, master Thomas Southwel, and John Hume.

6. Coniecture.

Sirthly, it is not to be supposed, if any such hie treason had been wrought or pretended against the kings person by these, that either the duchesse should so escape with bearing a taper and banishment, or that John Hume should be pardoned his life, the fact being so hainous, that neither any durst aske his pardon, nor if it had been asked, it had not been like to bee granted.

7. Coniecture.

To these we may also adde another suppolall, rising vpon the words & forme of their acculation, as it standeth in Harding, Polychronicon, and other moe, wherein they were accused for working sorcery and inchantments against the church and the king. Now what sorcery can be wrought against the church, that is, the whole multitude of christians, let the reader iudge, and by the truth of this consider also the truth of the other, which was against the king. Furthermore, if by this church is ment the cardinall of Winchester, as like it is, then it may be coniecturall, that all this matter rose of that cardinall, who was then a mortall enemy to the house of Glocester, &c.

8. Coniecture.

Eighthly: and that all this was done and wrought by the said cardinall of Winchester, the witch concerning Eye, maketh the matter the more suspicious, seeing that towne of Eye, as Fabian witnesseth, was neere beside Winchester, and see of that bishop.

9. Coniecture.

Moreouer, for so much as Polydore Virgil, among other story authors, being a man as may be supposed, rather fauoring the cardinals part then the dukes, made no mention at all touching this treason, his silence thereof may minister matter not only to muse, but also to coniecture, that he had found something which made him to mistrust the matter. Otherwise it is vnlikethat hee would haue so mewed vp the matter, and passed it ouer without some mention.

10. Coniecture.

Finally and breefly: the frequent practises and examples of other times, may make this also more doubtfull, considering how many subtill pretences, after the like sort haue bin sought, and wrongfull accusations brought against many innocent persons. For (not to repeate the like forgeries against the lord Cobham, and Sir Roger Acton, &c.) why may not this accusation of the duchesse and Onley, be as false as that in the time of king Edward the fifth, which was laid to the charge of the queene and Shores wife by the protector, for enchanting & bewitching of his withered arme: which to be false, all the world doth know, and but a quarrell made, only to oppresse the life of the lord Hastings, and the lord Standley, &c. And thus maiest thou see, gentle reader, according to the Wise mans saying: Nihil nouum esse sub sole: Nihilque dictum, quod non sit dictum prius, &c.

Although these with many mo coniectures, may be alledged in some part of defence of this duchesse, and of her chaplaines and priests, yet because it may not be vnpossible againe, the matter laid against them to be true, I leaue it therefore at large as I finde it: saying as I said before, that if it be true which the stories say in this matter, thinke I beseech thee gentle reader, that I haue said nothing hereof. Only, because y matter may be disputable, and not vnpossible to be false, I haue but moued thereof a question, and brought my coniectures, leauing the determination and iudgement hereof to thy indifferent and free arbitrement. And if M. Cope be so highly offended with me, because in my first edition of Acts and Monuments, I durst name the lady Eleanor Cobham, and Roger Onley: let him take this for a short answer, because my leasure serueth not to make long brawles with him, that if I had thought no imperfections to haue passed in my former edition before, I would neuer haue taken in hand the recognition thereof now the second time, whereby to sponge away such motes, as I thought would seeme great stumbling blocks in such mens walks, which walke with no charity to edifie, but with malice to carpe and reprehend, neither admonishing what they see amisse in others, neither tarying while other men reforme themselues, and finally finding quarrels where no great cause is iustly giuen. And here an end with M. Cope for this time.

A briefe answere to master Copes cauillations, concerning duke Humfreys wife.

Forsomuch as in the processe before, mention was touched concerning the grudge betweene the cardinall, called the rich cardinall of Winchester, and the good duke Humfrey duke of Glocester, the kings vncle, and protector of the realme, order of story now requireth to open some part of that matter more at large. Wherein this first is to be vnderstood, that long before great flames of grudge and discord did burst out between these two. For as the noble heart of the duke could not abide the proud doings of the cardinall, so much against the cardinall in like maner sore enuied and disdained at the rule of the duke of Glocester. Notwithstanding, by the means of the duke of Bedford, the breaking out betweene them was before appeased and cured: yet not so, but that vnder imperfect amity, priuy hatred, as sparkles vnder the imbers, did still remaine: So that the cardinall, ioyning with the archbishop of Yorke, attempted many things of their owne presumption, contrary to the consent, not only of the king (being then vnder age) but also of the protector and gouernor of the realme. Wherewith the duke (like a true hearted prince) being not without iust cause offended, declared in writing to the king certaine complaints contained in 21. articles, wherein the cardinall and archbishop had transgressed, both against the king and his lawes. The tenor whereof more at large is in other stories expressed, the briefe abstract thereof followeth in a short summary here to be seene.

The contention between the cardinall of Winchester and duke Humfrey, lord protector.

{Anno 1440}

Ex Polychron.

¶ Certaine points or articles obiected by duke Humfrey, against the cardinall of Winchester.

Winchester presumeth to be cardinall against the mind of his king.

FIrst, complained to his soueraigne prince his right redoubted lord duke Humfrey, his vncle & protector of the realme, that the bishop of Winchester, in the daies of his father king Henry the fifth, tooke vpon him the state of a cardinall, being denied by the king, saying, that hee had as liefe set his owne crowne beside him, as to see him weare a cardinals hat; and that in parliaments, he not being contented with the place of a bishop among the spirituall persons, presumed aboue his order; which the said duke desired to be redressed.

Winchester incurreth the law of præmunire.

2. Item, whereas he being made a cardinall, was voided of his bishoprieke of Winchester, hee procured from Rome the popes popes bull, vnknowing to the king, whereby he toke againe his bishoprick, contrary to the common law of this realme, incurring thereby the case of prouision, and forfetting all his goods to the king, by the law of premuniri facias.

Winchester intermedleth himselfe to be the kings gouernor.

3. Item, hee complained that the said cardinall, with the archbishop of Yorke, intruded themselues to haue the gouernance of the king, and the doing vnder the king of temporall matters, excluding the kings vncle, and other temporall lords of the kings kinne, from hauing knowledge of any great matter.

The Cardinall defraudeth the king of his iewels.

4. Item, whereas the king had borowed of the cardinall foure thousand pounds, vpon certaine iewels, and afterward had his mony ready at the day to quit his iewels: the cardinall caused the treasure to conuert that mony to the paiment of another army, to keepe the iewels still to his owne vse and gaine.

The Cardinall deliuereth the King of Scots vpon his owne authoritie.

5. Item, he being then bishop of Winchester, and chancellor of England, deliuered the king of Scots vpon his owne authority, contrary to the act of parliament, wedding his neece afterward to the said king. Also, where the said king of Scots should haue paid to the king forty thousand pounds, the cardinall procured ten thousand marks thereof to be remitted, and yet the rest very slenderly paid.

The Cardinall playeth the marchant.

6. Item the said cardinall, for lending notable sums to the king, had the profit of the port of Hampton, where he, setting his seruants to be the customers, woll and other marchandise was, vnder that cloke, exported, not so much to his singular vantage, being the chiefe merchant, as to the great preiudice of the king, and detriment to his subiects.

7. Item, the cardinall in lending out great sums to the king, yet so deferred and delaied the loane thereof, that comming out of season, the same did the king little pleasure, but rather hinderance.

The Cardinall a defrauder of the king.

8. Item, where iewels and plate were prised at eleuen thousand pounds in weight, of the said cardinall forfetted to the king: the cardinall for loane of a little peece, gat him a restorement thereof, to the kings great dammage, who better might haue spared the commons, if the summe had remained to him cleere.

9. Item, where the kings father had giuen Elizabeth Berchamp three hundred marks of liuelode, with this condition, if shee wedded within a yeere, the cardinall, notwithstanding she was married two or three yeeres after, yet gaue her the same, to the kings great hurt, and diminishing of his inheritance.

The Cardinall taketh vpon him like a king.

10. Item, the cardinall hauing no authority nor interest to the crowne, presumed notwithstanding to call before him, like a king to the kings high derogation.

11. Item, that the cardinall sued a pardon from Rome, to be freed from all dismes, due to the king by the church of Winchester, giuing thereby example to the clergy, to withdraw their dismes likewise, and lay all the charge only vpon the temporaltie and poore commons.

12. 13. Item, by the procuring of the said Cardinall & Archbishop of Yorke, great goods of the kings were lost and dispended vpon needles Ambassades, first to Arras, then to Calice.

14. Item, it was laid to the charge of the said Cardinall and Archbishop, that by their meanes, going to Calice, the two enemies of the king, the Duke of Orleance, and Duke of Burgoyne, were deduced together in accord and alliance, who being at warre before betweene themselues, and now confederate together, ioined both together against the kinges townes and countreys ouer the sea, to the great danger of Normandy, and destruction of the kings people.

The Cardinall traitor to the crowne.

15. Item, by the Archbishop of Yorke, and the Cardinall, perswasions were moued openly in the kings presence, with allurements and inducements, that the king should leaue his right, his title, and honour of his crowne, in nominating him king of France, during certaine yeares, and that hee should vtterly abstaine, and bee content onely in writing, with Rex Angliæ, to the great note and infamy of the king, and all his progenitours.

16. 17. Item, through the sleight and subtlety of the said Cardinall and his mate, a new conuention was intended betweene the king, and certaine aduersaries of France, also the deliuerance of the Duke of Orleance was appointed in such sort, as thereby great dishonour and inconuenience was like to fall, rather of the kings side, then of the other.

The Cardinall a purchaser of the kings lands.

18. Item, that the Cardinall had purchased great lands and liuelodes of the king, the Duke being on the other side the sea occupied in warres, which redounded little to the worship and profite of the king; and moreouer had the king bound, to make him assure estate of all those lands by Easter next, as could be deuised by any learned counsell, or else the said Cardinall to haue and enioy to him and his heyres for euer, the lands of the Duchie of Lancaster in Northfolke to the value of 7. or 8. hundred markes by the yeare.

Peruerse counsell of the Cardinall.

19. Item, where the Duke the kings vncle, had often offered his seruice for the defence of the Realme of France, and the Duchie of Normandie, the Cardinall euer laboured to the contrary, in preferring other, after this singular affection: whereby a great part of Normandy hath been lost.

20. Item, seeing the Cardinall was risen to such riches and treasure, which could growe to him, neither by his Church, nor by inheritance (which he then had) it was of necessitie to be thought, that it came by his great deceites, in deceiuing both the king, and his subiects, in selling offices, preferments, liuelodes, captaynships; both heere, and in the realme of France and in Normandy, so that what hath bene there lost, he hath bene the greatest causer thereof.

The Cardinall a deceiuer of the king, and a briber.

21. Furthermore, when the said Cardinall had forfeited all his goods by the statute of prouision, he hauing the rule of the king, and of other matters of the realme, purchased from the Pope a charter of pardon, not onely to the defeating of the lawes of the Realme, but also to the defrauding of the king, who otherwise might and should haue had wherewith to sustaine his warres, without any tallag of his poore people, &c.

The Cardinall purchaseth a pardon against his premuniri.

When the king heard these accusations, he committed the hearing thereof to his Counsell, whereof the most part were spirituall persons. So, what for feare, and what for fauour, the matter was wincked at, and dalied out, and nothing said thereunto, and a fayre countenance was made to the Duke, as though no displeasure had bene taken, nor malice borne in these spirituall stomaches. But shortly after, the smoke hereof, not able to keepe in any longer within the spirituall brests of these charitable churchmen, brast out in flames of mischiefe: For vpon the necke of this matter, as witnesseth Fabian, Polychronicon, and Hall which followeth Polychronicon, first ensued the condemnation of Lady Elianour the Duches and her Chaplaines, as ye haue heard before. Whereby it may appeare, the said Duches more of malice then any lust cause, thus to haue bene troubled. Also within vi. yeares after, followed the lamentable destruction of the Duke himselfe, as hereafter more is to be declared.

And after the condemnation of Lady Elianour the Duches aforesaid, within few yeares, An. 1445. followed the death of Henry Chichelley Archbishop of Cant. by whome she was condemned in S. Stephens chappell at Westminster, for penance to beare a taper through cheapside three sundry times, and afterward outlawed to the Ile of Man, vnder the custody of Syr John Standley knight. This Henry Chichelley builded in his time 2. Colledges in the vniuersitie of Oxford, the one called Allsoule Colledge, the other named Barnard Colledge.

Proceeding now to the yeare, wherein suffered Humfrey that good Duke of Gloucester, which was ỳ yeare of our Lord 1447. first we will begin in few words to intreate of his life and conuersation: then of the manner and cause of his death. As touching the offspring and descent of this Duke: first, hee was the sonne of Henry the fourth, brother to king Henry the fift, and vncle to king Henry the first, assigned to be the gouernour and protector of his person. Of maners he seemed meeke and gentle, louing the common wealth, a supporter of the poore commons, of wit and wisdoume discreet and studious, wel affected to religion, and a friend to veritie, and no lesse enemie to pride and ambition, especially in haughty Prelates, which was his vndoing in this present euill world: And which is seldome and rare in such princes of that calling, he was both learned himselfe, and no lesse giuen to studie, as also a singular fauourer and patrone to them which were studious and learned. And that my commendation of him may haue the more credit, I will produce the testimonie of learned writers, who liuing in his time, not onely doe commend his famous knowledge, and ripenes of learning in him, but also commit and submit their workes to his iudgement to be examined. Of which writers, one is Petrus de Monte, writing De virtutum & vitiorum differentia: who in his Epistle dedicatory beginning with the singular commendation of this Duke, & afterward speaking De optimarum artium, liberaliumque scientiarum peritia, sayeth thus: Cui tu quidem omni conatui omni ingenio, atque studio incumbis: adeo & nihil tibi sine librorum lectione, iucundum, gratum aut certe delectabile videatur, &c. And in further processe of his worke, thus hee further declareth, saying: Delectaris autem non vna tantum arte, aut scientia, quanquam & id quidem esset satis: verùm ferè omnibus, earumque codices magna quadam auiditate legisti, &c. Besides this Petrus de Monte, let vs heare also the iudgement of another writer of the same age, named Lapiscastellius, who likewise dedicating to the said Duke Humfrey, his booke intituled Comparatio studiorum & rei militaris, Amongst diuers other wordes commendatory, hath these as follow: Ad te potissimum mitto, quod horum te optimum, & sapientissimum iudicem fore existimo, qui vt ex integerrimo patre domino Zenone Baiocensi episcopo, homine tuæ laudis cupidissimo, accepi: ita in his humanitatis studiis inuigilares, vt nullus toto terrarum orbe princeps, nec doctrina, nec eloquentia, nec humanitate tecum comparandus sit, &c. Many other arguments and places may bee brought to declare what is to bee esteemed of the learning and studious wit of this noble Prince.

Furthermore, as the learning of this Prince was rare and memorable, so was the discreete wisedome and singular prudence in him no lesse to be considered: as for the more manifest ſelf proue thereof, I thought here good amongſt many other his godly doings, to recite one example reported as wel by the pen of ſir Thomas More, as alſo by M. William Tindall, the true Apoſtle of theſe our latter daies, to the intent to ſee and note, not only the craftie working of falſe miracles in the clergy, but alſo that the prudent diſcretion of this high and mighty prince, the foreſaid duke Humfrey, may giue vs the better to vnderſtand what man he was. The ſtorie lieth thus.

In the young daies of this king Henry the firth, being yet vnder the gouernance of this duke Humfrey his protector, there came to S. Albons a certaine begger with his wife, and there was walking about the towne begging, fiue or ſix daies before the kings comming thither, ſaying that he was borne blinde, & neuer ſaw in his life, and was warned in his dreame, that he ſhould come out of Barwicke, where he ſaid he had euer dwelled, to ſeeke ſaint Albon, and that he had been at his ſhrine, and had not been holpen, and therefore he would goe and ſeeke him at ſome other place: for he had heard ſome ſay, ſince he came, that S. Albons body ſhould be at Colen, and in deed ſuch a contention hath there been. But of truth as I am ſurely informed he lieth here at S. Albons, ſauing ſome reliques of him, which they there ſhew ſhrined. But to tel you forth my tale, when the king was come, and the town full, ſuddenly this blind man at S. Albons ſhrine had his ſight againe, and a miracle ſolemnly rung, and Te Deum ſung, ſo that nothing was talked of in all the towne, but this miracle. So hapned it then, that duke Humfrey of Gloceſter, a man no leſſe wiſe then alſo well learned, hauing great ioy to ſee ſuch a miracle, called the poore man vnto him, and firſt ſhewing himſelfe ioyous of Gods glory, ſo ſhewed in the getting of his ſight, and exhorting him to meekneſſe, and to no aſcribing of any part of the worſhip to himſelfe, nor to be proud of the peoples praiſe, which would call him a good and godly man thereby: at laſt, he looked well vpon his eyne, and aſked whether he could ſee nothing at all in all his life before. And when as well his wife as himſelfe affirmed faſtly no, then he looked aduiſedly vpon his eyne againe, and ſaid: I beleeue you very well, for me thinketh ye cannot ſee well yet. Yes ſir, quoth he, I thanke God and his holy martyr, I can ſee now as well as any man. Yea can (quoth the duke) what colour is my gowne? Then anon the begger told him. What colour (quoth hee) is this mans gowne? He told him alſo, and ſo forth without any ſticking, he told him the names of all the colours that could be ſhewed him. And when the duke ſaw that, he bad him walke traitor, and made him to be ſet openly in the ſtockes: for though he could haue ſeene ſuddenly by miracle the difference betweene diuers colours, yet could he not by the ſight ſo ſuddenly tell the names of all theſe colours, except he had knowne them before, no more then the names of all the men that he ſhould ſuddenly ſee.

A falſe miracle eſpied.

Diſſimulation well puniſhed.

By this may it be ſeene how duke Humfrey had not only an head to diſcerne and diſſeuer truth from forged and fained hypocriſie, but ſtudy alſo and diligence likewiſe was in him, to reforme that which was amiſſe.

Commendation of duke Humfrey.

The good duke of Gloceſter.

And thus much hitherto for the noble proweſſe and vertues, ioyned with the like ornaments of knowledge, and literature ſhining in this princely duke. For the which, as he was both loued of the poore commons, and well ſpoken of all men, and no leſſe deſeruing the ſame, being called the good duke of Gloceſter, ſo neither yet wanted he his enemies and priuy enuiers, whether it was through the fatall and vnfortunate lucke of the name of that houſe, which is but a vaine and friuolous obſeruation of Polydor and Hall which followeth him, bringing in the examples of Hugh Spenſer, of Thomas of Woodſtocke, ſonne of king Edward the third, of this duke Humfrey, and after of king Richard the third, duke likewiſe of Gloceſter: or whether it was that the nature of true vertue commonly is ſuch, that as the flame euer beareth his ſmoke, and the bodie his ſhadow, ſo the brightneſſe of vertue neuer blazeth, but hath ſome diſdaine or enuy waiting vpon it: or elſe whether it was rather for ſome diuorcement from his wife, or for ſome other vice or treſpaſſe done (as ſeemeth moſt like truth) which God as well in dukes houſes correcteth, as in other inferior perſons, eſpecially where hee loueth. But howſoeuer the cauſe is to vs vnknowne, this good duke of Gloceſter, albeit being both the kings ſole vncle, and hauing ſo many ſtelwillers thorow the whole realme, yet lacked not his ſathan, lacked not his ſecret maligners. Of whom, ſpecially was Henry Beuford cardinall, biſhop of Wincheſter, and chancellor of England, who of long time diſdaining and enuying the rule & authority of this duke, firſt had diſpoſed and appointed himſelfe, to remoue the kings perſon from Eltham vnto Windſor out of the dukes hands, and there to put in ſuch gouernors as him liſted. After that, intending the dukes death, he ſet men of armes and archers at the end of London bridge, and fore-barring the high way with a draw-chaine, ſet men in chambers, cellers and windowes with bowes and arrowes and other weapons, to the purpoſed deſtruction both of the duke and his retinue, if God had not ſo diſpoſed to turne his tourney another way. Beſide other manifold iniuries and moleſtations, the ambitious Cardinall ſeeking by all meanes to be pope, procured ſuch trouble againſt him, that great diuiſion was thereby in the whole realme: inſomuch that all the ſhops within the city of London were ſhut in, for feare of the fauourers of theſe two great perſonages, for each part had aſſembled no ſmall number of people. For the pacifying whereof, the archbiſhop of Canturbury, & the duke of Quinber, called the prince of Portingale, rode 7. times in one day betweene thoſe two aduerſaries. Such were then the troubles of this tumultuous diuiſion within the realme, and all by the excitation of this vnquiet cardinall.

The enemies of the duke of Gloceſter.

The malicious working of the cardinall againſt the duke of Gloceſter.

Duer and beſide this cardinall afore mentioned, an other capitall enemy to the ſaid duke, was William de la Pole, firſt earle, then marqueſſe, at laſt duke of Suffolke, a man very ill reported of in ſtories, to be not only the organ and inſtrument of this good mans death, but alſo to be the noyance of the common wealth, and ruine of the realme. For by him and his onely deuice, was firſt concluded the vnprofitable and vnhonorable mariage betweene the king and lady Margaret daughter of the duke of Angeow: where as the king had concluded and contracted, a mariage before with the daughter of the earle of Arminik, vpon conditions ſo much more profitable and honorable, as more conuenient it is for a prince to marrie a wife with riches and friends, then to take a maid with nothing, and diſherit himſelfe, and his realme of old rights, and ancient inheritance; which ſo came to paſſe. And all this the good duke did well foreſee, and declared no leſſe; but his counſell would not be taken. Wherupon followed firſt the giuing away the duchy of Angeow, and the city of Maine, with the whole countrey of Maine, to Reiner duke of Angeow and father of the damſell, called then king of Sicile, and of Jeruſalem, hauing therof no peny profit, but only a vaine name to play withall.

Wil. de la Pole duke of Suffolk, the cauſe of the duke of Gloceſters death.

The vnprofitable mariage betweene king Henry the 6. and queene Margaret.

An other ſore enemy and mortall plague to this duke, was the quéene her ſelfe, lately before married to the king: Who being of hautie ſtomacke, and all ſet vpon glory, of wit and wiliues, lacking nothing, and perceiuing hir huſband to be ſimple of wit, and eaſie to be ruled, tooke vpon her to rule and gouerne both the king and kingdome. And becauſe the aduice and counſell of Humfrey duke of Gloceſter, was ſomewhat a ſtay that her authority and regiment could not ſo fully proceed, and partly becauſe the ſaid duke before did diſagree from that mariage, this manly woman and couragious quéene ceaſed not by all imaginations and practiſes poſſible, to ſet forward his deſtruction, hauing alſo for her helper herein the duke of Buckingham, &c.

Queene Margaret mortall enemy to the duke of Gloceſter.

The malice of a woman.

Theſe being his principall enemies and mortall foes, fearing leſt ſome commotion might ariſe, if ſuch a prince ſo neere the kings blood, and ſo deare to the people, and of all men ſo beloued, ſhould be openly executed and put to death, deuiſed how to trap him, and circumuent him vnknowing and vnprouided. For the more ſpeedy furtherance whereof, a parliament was ſummoned to be kept at Bury, Anno 1447. farre from the citizens of London, as William Tindall in his booke of practiſe writeth, where reſorted all the peeres of the realme, and amongſt them the duke of Gloceſter, thinking no harme to any man, and leſſe to himſelfe. Who on the ſecond day of the Seſſion, was by the lord Beamond high conſtable then of England, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham and other, arreſted, apprehended, and put in ward, and vpon the ſame all his ſeruants diſcharged and put from him, of whom 32. of the principall being alſo vnder arreſt, were diſperſed into diuers priſons, to the great murmuring and grieuance of the people. After this arreſt thus done, and the duke put into ward, the night after (ſaith Hall) ſixe nightes after (ſaith Fabian and Polychron) hee was found dead in his bed the 24. of Februarie, and his body ſhewed to the lords and commons, as though he had beene taken naturally with ſome ſudden diſeaſe. And although no wound in his body could be ſeene, yet to all indifferent perſons it might well be iudged, that he died of of no naturall pang, but of ſome violent hand. Some ſuſpected him to be ſtrangled, ſome that a whole ſpit was priuily forced into his body; ſome affirme that he was ſtifled betweene two fetherbeds. After the death of this duke, and his body being interred at ſaint Albones, after hee had politickly by the ſpace of 25. yéeres gouerned this realme, fiue of his houſhold, to wit, one knight, 3. eſquires, and a yeoman, were arraigned, and conuict to be hanged, drawne and quartered. Who being hanged and cut downe halfe aliue, the marques of Suffolke there preſent ſhewed the charter of the kings pardon, and ſo they were deliuered. Notwithſtanding, all this could not appeaſe the grudge of the people, ſaying that the ſauing of the ſeruants, was no amends for the murthering of the maſter.

The cruell death or martyrdome of the good duke of Gloceſter.

In this cruell fact of theſe perſons, which did ſo conſpire and conſent to the death of this noble man, and which thought thereby to worke their owne ſafety, the maruellous worke of Gods iudgement, appeareth herein to be noted, whs as in all other like cruell policies of man, ſo in this alſo turned all their policies cleane contrary. So that where the quéene thought moſt to preſerue her huſband in honor, and her ſelfe in ſtate, thereby both ſhe loſt her huſband, her huſband loſt his realme, the realme loſt Angeow, Normandy, the duchy of Aquitane, with all her parts beyond the ſea, Calice onely except, as in the ſequell of the matter, who ſo will reade the ſtories, ſhall right well vnderſtand.

{Anno 1448} The death of the cardinall, and maner of the same.

The nert yeere following, it followed also, that the cardinall, who was the principall artificer and ringleader of all this mischiefe, was suffered of God no longer to liue. Of whose wicked conditions, being more largely set forth in Edward Hall, I omit here to speake. What he himselfe spake on his death bed for example to other, I thought not best to pretermit. Who hearing that he should die, and that there was no remedie, murmured and grudged, wherefore hee should die hauing so much riches, saying: that if the whole realme would saue his life, he was able either by policy to get it, or by riches to buy it: adding and saying moreouer; Fie (quoth he) will not death be hired? nor will money doe nothing? when my nephew of Bedford died, I thought my selfe halfe vp the wheele, but when I saw mine other nephew of Glocester deceased, then I thought my selfe able to be equall with kings, and so thought to encrease my treasure, in hope to haue worne the triple crowne, &c. Ex Edouar. Hallo. And thus is the rich bishop of Winchester, with all his pompe and riches gone; with the which riches, he was able not onely to build scholes, colledges, and vniuersities, but also was able to sustaine the kings armies in warre (as is specified in stories) without any taxing of the commons.

The words of the cardinall of Winchester at his death.

For the which foundation, as there haue beene, and bee yet many students bound to yeeld gratefull thankes vnto God, so I must needes confesse my selfe to be one, except I will be vnkind.

Gods punishment vpon the Marques of Suffolke.

Among the other mischieuous aduersaries which sought and wrought the death of Humfrey duke of Glocester, nert to the cardinall of Winchester (who, as is said, died the nert yeere following) was William de la Pole, marques of Suffolke, who also liued not long after, nor long escaped vnpunished. For although he was highly exalted, by the meanes of the queene (whose mariage he onely procured) vnto the fauour of the king, and was made duke of Suffolke, and magnified of the people, and bare the whole swaie in the realme, whose acts and facts his vaineglorious head caused also by the assent of the commons, to be recorded, and substantially to bee registred in the rolles of the parliament, for a perpetuall renowne to him and all his posterity for euer: yet notwithstanding the hand of Gods iudgement still hanging ouer him, he enioyed not long this his triumphant victorie. For within 3. yeeres after the death and ruine of the cardinall, the voices of the whole commons of England, were vtterly turned against him, accusing him in the parliament at the blacke friers, for deliuerie of the duchie of Angeow, and the earledome of Maine: also for the death of the noble prince Humfrey duke of Glocester. They imputed moreouer to him the losse of all Normandie, laying vnto him that he was a swallower vp and consumer of the kings treasure, the expeller of all good and vertuous counsellors from the king, and aduancer of vitious persons, apparant aduersaries to the publike wealth: so that he was called in euery mans mouth a traitor, a murtherer, and a robber of the kings treasure.

The blithe glory of mans heart forgetting himselfe in honour. The commons vnconstant. The duke of Suffolke accused by the commons.

The queene, albeit she tenderly loued the duke, yet to appease the exclamation of the commons, was forced to commit him to the Tower; where he, with as much pleasure and liberty as could be, remained for a moneth, which being expired, hee was deliuered and restored againe vnto his old place, and former fauour with the king: whereat the people more grudged then before. It happened by the occasion of a commotion then beginning amongst the rude people, by one whom they called Blewbrard, that the parliament was for that time adiourned to Leicester, thinking to the queene, by force and rigor of law to repelle there the malice and euill will conceiued against the duke. But at that place few of the nobility would appeare. Wherefore it was againe retourned vnto London, and kept at Westminster, where was a whole companie, and a full appearance with the king and queene, and with them the duke of Suffolke, as chiefe counsellor. The commons not forgetting their old grudge, renewed againe their former articles and accusations against the said duke, against the bishop of Salisburie, and sir James Fines, lord Say, and other. When the king perceiued that no glosing nor dissimulation would serue to appease the continuall clamour of the importunate commons, to make some quiet pacification, first hee sequestred from him the lord Say, treasurer of England, and other the dukes adherents from their offices. Then hee put in exile the duke of Suffolke, for the terme of fiue yeeres, supposing by that space the furious rage of the people would asswage. But the hand of God would not suffer the guiltlesse blood of Humfrey duke of Glocester, to bee vnreuenged, or that flagitious person further to continue. For when he shipped in Suffolke, intending to be transported into France; he was encountred with a ship of war belonging to the Tower: whereby he was taken, and brought into Douer rode, and there on the side of a ship boate, one strake off his head: which was about the yeere of our Lord, 1450.

The duke of Suffolke againe accused.

Example of Gods iudgement and of blood reuenged. The duke of Suffolke beheaded.

And thus haue ye heard the fully story and discourse of duke Humfrey, and of all his aduersaries; also of Gods condigne punishment vpon them for their bloodie cruelty. But before I remoue from the said storie of the foresaid duke, and of the proud cardinall his enemie, I will here by the way, annex a certaine instrument by the king and aduice of his counsell, made against the said cardinall, taking vpon him to enter into this realme, as legate from the pope, contrary to the old lawes and customes of this realme, as by the words of the said instrument here in Latine may well appeare.

An instrument by the king against the admitting the popes legate.

The sum and effect whereof in English is this, that in the yeere of our Lord 1428. as the king with duke Humfrey lord protector, and the rest of the councell, were in the dukes house in the parish of S. Bennets by Pauls wharfe, one Richard Candray procurator, in the kings name and behalfe did protest and denounce by this publike instrument, that wheras the king and all his progenitors, kings before him of this realme of England haue beene heretofore possessed time out of mind, with speciall priuiledge and custome vsed and obserued in this realme from time to time, that no legate from the apostolike see should enter into this land or any of the kings dominions, without the calling, petition, request, inuitement or desire of the king, and forsomuch as Henry bishop of Wint. and cardinall of S. Eusebius, hath presumed so to enter as legate from the pope, being neither called, sent for, required, or desired by the king: therefore the said Richard Candray in the kings name doth protest by this instrument, that it standeth not with the kings mind or intent, by the aduice of his councell, to admit, approue, or ratifie the comming of the said legate in any wise, in derogation of the rights, customes and lawes of this his realme: or to recognise, or assent to any exercise of this his authority legantine, or to any acts, attempts, or hereafter by him to be attempted in this respect contrary to the foresaid lawes, rightes, customes, ind liberties of this realme, by these presents, &c.

And thus much as an appendix, annexed to the story of D. Humfrey, and the cardinall of Winchester extract out of an old written volume, remaining in the hands of master William Bowyer.

The benefit and inuention of printing.

Anno 1450

The art of printing inuented.

Ex Typographia per Matthæum Indicem.

IN following the course, and order of yeeres, wee find this foresaid yéere of our Lord 1450. to be famous and memorable, for the diuine and miraculous inuention of printing. Nauclerus, and Wymselingus following him, referre the inuention thereof to the yéere 1440. In paralip. Abbatis Vrsp. it is recorded this facultie to be found, An. 1446. Auentinus and Zieglerus doe say, Anno 1450. The first inuenter thereof (as most agrée) is thought to be a Germaine, dwelling first in Argentine, afterward cittizen of Mentz, named John Faustus, a Goldsmith. The occasion of this inuention first was by engrauing the letters of the Alphabet in metall: who then laying blacke inke vpon the metall, gaue the forme of letters in paper. The man being industrious and actiue, perceiuing that, thought to proceed further, and to proue whether it would frame as well in words, and in whole sentences, as it did in letters. Which when he perceiued to come well to passe, hee made certaine other of his counsell, one John Guttenberge and Peter Schaffard, binding them by their oth, to kéepe silence for a season. After ten yéeres, John Guttemberge compartner with Faustus, began then first to broch the matter at Straushrough. The art being yet but rude, in processe of time, was set forward by inuentiue wits, adding more and more to the perfection thereof. In the number of whom, John Mentell, John Prus, Adolphus Ruschius, were great helpers. Ulricus Han, in Latine called Gallus, first brought it to Rome. Whereof the epigram was made:

Carmen Ant. Campani.

Anser Tarpeij custos, vigilando quòd alis
Constreperes, Gallus decidit, vltor adest
Vlricus Gallus, ne quem poscantur in vsum,
Edocuit pennis nil opus esse tuis.

Printing came of God.

Printing likened to the gifts of tongues.

Notwithstanding, what man soeuer was the instrument, without all doubt God himselfe was the ordainer and disposer thereof, no otherwise, then he was of the gift of tongues, and that for a singular purpose. And well may this gift of printing be resembled to the gift of tongues: for like as God then spake with many tongues, and yet all that would not turne the Iewes; so now, when the holy Ghost speaketh to the aduersaries in innumerable sorts of bookes, yet they will not bee conuerted, nor turne to the Gospell.

Now to consider to what end and purpose the Lord hath giuen this gift of printing to the earth, and to what great vtility and necessity it serueth, it is not hard to iudge, who so wisely perpendeth both the time of the sending, and the sequell which thereof ensueth.

The time considered when printing was found.

And first, touching the time of this faculty giuen to the vse of man, this is to be marked: that when as the bishop of Rome with all the whole and full consent of the cardinals, patriarkes, archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, lawyers, doctors, prouosts, deanes, archdeacons, assembled together in the councell of Constance, had condemned poore John Hus, and Hierome of Prage to death for heresie, notwithstanding they were no heretickes, and after they had subdued the Bohemians, and all the whole world vnder the supreme authority of the Romish sée: and had made all christian people obediencia-ries and vassals vnto the same, hauing (as one would say) all the world at their will, so that the matter now was past not onely the power of all men, but the hope also of any man to be recouered: in this very time so dangerous and desperate, where mans power could doe no more, there the blessed wisedome and omnipotent power of the Lord began to worke for his church, not with sword and target to subdue his exalted aduersary, but with printing, writing, and reading to conuince darkenes by light, errour by truth, ignorance by learning. So that by this meanes of printing, the secret operation of God hath heaped vpon that proud kingdome a double confusion. For whereas the bishop of Rome had burned John Hus before, and Hierome of Prage, who neither denied his transubstantiation, nor his supremacie, nor yet his popish masse, but said masse, and heard masse themselues, neither spake against his purgatorie, nor any other great matter of his popish doctrine, but onely exclaimed against his excessiue and pompous pride, his vnchristian or rather antichristian abomination of life: thus while he could not abide his wickednesse onely of life to be touched, but made it heresie, or at least mattet of death, whatsoeuer was spoken against his detestable conuersation and maners, God of his secret iudgement, séeing time to helpe his church, hath found a way by this faculty of printing, not only to confound his life and conuersation, which before he could not abide to be touched, but also to cast downe the foundation of his standing, that is, to examine, confute, and detect his doctrine, lawes, & institutions most detestable in such sort, that though his life were neuer so pure: yet his doctrine standing as it doth, no man is so blind, but may sée, that either the pope is Antichrist, or else that Antichrist is nére cosin to the pope: And all this doth, and will hereafter more and more appeare by printing.

Double confusion vpon the pope by printing.

The fruit and profit of printing.

The reason whereof is this: for that hereby tongues are knowne, knowledge groweth, iudgement encreaseth, bookes are dispersed, the Scripture is séene, the doctours be read, stories be opened, times compared, truth discerned, falshood detected, and with finger pointed, and all (as I said) through the benefit of printing. Wherefore I suppose, that either the pope must abolish printing, or he must séeke a new world to reigne ouer: for else, as this world standeth, printing doubtlesse will abolish him. But the pope, and all his colledge of cardinals, must this vnderstand, that through the light of printing, the world beginneth now to haue eyes to sée, and heads to iudge: He cannot walke so inuisible in a net, but he will be spied. And although through might he stopped the mouth of John Hus before, and of Hierome, that they might not preach, thinking to make his kingdome sure: yet in stead of John Hus and other, God hath opened the presse to preach, whose voice the pope is neuer able to stop with all the puissance of his triple crowne. By this printing, as by the gift of tongues, and as by the singular organe of the holy Ghost, the doctrine of the Gospell soundeth to all nations and countries vnder heauen: and what God reuealeth to one man, is dispersed to many, and that is knowne in one nation, is opened to all.

God counsell to the pope.

The first and best were for the bishop of Rome, by the benefit of printing, to learne and know the truth. If hee will not, let him well vnderstand, that printing is not set vp for nought. To striue against the streame, it auaileth not. What the pope hath lost since printing and the presse began to preach, let him cast his counters. First, when Erasmus wrote, and Frobenius printed, what a blow thereby was giuen to all friers and monkes in the world! And who séeth not, that the pen of Luther following after Erasmus and set forward by writting, hath set the triple crowne so awry on the popes head, that it is like neuer to be set straight againe?

Wherfore, if there were no demonstration to leade, yet by this one argument of printing, the bishop of Rome might vnderstand the counsell and purpose of the Lord to worke against him, hauing prouided such a way in earth, that almost how many printing presses there be in the world, so many blockehouses there be against the high castle of saint Angell: So that either the pope must abolish knowledge and printing, or printing at length will roote him out. For if a man wisely consider the hold and standing of the pope, thus hee may repute with himselfe, that as nothing made the pope strong in time past, but lacke of knowledge and ignorance of simple christians: so contrariwise, now nothing doth debilitate and shake the high spire of his papacie so much as reading, preaching, knowledge and iudgement, that is to say, the fruit of printing: Whereof some experience we sée already, and more is like (the Lord before) to follow. For although, through outward force and violent cruelty, tongues dare not speake, yet the hearts of men daily (no doubt) bee instructed through this benefit of printing. And though the pope both now by cruelty, and in times past by ignorance, had all vnder his possession: yet neither must he thinke, that violence will alwaies continue, neither must he hope for that now, which he had then: forsomuch as in those former daies, bookes then were scarce and also of such excessiue price, that few could attaine to the buying, fewer to the reading and studying thereof: which bookes now by the meanes of this art, are made easie vnto all men. We heard before, pag. 611. how Nicolas Belward, bought a new Testament in those daies for foure markes and fortie pence, whereas now the same price will serue well fortie persons with so many bookes.

So preacheth the vicar of Croiden in king Henry the 8. daies, at Pauls crosse; saying, that either we must roote out printing, or else printing will roote out vs.

Moreouer, in the pag. 379. col. 1. it was noted and declared by the testimony of Armachanus, how for defect of bookes and good authours, both Vniuersities were decayed and good wits kept in ignorance, while begging friers scraping all the wealth from other priests, heaped vp all bookes that could be gotten, into their owne Libraries: where either they did not diligently applie them, or else did not rightly vse them, or at least kept them from such as more fruitfully would haue perused them.

Triple commodity by printing.

In this then so great rarity, and also dearth of good bookes, when neither they which could haue bookes, would well vse them, nor they that would, could haue them to vse, what marueil if the greedinesse of a few prelats did abuse the blindnes of those daies, to the aduancement of themselues? Wherefore almighty God of his mercifull prouidence, séeing both what lacked in the church, and how also to remedie the same, for the aduancement of his glory, gaue the vnderstanding of this excellent art or science of printing, whereby three singular commodities at one time came to the world. First, the price of all bookes diminished. Secondly, the speedy helpe of reading more furthered. And thirdly, the plentie of all good authors enlarged: according as Aprutinus, doth truely report:

Imprimit ille die, quantum non scribitur anno. i.
The presse in one day will doe in printing,
That none in one yéere can doe in writting.

When Gunnes were first inuented.

By reason wherof, as printing of bookes ministred matter of reading: so reading brought learning, learning shewed light, by the brightnesse wherof blind ignorance was suppressed, errour detected, and finally Gods glory, with truth of his word aduanced. This faculty of printing was after the inuention tion

tion of Guns, the space of 130. yeares: which invention was also found in Germany an. 1380. And thus much for the worthie commendation of printing.

The lamentable losing of Constantinople.

Anno 1453 Anno 1453. Constantinus Paleologus, being Emperour of Constantinople, the 29. day of the moneth of May, the great citie of Constantinople was taken by the Turke Mahometes, after the siege of 54. daies, which siege began in the beginning of April. Within the citie, beside the citizens were but onelie 6000. rescuers of the Greekes. And 3000. of the Venetians and Genues. Against these, Mahometes brought an armie of 400. thousand, collected out of the countries and places adioyning neere about, as out of Grecia, Illyrica, Wallachia, Dardanis, Triballis, Bulgants, out of Bithynia, Galatia, Lydia, Cecilia, and such other: which places had the name yet of christians. Thus one neighbor for lucres sake, helped to destroy another.

The losing of Constantinople

The citie was compassed of the Turkes, both by the Sea and land. Mahometes the Turke divided his armie into three sundrie parts, which in three parts of the citie, so beat the wals and brake them downe, that they attempted by the breaches thereof to enter the citie. But the valiantnesse of the christians therein wan much commendation, whose duke was called John Justinianus, of Genua. But for so much as the assaults were great, and the number of the christian souldiors dailie decreased, fighting both at the walles and at the hauen, against such a multitude of the Turkes, they were not able long to hold out. Beside, the armies which laie battering at the walles, the Turke had vpon the sea his nauie of 200. and 50. saile, lying vpon the hauen of the citie, reaching from the one side of the hauens mouth vnto the other, as if a bridge should be made from the one banke to the other. Which hauen by the citizens was barred with yron chaines, whereby the Turkes were kept out a certaine space. Against which nauie 7. ships there were of Genua, within the hauen, and three of Creta, and certaine of Chio, which stood against them. Also the souldiors issuing out of the citie, as occasion would serue, did manfullie gainstand them, and with wilde fire, set their shippes on fire, that a certaine space they could serue to no vse. At length the chaines being brast, and a waie made, the Turkes nauie entred the hauen, and assaulted the citie, whereby the Turke began to conceiue great hope, and was in forwardnesse to obtaine the citie. The assault and skirmish then waxing more hot, Mahometes the tyrant stood by vpon an hil, with his warriours about him, crying and howling out vnto them to scale the walles and enter the towne; otherwise, if any reculed, he threatened to kill them, and so he did. Wherfore a great number of his souldiers in their repulse and retire, were slaine by the Turkes men, being sent by his commandement to slay them: and so they were iustlie serued, and well payed their hire.

The tyranny of the Turke toward his owne men.

Although this was some comfort to the Christians, to see and behold out of the citie, the Turkes retinue so consumed, yet that hope lasted not long. Shortly after by rage of warre, it happened Justinian the Duke aboue named, to be hurt, who notwithstanding that he was earnestlie desired by Paleologus the emperour, not to leaue his tower which he had to keep, seeing his wound was not deadly dangerous; yet could hee not be intreated to tarrie, but left his standing, and his fort disfurnished, setting none in his place to award the same. And so this doughtie duke, hurt more with his false heart, then with force of weapon, gaue ouer and fledde to Chius, where shortly after for sorrow, rather then for sorenes of his wound, he died. Many of his souldiers seeing their Captaine flee, followed after, leauing their fort vtterly destitute without defence. The Turkes vnderstanding that vantage, some brast into the citie. The emperor Paleologus seeing no other way but to flie, making toward the gate, either was slaine, or else troden downe with the multitude. In the which gate eight hundred dead mens bodies were found and taken vp.

The towardnes of duke Justinia

The Emperour of Constantinople slaine.

The citie of Constantinople thus being got, the Turkes sacking and ranging about the streetes, houses, and corners, did put to the sword most vnmercifullie, whomsoeuer they found, both aged and young: matrons, virgins, children and infants: sparing none, the noble matrons and virgins were horriblie ravished: the gods of the citie, the treasuries in houses, the ornaments in Churches were all sackt and spoyled, the pictures of Christ opprobriously handled, in hatred of Christ. The spoyle and hauocke of the citie lasted three daies together, while the barbarous souldiers murdered and rifeled what them lusted.

Constantinople won of ye Turks. The bloudy deeds of the Turkes.

These things thus being done, and the tumult ceased, after three daies, Mahometes the Turke, entreth into the citie, and first calling for the heads and ancients of the citie: such as he found to be left alive, he commanded them to be mangled and cut in peeces. It is also (saith my author) reported, that in the feasts of the Turkes, honest matrons and virgins, and such as were of the kings stocke, after other contumelies, were hewen and cut in peeces for their disport.

The horrible tyranny of the Turks.

And this was the end of that princelie and famous citie of Constantinople, beginning first by Constantinus, and ending also with Constantinus: which for the princely royaltie thereof, was named and ever honoured, from the time of the first Constantine, equally with the citie of Rome, and called also by the name thereof new Rome, and so continued the space of 1120. yeares. I pray God that old Rome may learne of new Rome, to take heed and beware betime.

Constantinople called new Rome.

This terrible destruction of the citie of Constantinople; the Queene of cities, I thought here to describe, not so much to set forth the barbarous crueltie of these filthie rakehelles and merciless murderers: as specially for this, that we being admonished by the doleful ruine and miserie of these our euen christened, may call to minde the plagues and miseries deserued, which seeme to hang no lesse ouer our owne heads, and thereby may learne betime to invocate and call more earnestlie vpon the name of our terrible and merciful God, that hee for his sonnes sake will keepe vs, and preserue his Church among vs, and mitigate those plagues and sorrowes, which we no lesse haue deserued, then these aboue minded, before vs. Christ grant it. Amen. Ex Hist. Wittenbergica Peucer.

A warning to all Christendom by Constantinople.

The historie of Reynold Pecocke bishop of Chichester, afflicted and imprisoned for the Gospell of Christ.

The story of Reinold Pecocke.

After the death of Henry Chicheley before mentioned, pa. 647. next succeeded John Stafford, anno 1445. who continued eight yeares. After him came John Kempe, anno 1453. who sate but three yeares. Then succeeded Thomas Burschere. In the time of which archbishop, fell the trouble of Reynold Pecocke, bishop of Chichester, afflicted by the popes prelats for his faith and profession of the Gospell. Of this bishop, Hall also in his Chronologie toucheth a little mention, declaring that an ouerthwart iudgement (as he termeth it) was giuen by the fathers of the spirituaitie against him. This man (saith he) began to moue questions not priuatelie, but openlie in the Vniuersities, concerning the Annates, Peter pence, and other iurisdictions and authorities pertaining to the see of Rome, and not onlie put forth the questions, but declared his mind and opinion in the same: wherefore he was for this cause abiured at Pauls crosse: Thus much of him writeth Hall. Of whom also recordeth Polychronicon, but in few words. This bishop, first of saint Asaph, then of Chichester, so long as duke Humfrey liued (by whom he was promoted and much made of) was quiet and safe, and also bold to dispute and to write his mind, and wrote (as Leland recordeth) diuers bookes and treatises. But after that good Duke was thus (as ye haue heard) made away, this good man lacking his backstaie, was open to his enemies, and matter soon found against him. Wherupon he being complained of, and accused by priuie and malignant promoters vnto the archbishop, letters first were directed downe from the archbishop, to cite all men to appeare that could say any thing against him. The forme of which citation here ensueth.

The Copie of the citation sent by the Archbishop.

The citation of the archb. Tho. Bowcher, alias Bourcher.

THomas by the permission of God, archb. of Canturburie, primate of all England, and Legate of the Apostolicke see, to all and singuler, parsons, vicars, chaplaines, curates, and not curates, clerkes and learned men, whatsoeuer they be, constitute and ordained in any place throughout our prouince of Canturbury, health, grace, and benediction.

We haue receiued a greeuous complaint of our reuerend fellow brother, Reinold Pecocke bishop of Chichester, conteining in it, that albeit our said reuerend fellow brother, the bishop, deliuered vnto vs certaine bookes written by him in the English tongue, by vs and our authoritie to be examined, corrected, reformed and allowed: notwithstanding many (the examination and reformation of the saide bookes depending and remaining before vs vndiscussed) haue openly preached and taught at Pauls crosse in London, and in diuers other places of our prouince of Canturburie, that our said fellow brother the bishop, hath propounded, made and written, or caused to be written in the said bookes, certaine conclusions repugnant to the true faith, and that he doth obstinately hold and defend the same. By the pretence of which preaching & teaching, the state and good name and fame of the said Lord Reynold the bishop, are greeuously offended and hurt, and he and his opinion maruellously burdened. Wherfore we charge you all together, and seuerally apart do command you, firmely enioyning you, that openly and generally you do warn or cause to be warned, all and singuler such persons, which will obiect any thing contrary & against the conclusions of our said reuerend fellow brother the bishop, had or conteined in his books or writings: that the 20. day after such monition or warning had, they do freely of their own accord appeare before vs & our commissaries in this behalfe appointed, whersoeuer we shall then be in our city, dioces, or prouince of Canturburie, to speake, propound, alledge, & affirme fully & sufficientlie in writing, whatsoeuer heretical or erroneous matter they will speake, propound, or obiect against the said conclusions contained in his sayd books: and both to satisfie and receiue, whatsoeuer shal seeme meete and right in this behalfe by the holy institutions and ordinances.

And forsomuch as this matter depending yet vndetermined and vndiscussed, nothing ought to be attempted or renewed: we charge you that by this our authoritie, you inhibit and forbid all and euery one so to preach and teach hereafter. Vnto whom also we by the tenour of these presents, do likewise forbid, that during the examination of the conclusions & books aforesaide, depending before vs and our Commissaries vndiscussed, they doe not presume by any meanes, without good aduice and iudgement, to preach, iudge, and affirme any thing to the preiudice or offence of the said Lord Reynold the bishop: and if so be you doe finde any in this behalfe, gainesaying or not obeying this our inhibition, that you doe cite or cause them peremptorilie to be cited, to appeare before vs or our Commissaries, in this behalfe appointed, the tenth day after their citation, if it be a court day, or else the next court day following, wheresoeuer we shall then be, in our citie, dioces, or prouince of Canturbury, to make further declaration by forme of lawe of the cause of their disobedience, and to receiue such punishment as iustice and equitie shall determine in that behalfe: and that by your letters you doe dulie certifie vs or our Commissaries, what you haue done in the premisses at the day and place aforesaide: or that he which hath so executed our commandement, doe so certifie vs by his letters. Dated at our Manour of Lambeth the xxii. day of October, an. 1457. and in the fourth yeare of our translation.

Pecock appeareth at Lambeth before the archb.

This citation being directed, the bishop vpon the summon thereof, was brought, or rather came before the iudges and bishops, vnto Lambeth, where the foresaid Thomas the archbishop, with his doctors and lawyers, were gathered together in the archbishops court. In which conuention also the duke of Buckingham was present, accompanied with the bishops of Rochester, and of Lincolne. What were the opinions and articles against him obiected, after in his reuocation shall be specified. In his answering for himselfe in such a companie of the popes friends, albeit he could not preuaile: notwithstanding he stoutlie defending himselfe declared many things worthy great commendation of learning, if learning against power could haue preuailed.

Great labour to reduce Pecocke from his opinions.

But they on the contrarie part, with all labour and trauell, extended themselues, either to reduce him, or els to confound him. As here lacked no blustering words of terrour and threatning, so also manie faire flattering words and gentle perswasions, were admixt withall. Briefly, to make a short narration of a long and busie trauerse, here was no stone left vnturned, no waies vnprooued, either by faire meanes to intreate him, or by terrible menaces to terrifie his minde, till at the length, hee being vanquished and ouercome by the bishops, began to faint and gaue ouer. Whereupon, by and by a recantation was put vnto him by the Bishops, which hee should declare before the people. The copy of which his recantation here followeth.

The forme and manner of the retractation of Reynold Pecocke.

The retractation of Bishop Pecocke.

IN the name of God, Amen. Before you the most reuerend Father in Christ and Lord, the Lord Thomas, by the grace of God, archbishop of Canturbury, primate of England and Legate of the Apostolicke sea, I Reynold Pecocke, vnworthy Bishop of Chichester, doe purely, wilfingly, simply, and absolutely confesse and acknowledge, that I in times past, that is to say, by the space of these twentie yeares last past and more, haue otherwise conceiued, holden, taught and written, as touching the sacraments and the articles of the faith, then the holy church of Rome and vniuersall Church: & also that I haue made, written, published and set forth many and diuers pernitious doctrines, bookes, workes, writings, heresies, contrary and against the true catholicke and apostolicke faith, containing in them, errours contrary to the Catholicke faith, and especially these errours and heresies here vnder written.

Ex regist.

His articles.

1 First of all, that we are not bound by ỳ necessitie of faith, to beleeue that our Lord Iesus Christ after his death descended into hell.

2 Item, that it is not necessarie to saluation to beleeue in the holy catholike church.

3 Item, that it is not necessarie to saluation, to beléeue the communion of saints.

4 Item, that it is not necessary to saluation, to affirme the body materially in the sacrament.

5 Item, that the vniuersall church may erre in matters which perteine vnto faith.

6 Item, that it is not necessarie vnto saluation, to beleeue, ỳ that, which euery generall councell doth vniuersallie ordeine, approue, or determine, should necessarilie for the helpe of our faith, and the saluation of soules, be approoued and holden of all faithfull Christians.

Wherfore I Reynold Pecocke wretched sinner which haue long walked in darknesse, and now by the mercifull disposition and ordinance of God, am reduced and brought againe vnto the light and way of truth, and restored vnto the vnity of our holy mother the church, renounce and forsake all errours and heresies aforesaid.

Notwithstanding (godly reader) it is not to be beleeued that Pecocke did so giue ouer these opinions, howsoeuer the words of the recantation pretend. For it is a policie and play of the bishops, that when they doe subdue or ouercome any man, they carrie him whither they list, as it were a yong steere by the nose, and frame out his words for him before hand, as it were for a Parat, what he should speake vnto the people: not according to his owne will, but after their lust and fantasie. Neither is it to be doubted, but that this bishop repented him afterward of his recantation: which may easilie bee iudged hereby, because he was committed again to prison, and detained captiue, whereas it is vncertaine, whether he was oppressed with priuie and secret tyrannie, and there obtained the crowne of martyrdome, or no.

The Dictionarie of Thomas Gascoigne, I haue not in my hands present. But if credit be to be giuen to such as haue to vs alledged the booke, this we may finde in the 8. Centurie of Iohn Bale, chapter 19. that the said Thomas Gascoigne in his third part of his said Dictionarie, writting of Reynold Pecocke, maketh declaration of his articles conteining in them matter of sore heresie. First (saith he) Reynold Pecock, at Pauls crosse preached openlie, that the office of a christian prelate, chiefly aboue all other things is, to preach the word of God. That mans reason is not to be preferred before the Scriptures of the old and new Testament. That the vse of Sacraments, as they be now handled, is worse then the vse of the law of nature. That bishops which buy their admissions of the bishop of Rome, do sinne. That no man is bound to beléeue and obey the determination of the church of Rome. Also that the riches of bishops, by inheritage, are the goods of the poore. Item, that the Apostles themselues personallie were not the makers of the Creed; and that in the same Créed, once was not the article he went down to hell. Item, that of the foure senses of the Scripture, none is to be taken, but the verie first and proper sense. Also, that he gaue little estimation in some points, to the authoritie of the olde Doctors. Item, that hee condemned the wilfull begging of the Friers, as a thing idle and needlesse. This out of Thomas Gascoigne. Leland also adding this moreouer, saith: that he, not contented to follow the catholicke sentence of the church, in interpreting of the Scripture, did not thinke soundlie (as he iudged it) of the holy Eucharist.

The articles of Reynold Pecocke mentioned by Thomas Gascoigne. Ex Tho. Gascoig. lib. de Dictionis. Theolog. part. 3.

At length, for these and such other articles, the said Reynold Pecocke, was condemned for an heretike, by the archbishops and bishops of Roffe, Lincolne, and Winchester, with other Diuines moe. Whereupon he being driuen to his recantation, was notwithstanding detained still in prison. Where some saie, that he was priuilie made away by death.

B. Pecocke detained in prison.

Hall addeth, that some say, his opinions to be, that spirituall persons by Gods law, ought to haue no temporall possessions. Other write, that he said, that personall tithes were not due by Gods law. But whatsoeuer the cause was, he was caused at Pauls crosse to abiure, and all his bookes burnt, and hee himselfe kept in his owne house, during his naturall life. I marueil that Polydore, of this extremitie of the bishops handling, and of his articles, in his history, maketh no memoriall. Belike it made but little for the honestie of his great master the Pope.

Polydore noteth.

From persecution and burning in England, now out of the way, to digresse a little, to speake of forraine matters of the church of Rome: you remember before, in the latter ende of the councell of Basill, how Eugenius was deposed. Of whose conditions and martiall affaires, how he made warre against Sforcia a famous captaine of Italie, and what other warres he raised beside, not onelie in Italie, but also in Germanie, against the citie and councell of Basill, I shall not need to make any long rehearsall. After his deposition, ye heard also how Fœlix duke of Sauoy was elected Pope. Whereupon another great schisme followed in the church, during all the life of Eugenius.

Eugenius warred against Sforcia and diuers other.

Pope Foelix

After his death, his next successor was pope Nicolas the fift, who (as you before haue heard) brought so to passe with the Emperour Frederike the third, that Fœlix was contented to renounce and resigne his papacie to Nicolas, and was therefore of him afterward receiued to the roome of a cardinall, for his submission: & Frederike for his working was confirmed at Rome to be full Emperor, & there crowned, an. 1451. For emperors before they be confirmed and crowned by the pope, are no Emperors, but only called kings of Romaines.

P. Nicolas 5.

Emperors are but kings of Romans before they be crowned by the Pope.

This pope Nicolas here mentioned, for to get and gather great sums of money, appointed a Iubile in the yeare of our Lord 1450. at which time there resorted a greater number of people vnto Rome, then hath at any time before béene seene. At which time, we reade in the storie of Platina to haue happened, that I thought here not vnworthie to be noted for the example of the thing. As there was a great concourse of people resorting vp to the mount Vaticane to behold the image of our Sauior, which there they had to shew to pilgrimes, the people being thick going to and fro betweene the mount & the citie, by chance a certaine Mule of the Cardinals of Saint Marke, ca-came by the way, by reason whereof the people not being able to auoide the way, one or two falling vpon the mule, there was such a preasse and throng vpon that occasion on the bridge, that to the number of two hundred bodies of men, and three horses, were there strangled, and on each side of the bridge many besides fell ouer into the water and were drowned.

The fruit of Idolatrie.

By meanes of which occasion, the pope afterward caused the small houses to be plucked downe, to make the way broder. And this is the fruit that commeth by idolatrie. Ex Platin.

Mat. Palmerius, a Florentine martyr.

In the time of this pope, one Mat. Palmerius wrote a booke De Angelis, in defending whereof, he was condemned by the pope, and burned at Coma, An. 1448. Ex Tritemio.

Tolling of Aues.

After him succeeded Calixtus the third, who amongst diuers other things ordained, both at noone and at euening, the bell to tole the Aues, as it was vsed in the popish time, to helpe the souldiers that fought against the Turks: for the which cause also he ordained the feast of the transfiguration of the Lord, solemnising it with like pardons and indulgences, as was Corpus Christi day.

S. Edmund of Canturbury canonized.

Also this pope proceeding contrary to the councels of Constance and Basill, decreed that no man should appeale from the pope to any councell. By whom also saint Edmund of Canturbury with diuers other, were made saints.

Pope Pius 2.

Next after this Calixtus, succeeded Pius secundus, otherwise called AEneas Syluius, who wrote the two bookes of Commentaries vpon the councell of Basill before mentioned. This AEneas, at the time of the writting of those his bookes, seemed to be a man of an indifferent and tollerable iudgement and doctrine, from the which hee afterward being pope, seemed to decline and swarue, seeking by all meanes possible, how to deface and abolish the bookes which heretofore he had written.

Sentences atributed vnto this Pius.

The Prouerbs of Pius.

THe diuine nature of God may rather be comprehended by faith, then by disputation.

Christian faith is to bee considered, not by what reason it is proued, but from whom it procedeth.

Neither can a couetous man be satisfied with money, nor a learned man with knowledge.

Learning ought to be to poore men, in stead of siluer, to noble men in stead of gold, and to princes in stead of precious stones.

An artificiall oration moueth fooles, but not wise men.

Suters in the law, be as birds, the court is the baite, the iudges be the nets, and the lawyers be the fowlers.

Men are to be giuen to dignities, and not dignities to men.

The office of a bishop is heauie, but it is blessed to him that doth well beare it.

A bishop without learning may be likened to an Asse.

An euill physition destroyeth bodies, but an vnlearned priest destroyeth soules.

Mariage of priests allowed by Æneas Siluius.

Mariage was taken from priests, not without great reason, but with much greater reason it ought to bee restored againe.

The like sentence to this he vttereth in his second booke of the councell of Basill before specified, saying, Peraduenture it were not the worst, that the most part of priests had their wiues: for many should be saued in priestly mariage, which now in vnmaried priesthood are damned. The same Pius also, as Celius reporteth, dissolued certaine orders of nunnes, of the order of saint Bridget and saint Clare, bidding them to depart out, that they should burne no more, nor couer a harlot vnder the vesture of religion.

This Pius, if he had brought so much piety and godlines, as he brought learning vnto his popedome, had excelled many popes that went before him.

It shall not be impertinent here to touch, what the said Eneas, called Pius, the pope, writeth touching the peace of the church, vnto Gasper Schlick, the emperors Chancellor, in his 54. Epistle.

Ex epist. 54. Æneæ Secund. ad Gasparum Schlick.

All men do abhor and detest schisme. The way to remedy this euill Charles the French king hath shewed vs both safe and briefe, which is, that Princes or their Orators should conuent and assemble together in some common place, where they may conclude vpon matters amongst themselues. To bring this to passe, it were needfull, writings to bee sent againe to all Kings and Princes, to send their Oratours to Strawesborow, or to Constance, with their full authoritie, there to entreate of matters appertaining to the peace of the church. Neither would it require so great expenses: Forasmuch as wee see the yeere before 300. gilderns to be sufficient. Constantine the emperour bestowed not much more in the congregation of the councell of Nice. And this way could not be stopped: neither could the pope or the councell withstand it, or make excuse: as though this might not easily bee done without them. For why? the secular princes may conuent and assemble together, will they, nill they: and yet notwithstanding, vnity may there bee concluded: For hee shall bee an vndoubted pope, whom all princes would obey. Neither doe I see any of the clergie so constant to death, which will suffer martyrdome either for the one part or the other. All we lightly hold that faith which our princes hold; which if they would worship Idols, we would also do the same, and not only denie the pope, but God also, if the secular power straine vs thereunto, for charity is waxed cold, and all faith is gone. Howsoeuer it be, let vs all desire and seeke for peace; the which peace, whether it come by a councell, or by assemblie of princes, call it what you will, I care not, for wee stand not vpon the terme, but vpon the matter. Call bread, if you will, a stone, so you giue it me to assuage my hunger. Whether you call it a councell or a conuenticle, or an assemblie, or a congregation, or a synagogue, that is no matter, so that schisme may be excluded & peace established. Thus much out of the Epistle of Pius.

The way to exclude schisme, is concord of princes.

The popes clergie will not abide the fire, either for prince or pope.

By this it may appeare, of what sentence and mind this Pius was in the time of the councell of Basill, before he was made pope. But as our common prouerbe saith, Honors change maners; so it happened with this Pius, who after he came once to be pope, was much altered from that he was before. For when as before hee preferred generall councels before the pope, now being pope, hee did decree that no man should appeale from the high bishop of Rome, to any generall councell.

The breath of this pestilent seate corrupteth all that sit in it, whatsoeuer they were before.

And likewise for priests mariage, whereas before he thought it best to haue their wiues restored, yet afterward hee altered his mind otherwise: Insomuch that in his booke intreating of Germany, and there speaking of the noble city of August, by occasion he inueyed against a certaine epistle of Huldericke once bishop of the said city, written against the constitution of the single life of priests. Whereby it appeareth, how the mind of this Pius was altered from that it was before. This epistle of Huldericke, is before expressed at large in the pag. 124.

Æneas Syluius now puffed vp with worldly pompe and glory, impugneth the truth which he did before both know and professe.

Here also might I touch something concerning the discord betwixt this AEneas Syluius and Diotherus, archbishop of Mentz, and what discord was stirred vp in Germany vpon the same between Fredericke the Palatine, and the duke of Wittenberge, with others, by the occasion whereof, besides the slaughter of many, the city of Mentz, which was free before, lost their freedome and became seruile.

Discord betweene pope Pius and the archbishop of Mentz.

The causes of the discord betwixt pope Pius and Diotherus were these:

First, because that Diotherus would not consent vnto him in the imposition of certaine tallages and taxes, within his countrey.

Secondly, for that Diotherus would not bee bound vnto him, requiring that the said Diotherus being prince Elector, should not call the other electors together, without his licence, that is, without the licence of the bishop of Rome.

And thirdly, because Diotherus would not permit to the popes Legats, to conuocate his clergie together after their owne lust. This pope Pius began his see, about the yeere of our Lord 1458.

Anno 1458

After this Pius secundus, succeeded Paulus secundus, a pope wholly set vpon his bellie and ambition, and not so much void of all learning, as the hater of all learned men. This Paulus had a daughter begotten in fornication, which because he saw her to be had in reproch, for that she was gotten in fornication, began (as the stories report) to repent him of the law of the single life of priests, and went about to reforme the same, had not death preuented him. Ex Stanislao Rutheno.

P. Paulus 2. Ex Stanistao Rutheno. vide Cent. 8. Bal.

After this Paulus, came Sixtus the fourth, which builded vp in Rome a stewes of both kindes, getting thereby no small reuenewes and rents vnto the church of Rome. This pope amongst his other acts, reduced the yeere of Jubily from the fiftie vnto the twentie fiue. Hee also instituted the feast of the conception, and of the presentation of Mary and of Anna her mother, and Joseph. Also he canonised Bonauenture and saint Francis for saints.

The feast of the conception and presentation of our Ladie.

By this Sixtus also, beads were brought in, and instituted to make our Ladies psalter, through the occasion of one Alanus and his order, whom Baptista maketh mention of in this verse: Hi filo insertis numerant sua murmura baccis: That is, These men putting their beades vpon a string number their praiers. This Sixtus the pope made two and thirtie cardinals in his time, of whom Petrus Ruerius was the first, who for that time that he was cardinall, which was but two yeeres, spent in luxurious riot, wasted and consumed two hundred thouland florens, and was left 60000. in debt. Wesellus Groningensis, in a certaine treatise of his de indulgentijs papalibus, writing of this pope Sixtus, reporteth this, that at the request of the foresaid Peter cardinall, and of Hierome his brother, the said pope Sixtus permitted and granted vnto the whole familie of the cardinall of saint Lucie, in the three hote monethes of Summer, June, July, and August, (a horrible thing to be spoken) free leaue and libertie to vse Sodomitrie, with this clause, Fiat vt petitur: That is, Be it as it is asked.

The pope licenceth the whole family of a certaine cardinall, to play the Sodomites three monethes in the yeere.

Next after this Sixtus, came Innocentius the eight, as rude and as farre from all learning, as his predecessour was before him. Amongst the noble facts of this pope, this was one, that in the towne of Polus apud AEquicolos, he caused 8. men and fiue women, with the lord of the place to bee apprehended prehended and taken, and iudged for heretickes, because they said that none of them was the vicar of Christ which come after Peter, but they which followed onely the pouerty of Christ. Also he condemned of heresie, George the king of Boheme, and deprined him of his dignity, and also of his kingdome, and procured his whole flocke to be vtterly reiected and put downe, giuing his kingdome to Matthias king of Panonia.

George king of Boheme condemned of heresie.

Now from the popes to descend to other estates, it remaineth likewise somewhat to write of the emperours incident to this time, with matters and grieuances of the Germaines, as also of other princes, first beginning with our troubles and mutations here at home, pertaining to the ouerthrow of this king Henry and his seate, now following to bee shewed. And briefly to contract long processe of much tumult and businesse, into a short narration, here is to bee remembred, which partly before was signified, how after the death of the duke of Glocester, mischiefes came in by heapes vpon the king and his realme. For after the giuing away of Angeow and Maine, to the Frenchmen, by the vnfortunate mariage of queene Margaret aboue mentioned, the said Frenchmen, perceiuing now by the death of the duke of Glocester, the stay and piller of this common-wealth to bee decayed, and seeing moreouer the hearts of the nobility, among themselues to bee diuided, forslacked no time, hauing such an open way into Normandie, that in short time they recouered the same, and also gat Gascoine, so that no more now remained to England, of all the parts beyond the sea but only Calis. Neither yet did all the calamity of the realme onely rest in this: For the king now hauing lost his friendly vncle, as the stay and staffe of his age, which had brought him vp so faithfully from his youth, was now thereby the more open to his enemies, and they more emboldened, to set vpon him: As appeared first by Iacke Cade the Kentish captaine, who encamping first on Blackheath, afterward aspired to London, and had the spoile thereof, the king being driuen into Warwickshire. After the suppressing of Cade, ensued not long after the duke of Yorke, who being accompanied with three earles, set vpon the king neere to saint Albones, where the king was taken in the field captiue, and the duke of Yorke was by parliament declared protectour, which was in the yeere of our Lord, 1453. After this followed long diuision and mortall warre betweene the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke, continuing many yeeres. At length about the yeer of our Lord, 1459. the duke of Yorke was slaine in battell by the queene neare to the towne of Wakefield, and with him also his sonne earle of Rutland. By the which queene also shortly after, in the same yeere, were discomfited the earle of Warwicke, and duke of Northfolke, to whom the keeping of the king was committed by the duke of Yorke, and so the queene againe deliuered her husband.

The D. of Yorke against king Henry.

Anno 1459

After this victorie obtained, the northren men aduanced not a little in pride and courage, began to take vpon them great attempts, not onely to spoile and robbe churches, and religious houses, and villages, but also were fully intended partly by themselues, partly by the inducement of their lords and captaines, to sacke, walke, and vtterly to subuert the citie of London, and to take the spoile thereof: and no doubt (saith my history) would haue proceeded in their conceiued greedie intent, had not the opportune fauour of God prouided a speedy remedie. For as these mischiefes were in bruing, suddenly commeth the noble prince Edward vnto London, with a mighty army, the 27. day of February, who was the sonne and heire to the duke of Yorke aboue mentioned, accompanied with the earle of Warwicke, and diuers moe. King Henry in the meane time, with his victorie, went vp to Yorke: when as Edward being at London, caused there to be proclaimed certaine articles concerning his title to the crowne of England, which was the second day of March.

The Northern men intended the subuersion of London. Ex historia manuscripta, cui titulus, Scala mundi.

London rescued by prince Edward.

Whereupon the next day following, the lords both temporall and spirituall being assembled together, the said articles were propounded, and also well approued. The fourth day of the said moneth of march, after a solemne generall procession (according to the blind superstition of those daies) the bishop of Exceter made a sermon at Pauls crosse, wherein he commended and proued by manifold euidences, the title of prince Edward to be iust and lawfull, answering in the same, to all obiections which might be made to the contrarie.

Anno 1461

The title of Edward to the crowne proued at Pauls crosse.

This matter being thus discussed, prince Edward accompanied with the lords spirituall and temporall, and with much concourse of people, rode the same day to Westminster hall, and there by the full consent, as well of the lords, as also by the voice of all the commons, toke his possession of the crowne, and was called king Edward the fourth.

King Edward taketh possession of the crowne.

These things thus accomplished at London, as to such a matter appertained, and preparation of money sufficiently being ministred of the people and commons, with most readie and willing minds, for the necessarie furniture of his warres: he with the duke of Northfolke, and earle of Warwicke, and lord Fauconbridge, in all speedie wise, toke his iourney toward king Henry: who being now at Yorke, and forsaken of the Londoners, had all his refuge onely reposed in the Northren men.

When king Edward with his army had passed ouer the riuer of Trent and was come neere to Ferebridge, where also the host of king Henry was not far off, vpon palme sunday, betweene Ferebridge and Tadcaster, both the armies of the Southern and Northern men ioyned together in battell. And although at the first beginning, diuers horsemen of king Edwards side, turned their backes, and spoiled the king of carriage and victuals: yet the courageous prince, with his captaines little discouraged therewith, fiercely and manfully set on their aduersaries. The which battell on both sides was so cruelly fought, that in the same conflict were slaine to the number, as is reported, beside men of name, of 30000. of the poore commons. Notwithstanding, the conquest fell on king Edwards part, so that king Henry hauing lost all, was forced to flie into Scotland, where also he gaue vp to the Scots the town of Warwicke, after he had reigned 38. yeeres and d halfe.

The fierce and cruell battell betweene king Henry the firth and king Edward the fourth.

Warwicke giuen to the Scots, by king Henry the firth.

The claime and title of the duke of Yorke, and after him, of Edward his son, put vp to the lords and commons, whereby they challenged the crowne to the house of Yorke, is thus in the story of Scala mundi, word for word, as hereunder is conteined.

The title of the house of Yorke to the crowne of England.

EDward the third right K. of England, had issue first prince Edward the 2. W. Hatfield. 3. Lionell, 4. Iohn of Gaunt, &c. Prince Edward had Richard the second, which died without issue, W. Hatfield died without issue. Lionel duke of Clarence, had issue lawfully begot, Philip his only daughter and heire: the which was lawfully coupled to Edmund Mortimer, earle of March, and had issue lawfully begot, Roger Mortimer earle of March and heire: Which Roger had issue Edmund earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Alienor; Edmund and Alienor died without issue, and the said Anne by lawfull matrimony was coupled vnto Richard earle of Cambridge, the son of Edmund of Langley, who had issue and lawfully bare Richard Plantagenet now duke of Yorke; Iohn of Gaunt gate Henry, which vnrightfully entreated king Richard: then being aliue Edmund Mortimer earle of March, son of the said Philip, daughter to Lionell. To the which Richard duke of Yorke and son to Anne, daughter to Roger Mortimer earle of March, son and heire to the said Philip, daughter and heire to the said Lionell, the third son of king Edward the third, the right & dignity of the crown appertained and belonged, afore any issue of the said Iohn of Gaunt. Notwithstanding the said title of dignity of the said Richard of Yorke, the said Richard desiring the wealth, rest, and prosperity of England, agreeth and consenteth that king Henry the sixth, should be had and taken for king of England during his naturall life, from this time without hurt of his title.

The title of the house of Yorke.

Richard Plantagenet.

Wherefore the king vnderstanding the said title of the said duke to be iust, lawfull, true and sufficient, by the aduice and assent of the lords spirituall and temporall, and the commons in the parliament, and by the authority of the same parliament declareth, approueth, ratifieth, confirmeth, accepteth the said title for iust, good, lawfull and true, and thereto giueth his assent and agreement of his free will and libertie. And ouer that, by the said aduice and authority, declareth, calleth, stablisheth, affirmeth, and reputeth the said Richard of Yorke very true and rightfull heire to the crowne of England and France: and that all other statutes & acts made by any of the Henries late, contrarie to this aduice, bee annulled, repelled, damned, cancelled, voide, and of no force or effect. The king agreed and consented, that the said duke and his heires shall after his naturall life enioy the crowne, &c. Also, that all sayings and doings against the duke of Yorke shall be high treason, and all acts of parliaments contrary to this principall act be voide and of none effect, &c. Ex Scala mundi.

And thus much for the reigne of king Henry the firth. Who now lacked his vncle and protector, duke of Glocester, about him. But commonly the lacke of such friends, is neuer felt before they be miſſed.

In the reigne of this Henry the 6. it is not to be passed ouer in silence which we find noted in the parliament rolles, how that Lewis archbishop of Rhoen, after the death of the late bishop of Ely, had granted vnto him by the popes buls, during his life, all the profits of the said bishoprick, by the name of the administrator of the said bishoprick. Lewis the aforesaid archb. sheweth his buls to the king, who vtterly reiected his buls. Notwithstanding for his seruice done in France, the K. granted to him the administration aforesaid, the which to all intents at the petition of the said Lewis, should be affirmed to be of as great force as though he were bishop, touching profits, liberties and habilitie.

act done betweene Easter and Whitsontide of a false Britton, anno 1427. Which murdered a good widow in her bed, (who had brought him vp of almes, without Algate in the suburbes of London) and bare away all that she had, and afterward he tooke succor of holy church at S. Georges in Southwarke: but at the last he toke the crosse and forswore the kings land. And as he went his way, it happened him to come by the same place where he had done that cursed deed; and women of the same parish came out with stones and canell dung, and there made an end of him in the high street, so that he went no further: notwithstanding the Constables and other men also which had him vnder gouernance to conduct him forward: for there was a great company of them, so that they were not able to withstand them.

King Edward the fourth.

Anno 1461

King Edward the fourth.

KIng Edward, after his conquest and victory atchieued against king Henry, returned againe to London, where, vpon the Vigil of S. Peter and Paul, being on Sunday, he was crowned king of England, and raigned twenty two yeeres, albeit not without great disquietnesse, and much perturbation in his raigne.

Queene Margaret hearing how her husband was fled into Scotland, was also faine to flie the land, and went to her father duke of Angeow: from whence the next yeere following she returned againe to renew warre against king Edward, with small succour and lesse lucke. For being encountred by the earle of Warwicke, about Nouember she was driuen to the seas againe, and by tempest of weather, was driuen into Scotland.

Anno 1463

King Henry the sixth againe repulsed in the battell of Exham.

The yeere following, king Henry issuing out of Scotland with a sufficient power of Scots and Frenchmen, came into the North country to recouer the crowne, vnto whom the lord Radulph Percie, & lord Radulph Gray flying from king Edward, did adioyne themselues: but the Lord so disposing, king Henry with his power was repulsed in the battell of Exham by the lord Mountacute, hauing then the rule of the North: where the duke of Somerset, lord Hungerford, lord Rosse, with certaine other were taken. The lord Radulph Percie was slaine, the residue fled. Albeit the history of Scal. mundi, referreth this battell to the yeere 1464. the fiftéenth day of May. In the which month of May, were beheaded the duke of Somerset, lord Hungerford, lord Rosse, lord Philip Wentworth, lord Thomas Hussy, lord Thomas Findern, beside twenty one other belonging to the retinue and houshold of king Henry the sixth. Queene Margaret finding no resting place here in England, tooke her progresse againe from whence she came, learning in her owne country to drinke that drinke, which she her selfe had brewed here in England.

King Henry 6. taken, arrested, and committed to the tower.

Anno 1465

And not long after, the next yeere, an. 1465. on the day of Saint Peter and Paul, king Henry being found and knowne in a wood by one Cantlow (as they say) was arrested by the earle of Warwicke, and at last, of a king made prisoner in the tower of London.

In this meane time, king Edward (after the motion of marriage for him being made; and first the lady Margaret sister to James the 4. king of Scots thought vpon, but that motion taking no effect, afterward y lady Elizabeth sister to Henry king of Castile, being intended; but she being vnder age, the earle of Warwicke turning then his legation and voyage to the French king Lewes the eleuenth, to obtaine lady Bona, daughter of the duke of Sauoy, and sister to Carlot the French queene, and obtaining the same) had cast fauor vnto one Elizabeth Grey, widow of sir John Grey knight, slaine before in the battell of S. Albons, daughter to the duchesse of Bedford, and lord Riuers, and first went about to haue her to his concubine: But she, as being vnworthy (as she said) to be the wife of such an high personage, so thinking her selfe to be too good to be his concubine, in such sort wan the kings heart, that incontinent before the returne of the earle of Warwicke, he married her: at the which marriage, were no mo then onely the duchesse of Bedford, two gentlewomen, the priest and clerke. Vpon this so hasty and vnlucky marriage, ensued no little trouble to the king, much bloudshed to the realme, vndoing almost to all her kindred, and finally confusion to king Edwards two sonnes, which both were declared afterward to be bastards, and also depriued of their liues. For the earle of Warwicke, who had been the faithfull friend and chiefe maintainer before of the king, at the hearing of this marriage, was therewith so greeuously moued and chafed in his mind, that he neuer after sought any thing more, then how to worke displeasure to the king, and to put him beside his cushion. And although for a time he dissembled his wrathfull mode, till he might spie a time conuenient, and a world to set forward his purpose, at last finding occasion somewhat seruing to his mind, he breaketh his hart to his two brethren; to wit, the marquesse Montacute, and the archbishop of Yorke, conspiring with them how to bring his purpose about. Then thought he also to proue a farre off, the mind of the duke of Clarence, king Edwards brother, and likewise obtained him, giuing also to him his daughter in marriage.

Conspiracy against king Edward.

This matter being thus prepared against the king, the first flame of this conspiracy began to appeare in the North country. Where the Northerne men in short space gathering themselues in an open rebellion, and finding captaines of their wicked purpose, came downe from Yorke toward London. Against whom was appointed by the king, W. lord Yarbert earle of Penbroke, with the lord Stafford, and certaine other captaines to encounter. The Yorkshire men giuing the ouerthrow first to the lord Stafford, then to the earle of Penbroke and his company of Welchmen at Banbery field, at last ioyning together with the army of the earle of Warwicke, and duke of Clarence, in the dead of the night, secretly stealing on the kings field at Wolney by Warwick, killed the watch, and tooke the king prisoner, who first being in the castell of Warwicke, then was conueied by night to Middleham castell in Yorkshire, vnder the custody of the archbishop of Yorke, where he hauing lose keeping, and liberty to goe on hunting, meeting with sir William Standley, sir Thomas of Borough, and other his friends, was too good for his keepers, and escaped the hands of his enemies, and so came to Yorke, where he was well receiued: from thence to Lancaster, where he met with the lord Hastings his chamberlaine, well accompanied, by whose helpe he came safe to London.

King Edward taken prisoner by the earle of Warwicke.

After this tumult, when reconciliation could not come to a perfit peace and vnity, although much labor was made by the nobility, the earle of Warwicke raiseth vp a new war in Lincolnshire, the captaine whereof was sir Robert Wels knight, who shortly after being taken in battell with his father, and sir Thomas Dunocke, were beheaded; the residue casting away their coates, ran away and fled, giuing the name of the field, called Losecoat field. The earle of Warwicke after this put out of comfort and hope to preuaile at home, fled out of England, anno 1470. first to Calice, then to Lewes the French king, accompanied with the duke of Clarence. The fame of the earle of Warwicke and of his famous acts, was at that time in great admiration aboue measure, and so highly fauored, that both in England and France, all men were glad to behold his personage. Wherefore the comming of this earle and of the duke of Clarence, was not a little gratefull to the French king, and no lesse opportune to queene Margaret, king Henries wife, and prince Edward her sonne, who also came to the French court to meete and conferre together touching their affaires: where a league betweene them was concluded, and moreouer a marriage betweene Edward prince of Wales, and Anne the second daughter of the earle of Warwicke was wrought. Thus all things falling luckily vpon the earles part, beside the large offers and great promises made by the French king, on the best manner to set forward their purpose, the earle hauing also intelligence by letters, that the hearts almost of all men went with him, and longed sore for his presence, so that there lacked now but onely haste with all speed possible to returne; hee with the duke of Clarence well fortified with the French nauy, set forward toward England: for so was it betweene them before decréed, that they two should proue the first venture, and then queene Margaret with prince Edward her sonne, should follow after. The arriuall of the earle was not so soone heard of at Dartmouth in Deuonshire, but great concourse of people by thousands went to him from all quarters to receiue and welcome him: who immediately made proclamation in the name of king Henry the sixth, charging all men able to beare armor, to prepare themselues to fight against Edward duke of Yorke, vsurper of the crowne. Here lacked no friends, strength of men, furniture, nor policie conuenient for such a matter.

When king Edward (who before not pausing for the matter, nor séeking how either to haue stopped his landing, or else straightwaies to haue encountred with him, before the gathering of his friends, but pausing forth the time in hunting, in hawking, in all pleasure and dalliance) had knowledge what great resort of multitudes incessantly repaired more and more daily about the earle and the duke, began now to prouide for remedy, when it was too late. Who trusting too much to his friends and fortune before, did now right well perceiue what a variable and inconstant thing the people is, and especially here of England, whose nature is neuer to be content long with the present state, but alwaies delighting in newes, séeketh new variety of changes, either enuying that which standeth, or else pitying that which is fallen. Which inconstant mutability of the light people, changing with the wind, & wauering with the reed, did well appeare in the course of this kings story. For hee, through the fauor of the people when hee was down, was exalted: now being exalted of the same, was forsaken. Whereby this is to be noted of all princes, that as there is nothing in this mutable world firme and stable: so there is no trust nor assurance to be made, but only in the fauor of God, and in the promises of his word, only in Christ his sonne, whose only

The constant heart and truth of the Lord Hastings.

These things thus passing on in England on the earles side against king Edward, he accompanied with the duke of Glocester his brother, and the lord Hastings, who had married the earle of Warwicks sister, and yet was neuer vntrue to the king his master: and the lord Scales, brother to the queene, sent abroad to all his trusty friends for furniture of able souldiers for defence of his person to withstand his enemies. When little rescue and sew in effect would come, the king himselfe so destitute, departed to Lincolnshire, where he perceiuing his enemies daily to increase vpon him, and all the countries about to be in a roare, making fires and singing songs, crying, King Henry, king Henry, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, and hearing moreouer his enemies the Lancastrians to be within halfe a daies iourny of him, was aduised by his friends to flie ouer the sea to the duke of Burgoyne, which not long before had married king Edwards sister.

King Edward forsaken of his people in his need.

The weake state of king Edward.

Whether godly simplicity, or mans policy be stronger.

¶ Here might be thought, by the common iudgement and policie of man, peraduenture that king Edward, as he had in his hands the life of king Henry, of his Queene and Prince: so if he had dispatched them out of the way, when as he might, hee had not fallen into this misery: but because he tooke not the vantage, which time rather then godly reason gaue him, therefore that sparing pity of his turned now to his confusion and ruine. And certes, I suppose no lesse, but if the same case had fallen in these our pitilesse daies, in which charity now waxeth vtterly cold, and humanity is almost forgotten, the occasion of such a time should not be so neglected. But let vs here note and learne, how godly simplicitie alwaies in the end of things gaineth more then mans policie, forsomuch as man worketh with the one, but God worketh with the other.

The double case of these two kings considered.

And so farre is it off, that euent and successe of things be gouerned by mans aduised policie, or vnaduised affection in this world, that that is iudged to be weaker that flourisheth in man, then that which is cast downe in the Lord: as in the double case of both these kings may well appeare. And first let vs consider the case of king Edward, who being so beset and compassed with euils and distresses on euery side, first was compelled to take the Washes betweene Lincolnshire and Linne (which was no lesse dangerous to his life, then it was vnseemly for his estate.) Being come to Linne, in what perill was he there, through the doubtfull mutability of the townes men, if he had been knowne to his enemies? And how could hee be but knowne, if he had taried any space? But though men and friends forsake him, yet the mercy of God, not forsaking the life of him which shewed mercy vnto other, so prouided, that at the same present there was an English ship, and two hulks of Holland ready to their iourny. Thus king Edward without prouision, without bagge or baggage, without clothsacke or maile, without store of mony, without raiment, saue only apparell for warre, also without all friends, except only his brother duke of Glocester, the lord Scales, and lord Hastings, with a few other trusty friends, to the number of seuen or eight hundred persons, tooke shipping toward Holland: at which time he was in no lesse ieopardy almost on the sea, then hee was on the land. For certaine Easterlings hauing many ships of warre, which lay rouing the same time on the sea, and had done much damage the yeere before, as well to the English merchants, as to the French nation, spying the kings ship, with seuen or eight gallant ships, made saile after the king and his company. The kings ship was good of saile, and gat some ground, albeit not much, of the Easterlings, that she came to the coast of Holland before Alquemare, and there cast anker: for otherwise, being an ebbing water, they could not enter the hauen. The Easterlings with their great ships approched as neere as they could possibly come for the low water, purposing at the flood to obtaine their pray, and so were like to doe, if the Lord had not there also prouided Mounsieur de Grounture, gouernor for duke Charles in Holland, at that season to be personally present in the towne of Alquemare, who hearing of the ieopardy of the king, being there at anker, prohibited the Easterlings on paine of death, not to meddle with any Englishmen which were the dukes friends and allies.

Charles duke of Burgoyne, king Edwards brother in law.

Duke Charles at the hearing of the vnprosperous case and condition of king Edward his brother in law, was greatly amazed and perplered in himselfe, much casting and doubting what hee should doe. For being then in warre with the French king, he could not well prouoke the English nation against him, without his manifest greeuance and decay: neither yet could he without great shame and obloquie, leaue the king his brother in that necessitie. Notwithstanding, so he demanured himselfe through faire speech, pretending to the Englishmen to ioyne part with the house of Lancaster, being himselfe partly descended of the same family by his grandmothers side: that he both was his owne friend openly, and the kings friend couertly, pretending that he did not, and doing that he pretended not.

When tidings was spread in England of king Edwards flying, innumerable people of all hands resorted to the earle of Warwicke, to take his part against king Edward, a few onely except of his constant friends which toke sanctuarie. Among whom was also Elizabeth his wife, who desperate almost of all comfort, tooke also sanctuary at Westminster, where she in great penury forsaken, was deliuered of a faire sonne called Edward, which without all pompe was baptised like another poore womans child, the godfathers being the abbat and prior of Westminster, the godmother was ladie Scrope.

To make the story short, the earle of Warwicke hauing now brought all things to his appetite, vpon the twelfth day of October, rode to the Tower, which was then deliuered to him, and there tooke king Henry out of the ward, and placed him in the kings lodging. The 25. day of the same month, the duke of Clarence accompanied with the earls of Warwicke, Shrewsbury, and the lord Standley, with a great company, brought him in a long gowne of blew veluet thorow the high streets of London, first to Pauls church to offer, then to the bishops palace of London, and there he resumed againe the crowne royall, an. 1471. which he did not long inioy.

King Henry restored againe to his kingdom.

After this followed a parliament, in the which king Edward with all his partakers were iudged traitors. Queene Margaret with her sonne prince Edward, all this while was tarrying for a faire wind, thinking long belike till she came to an euill bargaine, as it proued after. For king Edward within six months after his departure out of England vnto the duke of Burgoyne, whether by letters from his friends sollicitate, or whether by his aduenturous courage incited, made instant sute to duke Charles his brother, to rescue him with such power as he would bestow vpon him, for he was fully resolued to defer the matter and to protract the time no longer.

King Edward returneth again into England.

The duke damped in double feare, in such a dangerous case, notwithstanding ouercome by nature and affinity, secretly caused to be deliuered to him 50000. Florence, and further caused foure great ships to be appointed for him in a hauen in Zeland, where it was free for all men to come. Also the same duke had for him hired fourteene ships of the Easterlings well appointed, taking band of them to serue him truly till hee were landed in England, and fiftéene daies after.

King Edward only with 2000. souldiers commeth to Rauenspur, alias Rauenspore.

Thus king Edward being furnished but onely with two thousand men of war, with more lucke then hope to speed, sped his voyage into England, and landed at Rauenspur in the coast of Yorkshire. Although there was no way for the king with such a small company of souldiers to doe any good, yet to vse policie, where strength did lacke, first he sent forth certaine light-horsemen to proue the country on euery side, with perswasions, to see whether the vplandish people would be stirred to take king Edwards part. Perceiuing that it would not be, king Edward flieth to his shifts, dissembling his purpose to be, not to claime the crowne and kingdome, but only to claime the duchy of Yorke, which was his owne title, and caused the same to be published. This being notified to the people, that he desired no more, but only his iust patrimony and lineall inheritance, they began to be moued with mercy and compassion toward him, either to fauor him or not to resist him: and so iourning toward Yorke, he came to Beuerly. The marquesse Mountacute, brother to the earle of Warwicke, was then at Pomfret, to whom the earle had sent strait charge, with all expedition to set vpon him, or else to stop his passage: and likewise to the citizens of Yorke and all Yorkshire, to shut their gates and take armor against him. King Edward being in these straits, proceeded notwithstanding neere to Yorke without resistance, where he required of the citizens to be admitted into their city. But so stood the case then, that they durst not grant vnto him, but contrary sent him word to approch no neerer, as he loued his owne safegard. The desolate king was here driuen to a narrow strait, who neither could retire backe, for the opinion of the country and losse of his cause; neither could goe further, for the present danger of the city. Wherefore vsing the same policie as before, with louely words and gentle speech he desired the messengers to declare vnto the citizens, that his comming was not to demand the realme of England, or the title of the same, but only the duchy of Yorke, his old inheritance, and therefore determined to set forward, neither with army nor weapon. The messengers were not so soone within the gates, but he was at the gates in a manner as soone as they.

The gentle and faire words of king Edward.

The citizens hearing his courteous answer, and that he intended nothing to the preiudice of the king, nor of the realme, were something mitigated toward him, and beganne to commune with him from the walles, willing him to withdraw his power to some other place, and they would be the more ready to aid him, at least he should haue no damage by them.

Notwithstanding he againe vsed such lowly language, and deliuered so faire speech vnto them, intreating them so courteously, and saluting the Aldermen by their names, requiring at at their hands no more, but onely his owne towne whereof hee had the name and title, that at length the citizens, after long talke, and debating vpon the matter, partly also inticed with faire and large promises, fell to this conuention, that if hee would sweare to be true to king Henry, and gentle in entertaining his citizens, they would receiue him into the citie.

Two conditions put to king Edward.

This being concluded, the next morning, at the entring of the gate, a priest was readie to say masse, in the which after receiuing of the Sacrament, the king receiued a solemne oth, to obserue the two articles afore agreed. By reason of which oth so rashly made, and as shortly broken, and not long after punished (as it may well be thought) in his posteritie, hee obtained the citie of Yorke. Where hee, in short time forgetting his othe, to make all sure, set in garrisons of armed souldiers. Furthermore, perceiuing all things to bee quiet, and no stirre to bee made against him, hee thought to forslacke no opportunitie of time, and so made forward toward London, leauing by the way the Marques Mountacute, which lay then with his armie at Pontfret, on the right hand, not fully foure miles distant from his campe: and so returning to the high way againe, went forward without any stirring to the towne of Nottingham: where came to him, sir William Parre, sir Thomas of Borough, sir Thomas Mountgomerie, and diuers else of his assured friends, with their aides, which caused him by proclamation, to stand to his owne title of king Edward the fourth, saying that they would serue no man, but a king. At the same hereof being blowne abrode, as the citizens of Yorke were not a little offended (and that worthilie) so from other townes and cities, lords and noble men began to fall vnto him, thinking with themselues, that the Marquesse Mountacute either fauoured his cause, or was afraide to encounter with the man. Howsoeuer it was, king Edward being now more fully furnished at all points, came to the towne of Leicester, and there hearing that the earle of Warwicke accompanied with the earle of Oxford, were together at Warwicke, with a great power, minding to set on the earle, he remoued from thence his armie, hoping to giue him battell. The duke of Clarence in the meane time about London had leuied a great host comming toward the earle of Warwicke as he was by the earle appointed. But when the earle saw the duke to linger the time, hee began to suspect (as it fell out indeed) that hee was altered to his brethrens part. The king aduancing forward his host, came to Warwicke, where hee found all the people departed. From thence he moued toward Couentrie, where the earle was: vnto whom the next day after, hee boldlie offered battell. But the earle expecting the duke of Clarence his comming, kept him within the walles. All this made for the king. For hee hearing that his brother, duke of Clarence, was not farre off, comming toward him with a great armie, raised his campe, and made toward him, either to intreate, or else to encounter with his brother. When each host was in sight of the other, Richard duke of Glocester, brother to them both, as arbitrour betweene them, first rode to the one, then to the other. Whether all this was for a face of a matter made, it is vncertaine. But hereby both the brethren, laying all armie and weapon aside, first louingly and familiarly commoned: after that, brotherlie and naturallie ioyned together. And that fraternall amitie, by proclamation also was ratified, and put out of all suspition.

Then was it agreed betweene the three brethren to attempt the earle of Warwicke, if he likewise would be reconciled: but hee crying out shame vpon the duke of Clarence, stood at vtter defiance. From thence king Edward so strongly furnished, and daily increasing, taketh his way to London. Where, after it was knowne that the duke of Clarence was come to his brethren, much feare fell vpon the Londoners, casting with themselues what was best to doe. The suddennesse of time permitted no long consultation. There was at London the same time, the archbishop of Yorke, brother to the earle of Warwicke, and the duke of Somerset, with other of king Henries counsell, to whom the earle had sent in commandement a little before, knowing the weaknesse of the citie, that they should keep the citie from their enemies two or three dates, and he would follow with all possible speed, with a puissant armie. Who, according to their commandement, defended the citie with all their power, but yet to little purpose: For the citizens consulting with themselues for their owne most indemnitie, hauing no walles to defend them, thought best to take that way, which seemed to them most sure and safe, and therefore concluded to take part with king Edward. This was not so sone knowne abroad, but the communaltie ranne out by heapes to meete king Edward, and to salute him as their king. Whereupon the duke of Somerset, with other of king Henries counsell, hearing thereof, and wondering at the sudden change of the world, to shift for themselues, fled away and left there king Henrie alone: Who the same day being caused by the archbishop of Yorke, to ride about London like a king, was before night made captiue, and reduced againe to the Tower.

It was not long after these things thus done at London, but the comming of the earle of Warwicke was heard of, who thinking to preuent mischiefes with making speed, came a little too late and missed of his purpose. In the earles armie were John duke of Exceter, Edmund earle of Somerset, John earle of Oxford, and Marques Mountacute the earles brother. The earle had now passed a great part of his iourny, when hee hearing newes of the world so changed, and of the captiuitie of king Henry, was not a little thereat appalled in his mind: wherefore he staied with his armie at S. Albons, to see what way further to take. And forsomuch as there was no other remedie, but either hee must yeeld, or one conflict must finish the matter; hee remoued to Barnet ten miles from S. Albons.

The earle of Warwicke commeth to Barnet.

Against him set forth king Edward, well appointed with a strong armie of picked and able persons, with artillerie, engines and instruments meete for the purpose: bringing with him also king Henry. On Easter euen hee came to Barnet, and there he embattelled himself. In the morning vpon Easter day the battell began, and fiercely continued almost till none, with murder on eche side much doubtfull, till both parts were almost weary with fighting and murdering. King Edward then desirous to see an end, ofr or on, with a great crew of new fresh souldiers, set vpon his wearied enemies. Whereby the earles men, although encouraged with words of their captain, stoutly fought, but they sore wounded and wearied, could not long hold out. The earle rushing into the middest of his enemies, ventured so farre, that hee could not be rescued: where he was stricken downe and slaine, and there lay hee. Marques Mountacute thinking to succour his brother, whom hee saw to be in great ieopardie, was likewise otherthrowne and slaine. After that Richard Neuill, earle of Warwicke, and his brother were gone, the rest fled, and many were taken. The number of them which were in this field slaine, are iudged about tenne thousand, as Polydore Virgil recounteth, Fabian numbreth of them that were slaine, but fifteene hundred. The duke of Somerset and earle of Oxford thinking to flie to Scotland, returned to Jasper earle of Pembroke in Wales. The duke of Exceter hardly escaped to Westminster, and there tooke sanctuarie. For the death of the earle of Warwick the king was not so glad, as hee was sorie for the Marques Mountacute, whom he tooke to be his friend. The corps of these two were brought to the Church of Pauls, where they lay open in two coffins two daies, and then were interred. Ex Polyd. & alijs.

The earle of Warwicke and his brother slaine.

¶ In the narration of this historie, Polydore Virgil, whom Hall followeth word for word, doth some deale differ from Robert Fabian. Neither doe I doubt, but both these had their authors, by whom they were directed. Notwithstanding this I maruell, that Polydore writing of so many things which hee neuer saw, doth not vouchsafe to cite vnto vs those writers of whom he borrowed. And more doe I maruell, or rather lament, if it be true that I haue heard, that he not only nameth no author vnto vs, but also burned and heape of our English stories vnknowne, after the finishing of his, in the dayes of king Henry the 8. But now to our text againe.

Difference betweene Polydore and Fabian.

Hall followeth Polydore.

Polydore is said to haue burned a number of our English writers.

All this while yet Queene Margaret with young Prince Edward her sonne, was scarce come ouer, being long let with contrary windes, who at length in the moneth of Aprill arriuing at Waimouth in Dorsetshire, and hearing the sorrowfull tidinges of these things lately happened to her husband, and to the earle of Warwicke and his brother, and of the prosperous successe of king Edward: was so dismayed, disquieted, and pierced with sorrow, seeing all things contrarie to her expectation, so to frame against her, that she feared and took on with her selfe, lamenting her husband, bewayling her sonne, cursing her comming, and crying out of Fortune, as though blinde Fortune were she that gouerneth times and tides, rewarding iust punishments to vniust deseruings of men, and not the secret power and terrible iustice of almightie God. Such was then the impatiency of that Queene, being not able to beare the vehemencie of her passion (who rather should haue sorrowed the dolorous death of duke Humfrey, whom before she neglected, but now she lacked) that her senses failed, her spirits were taken, her speach decaied, and life almost gone, she fell to the ground as one that would rather die then liue. In this desolate case, Queene Margaret learning now to know her friends from her foes, when it was too late, straught full of heauinesse, without solace, or hope of remedie, she with her sonne and her companie departed for the next refuge, to a Monasterie of Monkes called Beaulie in Hamphire, there to take sanctuarie, and priuiledge of the house.

The returne of Queene Margaret into England.

Queene Margaret for sorrow swoundeth.

Ex Polyd. lib. 24.

Queene Margaret taketh sanctuarie.

Yet all hearts were not found nor subdued in England, especiallie Edmund duke of Somerset, with Lord John his brother, Thomas Courtney, earle of Deuonshire, Jasper earle of Pembroke, Lord Menlocke, John Longstrother, being Prior of the knights of Rhodes in Saint Johns. These hearing of the queenes returne, with speede resorted to her; by whom she being somewhat quickned in her spirites, and animated to warre, began to take some heart, and to follow their counsell: which was, in all the hote haste, to renew warre against king Edward, being now vnprouided, by reason his armie was now dispersed, and chiefest of his souldiors wasted.

Queene Margaret moued by her friends to renue warres against king Edward.

Here

Here great hope of victorie was shewed, great promises made. Although the queens mind was, being more carefull for the yong prince, then for her selfe, to send him ouer into France, before some proofe or triall made: yet following the contrarie counsell of them, and partly cut off by shortnesse of time, which required hast, she began with all expedition to gather power. Likewise Jasper earle of Pembroke, posted into Wales to do the same.

K. Edward hasteth against queene Margaret.

King Edward hauing intelligence of all these doings, first sendeth out certaine light horsemen, to espie abrode through the West parts, what waies his enemies did take. In the meane time, he vsing all celeritie to meete them before they came to London, gathered a power, such as hee could make about London, and first commeth to Abingdon, from thence to Marlebridge, hearing that the queene was at Bathe, thinking to encounter with them, before they diuerted into Wales to the earle of Pembroke, whither he thought (as they indeed intended) that they would take. But the queene vnderstanding the king to be so nigh, remoueth from Bathe to Bristow, sending word in the meane while to the citizens of Glocester, that they would grant her leaue safely to passe by their citie. Which when it could not bee obtained, with her armie she departed from Bristow to Tewkesburie: where the duke of Somerset knowing king Edward to be at hand at his verie backe, willed the queene there to stay, and in no wise to flee backward for certaine doubts that might bee cast. Although this counsell was against the consent of many other captaines, who thought it best rather to draw aside, while the earle of Pembroke with his armie were with them associate: yet the mind of the duke preuailed. The place was prefixed, the field pitched, the time of battell came, the king was looked for: who being within one mile of Tewkesburie, with like industrie and policie, as his enemies had done, disposed his armie likewise in their array. The celeritie of the king taking the time, was to him great aduantage: who otherwise if hee had deferred, till they had conioyned with the earle of Pembroke, had put the matter in great hazard. Such a matter it is to take a thing in time.

Queene Margaret debarred from Glocester.

The battell of Tewkesburie.

A great matter to take a thing in time.

Of this battell Hall thus reporteth, adding more then Polydore, that the duke of Somerset, although hee was strongly intrenched, yet through the occasion or policie of the duke of Glocester, which had the forewards of the kings part, a little reculing backe, followed the chase, supposing that the Lord Wenlocke, who had the middle ward, would haue followed hard at his backe. The duke of Glocester, whether for shame rather then of policie, espying his aduantage, suddenly turned face to his enemies. Whereupon the contrarie part was eftsones discomãted, and so much the more, because they were separated from their companie. The duke of Somerset not a little agreeued at this so vnfortunate case, returneth to the middle ward, where he seeing the lord Wenlocke abiding still, reuileth him, and calleth him traytor, and with his axe striketh the braines out of his head.

Thus much addeth Hall besides Polydor; but sheweth not his author where he had it. Polydor writing of this conflict, writeth no more but this, that the queenes armie being ouerset with the number and multitude of their enemies, and she hauing no fresh souldiers to furnish the field, was at last ouermatched, and for the most part slaine or taken. In which battell were named to bee slaine, the earle of Deuonshire, the lord Wenlocke, lord John duke of Somerset his brother, beside other. Among them that were taken, was queene Margaret found in her chariot almost dead for sorrow, prince Edward, Edmund duke of Somerset, John Prior of Saint Johns, with twentie other knights: all which were beheaded within two daies after, the queene onlie and the yong prince excepted. Which prince Edward being then brought to the kings presence, was demanded of him, how he durst be so bold to stand in battell against him. To this Edward Hall addeth more, and saith: that after the field was finished, the king made proclamation, that whosoeuer would bring prince Edward to him, should haue annuitie of an hundred pound during his life, and the princes life to bee saued. Whereupon sir Richard Crokes not misliking the kings promise, brought forth his prisoner, &c. And so the king demanding of the prince (as is said) how he durst so presumptuouslie enter this realme with his banner displaied against him, he answered, saying: that hee came to recouer his fathers kingdome and inheritance, from his grandfather and father to him descending: whereat (said Polydor) the king with his hand disdainfullie thrust him from him. Other say that the king stroke him on the face with his gauntlet.

At the speaking of these words was present George duke of Clarence, Richard duke of Glocester, and the earle lord William Hastings. Who vpon the same, vncourteously falling vpon the prince did slay him. Queene Margaret being brought prisoner to London, was afterward ransomed of her father duke of Angeow, for a great summe of money which hee borrowed of the French king, and for the payment thereof, was faine to yeeld vnto him the title of the kingdome of Sicile, and Naples, &c. King Edward for these prosperous warres, rendred to God his heartie thankes, and caused publikelie through his realme, solemne processions to be kept three daies together. And thus much, and too much, touching the warres of king Edward the fourth, which was done anno 1471. Ex Polyd. & alijs.

Anno 1471

The same yeere, and about the same time, vpon the ascension euen, king Henrie being prisoner in the tower, departed, after he had raigned in all xxx viij yeres, and vj. moneths. Polydor and Hall following him, affirme that hee was slaine with a dagger by Richard, duke of Glocester, the kings brother, for the more quiet and safegard of the king his brother. In the historie intituled Scala mundi, I finde these words: Quod in turri, in vigilia ascensionis Dominicæ ibidem feliciter moriens, per Thamesiam nauicula vsq; ad Abbatiam de Chertesey deductus, ibi sepultus est: That is, that king Henrie being in the tower vpon the ascension euen, there happilie, or quietly departing, was brought by Thames in a boate, to the abbey of Chertesey, and there buried.

Ex Scala mundi.

King Henry buried at Chertesey.

Polydore, after he hath described the vertues of this king, recordeth that king Henrie the seuenth did afterward translate the corps of him from Chertesey to Windsore; and addeth moreouer, that by him certaine miracles were wrought. For the which cause the said king Henry the seuenth (saith hee) laboured with pope Julius, to haue him canonized for a Saint; but the death of the king was the let, why that matter proceeded not. Edward Hall writing of this matter, addeth more, declaring the cause, why king Henries saincting went not forward, to be this: for that the fees of canonizing of a king, were of so great a quantitie at Rome (more then of another, bishop or prelate) that the said king thought it better to keepe the monie in his chests, then with the emponerishing of the realme to buy so deare, and pay so much for a new holie day of S. Henrie in the Kalendar, &c. Ex Hallo. Which if it be true, it might bee replied then to pope Julius, that if popes be higher then kings in the earth, and especiallie in heauen, why then is a pope-Saint so cheape in the market place of Rome, and a king Saint so deare? Againe, if the valuation of things in all markets and burses, bee according to the price and dignity of the thing that is bought, what reason is it, seeing the saincting of a king beareth a bigger sale then the saincting of any pope in heauen, but that kings should be aboue popes also vpon the earth? Sed extra iocum, as I doe not doubt, but that king Henry was a good and a quiet prince, if hee had not otherwise been abused by some: so touching the ruins of his house, I thinke not contrarie, but it came not without the iust appointment of the Lord, either for that the Henries of Lancasters house were such enemies to Gods people, and for the burning of the lord Cobham and many other: or else for the vniust displacing of king Richard 2. or else thirdly for the cruell slaughter of Humfrey the good duke of Glocester his vncle: whereof sufficientlie hath been said before.

A king Saint, is deare ware in the popes market.

¶ During the time of these doings, being about the yeare of our Lord 1465. there was here in England a certaine frier Carmelite, who about the terme of Michael the archangell preached at Pauls in London, that our Lord Jesus Christ, being here in this present world, was in pouertie, and did beg: To whose opinion and doctrine, the prouinciall of that order seemed also to incline, defending the same both in his reading and preaching, with other Doctours moe and brethren of the same order: vnto whom also adioyned certaine of the Iacobites, and stiffely did take their parts. On the contrary side, many doctors and also lawyers, both in their publicke lectures and preaching, to the vttermost of their cunning, did withstand their assertion, as being a thing most pestiferous in the church to be heard. Such a bitter contention was among them, that the defendant part was driuen for a while to keepe silence. Much like to those times I might well resemble these our dayes now present, with our tumultuous contention of formes and fashions of garments. But I put my selfe here in Pythagoras schole, and keepe silence with these Friers. In the storie moreouer it followeth, that this beggerly question of the begging friers, whether Christ did begge, or no, went so farre, that at length it came to the popes eares Paulus 2. who was no begger ye may be sure. After that the fame of this doctrine, mounting ouer the Alpes, came flying to the court of Rome, which was about the assumption of the virgin Mary, the yeare next following, ann. 1465. it brought with it such an euill smell to the fine noses there, that it was no need to bid them to sticke: for begging to them was worse then hie heresie. Wherefore the holy father pope Paulus the 2. to represse the sparkles of this doctrine, which otherwise perhaps might haue set his whole kitchin on fire, taketh the matter in hand, and eftsoones directeth down his Bull into England, intimating to the prelates here, Hæresim illam pestiferè asserentem, quod Christus publicè mendicauit, esse antiquitus à Romanis Pontificibus, cum suis Concilijs damnatam, & eam pro damnata, vndique declarandam, & conculcandam, &c. That is, that this heresie, which pestiferously doth affirme that Christ did openly begge, was condemned of old time by the Bishops of Rome, and his Councels, and that the same ought to be declared in all places for a damned doctrine, and worthy to be trodden downe vnder all mens feete, &c. This was in the same yeare when prince Edward, king Edwards sonne sonne was borne in the sanctuary at Westminster, an. 1465.

King Edward vanquished nine battels, being himselfe present at them all.

As touching the rest of the doings and affaires of this king, (which had vanquished hitherto nine battels, himselfe being present) how afterward he, through the incitement of Charles duke of Burgoyne his brother in law, ventured into France with a puissant army, and how the duke failed him in his promise; also how peace betweene the two kings was at length concluded in a solemne meeting of both the said kings together (which meeting is notified in stories, by a white doue sitting the same day of meeting vpon the top of king Edwards tent) also of the marriage promised betweene the young Dolphin, and Elizabeth king Edwards eldest daughter; but afterward broken off on the French kings part: moreouer, as touching the death of the duke of Burgoyne slaine in war, and of his daughter Mary, neece to king Edward, spoiled of her lands and possessions wrongfully, by Lewes the French king, and married after to Maximilian. Furthermore, as touching the expedition of king Edward into Scotland, by reason of king James, breaking promise in marrying with Cecily the second daughter of king Edward, and of driuing out his brother, and how the matter was composed there, and of the recouery againe of Warwicke: of these (I say) and such other things mo, partly because they are described sufficiently in our common English stories, partly also because they be matters not greatly pertaining to the church, I omit to speake, making of them a supersedeas. Two things I finde here among many other, specially to be remembred.

Charles duke of Burgoyne failed his promise with the king.

Peace betweene the two kings bought with the French kings mony.

Marriage betweene the French kings sonne, and king Edwards daughter, made and broken.

King James of Scotland goeth from his promise of marriage.

{Anno 1473}

The first is concerning a godly and constant seruant of Christ, named Iohn Gwse, which in the time of this king was vniustly condemned and burnt at the tower hill, an. 1473. in the month of August. Thus had England also his Iohn Hus as well as Boheme. Wherein moreouer this is to be noted, that since the time of king Richard 2. there is no raigne of any king to be assigned hitherto, wherein some good man or other hath not suffered the paines of fire, for the religion and true testimony of Christ Iesus. Of this said Iohn Gwse, or Iohn Hus; this moreouer I finde in another English monument recorded, that the said Iohn being deliuered to Robert Belisdon, one of the sheriffes, to see him burnt the after noone; the sheriffe like a charitable man, had him home to his house, and there exhorted him to deny (saith the story) his errors. But the godly man after long exhortation heard, desired the sheriffe to be content, for he was satisfied in his conscience. Notwithstanding this he desired of the sheriffe, for Gods sake to giue him some meat, saying that he was very sore hungred. Then the sheriffe commanded him meat; whereof he tooke and did eat, as he had been toward no manner of danger, and said to such as stood about him: I eat now a good and competent dinner, for I shall passe a little sharpe shower ere I go to supper. And when he had dined, he gaue thanks, and required that he might shortly be lead to the place, where he should yéeld vp his spirit vnto God. Ex Polychron.

The second thing herein to be noted, is the death of George duke of Clarence, the kings second brother: of whom relation was made before, how he assisted king Edward his brother, against the earle of Warwicke at Barnet field, and helped him to the crowne, and now after all these benefits, was at length thus requited, that (for what cause it is vncertaine) he was apprehended and cast into the tower, where he being adiudged for a traitor, was priuilie drowned in a butte of Malmsey. What the true cause was of his death, it cannot certainly bee affirmed. Diuers coniectures and imaginations there be diuerslie put forth. Some partly imputed to the Quenes displeasure. Other suppose it came for taking part in the cause of his seruant, which was accused and condemned for poisoning, sorcery, or inchantment. Another faine there is, which surmiseth the cause hereof to rise vpon the vaine feare of a foolish prophecie, comming no doubt (if it were true) by the crafty operation of Sathan, as it doth many times else happen among Infidels and Gentiles, where Christ is not knowne: where among high princes and in noble houses, much mischiefe groweth, first murther and parricide, and thereby ruine of ancient families, and alteration of kingdomes. The effect of this prophecie (as the faine goeth) was this, that after king Edward, should one raigne, whose name should begin with G. And because the name of the duke of Clarence, being George, began with a G. therefore he began to be feared, and afterward priuily (as is aforesaid) was made away.

The mischiefe that Sathan worketh by false prophecies.

The prophecie of G.

¶ By these experiments and mischéeuous ends of such prophecies, and also by the nature of them, it is soone to bee séene from what fountaine or author they procéed: that is, (no doubt) from Sathan, the ancient enemy of mankind, and prince of this world: against whose deceitfull delusions, christian men must be well instructed, neither to maruell greatly at them, though they séeme strange, nor yet to beléeue them, though they happen true. For Sathan being the prince of this world, in such worldly things can foresée what will follow, and can say truth for a mischéeuous end, and yet for all that is but a Sathan. So the dreame of Astyages, séeing a vine to grow out of his daughter, which should couer all Asia, and fearing thereby that by his nephew he should lose his kingdome, proued true in the sequell thereof, and yet notwithstanding of Sathan it came, and caused cruell murther to follow, first of the shepheards childe, then of the sonne of Harpagus, whom he set before his owne father to eate. Ex Iust. lib. 1. Likewise Cyrus was prophetically admonished by his dreame, to take him for his guide, whom he first met the next morrow. In that also his dreame fell true, and yet was not of God. In the same number are to be put all the blinde Oracles of the Idolatrous Gentiles, which although they procéed of a lying spirit, yet sometime they hit the truth to a mischéeuous purpose. The like iudgement also is to be giuen of Merlines prophecies. The sorceresse mentioned 1. Reg. 28. raising vp Samuel, told Saul the truth, yet was it not of God. In the sixteenth chapter of the Acts, there was a damsell hauing the spirit of Pytho, who said truth of Paul and Silas, calling them the messengers of the high God, and yet it was a wrong spirit. The vncleane spirits in giuing testimony of Christ, said the truth, yet because their testimony came not of God, Christ did not allow it.

Prophecies not rashly to be beleeued.

Sathan can say truth for a wicked end.

Diuellish prophecies, although they tell truth, yet are not to be followed.

a A spirit of diuination which could ghesse and foredeeme things past, present, and to come; which knowledge God many times permitteth to the diuell.

Paulus Diaconus recordeth of Valence the emperor that he also had a blinde prophecie, not much vnlike to this of king Edward, which was, that one should succéed him in the empire whose name should begin with o. and s. Whereupon one Theodorus, trusting vpon the prophecie, began rebelliously to hope for the crowne, and for his labor felt the paines of a traitor. Notwithstanding, the effect of the prophecie followed: For after Valence, succéeded Theodosius. Wherefore christian princes and noble men, and all Christs faithfull people must beware and learne.

Ex Paulo Diac.

1. First, that no man be inquisitiue or curious in searching to know what things be to come, or what shall happen, beside those things onely which are promised, and expressed in the word.

Three things to be noted concerning false prophecies.

2. Secondly, to vnderstand what difference there is, and how to discerne the voice of God from the voice of Sathan.

3. Thirdly, how to resist and auoid the danger of false and diuellish prophecies.

Many there be, which being not contented with things present, curiously occupy their wits to search what is to come, and not giuing thanks to God for their life which they haue, will also know what shall bechance them, how and when their end will come, how long princes shall raigne, and who after shall succéed them, and for the same, get vnto them soothsaiers, astrologers, sorcerers, coniurers, or familiars. And these are not so much inquisitiue to search or aske, but the diuell is as ready to answer them, who either falsly doubleth with them to delude them, or else telleth them truth, to worke them perpetuall care and sorrow. Thus was pope Siluester the sorcerer circumuented by the diuell, who told him that he should be at Jerusalem before he died, and so it fell out. For as hee was saying his masse at a chapell in Rome, called Jerusalem, there hee fell sicke, and within thrée dáies after died: vide sup. pag. 151. To king Henry the fourth also it séemeth it was propheried, that he should not die before he went to Jerusalem, who being brought to the abbats chamber of Westminster, and hearing of the name of the chamber to be called Jerusalem, knew his time to be come, and died: pag. 513.

growth to the life of men, either tauſing them falſly to truſt where they ſhould not, or elſe wickedly to perpetrate that they would not: as may appeare both by this king, and alſo diuers moe. So was Pompeius, Craſſus, and Ceſar, (as writeth Cicero) deceiued by the falſe Chaldeis, in declaring to them that they ſhould not die but in their beds, and with worſhip, and in their old age. Of ſuch a falſe truſt, riſing vpon falſe prophecies, S. Ambroſe in his booke of Exameron writeth, ſpeaking of raine, which being in thoſe parts greatly deſired, was promiſed and prophecied of one certainly to fall vpon ſuch a day, which was at the changing of the new moone: but (ſaith S. Ambroſe) there fell no ſuch raine at all, till at the praiers of the church, the ſame was obtained: giuing vs to vnderſtand, that raine commeth not by the word of man, nor by the beginnings of the moone, but by the prouidence and mercy of our Creator. Ex Ambroſ. in Examer.

Ambroſius in Exameron.

Ioan. Picus earle of Mirandula, in his excellent bookes written againſt theſe vaine ſtar-tellers and Aſtrologers, lib. 2. writeth of one Dardelaphus a prince, to whom it was prognoſticated by a famous cunning mã in that ſcience, called Hieronymus Manfredus, that he ſhould inioy long continuance of health, and proſperous life; who notwithſtanding the ſelfeſame yeere, and in the firſt yeere of his marriage, deceaſed: and after diuers other examples added moreouer vpon the ſame, he inferreth alſo mention, and the name of a certaine rich matron in Rome, named Conſtantia, who in like maner departed the ſame yeere, in which ſhe receiued great promiſes by theſe Soothſaiers and Aſtrologers, of a long and happy life, ſaying to her huſband theſe words: Behold (ſaith ſhe) how true be the prognoſtications of theſe Sooth-tellers: If it were not for noting of them which now are gone, and whoſe names I would in no caſe to be blemiſhed with any ſpot, otherwiſe I could recite the names of certaine, eſpecially one, which taking his iourney, in a certaine place, after diligent calculation and forecaſting of the ſucceſſe and good ſpeed of his iourney, was notwithſtanding in the ſame iourney, apprehended and brought where he would not, after that, neuer inioying good day, in ſhort time he departed. In Baſill this I my ſelfe heard of one which knew and was conuerſant with the party, who hauing a curious delight in theſe ſpeculations of chances and euents to come, by his calculation noted a certaine day, which he miſtruſted ſhould be fatall vnto him, by ſomething which at that day ſhould befall vpon him. Whereupon he determined with himſelfe, all that day to keepe him ſure and ſafe within his chamber, where he reaching vp his hand to take downe a booke, the booke falling downe vpon his head, gaue him his deaths wound, and ſhortly after hee died vpon the ſame. Of theſe and ſuch like examples the world is full, and yet the curioſitie of mans head will not refraine, ſtill to plucke the apple of this vnlucky and forbidden tree.

Ioan. Pic. Mirandul. contra Aſtrolog. li. ca. 9.

Experience of falſe prophecies.

This man by falſe diſſemblers, was taken, betraied, and brought into England.

A perilous matter for a man to be curious of times and things to come.

Beſide all this, what murther and paricide commeth by the feare of theſe prophecies, in great bloods and noble houſes, I referre it vnto them which reade and well aduiſe the ſtories, as well of our kings here in England, as in other kingdomes mo, both Chriſtened and Turkiſh, whereof another place ſhall ſerue as well (Chriſt willing) more largely to intreat, and particularly to diſcourſe. To this pertaineth alſo the great inconuenience and hinderance that groweth by the feare of ſuch prophecies in the vocation of men, forſomuch as many there be, which fearing, ſome one danger, ſome another, leaue their vocations vndone, and follow vnordinate waies. As if one hauing a blind prophecy, that his deſtruction ſhould be on the day, would walke and doe all his buſineſſe by night and candle light: and ſo forth in other ſeuerall caſes of men and women, as euery one in his owne conſcience knoweth his owne caſe beſt.

The ſecond thing to bee conſidered in theſe prophecies, is rightly to diſcerne and vnderſtand, as neere as wee can, the difference betweene the prophecies proceeding from God, and the falſe prophecies counterfetted by Sathan. For Sathan ſometime plaieth Gods Ape, and tranſformeth himſelfe into an Angell of light; bearing ſuch a reſemblance and colour of truth and Religion, that vneth a wiſe man is able to diſcerne the one from the other, and the moſt part is beguiled. Concerning prophecies therefore, to know which bee of God, which bee not, three things are to bee obſerued.

The ſecond part, how prophecies are to be diſcerned.

In the ſecond part three things to be conſidered.

1. Firſt, whether they goe ſimply and plainly, or whether they be doubtfull and ambiguous: whereof the one ſeemeth to taſte of Gods ſpirit, ſuch as be the prophecies of the ſcripture: the other to come otherwiſe, hauing a double or doubtfull interpretation. Although the time of Gods prophecies, as alſo of miracles is commonly and ordinarily expired: yet if the Lord in theſe daies, not vertraordinarily doe ſhew any prophecie, by the ſimpleneſſe and plainneſſe thereof, partly it may be diſcerned.

The ſecond thing to be conſidered in prophecies.

2. Secondly, this is to be expended, whether they be priuate, tending to this family or that family, or publike. For as the Scriptures, ſo commonly the prophecies of God haue no priuat interpretation, but generall: forſomuch as the care of Gods holy ſpirit is not reſtrained partially to one perſon more then to another, but generally and indifferently reſpecteth the whole church of his elect in Chriſt Jeſus his Sonne. Wherefore ſuch prophecies as priuatly are touching the armes of houſes or names of men, riſing or falling of priuat and particular families, are worthily to be ſuſpected.

The 3. thing to be conſidered in prophecies.

3. The third note and ſpeciall argument to deſcry the true prophecies of God, from the falſe prophecies of ſatan and his falſe prophets, is this, to conſider the matter and the end thereof, that is, whether they be worldly, or whether they be ſpirituall, or whether they tend to any glory or ſtate of this preſent world, or whether they tend to the ſpirituall inſtruction, admonition, or comfort of the publike church.

The 3. part, how to auoid the danger of ſinniſter prophecies.

Two remedies againſt diuelliſh prophecies.

The firſt remedie.

Now remaineth thirdly, after we know what prophecies be of God, and what not, that we be inſtructed next how to eſchew the feare and perill of all diuelliſh prophecies which make againſt vs. Wherein two ſpeciall remedies are to be marked of euery chriſtian man, whereby he may be ſafe and ſure againſt all danger of the enemy. The firſt is, that we ſet the name of Chriſt Jeſus the Sonne of God againſt them, through a true faith in him: knowing this, that the Son of God hath appeared, to diſſolue the workes of the diuell. And againe, this is the victory (ſaith the ſcripture) that ouercommeth the world, euen our faith. Whatſoeuer then ſatan worketh, or can worke againſt vs, be it neuer ſo forcible, faith in Chriſt will vanquiſh it. Such a maieſty is in our faith, beleeuing in the name of the Sonne of God.

The ſecond remedy againſt dangerous prophecies.

The other remedy is faithfull praier, which obtaineth in the name of Chriſt, all things with the Lord. So that wicked feend, which had killed before ſeuen huſbands of Tobias wife could not hurt him, entring his matrimony with earneſt praier: ſo no more ſhall any ſiniſter prophecie preuaile, where praier out of a faithfull heart, doth ſtriue againſt it. Neither am I ignorant, that againſt ſuch temporall euils and punihments to this life inflicted, a great remedy lieth alſo in this, when Sathan findeth nothing, wherein greatly to accuſe our conſcience. But becauſe ſuch a conſcience is hard to be found, the next refuge is to flie to repentance, with amendement of life. For many times where ſinne doth raigne in our mortall bodies, there alſo the operation of Sathan is ſtrong againſt vs, to afflict our outward bodies here; but as touching our eternall ſaluation, neither worke nor merit hath any place, but onely our faith in Chriſt. And thus much briefly touching the two ſpeciall remedies, whereby the operation of all diuelliſh prophecies may bee auoided and defeated.

Mans policie can nothing do againſt the diuell.

Now many there be, which leauing theſe remedies aforeſaid, and the ſafe protection which the Lord hath ſet vp in Chriſt, take other waies of their owne, ſeeking by their owne policie, how to withſtand and eſcape ſuch prophecies, either in eſchewing the place and time ſubtilly, or elſe cruelly by killing the party whom they feare: whereof commeth inury, murther, and parricide, with other miſchiefes in commonwealths vnſpeakeable. To whom commonly it commeth ſo to paſſe, that whereby they thinke moſt to ſaue themſelues, by the ſame meanes they fall moſt into the ſnare, being ſubuerted and confounded in their owne policie, for that they truſting to their owne deuice, and not vnto the Lord, which onely can diſſolue the operation of Sathan, the Lord ſo turneth their deuice into a trap, thereby to take them, whereby they thinke moſt ſurely to eſcape. Examples whereof wee ſee not onley in Aſtyages, king of the Medes aforeſaid, and Cyrus; but in infinite other like euents, which the trade of the world doth daily offer to our eies. So Queene Margaret thought her ſelfe cockeſure, when duke Humfrey was made away; when nothing elſe was her confuſion ſo much, as the loſſe and lacke of that man.

No power can withſtand Sathan, but only Chriſt, and our faith in him.

So if king Richard the ſecond had not exerciſed ſuch cruelty vpon his vncle Thomas, duke of Glocester, he had not receiued ſuch wrong by king Henry the fourth as hee did, pag. 473. Likewiſe this king Edward the fourth, if he had ſuffered his brother George, duke of Clarence to haue liued, his houſe had not ſo gone to wracke by Richard his other brother, as it did. What befell vpon the Student of Aſtrology in the Vniuerſity of Baſil, ye heard before, who if he had not mewed himſelfe in his chamber for feare of his diuination, had eſcaped the ſtroke that fell. Now in auoiding ſuch prophetical euents which hee ſhould not haue ſearched, hee fell into that which hee did feare. Theſe few examples for inſtruction ſake, I thought by occaſion to inferre, not as though theſe were alone; but by theſe few to admoniſh the Reader of infinite other, which daily come in practiſe of life, to the great danger and decay, as well in priuate houſes, as in weales publike.

A briefe rehearſall of the matter of prophecies before paſſed.

Wherefore briefly to repeat what before ſimply hath been ſaid touching this matter, ſeeing that ſathan through ſuch ſubtile prophecies, hath and yet doth daily practiſe ſo manifold miſchiefes in the world, ſetting brother againſt brother, nephew againſt the vncle, houſe againſt houſe, and realm againſt realme, gendring hatred where loue was, and ſubuerting priuily the ſimplicity of our chriſtian faith; therefore the firſt thing and beſt is, for godly men not to buſie their braines about ſuch phantaſies, neither in delighting in them, nor in harkening to them, nor in searching for them, either by southsaier, or by coniuration, or by familiar, or by astrologer: knowing and considering this, that whosoeuer shall be desirous or readie to search for them, the diuell is as readie to auiswere his curiositie therein. For as once in the old time of Gentilitie, he gaue his Oracles by Idols, and Priests of that time: so the same diuell, although he worketh not now by Idols, yet hee craftilie can giue now answere by Astrologers, and coniurers in these our dayes, and in so doing, both to say truth, and yet to deceiue men when he hath said. Wherefore, leauing off such curiositie, let euery Christian man walke simply in his present vocation, referring hid things not in the word expressed, vnto him which saith in his word: Non est vestrum scire tempora & momenta temporum, &c. It is not for you to knowe the times, and seasons of times, which the father hath kept in his owne power, &c.

to

The diuell readie to answere in matters of diuination.

Curiositie of prophecies to be auoyded.

Secondly, in this matter of Prophecies, requisite it is (as is said) for euery Christian man to learne, how to discerne and distinct the true prophecies, which procéde of God, and the false Prophecies, which come of Sathan. The difference whereof, as it is not hard to be discerned: so necessarie it is, that euery good man doe rightly vnderstand the same, to the intent that he knowing and flying the danger of the one, may be the more certaine and constant in adhering to the other.

Thirdly, because it is not sufficient that the deceitfull prophecies of the diuell be knowen, but also that they be resisted, I haue also declared, by what meanes the operation of Sathans works and Prophecies are to be ouercome: that is, not with strength and policie of man, for that there is nothing in man, able to counteruaile the power of that enemie. Under heauen there is nothing else that can preuaile against his works, but only the name of the Lord Iesus the sonne of God, not outwardly pronounced onely with our lips, or signed in our foreheads with the outward crosse, but inwardly apprehended and dwelling in our hearts by a stedfast faith, firmely and earnestly trusting vpon the promises of God, giuen and sealed vnto vs in his name: For so it hath pleased his fatherly wisedome, to set him vp, to be both our righteousnesse before himselfe, and also to be our fortitude against the enemie, accepting our faith in his sonne, in no lesse price, then he accepteth the works and worthinesse of the same his sonne, in whom we doe beléeue.

The strength of a Christian mans faith in Christ.

Such is the strength and effect of faith both in heauen, in earth, and also in hell: In heauen to iustifie, in earth to preserue, in hell to conquere. And therefore when any such Prophecie, or any other thing is to vs obiected, which séemeth to tend against vs, let vs first consider whether it sauour of Sathan, or not. If it doe, then let vs séeke our succour not in our selues, where it doth not dwell, neither let vs kill, nor slay, nor chaunge our vocation therefore, following vnordinate wayes: but let vs run to our Castle of refuge, which is to the power of the Lord Iesus, remembring the true promise of the Psalme: Qui habitat in adiutorio altissimi, in protectione Dei cœli commorabitur. That is, Who so putteth his trust in the succour of the Lord, shall haue the God of heauen to his protector. And then shall it afterward follow in the same Psalme: Ipse liberabit te à laqueo venantium, & à verbo aspero. That is: And he shall deliuer him from the snare of the hunter, and from all euill words, and Prophecies, be they neuer so sharpe or bitter against him, &c. And thus much by the occasion of king Edward, of Prophecies.

Onely Christ able to withstand the power of Sathan. Psal. 90.

Now hauing long taried at home in describing the tumultes and troubles within our owne land, wée will let out our storie more at large, to consider the afflictions and perturbations of other parties and places also of Christes Church, as well here in Europe vnder the Pope, as in the East parts vnder the Turke, first deducing our storie from the time of Sigismund, where before we left: Which Sigismund, as is aboue recorded, was a great doer in the Councell of Constance against John Hus, and Hierome of Prage. This Emperour had euer euill lucke, fighting against the Turkes. Twice he warred against them, and in both the battailes was discomfited and put to flight: once about the Citie of Mysia, fighting against Baiazetes the great Turke, an. 1395. the second time fighting against Celebinus the sonne of Baiazetes, about the towne called Columbacium. But specially after the Councell of Constance, wherein were condemned and burned those two godly Martyrs, more vnprosperous successe did then followe him, fighting against the Bohemians, his owne subiects, an. 1420. by whom he was repulsed in so many battailes, to his great dishonour, during all the life of Ziska, and of Procopius, as is afore more at large expressed: who was so beaten both of the Turkes, and at home of his owne people, that he neuer did encounter with the Turkes after. Then followed the Councell of Basill, after the beginning whereof within fiue yéeres, this Sigismundus, which was Emperour, king of Hungarie, and king of Bohemie, died in Morauia, an. 1437.

¶ Albertus Emperour.

THis Sigismund left behinde him one onely daughter Elizabeth, who was married to Albert, Duke of Austrich: by reason whereof, he was aduanced to the empire, and so was both Duke of Austrich, Emperour, king of Hungary, and king also of Boheme. But this Albert (as is afore declared) being an enemie and a disquieter to the Bohemians, and especially to the good men of Thabor, as hee was preparing and setting forth against the Turkes, in the meanetime died, in the second yeare of his Empire, an. 1439. leauing his wife great with childe, who lying then in Hungarie, and thinking to be great with a daughter, called to her the Princes and the chiefetaines of the Realme, declaring to them that shee was but a woman, and vnsufficient to the gouernance of such a state: and moreouer how she thought her selfe to be with childe of a daughter, and therefore required them to prouide among them, such a Prince and gouernour, (reseruing the right of the kingdome to her selfe) as were fit and able vnder her, to haue the regiment of the land committed. The Turke in the meane while being eleuated and incouraged with his prosperous victories against Sigismundus aforesaid, began then more fiercely to inuade Hungarie and those parties of Christendome. Wherefore the Hungarians making the more haste, consulted among themselues, to make duke Uladislaus, brother to Casimirus king of Polonie, their king.

But while this was in working betweene the Hungarians and Uladislaus the duke, in the meane space Elizabeth brought forth a sonne called Ladislaus, who being the lawfull heire of the kingdome, the queene calleth backe againe her former word, minding to reserue the kingdome for her sonne, being the true heire thereof, and therefore refuseth marriage with the said Uladislaus, which she had before pretended. But Uladislaus ioyning with a great part of the Hungarians, persisting still in the condition before granted, would not giue ouer: by reason whereof, great contention and diuision kindling among the people of Hungarie, Amurathes, the great Turke, taking his aduantage of their discord, and partly surprised with pride of his former successe against Sigismund aforesaid, with his whole maine and force, inuaded the Realme of Hungarie: where Huniades surnamed Uaiuoda, Prince of Transiluania, ioyning with the newe king Uladislaus, did both together set against the Turke, an. 1444. and there Uladislaus the newe king of Hungaria, the fourth yeare of his kingdome was slaine. Elizabeth with her sonne, was fled in the meane while, to Frederick the Emperour. Of Huniades Uaiuoda the noble captaine, and of his actes, and also of Ladislaus (Christ willing) more shall be said hereafter, in his time and place.

¶ Fredericus the third Emperour.

AFter the decease of Albert, succeeded in the Empire Fredericus the third, duke of Austria, an. 1440. By whom it was procured (as we haue before signified) that Pope Felix elected by the Councell of Basill, did resigne his Popedome, to Pope Nicolas the fift, vpon this condition, that the said Pope Nicolas should ratifie the actes decréed in the said Councell of Basill. In the dayes of this Emperour, much warre and dissension raged almost thorough all christian realmes, in Austria, Hungaria, Polonia, in France, in Burgoine, and also héere in England, betweene king Henrie the sixth, and king Edward the fourth, as yée haue alreadie heard, whereby it had bene easie for the Turke, with little maistrie, to haue ouerrunne all the Christian Realmes in Europe, had not the prouidence of our mercifull Lord otherwise prouided to keepe Amurathes the Turke, occupied in other ciuill wars at home in the meane while. Unto this Fredericke came Elizabeth (as is aforesaid) with Ladislaus her sonne: by whom he was nourished and entertained a certaine space, till at length, after the death of Uladislaus aforesaid, king of Hungarie (which was slaine in battaile by the Turkes) the men of Austria, through the instigation of Ulricus Etzingerus and of Ulricus earle of Cilicia rising vp in armour, required of Fredericke the Emperour, either to giue them their young king, or else to stand to his owne defence.

Uladislaus K. of Hungarie slaine in battaile by the Turke.

When Fredericke heard this, neither would he render to them a sodaine aunswere, neither woulde they abide any longer delay: and so the matter growing to warre, the new Citie was besieged, where many were slaine, and much harme done. At length the Emperours part being the weaker, the Emperour through the interuention of certaine Nobles of Germanie, restored Ladislaus vnto their hands, who being yet vnder age, committed his three kingdomes to three gouernours. Whereof John Huniades the worthie captaine aboue mentioned, had the ruling of Hungarie: George Pogiebracius had Boheme: and Ulricus the Earle of Cilicia, had Austria. Which Ulrice, hauing the chiefe custodie of the king, bare the greatest authoritie aboue the rest, a man as much full of ambition and tyrannie, as hee was hated almost of all the Austrians, and shortly after by the meanes of Etzingerus, was excluded also from the king and the court, but afterward restored againe, and Etzingerus thrust out. Such is the vnstable condition of them which be nert in place about Princes. But this contention betweene them I ouerpasse.

Ulricus gouernour of Austria.

Not long after, Ladislaus the yong king went to Boheme, there to be crowned, where George Pogiebracius (as is sayd) had the gouernance. But Ladislaus during all the time of his being there, though being much requested, yet would neither enter into the Churches, nor heare the seruice of them, which did draw after the doctrine of Hus. Insomuch that when a certaine Priest in the high tower of Prage, was appointed and addressed, after the manner of Priests, to say seruice before the king, being knowen to hold with John Hus and Rochezana, the king disdaining at him, commaunded him to giue place and depart, or else he would send him downe headlong from the rocke of the tower: and so the good minister repulsed by the king, departed. Also another time the said Ladislaus, seeing the sacrament carried by a minister of that side, whom they called then Hussites, would doe thereunto no reuerence. Ex Aene. Syluio.

Ladislaus could not abide the doctrine of Hus.

At length the long abode of the king, although it was not very long, yet seemed to the godly disposed to bee longer then they wished: and that was not to the king vnknowen, which made him to make the more haste away: but before he departed, hee thought first to visite the noble Citie Uratislauia in Schlesia. In the which Citie, the foresaid king Ladislaus being there in the high church, at seruice, many great princes were about him: Among whom was also George Pogiebracius, who then stood nearest to the king, vnto whom one Chilianus, playing the Parasite about the king (as the fashion is of such as faine themselues fooles, to make other men as very fooles as they) spake in this wise as followeth: With what countenance you doe behold this our seruice, I see right well, but your heart I doe not see. Say then, doth not the order of this our Religion seeme vnto you decent and comely? Do you not see how many and how great princes, yea the king himselfe, doe follow one order and vniformitie? And why doe you then follow rather your Preacher Rochezana then these? Doe you thinke a few Bohemians to be more wise then all the Church of Christ besides? why then doe you not forsake that rude and rusticall people, and ioyne to these Nobles, as you are a noble man your selfe?

Unto whom thus Pogiebracius sagely againe doth answere. If you speake these words of your selfe, saith he, you are not the man whom you faine your selfe to be: and so to you I answere, as not to a fole. But if you speake this by the suggestion of others, then must I satisfie them. Heare therefore. As touching the Ceremonies of the Church, euery man hath a conscience of his owne to follow. As for vs, we vse such ceremonies, as we trust doe please God: Neither is it in our arbitrement to beleeue what we will our selues. The mind of man being perswaded with great reasons, is captiuated, will hee nill he: and as nature is instructed and taught, so is she drawen, in some one way, and in some another. As for my selfe, I am fully perswaded in the religion of my preachers. If I should follow thy religion, I might perchance deceiue men, going contrary to mine owne conscience, but I cannot deceiue God, who seeth the hearts of all: Neither shall it become mee to frame my selfe like to thy disposition. That which is meete for a iester, is not likewise conuenient for a noble man. And these words either take to thy selfe, as spoken to thee, if thou be a wise man, or else I referre them to those which set thee a work. Ex Aen. Syl. in Hist. Bohem.

An aunswere proceeding of a heauenly wisedome.

After the king was returned from the Bohemians againe to Austria, the Hungarians likewise made their petitions to the king, that he would also come vnto them. The gouernour of Hungarie (as yee before haue heard) was Joannes Huniades, whose victorious acts against the Turks are famous. Against this Huniades, wicked Ulricus Earle of Cilica, did all he could with the king, to bring him to destruction, and therefore caused the king to send for him vp to Vienna, and there priuily to worke his death. But Huniades hauing thereof intelligence, offereth himselfe within Hungarie to serue his Prince, to all affaires: Out of the land where he was, it was neither best (said hee) for the king, nor safest for himselfe, to come. The earle being so disappointed, came downe with certaine Nobles of the Court, to the borders of Hungarie, thinking either to apprehend him and bring him to Vienna, or there to dispatch him. Huniades without in the fieldes, said he would commune with him, within the towne he would not be brought. After that, an other traine also was laid for him, that vnder pretence of the kings safe-conduct, hee should meete the king in the broad fields of Vienna. But Huniades suspecting deceit, came indeede to the place appointed, where hee neither seeing the king to come, nor the earle to haue any safe-conduct for him, was moued (and not without cause) against the earle, declaring how it was in his power there to slay him, which went about to seeke his blood, but for the reuerence of the king, hee would spare him and let him goe.

Not long after this, the Turke with a great power of fighting men, to the number of an hundred and fiftéene thousand, arriued in Hungarie, where he laid siege to the Citie Alba. But through the mercifull hand of God, John Huniades, and Capistranus a certaine Minorite, with a small garrison of Christian souldiours, gaue him the repulse and put him to flight, with all his mightie host: Wherevpon more (Christ willing) hereafter. Ex hist. Bohemic. Aen. Sylui. Huniades shortly after this victorie, deceased. Of whose death when the king and the earle did vnderstand, they came the more boldly into Hungarie, where he being receiued by Ladislaus Huniades sonne, into the towne of Alba: there viewed the places where the Turkes before had pitched their tents. When this Ladislaus heard that the king was comming first toward the towne, obediently he opened to him the gates. Foure thousand onely of armed souldiours hee debarred from entring the Citie.

In the meane time while the king was there resident in the Citie, the earle with other Nobles did sit in counsaile, requiring also Ladislaus to resort vnto them: who first doubting with himselfe what he might doe, at length putteth on a priuy coate of male, and commeth to them. Whether the earle first began with him, or he with the Earle, it is not knowen. The opinion is of some, that Ulricus first called him traitor, for shutting the gates against the kings souldiors. Howsoeuer the occasion began, this is vndoubted, that Ulricus taking his sword from his page, let fite at his head. To breake the blow, some putting vp their hands, had their fingers cut off. The Hungarians hearing a noise and tumult within the chamber brake it vpon them, and there incontinent slew Ulrick the earle, wounding and cutting him almost all to peeces: The king hearing thereof, although he was not a little discontented thereat in his minde: yet seeing there was then no other remedie, dissembled his griefe for a time.

From thence the king tooke his iourney againe to Buda, accompanied with the foresaid Ladislaus, who passing by the towne, where the wife of Huniades was mourning for the death of her husband, seemed with many faire words to comfort her: and after he had there sufficiently repasted himselfe, with such pretence of dissembled loue, and fained fauour, that they were without all suspition and feare: from thence he set forward in his iourney, taking with him the two sonnes of Huniades, Ladislaus and Mathias, who were right readie to wait vpon him. The king being come to Buda (whether of his owne head, or by sinister counsell set on) when he had them at a bauntage, caused both the sonnes of Huniades; to wit, Ladislaus and Mathius, to be apprehended. And first was brought forth Ladislaus the elder sonne, to the place of execution, there to be beheaded: where meekely he suffered, being charged with no other crime, but this, published by the voyce of the crier, saying: Thus are they to be chastened, which are rebels against their Lord. Peucerus writing of his death, addeth this moreouer, that after the hangman had three blowes at his necke, yet notwithstanding the said Ladislaus hauing his hands bound behind him after the third stroke, rose vp right vpon his féete, and looking vp to heauen, called vpon the Lord, and protested his innocencie in that behalfe: and so laying downe his necke againe, at the fourth blow was dispatched. Mathius the other brother was led captiue with the king vnto Austria. The rest of the captiues brake the prison and escaped.

Ex Peucer. Chron. lib. 5.

It was not long after this crueltie was wrought vpon Ladislaus, the king being about the age of twentie and two yeeres, that talke was made of the kings marriage, with Magdalene daughter to the French king. The place of the marriage was appointed at Prage, where great preparation was for the matter. At the first entrance of the king into the Citie of Prage, Rochezana with a companie of ministers, such as were fauourers of John Hus, and of sincere religion, came with all solemnitie to receiue the king, making there his oration to gratulate the kings most ioyfull and prosperous accesse into the same his owne realme and countrey of Boheme. Unto which Rochezana, after he had ended his oration, scarce the king would open his mouth to giue thanks to him, or any chearefull countenance vnto his companie, but fiercely seemed to frowne vpon them. In the next Pagent after these, came forth the Priests of the high Minister, after the most Popish manner, meeting him with procession, and with the Sacrament of the altar: For as Panacea among Physitions serueth for all diseases, so the sacrament of the Popes altar, serueth for all pompes and pagents. First it must lie vpon the altar, then it must be holden vp with hands, then it must hang in the pire, it must serue for the quicke, it must also helpe the dead, it must moreouer visite the sicke, it must walke about the Churchyard, it must goe about the streets, it must bee carried about the fieldes to make the grasse to grow, it must be had to the battaile, it must ride on horsebacke before the pope: And finally, it must welcome kings into Cities. Wherein these Catholike Fathers doe séeme somewhat to forget themselues. For if the pope, being inferiour to the Sacrament of the altar, at the comming of kings, doe vse to sit still while the kings come and kisse his féete, what reason is it that the Sacrament of the altar, which is (I trow) aboue the pope, should méet kings by the way, and welcome them to the towne? But this by the way of parenthesis: Let vs now continue the text.

and especially with their blessed Sacrament, to come: with all reuerence and much deuotion, he lighted downe from his horse, he embraced the crosse and kissed it, and with chearefull countenance saluted the Priests in order. All this while his young wife was not yet come out of France, but Legates were sent, after most sumptuous wise, to conduct her. Other Legates also were sent the same time, to the Emperour Fredericke, for conclusion of peace. The third Legacie was directed likewise to Pope Calixtus about Religion, how to reduce the Bohemians to the Church of Rome. The author of this storie (which was Pope Pius himselfe) declareth further the opinion of some to bee, that king Ladislaus the same time had intended, to make a finall end and destruction of all that sect in Bohemia, which held with the doctrine of John Hus, and Hierome, by the assembly and concourse of the catholicke Princes, and Popish Prelates, which were appointed there to meet together at that marriage in Prage. For there should be first the Emperour Fredericke, Elizabeth the kings mother, and his sisters, Elizabeth, and Anna, the Princes of Saxonie, Baioria, Silesia, Franconia, the Palatine, and other Princes of Rhene: many also of the Lords of France, besides the Popes Cardinals, Legats, Prelats, and other potestates of the Popes Church. Who if they had all together conuented in Boheme, no doubt but some great mischiefe had beene wrought there against the Hussites: against whom this Ladislaus, following the steps of Sigismundus his grandfather, and Albertus his father, was euer an vtter enemy. But when man hath purposed, yet God disposeth as pleaseth him.

Eneas Siluius.

And therefore, truely it is written of Aeneas Syluius in the same place, saying: De regimine Ciuitatum, de mutatione regnorum, de orbis imperio, minimum est, quod homines possint (tum verò De religionis constitutione multo minus) magna magnus disponit Deus. That is: In regiment of Cities, in alteration of kingdomes, in ruling and gouerning the world, it is lesse then nothing that man can doe: it is the high God that ruleth high things. Whereunto then I may well adde this moreouer, and say: that if the gouernance of worldly kingdomes standeth not in mans power, but in the disposition of God, much lesse is it then, that mans power can doe in the regiment and gouerning of religion. Example whereof in this purposed deuice of Princes, doth euidently appeare. For as this great preparation and solemnitie of marriage was in doing, and the princes readie to set forth, with a little turne of Gods holy hand, all these great purposes were suddenly turned and dashed. For in the midst of this businesse, about the 21. day of Nouember, An. 1461. this great aduersarie of Christs people, king Ladislaus, king of Boheme, of Hungarie, and prince of Austria sickned, and within 36. houres died, some say of a Pestilent sore in his grine, some say of poyson. But howsoeuer it was, as it came not without the iust iudgement of God, reuenging the innocent blood of Ladislaus Huniades sonne, wrongfully put to death before: so by the opportune death of this king, the poore Churches of Boheme were gratiously deliuered. And this end made Ladislaus, one of the mightiest princes at that time in all Europe: in whom three mightie kingdomes were conioyned and combined together, Austria, Hungaria, and Bohemia: which countries doe lie Southeast from England, in the farthest parts of all Germanie, toward Constantinople, and the dominion of the Turkes, and containe these principall townes in them.

After the death of Ladislaus, the kingdome of Boheme fell to George Pogiebracius aboue mentioned, whom Pope Innocent the eight, did excommunicate and depose for his religion, as is afore declared.

George Pogiebracius.

Furthermore the kingdome of Hungarie, was giuen to Matthias son of Huniades, who was in captiuity (as is said) with king Ladislaus, and should haue beene put to death after his brother, had not the king before beene preuented with death, as is aboue recorded. Moreouer, heere is to be noted that the said king Ladislaus, thus dying without wife and issue, left behinde him two sisters aliue, to witte, Elizabeth, which was married to Casimirus king of Polonia: and Anna, married to William, duke of Saronie; Elizabeth by her husband Casimirus, king of Polonia, had Uladislaus, who at length was king both of Boheme and Hungarie. This Casimirus, first was married to Beatrix, wife before to Matthias. Then being diuorced from her by the dispensation of pope Alexander married a new wife a countesse of France, by whom he had two children, Lewes, and Anna; Lewes which was heire of both kingdomes of Boheme, and Hungarie, was slaine fighting against the Turkes, Anna was married to Ferdinandus, by whom he was Archduke of Austria king of Boheme, &c.

    - Vladislaus, king of Boheme and Hungary: Who by his second wife, Countesse of France, had
      - Ludouicus, king of Boheme, and Hungary.
      - Anne, wife to Ferdinandus, father to this Maximilian now Emperour.

War betweene Matthias and Fredericke the Emperour.

We heard before, how after the decease of Ladislaus, the Hungarians by their election preferred Mathias, surnamed Corninus, which was sonne of Huniades, to the kingdome of Hungarie. For which cause dissension fell betweene Fredericke the Emperour and him, for that the said Fredericke was both nominated himselfe by diuers vnto that kingdome, and also because he had the crowne of Hungarie then remaining in his hands, which Elizabeth mother to king Ladislaus, had brought to the Emperour, as was before declared. But this warre betweene them, was ceased by the intercession of the princes of Germany, so that Matthias ransomed that crowne of Fredericke for eight thousand Florences.

George Pogiebracius by the Pope deposed from his kingdome, for fauouring of I. Hus.

Not long after, Pope Innocent being displeased with George Pogiebracius (or Boiebracius) king of Bohemia, for fauouring of John Hus, and his religion, that is to say, for playing the part of a godly Prince, did excommunicate and depose him, conferring his kingdome to Matthias. But forsomuch as Fredericke the Emperour would not thereto consent, and especially after the death of the aforesaide George, when the Emperour and the Bohemians, leauing out Matthias, did nominate Uladislaus sonne of Casimirus, king of Polonie, and of Elizabeth, to be king of Boheme, therefore great warre and trouble kindled betweene him and Fredericke the Emperour: Wherein the Emperour had vtterly gone to ruine, had not Albertus duke of Saxonie rescued the Emperour, and repressed the vehemencie of Matthias.

The noble acts of John and Matthias Huniades against the Turkes. Sirmium and the borders of Illyrica, recouered from the Turkes.

The noble actes of John Huniades, and of this Matthias his sonne, were not onely great stais to Hungarie, but almost to all Christendome, in repelling backe the Turke. For beside the other victories of John Huniades the father, aforementioned, this Mathias also his sonne succeeding no lesse in the valiantnesse, then in the name of his father, did so recouer Sirmium, and the confines of Illyrica, from the hands of the Turkes, and so vanquished their power, that both Mahometes, and also Baiazetes his sonne, were inforced to seeke for truce.

Jaitza recouered. The subtle practise of Sathan to stop good procedings.

Ouer and besides, the same Matthias, conducting his armie into Bosna (which lieth South from Hungarie) recouered againe Jaitza, the principall towne of that kingdome, from the Turkes possession. Who, if other Christian Princes had ioyned their helpes withall, would haue proceeded farther into Thracia. But behold heere the malitious subtiltie of Sathan, working by the Pope. For while Matthias was thus occupied in this expedition against the Turkes, wherein hee should haue bene set forward and aided by Christian Princes, and Bishops: the Bishop of Rome, wickedly and sinfully misstreth matter of ciuill discord betweene him and Pogiebracius aforesaid, in remouing him from the right of his kingdome, and transferring the same to Matthias. Whereupon, not onely the course of victorie against the Turkes was stopped, but also great warre and bloodshed followed in Christian realmes, as well betweene this Matthias, and Pogiebracius, with his two sonnes Victorinus and Henricus, as also betweene Casimirus, Uladislaus, and Matthias warring about Uratislauia, till at length the matter was taken vp by the Princes of Germanie.

The popes excommunication not obeyed of diuers in Bohemia.

Albeit, for all the execrable excommunication of the Pope against Pogiebracius, a great part of Boheme would not be remoued from the obedience of their king, whom the Pope had cursed, and deposed: yet Matthias tooke from him Morauia, and a great portion of Slesia, and adioyned it to his kingdome of Hungarie, An. 1474.

Matthias adioyned Morauia and part of Slesia vnto Hungarie.

Anno 1474

¶ Where this by the way is to be noted, that the religion in Bohemia, planted by John Hus, could not be extinct or suppressed with all the power of foure mightie Princes, Uincelaus, Sigismundus, Albertus, and Ladislaus, notwithstanding they with the popes, did therein what they possibly could: but still the Lord maintained the same, as yee see by this Pogiebracius king of Boheme, whom the pope could not vtterly remoue out of the kingdome of Bohemia.

The religion of the Bohemians, defended by God against the 4. greatest princes in Europe.

Matthias a great louer of learning and of learned men.

This forementioned Matthias, beside his other memorable acts of Chiualrie, is no lesse also commended for his singular knowledge and loue of learning and of learned men, whom he with great stipends, procured into Pannonia: where by the meanes of good letters, and furniture of learned men, he reduced in short space the barbarous rudenesse of that countrey, into a flourishing common wealth. Moreouer such a Librarie hee did there erect, and replenish with all kind of Authors, Sciences, and Histories, which he caused to be translated out of Greeke into Latin, as the like is not thought to bee found, next to Italy, in all Europe beside. Out of which Librarie we haue receiued diuers fragments of writers, as of Polybius, and Diodorus Siculus, which were not extant before. Ex Peucer.

The noble Librarie of Matthias king of Hungarie. Ex 5. lib. Peuc.

The constant fortitude also of Georgius Pogiebracius king of Boheme, is not vnworthy of commendation: of whom also pope Pius himselfe, in Descriptione Europæ, doth honestly report (as a pope may speake of a protestant) in these words writing: Magnus vir alioqui, & rebus bellicis clarus, &c. Who although pope Innocent did execrate with his children, yet he left not off the profession of the veritie and knowledge which he had receiued. Moreouer, the Lord so prospered his sonnes, Victorinus, and Henricus, that they subdued their enemies, and kept their estate: Insomuch, that when Fredericke the Emperour at Vienna was in Custodie enclosed by the Citizens, Victorinus did rescue and deliuer him out of their hands: Wherefore the Emperour afterward aduanced them to be dukes. Also God gaue them sometimes prosperous victory against Mathias, as at the Citie of Glogouia, &c.

Commendation of George Pogiebracius. Ex Pij pont. Descriptione Europæ.

Gods fauour to the sonnes of Pogiebracius.

After the decease of Georgius Pogiebracius, king of Boheme, Fredericke the Emperour assigned that kingdome, not to Matthias, vpon whom the pope had bestowed it before, but vpon Uladislaus sonne of Casimirus, king of Polonie, and of Elizabeth, daughter of the Emperour Albert, and sister to Ladislaus. For the which, Matthias being discontented, and for that the Emperour had denied him his daughter Kunegunda, went about to exclude Uladislaus out of Boheme, and also proclaimed warre against Fredericke. But before he accomplished his purposed preparation, death preuented him, who without issue departed, An. 1490.

The death of Pogiebracius.

Uladislaus Casimirus son, made king of Hungarie.

After the death of Matthias, departing without issue, Uladislaus sonne of Casimirus, king of Polonie, and of Elizabeth daughter to Albert Emperour, and sister to king Ladislaus, married his wife Beatrix, whom Matthias left a widow, and with her was elected king of Hungarie, with this condition made betweene him and Fredericke the Emperour, that if he died without lawfull issue, then the kingdomes of Hungarie and of Boheme, should returne to Maximilian, sonne to Fredericus. But Uladislaus not long after, did repudiate his wife Beatrix, and depriuing her of her kingdome, caused the said Beatrix to sweare and to consent to the marrying of another woman, which was the daughter of the French king, named Anne, procuring from Pope Alexander a dispensation for the same, as is before signified. By this Anne, Uladislaus had Lewis, and Anne, which Anne afterward was married to Ferdinandus.

Uladislaus forsaketh his first wife. Dispensation from pope Alexander to forsake his first wife, and to marry another.

Ludouicus Uladislaus sonne, king of Hungarie and Boheme.

Lewis, succeeding after his father, had both the said kingdomes of Boheme and Hungarie; An. 1492. and married Marie sister to Charles the 5. Emperour. Anne, as is sayd, was coupled to Ferdinandus, &c.

Of Charles duke of Burgoine, somewhat was before touched, who had married king Edwards sister: and what troubles by him were stirred vp in France, partly was before notified. This Charles after he had besieged the Citie Nullis, or Nouasium, the space of a whole yeere, went about to alienate the territorie of Colen, from the Empire to his owne dominion: wherefore warre began to bee moued betweene him and Fredericke the Emperour. At length through communication had, peace was concluded, and a marriage appointed betweene Mary the onely daughter of Charles, and Maximilian the Emperours sonne: Anno 1475. Then from Nouasium, Charles leadeth his armie toward Heluatia, against Renatus or Reinhardus duke of Lotharing: then against the Heluetians. Where hee being thrice ouercome, first at Granson, then at Moratum or Murta, in the higher part of Heluetia, at last at the towne of Nanse, was ouerthrowne and slaine: Anno 1477. The procurer of which warres, was chiefly Lewis the 11. the French king, to the intent he might compasse the dominion of Burgundie, vnder his subiection: which afterward by open wrong and priuie fraud, he brought about, defrauding Marie the daughter of Charles, of her rightfull inheritance: for the which cause the Burgundians were the more willing to ioyne her in marriage with Maximilian, sonne of Fredericke the Emperour: by reason whereof the title of Burgundie, was first ioyned to the house of Austria.

And thus haue you the miserable vexations and contentions among our Christian princes heere in Europe described, vnder the raigne of this Fredericke the third emperour, so that almost no angle or portion of all Christendome (whether we consider the state of the Church, or ciuill gouernment) was free from discord, tumults, and dissensions. This cankered worme of ambition so mightily creepeth, and euery where preuaileth in these latter ends of the world, that it suffereth neither rest in common weales, nor peace in the Church, nor any sparkle of charitie almost to remaine in the life of men. And what marueil then, if the Lord seeing vs so farre to degenerate, not onely from his precepts and counsels, but almost from the sense and bond of nature, that brother with brother, vncle with nephew, blood with blood cannot agree, in striuing, killing, and fighting for worldly dominions, doe send therefore these cruell Turkes vpon vs so to scourge and vexe vs: Of whose bloodie tyrannie and daily spilling of Christian blood, hereafter (by the grace of Christ) wee will discourse more at large, when wee come to the peculiar consideration of the Turkish stories. In the meane time, this shall be for vs to note and obserue, not so much the scourge how grieuous it is: but rather to behold the causes which bring the whip vpon vs, which is our owne miserable ambition and wretched warres among our selues.

Warre and dissension among Christian Princes.

The discord of Christians scourged by the Turkes.

And yet if this Christian peace and loue, left and commended so heartily vnto vs by the mouth of the sonne of God, being now banished out of Christian Realmes and ciuill gouernance, might at least finde some refuge in the Church, or take Sanctuarie among men professing nothing but Religion, lesse cause wee had to mourne. Now so it is, that as wee see little peace and amitie among ciuill Potentates: so lesse wee finde in the spirituall sort of them, which chiefly take vpon them the administration of Christs Church. So that it may well bee doubted whether the scourge of the Turke, or the ciuill sword of Princes haue slaine moe in the fieldes, or the Popes keyes haue burnt moe in townes and Cities. And albeit such as bee professed to the Church, doe not fight with sworde and Target for Dominions and reuenewes, as Warlike Princes doe: yet this ambition, pride and auarice, appeareth in them nothing inferiour vnto other worldly potestates:

Discord and dissension in the Church vsed.

Ambition and auarice of the Church of Rome.

potestates: especiallie if wee behold and aduise the doings and insatiable desires of the court of Rome. Great argument and proofe hereof neither is hard to be found, nor far to be sought. What realme almost through all Christendome hath not onlie seene with their eyes, but haue felt in their purses the ambition intollerable, and auarice insatiable of that deuouring Church, and also haue complained vpon the greeuance thereof, but neuer could be redressed? What exactions and extortions haue bene here in England out of bishoprickes, monasteries, benefices, deanries, archdeaconries, and all other offices of the church, to fill the popes coffers? and when they had all done, yet euery yeare brought almost some newe inuention from Rome, to fetch in our English money: and if all the flouds in England (yea in all Europe) did runne into the sea of Rome, yet were that Ocean neuer able to be satisfied.

¶ In France likewise, what flouds of money were swallowed vp into this sea of Rome? it was openly complained of in the councell of Basill as is testified by Henry Token, Canon and Ambassadour of the archbishop of Maidenburge, written in this booke intituled Rapularium, where as hee writeth that in the councell of Basill, An. 1436. the archb. of Lions did declare, that in the time of pope Martine, there came out of France to the court of Rome, 9. millions of golde, which was gathered of the Bishops and Prelats, besides those which could not be counted of the poore Clergie, which daily without number, ran vnto the court of Rome, carrying with them all their whole substance: The archbishop of Turonne said also at Basill, in the yeare of our Lord 1439. that three millions of gold came vnto Rome in his time, within the space of 14. yeares, from the prelates and prelactes, whereof no account could be made, besides the poore clergie, which daily runne to that court. Let the man which feareth God, iudge what a deuouring gulfe this is. A million containeth x. C. M.

And what made pope Pius the 2. to labour so earnestlie to Lewes the 11. the French king (who as is aforesaide was a great enemie to the house of Burgoin) that hee would (according to his former promise) abolish and vtterly extinct the constitution established before at the Councell of Bitures, by king Charles the 7. his predecessor, called Pragmatica Sanctio, but onlie the ambition of the see, which had no measure, & their auarice which had no end? The storie is this. K. Charles 7. the French king, willing to obey & follow the councell of Basill, did summon a Parliament at Bitures: where by the full consent of all the states in France, both spirituall and temporall, a certaine constitution was decreed and published, called Pragmatica Sanctio: wherein was comprehended briefly the pith and effect of all the Canons and decrees concluded in the councell of Basill. The which constitution the said king Charles willed and commaunded through all his realme, inuiolably to be obserued and ratified for the honor and increase of Christian religion for euer. This was An. 1438.

It followed, that after the decease of this foresaid Charles the 7. succeeded king Lewes 11. who had promised before, being Dolphine to Pope Pius, that if he euer came to the crowne, the foresaid Sanctio Pragmatica should be abolished. Whereupon Pope Pius hearing him to be crowned, did send vnto him John Baluus a Cardinall, with his great letters patent, willing him to be mindfull of his promise made. The king either willing, or els pretending a will to performe, and accomplish what he had promised, directed the popes letters patent, with the said Cardinall to the councell of Paris, requiring them to consult vpon the cause.

Thus the matter being brought and proposed in the Parliament house, the kings Atturney named Ioannes Romanus, a man well spoken, singularlie witted, and wel reasoned, stepping forth, with great eloquence, and no lesse boldnesse, proued the said Sanction to be profitable, holie, and necessary for the wealth of the realme, and in no case to be abolished. Vnto whose sentence the Vniuersitie of Paris adioyning their consent, did appeale from the attempts of the pope to the next generall Councell. The Cardinall vnderstanding this, tooke no little indignation thereat, fretting and fuming, and threatning manie terrible things against them: but all his minatorie words notwithstanding, he returned againe to the king, his purpose not obtained, An. 1438. Ex Ioan. Mario.

Thus the popes purpose in France was disappointed, which also in Germany had come to the like effect, if Fredericke the Emperor had there done his part likewise toward the Germaines: who at the same time bewailing their miserable estate, went about with humble suite to perswade the Emperour that he should no longer be vnder the subiection of the Popes of Rome, except they had first obtained certain things of them as touching the charter of Appeales, declaring their estate to be far worse (although vndeserued) then the Frenchmen or Italians: whose seruants (and especiallie of the Italians) they are worthily to be called, except that their estate were altered. The nobles and communaltie of Germany, did instantly intreate with most waighty reasons and examples, both for the vtilitie and profit of the Empire, to haue the emperours aid and helpe therein, for that which hee was bound vnto them by an othe: alledging also the great dishonour and ignominie in that they alone had not the vse of their owne lawes, declaring how the French nation had not made their suite vnto their king in vain against the exactions of popes: by whom they were defended; which also prouided decrees and ordinances for the libertie of his people, and caused the same to be obserued: the which thing the Emperour ought to foresee within his Empire, and to prouide for his people and states of his empire, aswell as other kings doe. For what shall come to passe thereby, if that forrain nations hauing recourse vnto their kings, being relieued and defended by them from the said exactions, and the Germaines, and states of the Empire flying vnto their Emperour, be by him forsaken or rather betraied and depriued of their owne lawes and decrees? The Emperour being moued, and partly ouercome by their perswasions, promised that hee would prouide no lesse for them, then the king of France had done for the Frenchmen, & to make decrees in that behalfe. But the graue authoritie of Aeneas Syluius, as Platina writeth in the historie of Pius the second, brake off the matter, who by his subtile and pestiferous perswasions did so bewitch the emperor, that he contemning the equall, iust, and necessarie requests of his subiects, chose the said Aeneas to be his Ambassadour vnto Calixtus then newlie chosen pope, to sweare vnto him in his name, and to promise the absolute obedience of all Germanie, as the onlie countrie (as they call it) of obedience, neglecting the ordinances and decrees of their countrie, as before he had done vnto Eugenius the 4. being Ambassador for the said Frederick, promising that he & all the Germains would be obedient vnto him from henceforth in all matters, aswell spirituall as temporall.

Thus twice Frederick of Austrich contemned and derided the Germains, & frustrating them of their natiue decrees and ordinances, brought them vnder subiection and bondage of the Pope: which partlie was the cause that 7. yeares before his death, he caused his son Maximilian, not only to be chosen, but also crowned king of Romains, and did associate him to the ministration of the empire, lest after his death (as it came to passe) the empire should be transported into another familie, suspecting the Germains, whom hee had twice contrarie to his lawes made subiect and in bondage vnto the Popes exactions: first before he was crowned in the time of Eugenius the 4. and againe the second time after his coronation, and death of Pope Nicolas the 5. denying their requests. Whereupon Germanie being in this miserable pouertie and grieuous subiection vnder the Popes tyrannie and polling, with teares and sighes lamenting their estate, continued so almost vnto Luthers time, as the histories hereafter following do testifie.

And heere ceasing with the storie of Fredericke, we will now proceed to the raigne of Maximilian his sonne, omitting diuers things else incident in the time of this Emperour: as first touching the vnbrotherlie contention and conflicts betweene this Frederick and Albertus his brother, and Sigismundus his vncle, for the dukedome of Austria, after the death of Matthias afore mentioned: Omitting also to speake of the long and cruell warre betweene the Prussians, and Polonians, with the religious sect of them, which were called Tentones fratres sanctæ Mariæ, in the time of Uladislaus: Omitting also the strife and variance for the dukedome of Millain, betweene Fredericus the Emperour, Alfonsus, Carolus duke of Orleance, and Franciscus Sforzia: And how the said Princedome being after giuen to Sforzia, great warres were kindled and long continued betweene Sforzia and the Milleners, then betweene the Milleners and Venetians, and after betweene the Frenchmen and the Milleners. All which tumults and commotions, as not pertinent greatlie to the purpose of this storie, I referre to other writers, where they are to be found more amply discoursed.

This as more properly belonging to the storie of the church I thought good not to passe ouer touching such as were condemned, & suffered the paines of fire for testimonie of Christ and his truth. Of whom one was John a Pasor or a neteheard, which was a keeper of cattell: The other was Ioannes de Wesalia, although not burned, yet persecuted neere to death vnder the raigne of this Emperour Fredericus the 3.

And first touching this John the Neteheard; thus writeth Sebast. Munsterus. That the bishop of Herbypolis, condemned and burned for an heretike one John, which was a keeper of cattell at a town called Niclas Hausen in Franconia, because he taught and held that the life of the clergie was ignominious & abominable before God: An. 1476. Ex Munstero. Anno 1476

The other was doctor Ioannes the Wesalia, who was complained vpon vnto Dietherus the archbishop of Mentz, by the Thomists, vpon certaine articles and opinions, gathered out of his bookes. Wherefore the said Dietherus, fearing els to be deposed againe from his Bishoprick, directeth forth commission to the Vniuersities of Heidelberg and Colen, to haue the matter in examination, who conuenting together the yeare aboue mentioned, called this doctor de Wesalia before them, making him to sweare that he should present and giue vp all his treatises, workes and writings, whatsoeuer he had made or preached: that being done, they diuided his bookes amongst themselues, seuerallie euerie man to finde out what heresies and errors they could. His articles and opinions were these,

The articles and opinions of John de Wesalia.

That all men be saued freely, and through meere grace by faith in Christ. Free will to be nothing. Only that we should beleeue the word of God, and not the gloſſe of anie man, or fathers. That the word of God, is to bee expounded with the collation of one place with another. That prelats haue no authoritie to make lawes, or to expound the scriptures by any peculiar right, giuen them more then to another. That mens traditions, as fastings, pardons, feasts, long praiers, peregrinations and such like, are to be reiected. Extreame vnction and confirmation to be reproued: confession and satisfaction to be reprehended. The primacie of the pope also he affirmed to be nothing.

Free will nothing.

Prelates haue no more power ouer scriptures, then other men.

Extreme vnction reproued.

Against the primacie of the Pope.

Certaine other articles also were gathered out of him by his aduersaries, but in such sort, that they may seeme rather to follow their owne malicious gathering, then any true intelligence of his minde: whereof more is to be vnderstood in this processe hereafter.

Thus when Wesalianus was commaunded to appeare, there conuented together, first the archbishop, the inquisitor, the doctors of Colen, and the doctors of Heidelberge, with the maisters of the same, & the Rector of the Vniuersitie of Mentz, the Deane of faculties, Bachelors of diuinitie, and many other maisters of the same Vniuersitie, Canons, Doctours, with the Bishops Chancellor, and his Counsellers, besides many religious prelates, schollers, with a doctour of Franckfort, the sumner and bedels, which all met together in the great hall of ỹ Minorites, for the examination of this Io. de Wesalia.

Frier Elton the Inquisitour, first sitteth in the highest place, then after him others according to their degree. In the beginning of the examination, first the Inquisitor beginneth with these words: Most reuerend father and honourable doctors, &c. Our reuerend father and prince Elector hath caused this present conuocation to be called, to heare the examination of M. John de Wesalia, in certaine suspected articles concerning the catholike faith. But something I will say before, that may doe him good, and desire that two or three of them that fauour him, or some other, will rise vp and giue him counsell, to forsake and leaue his errours, to recognise himselfe, and to aske pardon; which if he will doe, he shall haue pardon: if hee will not, we will proceed against him without pardon. And thus Wesalianus being cited and brought in the midst betwixt two Minorites, being verie aged, and hauing a staffe in his hand, was set before the Inquisitor. Who beginning to answer for himselfe with a long protestation, could not be suffered to prosecute his oration, but was cut off & required briefly to make an end, and to tell them in fewe words whether hee would stand to his opinions, or to the determination of the Church. To this he answered, that he neuer spake any thing against the determination of the church, but said that hee had written diuers and sundry treatises, in the which if he had erred, or were found to say otherwise then well, he was content to reuoke and call back the same, and do all things that was requisite. Then said the Inquisitor, doe you aske then pardon? The other answered, why should I aske pardon, when I know no crime or error committed? The Inquisiteur said: well we will call you to the remembrance thereof, and proceede to the examination.

The Inquisitor speaketh.

John de Wesalia brought before the prelats.

The answer of Wesalianus reasonable.

In the meane time, others called vpon him instantlie to aske pardon. Then said Wesalianus, I aske pardon. Notwithstanding the Inquisitor proceeded to the examination, reading there two instruments, declaring that hee had authoritie from the Apostolicke sea: after this cited the said John to appeare to his examination. Thirdly hee commaunded him vnder paine of disobedience, in the vertue of the holy Ghost, and vnder paine of excommunication of the greater curse, (from the which no man could absolue him, but only the pope, or ỹ Inquisitor, except only at the point of death) to tell plainly the truth vpon such things as should be demanded of him concerning his faith, without ambages and sophistication of words. And so being demanded first whether he did beleeue vpon his othe taken, that he was bound to tell the trueth, although it were against himselfe or any other: to this hee answered, Scio, that is; I know: Then the Inquisitour biddeth him say, Credo, that is, I beleeue. To the which he answered againe, what neede I say that I beleeue that thing I know? There the Inquisitor something stirred with the matter, as hote as a toste (as they say) cried out with a loud voyce, maister Joannes, maister Joannes, maister Joannes, say Credo, say Credo. Then he answered, Credo.

The cruel proceeding of the Inquisitor.

The greater curse of the pope declared.

Scio. Credo.

After this, being demanded whether hee had written anie treatise, concerning the binding of humaine lawes, to one Nicolas of Boheme, and whether he had written any treatise of the Ecclesiasticall power of indulgences and pardons, and of fasting and other treatises: he beleeued that he had so written, and had conferred with diuers learned men: Also that he had sent to the bishops of Mozmes, a certaine treatise of fasting.

Many other interrogatories were ministred vnto him, whereof some were vain, some false. Such as were more principall, here we will briefly touch, leauing out superfluities.

His opinion of the sacrament.

Being demanded whether he was a fautor of the Bohemians, he said he was not. Also being demanded concerning the sacrament of the holy body and blood of our Lord, whether he thought Christ there to be contained reallie, or only diuinely, and whether he did beleeue in the said sacrament the substance of bread there to remaine, or onlie the forme thereof: to this he answered, not denying but the body of Christ was there reallie contained, and also with the body of Christ, the substance of bread to remaine.

His opinion of Monkes and Nunnes.

The vow of chastitie.

After this he was demaunded his opinion concerning religious men, as Monkes, Nunnes, or Begwines, whether hee thought them to be bound to the vow of chastitie, or to the keeping of any other vow, and whether he said to the Friers Minorites any such word in effect: I cannot saue you in this your state and order. This he confessed, that he had said, how that not your religion saueth you, but the grace of God, &c. not denying but they might be saued.

Mortall sinne found by the pope, beside that which is expressed to be mortal in the scripture.

Item, being required whether he beleeued or had written, that there is no mortall sin, but which is expresse to be mortall in the canon of the holy Bible: to this he answered, that hee did so beleeue as he hath written, till he was better informed. Likewise being required what he thought of the vicar of Christ in earth, he answered, that hee beleeued that Christ left no vicar in earth: For the confirmation whereof he alledged and said, that Christ ascending vp to heauen, said: Ecce ego vobiscum sum, &c. Behold I am with you, &c. In the which words he plainly declared, that hee would substitute vnder him no vicar here in earth; and said moreouer, if a vicar signified any man, which in the absence of the principall hath to doe the works of the principall, then Christ hath no vicar here in earth.

What is this article, but to make the pope a God: Christ left no vicar in earth.

Pardons and indulgences be of no effect.

In like maner, concerning indulgences and pardons, such as the church doth vse to giue, they demaunded of him, whether they had any efficacie, and what hee thought thereof: who answered again that he had written a certain treatise of that matter, and what he had written in that treatise, hee would persist therein, which was thus: that he beleeued, that the treasure bore of the merits of Saints could not be distributed of the pope to others, because that treasure is not left here in earth: for so it is written in the Apocalyps: Opera enim illorum sequuntur illos, &c. that is: their works follow them.

The treasure of saints merites is not in earth.

Item, that their merits could not be applied to other men, for the satisfaction of their paine due vnto them, and therefore that the pope and other prelates cannot distribute that treasure to men.

This saying was taken out of one Cantor Parisiensis, which was wont to say, that pardons were holy deserts, because that lay men there were prouoked, by naughtie deserts, to giue good almes.

It was obiected to him moreouer, that in the said his treatise, he called pardons and indulgences, Pias fraudes fidelium, that is, holie fraudes and deceits of the faithfull.

Also being demanded what hee thought of the hallowing & blessing of altars, chalices, vestiments, wax candels, palms, herbes, holie water, and other diuine things, &c. he answered that they had no spirituall vertue and power in them to driue away diuels, and that holy water hath no more efficacie then other water not hallowed, as concerning remission of venniall sins, and driuing away diuels and other effectes, which the schole doctors doe attribute to it.

Degrees in scripture forbidden to marie.

Item, for degrées of mariage forbidden in the scriptures, he beleeueth that all christian men vnder deadlie sinne, are bound vnto the same.

Item, that hee beleeueth that God may giue grace to a man hauing the vse of reason, without all motion of free will. Also he thinketh that S. Paul in his conuersion, did nothing of his owne free will for his conuersion. He beleeueth moreouer, that God may giue such grace to a man hauing the vse of reason, not doing that which in him is.

Nothing to be beleeued, but that which is in scripture conteined.

Item, he affirmed that nothing is to be beleeued, which is not conteined in the canon of the Bible.

Also, that the elect are saued onely by the grace of God.

Besides all these, moreouer he was charged with the old opinion of the Grecians, which they did holde contrarie to the Romaine church, vnto the time of the councell of Ferraria aboue mentioned, concerning the processing of the holy ghost.

The church giueth witnesse who were the writers of the scriptures, but hath no authoritie aboue that which is written.

The Wednesday next following, three doctours, the Suffragane, Herwicus and Jacobus Sprenger, were sent vnto him with persuasions to exhort him; and when hee would not stand to their Canons, whereby they went about to refute his doctrine, he was then demanded of Herwicus, why hee would beleeue rather the 4. Euangelistes, then the Gospell of Nicodemus. To whom he answered, because he would. Being asked again why he beleeued the 4. Euangelists, he said: because he so receiued of his parents. Then being demanded, why he would not beleeue the doctors: because (said he) their doctrine is not canonicall scripture. Againe, it was to him obiected, why he would be credited himselfe, when he preached, seeing he would not beleeue the holy doctors? To whom he answered in this wise, saying, that he did preach as his dutie was, but whether they gaue credite to his words, he did not care.

By this inquisition, Christ himselfe might be condemned.

This examination being ended, after these articles were condemned by the Inquisitor and his assistance, then said he after this maner: As you do with me, if Christ himselfe were here, he might be condemned as an hereticke. After this they sent diuers to him to haue communication with him, & to perswade him, sending also to him with his articles a forme of asking pardon: at length within 3 or 4 daies after, he was content to to condescend vnto them, and to submit himselfe to their holy mother church, and the information of the doctors. In the booke of Orthuinus Gratius, and in Paralipomena, adioyned to Abbas Vrspergensis, we reade these words written of this Ioannes de Wesalia: Dempto solo articulo de processione spiritus sancti, in alijs videtur non ita graui censura, &c. That is: except onely the article of the proceeding of the holy Ghost, in other articles it seemeth that he was not to bee chastened with so sharpe censure, if respit and space had beene giuen him, if good counsellors had been about him, if all they which did accuse and molest him, had not beene de via realium, as Thomists, that is, of the sect of Thomas: which Thomists were set at that time, against the other sect of the seculars, which were called Nominales, and therefore, they so spited this Doctour, because he did not hold with their Thomas, against whom otherwise (had it not beene for that cause) they would neuer haue beene so fierce and malicious in proceeding against him. I take God to witnesse, which knoweth all things, that this processe which was made against him for his reuoking and burning of his bookes, did greatly displease master Engeline of Brunswike, a great Diuine, and also master John Ketzersberge, being both learned, and famous men; but namely master Engeline thought, that too much malice and rashnesse was shewed in handling of that same man, and did not feare to say, that many of his articles, and the greater part thereof might be holden well enough, and greatly blamed the mad and phantasticall dissention of the Thomists, seeking by all maner of waies, how to get the triumph ouer the secular Diuines, &c. Hæc ille.

Although this aged and feeble old man, by weaknes was constrained to giue ouer vnto the Romish clergie, by outward profession of his mouth: yet notwithstanding, his opinions and doctrine declared his inward heart, of what iudgement hee was if feare of death present had not otherwise enforced him to say, then he did thinke. Againe, although hee had reuoked after their minds, yet we reade no such forme of recantation to bee prescribed to him to reade openly vnto the people, as the vse is here in England. The storie of this man is more fully to bee found in the bookes of Orth. Gratius, &c.

Doctor John de Wesalia reuoketh his opinions.

As touching the reigne of this Fredericke emperor, seeing we haue comprehended hitherto sufficiently the most principall matters in his time incurrent, wee will now passe forward (the Lord guiding vs) to Maximilian, after I haue first giuen a briefe memorandum of three valiant princes and captaines, flourishing in the same time of this Fredericke, in Germanie: Of the which, one was Albert duke of Saxonie, who for his renowned and famous acts, was called by publike voice, Dextera manus Imperij, The right hand of the empire. The other was Albert, marquesse of Brandenburge, to whom also the name was attributed, named of pope Pius to be Achilles Germanicus. The third was Fredericke earle Palatine, surnamed Victoriosus, who manfully defended the freedome and maiestie of the empire, from the fraudulent oppressions of the popes tyrannie.

Albert duke of Saxonie, called Dextra manus Imperij.

Albert marques of Brandenburge, called Achilles Germanicus.

In the yeere of our Lord 1484. in this emperours time died pope Sixtus the fourth a little before touched, a monster rather of nature, then a prelat of the church. Of him writeth Platina, that vnluckily he vexed all Italie with warre and dissension. Agrippa writing of him, saith, that among all the bawdes of these other latter daies, which were builders of brothel houses, this pope Sixtus the fourth surmounted all other: who at Rome erected a stewes of double abomination, not only of women, but also, &c. whereupon no small gaine redounded to his coffers: For euery such common harlot in Rome, paid to him a Julie piece, the summe whereof grew in the yeere, some while to 20000. at length to fortie thousand duckets. Whereunto accordeth right well the epitaph of Iohn Sapidus, which in the end hereof we will annex.

John Carion also speaking of this bishop, witnesseth him to be a man rather borne to war, then to religion: For he warred against Vitellius Tiphernates, against the Florentines, the Venetians, whom he excommunicated, and did not absolue till he died: also against Columnenses, against Ferdinandus king of Apulia, and duke of Calabria: also against other nations and princes moe. Ex Ioan. Laziardo.

The warres of pope Sixtus.

Ex Ioan. Laziardo, bb. hist. Vniuers. cap. 84.

Of the said pope it is recorded, that he was a speciall patron and tutor to all begging friers, granting them to haue and enioy reuenues in this world, and in the world to come euerlasting life. Among the which friers there was one named Alanus de rupe, a blacke frier, which made the Rosarie of our Ladies Psalter (so they terme it) and erected a certaine new fraternitie vpon the same, called Fraternitas Coronatiorum, pertaining to the order of the Dominickes, of the which order Iacobus Sprenger, one of the condemners of Ioannes de Wesalia aboue mentioned, was a great aduancer, and especially this pope Sixtus the fourth, who gaue to the said fraternities large graces and priuiledges.

A large gift of the pope to the begging friers.

Alanus, author of our Ladies Psalter.

Concerning the institution of this Rosarie, there was a booke set forth about the yeere of our Lord 1480. in the beginning whereof is declared, that the blessed virgin entred into the cell of this Alanus, and was so familiar with him, that not only she did espouse him to her husband, but also kissed him with her heauenly mouth, and also for more familiarity, opened to him her paps, and powred great plentie of her owne milke into his mouth. For the confirmation whereof the said Alanus, this holy babe (saith the storie) did sweare deepely, cursing himselfe, if it were not thus, as he had made relation.

Then had the blessed virgin Marie two husbands.

An old knaue, to sucke his wiues breast.

This fabulous figment, when I read in the centuries of John Bale, I began with my selfe to mistrust the credit thereof, and had thought not to trouble the reader with such incredible forgeries. But as the prouidence of God worketh in all things, so also it appeared in this, that the very same booke came to my hands at the writing hereof, wherein this selfesame narration is contained, wherein I found not only this to be true, which in John Bale is expressed, but also found in like manner, another wonder as prodigious as this: where in another place not farre off, is stored in the same book, how that about the time of saint Dominicke, there was a certaine matron in Spaine, named Lucia, which being taken captiue by the Saracens, hauing her husband killed, was carried great with child into the Turkish land.

When the time of her labour came, shee being left desolate among beasts and hogs, and remembring this twice holy Rosarie, (first instituted, saith the booke, by saint Dominicke, and afterward reuiued by Alanus) eftsoones the holy virgine was readie and stood by her, and receiued the child at her trauell, supplying all the parts of a diligent midwife: and moreouer causing a priest suddenly to appeare, gaue the child to be christened, calling it after her owne name, Marianus: and so was she wife to Alanus, midwife to Lucia, and godmother to Marianus. Which storie if it be true, then is the popes Canon by this example to be controlled, which permitteth midwiues in time of necessitie to baptise, seeing the blessed virgin, playing the part her self of a midwife, durst not baptise this child without a priest.

The detestable impietie and blasphemie of the popish lying religion.

Mendacem memorem esse oportet.

It followeth more in the storie, that by the helpe of the said blessed virgin, this Lucia our ladies gossip, after her purification, was restored with her child safe to her countrie againe. This booke being in Latine and printed, beareth this title: Rosacea Augustissimæ Christiferæ Mariæ corona: and in the front it sheweth the name of Iodocus Bisselaius a noble man of Aquine. And this by the occasion of pope Sixtus. Which Sixtus, what a maintainer of blind superstition he was, partly by that afore spoken, partly by the end following it may be seene. For we read in certaine writers, that after this pope had vnderstanding that Hercules Estensis, duke of Ferraria, had ioyned peace with the Venetians against his will, he was so grieued therewith, that for rancour of mind, within fiue daies after, hee died: whereunto his Epitaph following, giueth sufficient record. About whose time also died Platina, a man not vnlearned, but yet a shamefull flatterer and bearer with the wicked liues of the popes.

But leauing here pope Sixtus with his verses and vices, let vs now proceed, as we before promised, to enter the storie of Maximilian, keeping notwithstanding the order of our kings here in England: For a little before the reigne of Maximilian, king Edward the fourth reased his life, an. 1483. after he had raigned twentie and two yeares. In the time of which king Edward, this also is not to be forgotten, that one Burdet, a marchant dwelling in Chepeside, at the signe of the crowne, which is the signe now of the Flower deluce, merilie speaking to his sonne, said that he would make him inheritor of the crowne, meaning indeed his owne house. For the which words, when king Edward caused to be misconstrued, and interpreted, as though he had ment the crowne of the Realme, within lesse space then foure houres, he was apprehended, iudged, drawne, and quartered in Chepeside.

The death of k. Edward 4.

Anno 1483

Burdet. Tyrannie in misconstruing a mans words.

The lawes of the realme misconstrued for the princes aduantage.

King Edward the 5.

K. Edward 5.

THis king Edward left behinde him by his wife Elizabeth two sonnes, Edward & Richard, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Cicelie. Which two sonnes Edward and Richard, for so much as they were vnder age and not ripe to gouerne, a consultation was called among the peeres to debate whether the foresaid yong prince and king, should be vnder the gouernment of his mother, or else that Richard Duke of Glocester, brother brother to king Edward the fourth, & vncle to the child, should be gouernour of the king, and protectour of the realme, there hath beene and is an old adage, the words whereof rather then the true meaning, is wrested out of Salomon: Væ regno cuius Rex est puer, &c. i. Woe to the kingdome, the king whereof is a child, &c. But if I may find leaue herein to thrust in a glosse, I would adde this, and say: Væ illi puero, qui sui regni Rex non est. i. Woe to that child, which is a king in a kingdome vnrulie and ambitious. There was the same season among other noble peeres of the realme, the duke of Buckingham, a man of great authoritie, who had maried king Edwards wifes sister. Because the duke being so neere allied to the king, had beene vnkindly (as he thought) of the king entreated, hauing by him no aduancement nor any great friendship shewed, according to his expectation, tooke part therefore with Richard duke of Glocester, both against the queene and her children, to make the foresaid duke, the chiefe gouernour and protector. The which thing being brought to passe, by the aide, assistance, and working of the duke of Buckingham, the queen tooke sanctuarie with her yonger sonne: the elder brother, which was the king, remained in the custodie of the duke of Glocester his vncle. Who being now in a good towardnesse to obtaine that which he long looked for, sought all the meanes, and sone compassed y matter, by false colour of dissembled words, by periurie, and labour of friends, namely of the duke of Buckingham, and the cardinall archbishop of Canturburie, that the other brother also should be committed to his credit. Thus the ambitious protector and vnnaturall vncle, hauing the possession of his two nephewes, and innocent babes, thought himselfe almost vp the wheele where he would climbe: although he could not walke in such mists and clouds, but his deuised purposes began to be espied: which caused him more couertly to goe about to remoue from him all suspition and to blind the peoples eies. But before hee could accomplish his execrable enterprise, some there were, whom he thought first must be rid out of the way, as namely the lord Hastings, and the lord Stanley; who as they were sitting together in counsell within the Tower, the protector (the matter being so appointed before) suddenly rushed in among them, and after a few words there communed, hee suddenly hasted out againe: his mind belike, being full of mischiefe and furie was not quiet. Who within the space of an houre, returned againe into the chamber with a sterne countenance and a frowning looke, and so there set him downe in his place. When the lords were in great maruell and muse at the meaning hereof: then he out of a rankered hart, thus began to bray, asking them, What are they worthie to haue, which go about to imagine the destruction of him being so neere to the kings blod, and protectour of the realme? At the which question, as the other lords sate musing, the lord Hastings, because he had bin more familiar with him, thus answered, that they were worthie of punishment, whatsoeuer they were. Which when the other lords also had affirmed: that is (quoth the Protector) yonder sorceresse, my brothers wife, meaning the queene and other with her: adding moreouer, and saying; that sorceresse and other of her counsell, as Shores wife, with her affinitie, haue by their witchcraft, thus wasted my bodie, and therewith shewed forth his left arme a wearish withered thing, as it was neuer otherwise, as was well knowne.

This Shores wife had bin before a concubine to king Edward, and afterward was kept by the same lord Hastings. Moreouer, heere is to be noted, that by the consent of the said lord Hastings, the cruell Protector had deuised about the same time, the kindred of the queene, innocently to be beheaded at Pomfret, of meere despite and hatred. Wherefore, this punishment not vndeseruedly, by the iust hand of God, fell vpon the said lord Hastings.

It followeth then more in the storie, that when the lord Hastings had heard these false accusations of the tyrant, which he knew to be vntrue: certainly (my lord) said he, if they haue so done, they be worthie of hainous punishment. Why quoth the Protector, doest thou serue me with if and with and: I tell thee, they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy bodie traitor: and therewith giuing a great rap on the bord (for a token or watchword) one cried treason without, and forthwith the chamber was full of harnessed men. The Protector then approching to the lord Hastings, arrested him as a traytor. Another let flie at the lord Stanley: who to auoid the blow shrunke vnder the table, or else his head had bin cleft asunder: notwithstanding he receiued such a wound, that the blod ran about his eares. There were in that counsell the same time the archbishop of Yorke, and doctor Morton bishop of Elie (by whose procurement afterward king Henrie the seuenth was sent for into England, and he made archbishop after that of Canturburie) these with the lord Stanley diuersly were bestowed in diuers chambers. The lord Hastings was commanded to speed and shriue him apace, for before dinner the Protector sware by Saint Paul that he should die: and so incontinently, without further iudgement, his head was stricken off, by whose counsell the queenes kindred were at the same time and day, beheaded at Pomfret.

After this tyrannous murder accomplished, the mischieuous protectour aspiring still to the crowne, to set his deuices forward, first through gifts and faire promises, did subordinate doctour Shaw a famous preacher then in London, at Pauls crosse to insinuate to the people, that neither king Edward with his sonnes, nor the duke of Clarence were lawfullie begotten, nor the very children of the duke of Yorke, but begotten vnlawfullie by other persons in adulterie on the dutches their mother, and that hee alone was the true and onelie lawfull heire of the duke of Yorke. Moreouer, to declare and to signifie to the audience, that king Edward was neuer lawfullie married to the Queene, but his wife before was dame Elizabeth Lucie, and so the two children of king Edward to bee base and bastards, and therefore the title of the crowne most rightlie to pertaine to the lord protector. Thus this false flatterer, and loud lying preacher, to serue the protectours humour, shamed not most impudently to abuse that holy place, that reuerend auditorie, the sacred word of God, taking for his theame: Adulteræ plantationes non dabunt radices altas, &c. which he most impiouslie did applie against the innocent children and right heires of the realme. Wherupon such grudge and disdaine of the people with worldly wonder followed him, that for shame of the people crying out of him, in few daies after he pined away.

When this sermon would take no effect with the people, the protector vnmercifully drowned in ambition, rested not thus, but within few daies after, excited the duke of Buckingham first to breake the matter in couert talke, to the maior and certaine of the heades of the citie, picked out for the purpose: that done, to come to the Guildhall, to moue the people by all flattering and lying perswasions to the same, which shamelesse Shaw before had preached at Pauls crosse. Which the duke with all diligence and helpes of eloquence, being a man both learned and well spoken, endeuoured to accomplish, making to the people a long and artificiall oration, supposing no lesse, but that the people allured by his craftie insinuations would crie, king Richard, king Richard. But there was no king Richard in their mouthes, lesse in their hearts. Whereupon the duke looking to the lord maior, and asking what this silence meant, contrarie to the promise of the one, and the expectation of the other: it was then answered of the maior, that the people peraduenture well vnderstood him not: wherefore the duke reiterating his narration in other words, declared againe that hee had done before. Likewise the third time he repeated his oration againe and againe. Then the commons which before stood mute, being now in a maze, seeing this importunitie, began to mutter softly among themselues, but yet no king Richard could sound in their lips, saue onely that in the neather end of the hall, certaine of the dukes seruants with one Nashfield, and other belonging to the protector, thrusting into the hall among the preasse, began suddenlie at mens backes to crie king Richard, king Richard, throwing vp their cappes; whereat the citizens turning backe their heads, marueled not a little, but said nothing.

The Duke and the Lord Maior with that side, taking this for sufficient testimonie, incontinent came blowing for hast to the protector, then lying at Baynards castle. Where the matter being made before, was now so contriued, that forsooth, humble petition was made in the name of the whole commons and that with three sundrie suites, to the humble and simple protector, that he, although it was vtterlie against his will to take it: yet would of his humilitie stoope so low, as to receiue the beanie kingdome of England vpon his shoulders. At this their tender request and suite of the lords and commons made (ye must know how) the milde Duke seeing no other remedie, was contented at length to yeeld, although sore against his will (ye must so imagine) and to submit himselfe so low, as of a protector to be made king: not much herein vnlike to our prelats in the popish church, who when they haue before well compounded for the popes Wals, yet must they for maner sake make courtesie, and thrice denie that for which they so long before haue gaped, and so sweetlie haue paied for.

wards daughter and him, wherby the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster were vnited together.

After the kingdome of England was thus allotted to king Richard the vsurper, as in maner aboue remembred, hee taried not long for his coronation, which was solemnized the moneth next ensuing, the sixth day of Julie.

King Richard crowned.

The triumph and solemnitie of his vsurped coronation being finished, and all things to the same appertaining, this vnquiet tyrant yet could not thinke himselfe safe, so long as yong Edward the right king and his brother, were aliue: wherefore the next enterprise which he did set vpon was this, how to rid those innocent babes out of the way, that he might reigne king alone.

In the meane time while all this ruffling was in hand, what dread and sorrow the tender hearts of these fatherlesse and friendlesse children were in, what little ioy of themselues, what small ioy of life they had, it is not so hard as dolorous, for tender hearts to vnderstand. As the yonger brother lingred in thought and beautinesse, so the prince which was 11. yeere old, was so out of heart and so fraught with feare that hee neuer tied his points, nor ioyed good day, till the traitorous impietie of their cruell vncle had deliuered them of their wretchednesse, which was not long in dispatching. For after king Richard their vncle, first attempting to compasse his diuelish deuice by Robert Brakenburie constable of the tower, and could not win him to such a cruell fact (to die therefore) then, hee got one James Tyrill, ioyning with him J. Dighton, & Miles Forrest, to perpetrate this hainous murther. Which Dighton and Forrest about midnight entring into their chamber, so bewrapped and intangled them amongst the clothes, keeping downe the fetherbed and pillowes hard vnto their mouthes, that within a while, they smothered and stifled them pitiouslie in their bed.

The truth of Robert Brakenburie to his prince.

James Tyrill. John Dighton. Miles Forrest, cruell traitors and murtherers of their prince. Yong princes. These children of king Edward murthered.

And thus ended these two yong princes their liues, through the wretched crueltie of these forenamed tormentors, who for their detestable and bloodie murther committed, escaped not long vnpunished by the iust hand of God. For first Miles Forrest, at saint Martins le graund, by peecemeale miserably rotted away: John Dighton liued at Calis long after so disdained and hated, that he was pointed at of all men, and there died in great miserie. Sir James Tyrill was beheaded at Tower hill for treason. Also king Richard himselfe within a yeere and a halfe after, was slaine in the field hacked and hewed of his enemies hands, torne and tugged like a cur dog.

Furthermore, the said iustice of Gods hand let not the duke of Buckingham escape free: which was a great maintainer and setter vp of this butcherlie vsurper: for lesse then within a yeare after so God wrought, that he was himselfe beheaded for treason by the said king, whom he so vniustly before had aduanced and set vp.

The punishment of God vpon the duke of Buckingham.

In the same catalogue and order of these wicked doers afore recited, we haue also to comprehend two other, as well worthie of memoriall, as the best or rather as the worst. The name of the one was doctor Shaw aboue rehearsed: The other doctor Pinkie, prouinciall of the Austen friers: both famous preachers, and both doctors in Diuinitie, both of more learning then vertue (saith the storie) of more fame then learning, and yet of more learning then truth. Shaw made a sermon in praise of the Protector, before his coronation. Pinkie preached after his coronation. Both were so full of tedious flatterie, that no good eares could abide them. Pinkie in his sermon so lost his voice, that he was faine to leaue off and came downe in the middest. Doctor Shaw by his sermon lost his honestie, and soone after his life, for verie shame of the world, so that he neuer durst after that, shew his face againe. But as for the frier, he was so far past shame, that the losse thereof did little touch him.

Doctor Shaw and doctor Pinkie, two flattering preachers.

Mention was made a little before of doctor Morton bishop of Elie, by whose meanes the deuice was first broched, for the coniopning of the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster together. This deuice was first broken to the Duke of Buckingham, which soone after cost him his life. But that bishop more craftie to saue himselfe, incontinent fled into Britaine. Notwithstanding, the deuice once being broched was so plausible, and took such effect, that message was sent ouer ỳ sea to Henrie earle of Richmond, by his mother and by the quéene, mother to the ladie Elizabeth, that if he would make his returne, and promise to marrie with the said ladie Elizabeth king Edwards daughter, he should be receiued. To make a longer discourse of this matter, which is sufficiently set forth by sir Thomas More so ornately, it néedeth not.

The first motion of ioyning the two houses, Yorke and Lancaster together.

Briefely (to contract that in a small compasse of words, which was not so small a thing in doing) after that the Earle Henrie, with such other banished men, as fled out of England at the taking of the duke of Buckingham, had perfect intelligence by his mother and by the quéene, and other friends moe out of England, how the case of the realme stood, and how it was heere purposed by his friends, that is, that he should with all conuenient spéed, haste his returne ouer into England, promising to marrie with ladie Elizabeth: he with all diligence as time and preparation would serue, aduanced forward his iourney, being well helped and furnished by Francis duke of Britaine, and so shipped his men. Albeit his first voiage sped not, for that the winds turning contrary; by force of weather his ships were dispersed, and he repulsed back into France againe. His second voiage was more prosperous. Who taking the seas at Harflet, in the moneth of August, anno 1485. accompanied onlie with two thousand men, and a small number of ships, arriued at Milford Hauen in Wales, and first came to Dale, then to Harford west, where hee was ioyfully receiued, and also by the comming in of Arnold Butler and the Pembroke men, was in power encreased. From thence he remoued by Cardigan to Shrewesbury, and then to Newport, and so to Stafford, from thence to Lichfield, his armie still more and more augmented. Like as a great flood by comming in of many small riuers, gathereth more abundance of water: so to this earle diuers noble captaines and men of power adioyned themselues, as Richard Griffith, John Morgan, Rice ap Thomas, then sir George Talbot, with the young earle of Shrewesburie his ward, sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas Burchier, and sir Walter Hungerford, knights. At last the said earle hearing of the kings comming, conducted his whole armie to Tamworth.

The arriuing of Henry earle of Richmond in Wales.

King Richard hearing of the arriuall of the earle Henrie in the parts of Wales after such a slender sort, did giue little, or no regard vnto it. But after, vnderstanding that hee was come to Lichfield, without resistance or incombrance, he was sore moued, and exceedinglie toke on, cursing and crying out against them which had so deceiued him, and in al post spéed, sent for John duke of Northfolke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thom. earle of Surrey, with other his friends of speciall trust. Robert Brankenburie also lieutenant of the tower was sent for, with sir Thomas Burchier, and sir Walter Hungerford, with certaine other knights and esquires, of whom he partly misdoubted, or had some suspitious ielousie. Thus king Richard, after most forceable manner well fortified and accompanied, leauing nothing vndone that diligence could require, set forward toward his enemies. The earle by this time was come to Tamworth, to whom secretly in the euening resorted sir John Sauage, sir Bryan Sanford, sir Simon Digby, and many other, forsaking the part of king Richard, whom all good men hated, as hee no otherwise deserued. The king hauing perfect knowledge the earle to bee encamped at Tamworth, embattelled himselfe in a place néere to a village called Bolworth, not farre from Leicester, appointing there to encounter with his aduersaries. Here the matter lay in great doubt and suspense concerning the lord Stanley (which was the earles father in law and had married his mother) to what part he would encline. For although his hart went (no doubt) with the earle, and had secret conference with him the night before, yet because of his sonne and heire George lord Strange, being then in the hands of king Richard, lest the king should attempt any preiudicall thing against him, durst not be séene openly to goe that way, where in heart he fauoured, and therefore closely kept himselfe betweene both, till the push came that his helpe might serue at a pitch.

King Richard gathered his power to encounter with earle Henry.

King Richard taketh the field of Bosworth. This L. Stanley was he, which was hurt at the tower when the lord Hastings was arrested. vide pag. 668.

The number of the earles part exceeded not to the one halfe of the side of king Richard. When the time and the place was appointed, where the two battailes should encounter and ioyne together, sore stripes and great blowes were giuen on both sides, and many slaine. If number and multitude might gouerne the successe of battell, king Richard had double to the earle. But God is he, not man, that giueth victorie, by what meanes it séemeth to his diuine prouidence best. In what order and by what occasion this field was won and lost, the certaine intelligence we haue not certainely expressed, but onely by the historie of Polydore Virgil, whom sir Thomas More doth follow word for word. In the which historie it doth appeare, that as these two armies were coupling together, K. Richard, vnderstanding by his espials where the Earle of Richmond was, and how he was but slenderly accompanied, and séeing him to approch more néere vnto him, he rather caried with courage, then ruled with reason, set spurres to the horse, and ranging out of the compasse of his rankes, pressed toward the earle, setting vpon him so sharpely, that first he killed sir William Brandon, the earles standard bearer, father to the lord Charles Brandon D. of Suffolk, then after ouerthrew sir John Cheinie, thinking likewise to oppresse the earle. But as the Lord by his secret prouidence disposeth the euent of all things, as the earle with his men about him being ouermatched, began to despaire of victorie, suddenly and opportunely came sir William Stanley with three thousand well appointed able men, whereby king Richards men were driuen backe, and hee himselfe cruelly fighting in the thicke of his enemies, was there slaine, and brought to his confusion and death, which he worthily deserued.

K. Richards son punished for the wickednesse of his father.

This king Richard had but one sonne, who shortly after the cruell murder of king Edwards sonnes, was taken with sickneſſe and died. The wife of the said king Richard (whether by poyson or by sickneſſe) died also a little before the fielde of Bosworth: after whose decease, the storie of Polydore and of sir Thomas More affirmeth; that he intended himselfe to marie the ladie Elizabeth his owne brothers daughter, and so to preuent the earle of Richmond.

K. Richard purposed to marry Elizabeth his brothers daughter.

L. Stanley husband to king Henries mother forsooke king Richard.

Moreouer, as touching the lord Stanley, thus reporteth the storie, that king Richard being in Bosworth field, sent for the lord Stanley by a pursеuant, to aduance forward with his company, and come to his presence: otherwise hee sware by Christs passion, that he would strike off his sonnes head before dinner. The lord Stanley sent word againe, that if he did, he had more sonnes alive. Whereupon the king immediatly commanded the lord Strange to be beheaded: which was the very time when both the armies were within sight, and were ready to ioyne together. Wherefore the kings counsellors pondering the time and the case perswaded the king, that it was now time to fight, and not to doe execution, aduising him to delay the matter till the battell were ended. And so (as God would) king Richard breaking his oth, or rather keeping his oth, for he himselfe was slaine before dinner, the lord Strange was committed to be kept prisoner within the kings tent: who then after the victorie gotten, was sought out and brought to his ioyfull father. And thus haue ye the tragicall life and end of this wretched king Richard.

The Lord Strange marueilously preserued.

Henrie the Erle of Richmond, after heartie thankes giuen to almightie God, for his glorious victorie obteined, proceeded to the towne of Leicester, where was brought to him by the lord Strange, the crowne, and put on the Earles head.

In the meane time the dead corps of king Richard was shamefully carried to the towne of Leicester, being naked and despoiled to the skin, and being trussed behind a pursеuant of armes, was carried like a hog or a dog, hauing his head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and the legges on the other side, all sprinkled with mire and blod. And thus ended the vsurped reigne of king Richard, who reigned two yeeres, and two moneths. Ex Polydo. & Th. Moro.

Anno 1485

King Henry the vij.

King Henrie 7.

When king Henrie, by the prouidence of God had obtained this triumphant victorie and diademe of the realme, first sending for Edward Plantaginet earle of Warwike, sonne to George Duke of Clarence, and committing him to safe custody within the tower, from Leicester remoued to London, and not long after, according to his oth and promise made before, espoused to him the yong ladie Elizabeth, heire of the house of Yorke: whereby both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster were conioyned together, to the no little reioycing of all English hearts, and no lesse quiet vnto the realme, which was, an. 1485. This king reigned 23. yeeres, and eight moneths, and being a Prince of great policie, iustice and temperance, kept his realme in good tolerable rule and order. And here interrupting a little the course of our English matters, we will now (the Lord willing) enter the storie aboue promised, of Maximilian the emperour, and matters of the empire, especially such as pertaine to the Church.

K. Henry marieth with Elizabeth. The two houses of Yorke & Lancaster ioyned together.

Maximilian the Emperour.

Anno 1486 Maximilianus Emperour.

In the yeere of our Lord 1486. Fredericus waring aged and partly also mistrusting the hearts of the Germains, who had complained before of their greeuances, and could not be heard; and therefore mistrusting that his house after his decease, should haue the lesse fauour among them, for that cause in his life time did associate his sonne Maximilian to be ioyned emperour with him: with whom he reigned the space of 7. yeeres till the death of the said Frederick his father, who departed an. 1494. after he had reigned ouer the Empire 53. yeeres, lacking onely but three yeeres of the raigne of Augustus Cæsar, vnder whom was the birth of our Lord and Sauiour Christ.

The reigne and death of Fredericus emperour. Anno 1494

This Maximilian, as he was a valiant Emperour, prudent and singularly learned: so was his reigne intangled in many vnquiet and difficill wars: first in the lower Countries of Flanders and Brabant, where the said Maximilian was taken captiue, but shortly after rescued and deliuered againe by his father, an. 1487. It was signified before how this Maximilian by the aduice of the Burgundians, had to wife Mary the onely daughter of Charles duke of Burgundie afore mentioned, by whom he had two children, Philip and Margaret, an. 1477. Which Mary not long after, about the yeere of our Lord, 1481. by a fall from her horse, fell into an ague, and departed. Other wars many moe, the same Maximilian also atchieued, both in France, in Italy, in Hungarie, and diuers besides.

Maximilian marieth the Dutches of Burgoyne. This Marie was neece to king Edward the fourth.

So happie was the education of this Emperour in good letters, so expert he was in tongues and sciences, but especially such was his dexteritie and promptnesse in the Latin stile, that he imitating the example of Iulius Cæsar, did write and comprehend in Latin histories, his owne acts and feates done, and that in such sort, that when he had giuen a certaine tasse of his historie, to one Pircamerus a learned man, asking his iudgement how his warlike stile of Latin did like him, the said Pircamerus did affirme and report of him to Iohn Caron (the witnesse and writer of this storie) that he did neuer see nor read in any Germaine storie, a thing more exactly (and that in such haſt) done, as this was of Maximilian. Moreouer, as he was learned himselfe, so was he a singular patrone and aduancer of learned students, as may well appeare by the erecting and setting vp the Vniuersitie of Wittenberge. By this Emperour many in those dayes were excited to the embracing as well of other liberall artes, as also namely to the searching out of old antiquities of histories, wherby diuers were then by him first occasioned in Germanie, to set their minds and to exercise their diligence, in collecting and explicating matters pertaining to the knowledge of histories, as well of ancient as also of latter times, as namely Cuspinianus, Nauclerus, Conradus Peutingerus, Manlius, and other.

Maximilian writer of his owne storie. Ex Ioā. Carione. Maximilian first ordeiner of the vniuersitie of Wittenberg.

Here now it began right well to appeare, what great benefite was broched to the world, by the arte and facultie of Printing, as is before mentioned. Through the meanes of which printing the church and cōmon wealth of Christ began now to be replenished with learned men, as both may appeare by this Emperour, being so indued himselfe with such excellent knowledge of good letters, and also by diuers other famous and worthie wits, which began now in this age exceedingly to encrease and multiplie; as Baptista Mantuanus, Ang. Politianus, Hermolaus Barbarus, Picus Mirandula, and Franciscus his cosine, Rodol. Agricola; Pontanus, Philippus, Beroaldus, Marsillius, Ficinus, Volateranus, Georgius Valla, with infinite other.

Learned men begin to grow in Christendome.

Among whom is also to be numbred Wesselus Groningensis, otherwise named Basilius, who was not long after Ioan de Wesalia aboue recited, both much about one time, and both great friends together. This Wesselus died the yeere of our Lord, 1490. After that Ioannes doctor De Wesalia aforesaid was condemned, this Wesselus being familiar with him, thought that the Inquisitour would come and examine him also, as he himselfe in a certaine Epistle doth write. He was so notable and worthie a man, that of the people he was called Lux mundi: That is: the light of the world.

Doct. Wesselus Groningensis.

Concerning his doctrine, first he reprehended the opinion of the papists, as touching repentance, which they diuided into three parts, of the which three parts, satisfaction and confession he did disallow. Likewise Purgatorie and supererogation of workes and pardons he did disproue, both at Rome and at Paris. He spake against the popes indulgences, by the occasion whereof diuers of the popes court perswaded by him, began to speake more freely against the same matter, then hee himselfe had done.

Wesselus called Lux mundi.

The doctrine of Wesselus Groningensis.

The abuses of masses and praying for the dead he disalloweth: and likewise the supremacie of the pope he vtterly reiected (as appeareth in a booke of his, De sacramento pœnitentiæ) denying vtterly that any supreme head or gouernour ought to be in the world ouer all other: affirming also and saying many times, that the pope had no authoritie to doe any thing by commandement but by truth: that is, so farre as truth goeth with him, so farre his sentence to stand: neither that he ought to preuaile by commanding, but onely by teaching, so as euery true Christian bishop may preuaile ouer an other. Also in some place in his writings he denieth not, but that popes and their spirituall Prelates, proceeding against Christs doctrine, be plaine Antichrists. Such as were infirme and not able to performe the bond of chastitie taken vpon them, he said they might well breake their vow.

Ex lib. D. Wesselli De sacramento pœnitentiæ. The popes supremacy written against.

Also the said Wesselus witnesseth, that the forefathers which were before Albert and Tho. did resist and withstand the popes indulgences, calling them in their writings plaine Idolatrie, meere fraud and errour: adding moreouer, that vnlesse the seueritie of some good Diuines had not withstood these pardons and indulgences of the pope; innumerable errors had ouerflowne the Church.

Amongst these workes of Wesselus, there is a certaine Epistle of one written to him, in which the author of the Epistle confesseth, that in his time there was a certaine learned man at Paris called maister Thomas de Curselis a Deane: who being in the councell of Basill, where as diuers began to aduance the power of the pope too farre, declared and affirmed, to be said to him of Christ: Quicquid ligaueris super terram erit ligatum & in cœlo, &c. Et non, quicquid dixeris esse ligatum. That is: Whatsoeuer thou shalt bind vpon earth shall be bound in heauen, but not, Whatsoeuer thou saiest to bee bound. As who should say, the pope cannot nor doth not binde therefore, because he so saith, except truth and righteousnesse goe also with him: then he doth so bind in deed. There is a certaine booke of this man amongst diuers others, which he intituleth, De subditis & superioribus, in the which hee disputeth greatly against the pope & his prelates: affirming that the pope vnlesse his faith and doctrine be sound, ought not to be obeyed. He affirmeth also that the pope may erre, and when he erreth, men is looked in heauen: but what soeuer is looked in very deed in earth, that is also looked indeed in heauen.

Against riches in the Church.

The precepts of the pope and prelates how they bind.

men ought by all manner of meanes to resist him. Item, that great and superfluous riches in the clergie doe not profite, but hurt the church. That the Pope doth wickedly distribute the rents of the church, and the church it selfe, to vnworthie ministers by Simony, for his owne profite and gaine, whereby it may appeare that he neither careth for God, nor the health of the church. Item, that the precepts and commandements of the pope and prelats bee no otherwise but as the counsels and precepts of Physitions, binding no further then they are found to be wholesome and standing with the truth of the word. Item, that the pope can command no man vnder paine of deadly sinne, except God command him before. He saith that the keyes of the pope and of the prelats be not such, wherewith they open the kingdome of heauen, but rather shut it, as the Pharisies did. Concerning bowles, he disputeth that such as be foolish and impossible, ought to be broken: that the hearers ought to discerne and iudge of the doctrine of their prelates, and not to receiue euery thing that they say, without due examination.

The Popes keyes.

Bowes.

Doctrine not to be receiued without examination.

Excommunication.

He sheweth moreouer that the sentence or excommunication is of more force, proceeding from a true, godly, honest, simple and learned man, then from the pope; as in the councell of Constance, Bernard was more esteemed then Eugenius. Also if the pope with his prelats, gouerne and rule naughtilie, that the inferiors, be they neuer so base, ought to resist him.

Writing moreouer of two popes, Pius the second and Sixtus the fourth, he saith, that Pius the second did vsurpe vnto himselfe all the kingdomes of the whole world, and that Sixtus the pope did suspense with all manner of oths in causes temporall, not only with such othes, as haue bin already, but also with all such as shall be made hereafter: which was nothing else but to giue libertie and licence for men to forsweare themselues and deceiue one another.

This Weselus being a Physian borne, and now aged in yeers, vpon a certaine time, when a yong man called M. Joannes Ostendorpius, came to him, said these words: Well my child, thou shalt liue to that day, when thou shalt see the doctrine of these new and contentious diuines, as Thomas and Bonauenture, with others of the same sort, shall be vtterly reiected and exploded from all true christian Diuines. And this which Ostendorpius then being young, heard Weselus to speake, he reported himselfe to Nouiomagus, which wrote this storie, an. 1520. and heard it of the mouth of the said Weselus, an. 1490. Martij 18.

Ex Nouiomago. A prophecie of Weselus. This Ostendorpius was a man well learned and Canon of the minster of Lubecke.

Philippus Melanchon writing of the life of Rodulphus Agricola, saith: that Iosquinus Groningensis, an ancient and a godly man, reported that when as he was young, he was oftentimes present at the sermons of Rodulphus and Weselus, wherein they many times lamented the darkenesse of the church, and reprehended the abuses of the masse: and of the single life of Priests. Item, that they disputed oftentimes of the righteousnesse of faith, why Saint Paul so oftentimes did inculcate, that men be iustified by faith and not by workes. The same Iosquine also reported, that they did openly reiect and disproue the opinion of Monkes, which say that men be iustified by their workes. Item, concerning mens traditions their opinion was, that all such were deceiued, whosoeuer attributed vnto those traditions any opinion of Gods worship, or that they could not be broken. And thus much for the storie of doctor Wesellianus and Weselus.

Here it appeareth that this Rodulphus Agricola was of good iudgment though the Friers afterward buried him in a Friers weed.

Rodul. Agricola, Weselus lamenteth the darknesse of the Church.

By this it may be seene and noted, how by the grace of God and gift of printing, first came forth learning: by learning came light to iudge and discerne the errors of the pope from the truth of Gods word, as partly by these abouesaid may appeare, partly by other that follow after (by the grace of Christ) shall better be seene.

About the very same time and season, when as the Gospell began thus to branch and spring in Germanie: the host of Christs Church began also to muster and to multiplie likewise here in England, as by these histories here consequent may appeare. For not long after the death of this Weselus in the yeere of our Lord 1494. and in the ninth yeere of the raigne of king Henrie the 7. the 28. of Aprill, was burned a very old woman named Joane Boughton widow, and mother to the Ladie Young, which Ladie was also suspected to be of that opinion which her mother was. Her mother was of foure scoure yeeres of age or more, and held eight of Wicklifs opinions (which opinions my author doth not shew) for the which she was burnt in Smithfield the day abouesaid. My author saith, she was a disciple of Wicklifke, whom she accounted for a saint, and held so fast and firmely eight of his ten opintons, that all the doctours of London could not turne her from one of them: and when it was told her that she should be burnt for her obstinacie and false beleefe, she set nothing by their menacing words, but defied them; for she said she was so beloued of God, and his holy Angels, that she passed not for the fire, and in the midst thereof she cried to God to take her soule into his holy hands. The night following that she was burnt, the most part of her ashes were had away of such as had a loue vnto the doctrine that she died for.

Shortly after the martyrdome of this godly aged mother, in the yeere of our Lord, 1497. and the 17. of Januarie, being Sunday, two men, the one called Rich. Wilderale, and the other James Sturdie, bare fagots before the procession of Pauls, and after stood before the preacher in the time of his Sermon. And vpon the Sunday following, stode other two men at Pauls Crosse all the Sermon time: the one garnished with painted and written papers, the other hauing a fagot on his necke. After that in Lent season vpon Passion Sunday, one Hugh Glouer bare a Fagot before the procession of Pauls, & after with the Fagot stod before the preacher all the Sermon while at Pauls Crosse. And on the Sunday next following foure men stod, and did there open penance at Pauls as is aforesaid, in the sermon time many of their bookes were burnt before them at the Crosse.

FVrthermore the next yeere following, which was the yeere of our Lord 1498. in the beginning of May, the king then being at Canturbury, was a priest burnt, which was so strong in his opinion that all the clerkes and doctors then there being, could not remoue him from his faith: whereof the king being informed, caused the said priest to be brought before his presence, who by his perswasion caused him to reuoke, and so hee was burnt immediatly.

IN the same yeere aboue mentioned, which was the yeere of our Lord 1498. after the beheading of Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwicke, and sonne to the Duke of Clarence, the king and Queene being remoued to Calis, a certaine godly man and a constant martyr of Christ, named Babram, in Northfolke, was burnt in the moneth of Julie, as is in Fabian recorded, after the copie which I haue written. Albeit in the booke of Fabian printed, his burning is referred to the next yeere following, which is, an. 1500. Ex Fabiano, & alio scripto codice.

IN the same yeere also, which was of the Lord, 1499. fell the martyrdome and burning of Hieronymus Sauonarola, a man no lesse godly in heart, then constant in his profession. Who being a Monke in Italy, and singularly well learned, preached sore against the euill life and liuing of the spiritualty and specially of his owne order, complaining sore vpon them as the springs and authors of all mischiefes and wickednesse. Whereupon by the helpe of certaine learned men he began to seeke reformation in his own order. Which thing the pope perceiuing, and fearing that the said Hierome, which was now in great reputation amongst all men, should diminish or ouerthrow his authoritie, he ordained his vicar or prouinciall to see reformation of these matters: which vicar with great superstition began to reforme things, but the said Hierome did alwayes withstand him, whereupon he was complained of to the pope, and because that contrarie vnto the popes commandement, he did withstand his vicar, he was accursed. But for all that Hieronymus left not off preaching, but threatned Italy with the wrath and indignation of God, and prophesied before vnto them, that the land should be ouerthrowen for the pride and wickednesse of the people, and for the vntruth, hypocrisie and falshood of the clergy, which God would not leaue vnreuenged, as afterward it came to passe, when as king Charles came into Italy and to Rome, and so straitly beset the pope Alexander that he was forced to make composition with the king.

Sauonarola cited to appeare before the pope.

Now forsomuch as the said Hierome would not leaue off preaching, he was commaunded to appeare before the Pope, to giue account of his new learning (for so then they called the truth of the Gospell) but by meanes of the manifold perils, he made his excuse that he could not come. Then was he againe forbidden by the Pope to preach, and his learning pronounced and condemned as pernicious, false and seditious.

The doctrine of Sauonarola condemned because he would not come before the Pope.

This Hieronymus, as a man worldly wise, foreseeing the great perils and dangers that might come vnto him, for feare lest of preaching. But when as the people, which sore hungred and longed for Gods word, were instant vpon him that hee would preach againe, he began againe to preach, in the yeare of our Lord 1496. in the citie of Florence; and albeit that many counselled him that he should not so doe without the Popes commaundement, yet did he not regard it, but went forward freely of his owne good will. When as the pope and his shauelings heard newes of this, they were greeuously incensed and inflamed against him, and now againe cursed him, as an obstinate and stiffnecked heretike. But for all that, Hieronymus proceeded in teaching and instructing the people, saying that men ought not to regard such curses, which are against the true doctrine and the common profite, whereby the people should be learned and amended, Christs kingdome enlarged, and the kingdome of the diuell vtterly ouerthrowen.

Sauonarola preacheth contrarie to the Popes commandement.

In all his preaching he desired to teach no other thing then the onely pure and simple Word of God, making often protestation that all men should certifie him if they had heard him teach or preach any thing contrary thereunto, for vpon his own conscience he knew not that he had taught any thing but the pure word of God. What his doctrine was all men may easily iudge by his bookes that he hath written.

Hiero. with 2. other friers committed to prison.

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1498. hee was taken and brought out of Saint Marks cloyster, and two other Friers with him, named Dominicke and Siluester, which fauoured his learning, and was carried into prison, where as hee wrote a godly meditation vpon that most comfortable thirtie and one Psalme, In te Domine speraui, non confundar in æternum, sed in iustitia tua libera me. Wherein he doth excellently describe and set forth, the continuall strife betweene the flesh and the spirit.

The commentary of Hierom Sauon. vpon the Psalme beginning: In te domine speraui.

After this the popes Legates came to Florence, and called forth these three good men, threatning them marueilously, but they continued still constant. Then came the chiefe counsellers of the citie, with the Popes Commissioners, which had gathered out certaine articles against these men, whereupon they were condemned to death: the tenour of which Articles hereafter ensue.

Articles obiected against Hierome and the two Friers.

1 The first article was as touching our free iustification through faith in Christ.

2 That the communion ought to be ministred vnder both kinds.

3 That the indulgences and pardons of the pope, were of no effect.

4 For preaching against the filthy and wicked liuing of the Cardinals and spiritualitie.

5 For denying the popes supremacie.

6 Also that he had affirmed, that the keyes were not giuen vnto Peter alone, but vnto the vniuersall Church.

7 Also, that the Pope did neither follow the life nor doctrine of Christ, for that he did attribute more to his owne pardons and traditions, then to Christs merits, and therefore he was Antichrist.

8 Also, that the popes excommunications are not to be feared, and that he which doth feare or flie them, is excommunicate of God.

9 Item, that auricular confession, is not necessarie.

10 Item, that he had moued the citizens to vprore & sedition.

11 Item, that hee had neglected and contemned the Popes Citation.

12 Item, that he had shamefully spoken against, and slandered the Pope.

13 Item, that he had taken Christ to witnesse of his naughtinesse and heresie.

14 Also, that Italy must be clensed through Gods scourge, for the manifold wickednesse of the princes and clergie.

These and such other like articles, were laid vnto them and read before them. Then they demaunded of the said Hierome and his companions, whether they would recant and giue ouer their opinions. Whereunto they answered, that through Gods helpe, they would stedfastly continue in the manifest truth, and not depart from the same. Then were they degraded one after another, by the bishop of Vasion, and so deliuered ouer to the secular rulers of Florence, with straight commandement to carrie them forth, and handle them as obstinate and stiffnecked heretickes.

Hierome with his 2. companions hanged and burnt for the Gospels truth.

Thus was the worthie witnesse of Christ, with the other two aforesaid, first hanged vp openly in the market place, and afterward burnt to ashes, and the ashes gathered vp, and cast into the riuer of Arum, the foure and twentie day of May, in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, foure hundred ninety and nine. Ex Catal. testium Illyrici.

The Martyrdome of Hierome and his two companions.

This man foreshewed many things to come, as the destruction of Florence and Rome, and the renuing of the Church: which three things, haue happened in these times within our remembrance. Also he foreshewed that the Turkes and Mores in the latter dayes, should be conuerted vnto Christ. He also declared that one should passe the Alpes into Italy, like vnto Cyrus, which should subuert and destroy all Italy. Whereupon Iohannes Franciscus Picus, earle of Mirandula, called him a holy Prophet, and defended him by his writings against the Pope. Many other learned men also, defend the innocencie of the said Sauonarola. Marsilius Ficinus also in a certaine Epistle doth attribute vnto him the spirit of prophecie, greatly commending and praysing him. In the like manner Philippus Comineas a French Historiographer, which had conference with him, witnesseth that he was a holy man, and full of the spirit of prophecie, forsomuch as he had foreshewed vnto him so many things, which in euent had proued true.

There were besides these, many other, not to be passed ouer or forgotten: as Philip Norice an Irishman, professour at Oxford, who albeit he was not burned, yet (as it is said) hee was long time vexed and troubled by the religious rout. But would to God, that such as haue occupied themselues in writing of histories, and haue so diligently committed vnto memorie all other things done in forreine common wealthes, had bestowed the like diligence and labour, in noting and writing those things, which pertaine vnto the affaires of the Church: whereby the posteritie might haue had fuller and more perfect vnderstanding and knowledge of them.

This Sauonarola aboue mentioned, suffered vnder Pope Alexander the first, of which pope, more leisure and opportunitie shall serue hereafter (Christ willing) to entreat, after that we shall first make a little digression to entreat of certaine cases and complaints of the Germaines, incident in the meane time, which as they are not to be ouerpast in silence, so can they haue no place nor time more conuenient to be inserred. What complaints of the Germaines were made and moued vnto the Emperour Fredericke against the popes suppressions and exactions, mention was made before pag. 665. where also was declared, how the said Germaines at that time, were twice put backe and forsaken of the Emperour: whereby they continued in the same yoke and bondage, vntill the time of Luther. Wherfore it commeth now to hand, and we thinke it also good here briefly to declare, how the said Germaines, in the time of Maximilian the Emperour; renuing their complaints againe, deliuered vnto the Emperour, ten principall greeuances, whereby the Germaines haue beene long time oppressed: shewing also the remedies against the same, with certaine aduisements vnto the Emperours maiestie, how he might withstand and resist the popes subtilties and crafts: The order and tenour whereof here ensueth.

The cõplaints of the Germans against the popes greeuances remued.

The ten greeuances of the Germaines.

Ten greeuances complained of by the Germains.

1 That the Bishops of Rome, successours one vnto another, doe not thinke themselues bound to obserue & keepe the Bulles, couenants, priuiledges, and letters, granted by their predecessours, without all derogation: but by often dispensation, suspension and reuocation, euen at the instance of euery euery vile person, they doe gainesay and withstand the same.

2. That the elections of prelates are oftentimes put backe.
3. That the elections of Presidentships are withstood, which the chapter houses of many churches haue obtained with great cost and expence, as the Church of Spire and Hasell do well know: whose bull, touching the election of their president, is made frustrate, he being yet aliue which graunted the same.
4. That benefices, and the greatest ecclesiasticall dignities, are reserued for Cardinalls and head notaries.
5. That expectatiue graces, called vowsons, are granted without number, and many oftentimes vnto one man: whereupon continuall contentions do rise, and much money is spent, both that which is laid out for the Bulles of those vowsons which neuer take effect, and also that which is consumed in going to law. Whereupon this prouerb is risen, Whosoeuer will get a vowson from Rome, must haue C. or CC. peces of gold laid vp in his cheste, for the obtaining of the same, which hee shall haue neede of, to prosecute the law withall.
6. That Annates or yearely reuenewes, are exacted without delay or mercy, euen of the bishops lately dead, and oftentimes more extorted then ought to be, through new offices and new seruants, as by the examples of the churches of Ments and Strausburgh, may be seene.
7. That the rule of the churches are giuen at Rome vnto those that are not worthy, which were more fit to keepe and feede Mules, then to haue the rule and gouernance of men.
8. That new indulgences and pardons, with the suspension and reuocation of the old, are graunted to gather and scrape money together.
9. That tenthes are exacted vnder the pretence of making warre against the Turke: when as no expedition doth follow thereupon.
10. That the cause which might be determined in Germany, where as there are both learned and iust iudges, are indistinctly caried vnto the Court of Rome; which thing S. Bernard, writing to Pope Eugenius, seemeth wonderfully to reproue.

Here ensueth the remedy against the said greeuances.

Remedies against the foresaid greeuances.

IF it shall seeme good vnto the Emperors maiesty, let it be declared vnto the bishop of Rome, how greeuous and intolerable a thing it is vnto the Germaines, to suffer continually so great charges and greeuances, to pay so great Annates for the confirmation of the Bishops and Archbishops, and especially in such Bishoprickes, where as the Annates by succesle of time, are enhansed, and in many (as it is said) doubled.

The Archbishops Palle of Ments what it costeth.

For the Archbishops see of Ments (as it is said) sometime paid only 10000. floreines: which summe, when as one which was chosen there, refused to giue, and so continued euen vnto his death, he which was afterward elect, being desirous of confirmation, fearing to withstand the Apostolicke see, offered the old summe of 10000. floreines: But notwithstanding, he could not get his confirmation, except he would pay the other 10000. which his predecessour before him had not paid.

By this meanes he was compelled to pay 20000. floreines. Which being enrolled in the register of the chamber, hath bene exacted of euery Archbishop since, vntill these our dayes: and not only 20000. but also 25000. for their new offices, and new seruants. At last, the summe drew to 27000. floreines, which Iames the Archbishop of Ments was compelled to pay, as his Commissary did report. So by this meanes, in a little time there was seuen times 25000. floreines paid out of the Archbishoprick of Ments vnto Rome, for the confirmation of the Archbishop. And when this Archbishop Iames had kept the Archbishoprick scarce foure yeares, the Lord Uriel was elect after him, who was compelled to pay at the least 24000. or 25000. floreines. Whereof a part he borowed of Merchants: but to satisfy and pay them againe, he was forced to exact a subsidy of his poore subiects and husbandmen, whereof some haue not yet satisfied and paid the tribute for the Bishops palle; so that by this meanes, our people are not onely tormented and brought to extreme pouerty, but also are moued vnto rebellion to seeke their liberty by what meanes soeuer they may, greeuously murmuring against the cruelty of the Clergy.

The Popes Palle dearely bought.

The pope also should be admonished, how that through diuers and sundry warres and battels, the lands of Germany lie desolate and waste, and through many mortalities, the number of men is diminished, so that for the scarcenes of husbandmen, the fields for the most part, lie vntild, the tolles are by diuers meanes diminished, the mines consumed, and the profities daily decay, whereby the Archbishops and Bishops should pay their Annates vnto the Apostolicke see, besides their other necessary and honest charges: insomuch that not without iust cause, Iames the Archbishop of Ments being euen at the point of death, said, that he did not so much sorrow for his owne death, as for that his poore subiects should be againe forced to pay a grieuous exaction for the Palle. Wherefore let the high Bishop, as a godly father and louer of his children, and a faithfull and prudent pastor, deale more fauourably with his children the Germaines, lest that persecution happen to rise against the Priests of Christ, and that men following the example of the Bohemians, do swarue from the church of Rome.

The people polled for the Popes Palle.

At the least, let him be more fauorable, as often, as any Archbishop or Bishop happeth to rule his Church but a few yeares: as it happened to the Bishops of Bamberge, whereof three died within few yeares. The like also might happen by other bishoprickes, whereof (as Aeneas Syluius witnesseth) there are in Germany to the number of 50. besides Abbats, whereof a great number are confirmed at Rome.

Aboue 50. Bishoprickes in Germanie.

And admit that in Germany there were greater profits and reuenewes rising of the ground, mines and toles: notwithstanding the Emperour and the other Princes, should lacke treasure and munition of warre against their enemies, and specially the infidels, and to preserue Germany in peace & quietnesse, and to minister iustice vnto euery man: for which purpose, the Councell of the chamber being most holily instructed and furnished with great cost and charges, doth chiefly serue. Besides that, the Emperour hath neede of treasure, to suppresse the rebelles in the Empire, to banish and driue away theeues and murtherers, whereof a great number are not ashamed to spoyle churches onely, and to robe them of their goods, but also to assaile the Clergy themselues. Finally, our nation and countrey of Germany, hath neede of great riches and treasure, not onely for the repayring of Churches and Monasteries, but also for Hospitals for children that are laid out in the streets, for widowes, for women with child, for orphans, for the mariage of the daughters of poore men, that they be not defloured, for such as haue neede and necessitie, for the old and weak, for the sicke and the sore, whereof (the more is the sorrow) Germany is fully replenished and filled.

Aduertisements vnto the Emperours Maiesty.

The Emperor aduertised of the subtle practises of the Pope, and popish prelats.

LEt the Emperours Maiesty foresee and prouide, that the begging Friers do not preach against his Maiesty, which are wont to complaine gladly vnto the Apostolicke see, fearing to lose their priuiledges, which I would to God, were as well grounded vpon Christ, as they are vpon profite. Let the Emperours Maiesty also beware, that the Pope do not giue commandement vnto the Electours, to proceede to the election of a new king of Romains, as he did against Frederick the second, when as the Lantgraue of Thurin, and William Earle of Holland, were elect by the commandement of the Pope. Let the Emperours Maiesty also feare and take heed of all the prelats of the Churches, and especially of the Presidents, which by their oth are bound to aduertise the Pope. Let the Emperours Maiesty also feare and beware that the Pope do not take away from his subiects their obedience, and prouoke the people boldring vpon him, to make inuasion into the Emperours dominions and Archduchie of Austrich: which those men, vnder colour of shewing obedience vnto the Popes commandement, be ready to do.

Let the Emperours maiesty also take heed of the Apostolicke censures, from which the Pope will in no case refraine. Finally, let the Emperours maiesty diligently foresee and take heed, that the Pope do not perswade the people with most subtle arguments, contrary to the pragmaticall sanction, excusing himselfe, and getting the good will of the simple, alledging that with great costs and charges, he will repaire the Church of S. Peter in Rome, & build in certaine places against the Turks, and recouer againe the lands and patrimony pertaining vnto the church of S. Peter, as he is bound by his office. Therfore, let your maiesty diligently foresee and deliberat, how through your most wise and discrete counsell, if neede shall require, you will answere to those subtleties of the Pope.

The Popes pretence of building S. Peters Church in Rome.

A certaine godly exhortation vnto the Emperours Maiesty.

A supplication or exhortation to Maximilian Emperour, for redresse of the Church.

YOur Maiesty can do nothing better, nothing more acceptable, or more worthy eternall remembrance, then to moderate the great exactions and oppressions of the Germains: to take away all occasion from the laitie, to persecute the Clergy: also to take away the benefices out of the hands of courtisans, which can neither preach, comfort, nor counsell any man (of which benefices, as Aeneas Syluius writeth, some are equall to the Bishoprickes of Italy) to encrease Gods honour and worship: and so to bridle the auarice and vngodlines of those courtisans, whereby your maiesty may the better prouide for the children of many noble and famous men and Citizens in Germany; which being brought vp from their youth in the Vniuersities, learning both the Scriptures and other humane letters, may without vniquet vexations, and most superfluous charges and contentions, aspire to the Ecclesiasticall promotions, who by their counsell and prayers, may be helps vnto the whole Church: For there is no small occasion, why the realme of Fraunce should so flourish, hauing so many notable learned men in it. If the Emperour would abolish this impietie, and restore Germany vnto their auncient libertie, which is now oppressed with grieuous tributes, and would make way for learned and honest men vnto Eccles-

Ecclesiasticall promotions: then might he truly and perpetually be called of all men, and in all places, the restorer of Germany to his auncient libertie, and the father of his countrey, and should obtaine no lesse glory thereby vnto himselfe, and profite vnto Germany, then if he had by force of armes, subdued any prouince vnto them: And so shall Germany render no lesse thanks vnto the said Maximilian, then vnto all the rest, which hauing translated the Empire from the Grecians vnto Germany, haue raigned many yeares before.

Hereafter ensueth the copy of a certaine letter of the Emperour Maximilian, giuen out in maner of a decree or commandement, against certaine abuses of the Clergy. Whereunto we haue also annexed the answere of Iacobus Selestadiensis, vnto the Emperours letters, wherein he seemeth also to haue sought aduice for the remedy of the like abuses, which we thought good here not to be omitted.

An Edict of Maximilian the Emperour.

WE according to the example of our dearely beloued father Fredericke Emperour of Rome, reuerencing the chiefe Pastour of the Church, and all the Clergy, haue suffered no final reuenewes of the Ecclesiasticall dignities, to be caried out of our dominion by the Prelats and Clergy that are absent, whose faults committed by humaine frailtie, with Constantine our predecessor, we haue not disdained to hide and couer. But for so much as through our liberalitie, the decay of Gods honour is risen, it is our part to foresee (which are elect vnto the Empire, without any desert) that amongst all other affaires of peace and warre, the Churches do not decay, Religion quaile not, or Gods true worship be not diminished: which we haue manifestly experimented, and daily do perceiue by the insatiable couetousnesse of some, which are neuer satisfied in getting of benefices: through whose absence (being but resident only vpon one) Gods honour & worship is diminished, houses decay, churches decrease, the Ecclesiasticall libertie is hurt, learning and monuments are lost and destroied, hospitalitie and almes diminished, and by their vnsatiable greedinesse, such of the Clergie as for their learning and vertue were worthie of Benefices, and their wisedome, profitable in common wealthes, are hindered and put backe. Wherefore according to the office and duety of our estate, for the loue of the encrease of Gods honour, we exhort & require, that no man from henceforth hauing any Canonship or Vicarage in one City of our Empire, shall occupie or possesse a prebend in an other Church of the same City, except he giue ouer the first within a yeares space vnto some person fit and profitable for the Church: neither that he do by vniust quarels, vexe or trouble any man in getting of benefices, neither that any man doe falsely faine himselfe to haue beene of the Emperors household, which hath not been comprehended within the league and agreement made by the Princes, neither that any man attempt to take away the patronages from any lay man, or aggrauate the small prebends of Curates of Churches, with pensions, neither that they do vse in getting of benefices and Bulles, any fraude, deceite, false instruments, corrupt witnesses, and cloaked Simonie, neither that any man presume to obtaine any regresse, or other thing cõtrary to the sacred Canons, right, honesty, equity and reason, vpon paine of the most greeuous offence of treason: the which we will, that not only they, going so contrary to God and all honesty: but also all their fauourers, which do helpe, counsell, harbour or giue them any thing, all their messengers and writers, proctours, sureties, and other their friends, shall incurre, and receiue condigne punishment for so great offence and contempt of our commandement. From Oenopont, &c.

No man to haue two Canonships or prebends at once.

* Here ensueth the copy of a letter writen vnto the Emperour Maximilian.

¶ To our most victorious Lord Maximilian the Emperour, Iacobus Selestadiensis, most humble commendations.

MOst victorious Emperour, when I had read your Maiesties Epistle, and receiued instructions of your Secretary, I prepared my selfe with al my whole endeuour, to satisfie your Maiesties desire: For euen from my youth hitherto, I haue applied all my care & study, first for the honour of your Maiesty, & consequently for the amplifying of the Germaine nation, and sacred Romaine Empire. Albeit I know my selfe farre vnable to satisfie your desire and purpose, and there are many which can fulfill this matter much better, which haue greater learning and experience of these common matters. There be also with other Princes, and in the Senates of common wealthes, many excellent learned men, which can exornate and beautifie Germanie, and perswade to reduce all the Clergy vnto a christian discipline, & to an vnitie and peace of the vniuersall church. Wherin not onely your Maiestie, but also your predecessors, as Charles the great, and his sonne Ludouicus Pius, the Othoes, Conrades, Fredericks, and Henrickes, and last of all, Sigismundus, haue with all labour and diligence trauelled, being stirred thereunto, vndoubtedly through the zeale and charity which they bare vnto almighty God, and thankefulnes vnto Christ, for his benefites which he hath bestowed vpon mankinde, and specially for the benefit of his most bitter passion. For Christ became not poore for vs, that we should liue in all riot and wantonnes vpon his patrimony, and shew forth our ambition and couetousnesse: neither did he suffer hunger that we should glut vp our selues: or suffered labors, chastity, and grieuous torments, that we should liue in idlnesse, wantonnes, and all kind of voluptuousnesse. Neither they which were contributers, and benefactours to Churches, induing the ministers thereof with their temporall riches, had any such respect herein, that the Clergy should liue onely in idlenesse, hauing all things at their will, without labour. Surely there was another cause why that they in times past did empouerish themselues and theirs to endow the Church: verily that they might the better attend vnto diuine seruice, without care of want of liuing (which they might easily get & gather out of the fields, woods, medowes, and waters) and to the intent that they should liberally giue almes vnto the poore Christians, Widows, Orphans, aged and sicke persons. For in the institutions of the canonicall profession, which we suppose was written by the commandement of Ludouicus Pius the Emperour, and allowed by the counsell of the Bishops, thus it is read: The goods of the Church (as it is alledged by the fathers, and contained in the chapters before) are the vowes of the faithfull, and patrimony of the poore. For the faithfull, through the feruentnesse of their faith, and loue of Christ, being inflamed, hauing an earnest desire of that heauenly kingdome, haue enriched the holy Church with their owne goods, that thereby the souldiors of Christ might be nourished, the Church adorned, the poore refreshed, and captiues according to the opportunitie of time, redeemed. Wherefore such as haue the administration of those goods, ought diligently to be looked vpon, that they do not conuert them vnto their owne proper vse, but rather, according to their substance and possibility, they do not neglect them in whom Christ is fed and clothed. Prosper is also of the same minde, affirming, that holy men did not challenge the church goods to their owne vse, as their owne proper goods, but as things commended vnto the poore, to be diuided amongst them: For that is to contemne that which a man possesseth, not to possesse a thing for himselfe, but for others, neither to couet the church goods with couetousnesse, to haue them himselfe, but to take them with a godly zeale to help other. That which the church hath, is common to all them which haue nothing, neither ought they to giue any thing of that vnto them (saith he) which haue of their owne: for to giue vnto them which haue enough, is but to cast things away. Ex Illyrico.

Pope Alexander 6.

To returne now to the order of Popes where we left before, speaking of Innocentius the 8. After the said Innocentius, next succeded Pope Alexander the 6. In which Alexander, among other horrible things, this is one to be noted, that when Gemes (Peucerus named him Demes) brother to Baiazetes the great Turke, was committed by the Rhodians, to the safe custody, first of Pope Innocent, then of Alexander the 6. for whose keeping, the Pope receiued euery yeare 40000. crownes; yet notwithstanding, when Pope Alexander afterward was compelled to send the said Gemes to Charles the eight the French king for a pledge, because the French king should not procure the great Turkes fauour, by sending his brother Gemes to him to be slaine, he being hired by the Turke, caused the said Gemes to be poysoned, who in his iourney going toward the French king, died at Terracina. Ex Hieronymo Mario.

The Pope poysoneth Gemes the Turks brother, being committed to his custodie. Ex Paul. Iouio lib. 2. Ex Peucero lib. 5. Ex Hieronym. Mario.

Moreouer, in the said Hieronymus Marius it appeareth, that this Alexander taking displeasure with the foresaid Charles the French king, about the winning of Naples, sent to Baiazetes the Turke, to fight against the foresaid Charles. Ex eodem.

The Pope seeketh the great Turke against the French King.

Munsterus lib. 4. Cosmog. declaring the foresaid historie of Gemes, somthing otherwise, first calleth him Zizymus, and saith that he was first committed by the Rhodians to the French king. And when as Ieannes Huniades afore mentioned, did labour to the French king to haue him, thinking by that meanes to obtaine a noble victory against the Turke, as it was not vnlike: this Alexander the Pope, through his fraudulent flattery, got him of the French king, into his owne hands, by whose meanes the said Gemes afterward was poysoned, as is in maner before expressed. Ex Seb. Munstero lib. 4. Cosmograph.

Vnto these poisoned acts of the Pope, let vs also adioine his malicious wickednes, with like fury exercised vpon Antonius Mancinellus; which Mancinellus being a man of excellent learning, because he wrote an eloquent oration against his wicked maners and filthy life, with other vices, he therefore commanded both his hands and his tongue to be cut off, playing much like with him, as Antonius the tyrant once did with M. Cicero, for writing against his horrible life: at length, as one poyson requireth another, this poysoned Pope, as he was sitting with his Cardinals, and other rich Senatours of Rome at dinner, his seruants bringing to him a wrong wrong bottle, wherewith he was poysoned, and his Cardinals about him.

In the time of this Pope Alexander, also it happened (which is not to be pretermitted) how that the Angell which stode in the high top of the Popes Church, was beaten downe with a terrible thunder: which thing seemed then to declare the ruine and fall of the Popedome. After this pope, next succeeded Pius the third, about the yeare of our Lord 1503. After whom, came next Julius the second, a man so farre passing all other in iniquitie, that Vlcelius, and such other of his owne friends writing of him, are compelled to say of him, Marti illum quam Christo deditiorem fuisse: that is, that he was more giuen to warre and battaile, then to Christ. Concerning the madnesse of this man, this is most certainly knowne, that at what time he was going to warre, he cast the keyes of S. Peter into the riuer of Tibris, saying, that for as much as the keyes of Peter would not serue him to his purpose, he would take himselfe to the sword of Paul. Whereupon Philip Melanthon, amongst many other writting vpon the same, maketh this Epigramme.

Cùm contra Gallos bellum papa Iulius esset
Gesturus, sicut fama vetusta docet,
Ingentes Martis turmas contraxit, & vrbem
Egressus sæuas edidit ore minas.
Iratusque sacras claues in flumina iecit
Tibridis, hic vrbi pons vbi iungit aquas.
Inde manu strictum vagina diripit ensem,
Exclamansque truci talia voce refert:
Hic gladius Pauli nos nunc defendet ab hoste,
Quandoquidem clauis nil iuuat ista Petri.

Whereupon also Gilbert Ducherius maketh this Epigramme.

In Gallum, vt fama est, bellum gesturus acerbum,
Armatam educit Iulius vrbe manum:
Accinctus gladio, claues in Tibridis amnem
Proiecit, & sæuus talia verba facit:
Quum Petri nihil efficiant ad prælia claues,
Auxilio Pauli forsitan ensis erit.

¶ The sense of these Epigrammes in English is this.

VVhen Iulius Pope against the French determined to make warre:
As fame reports, he gathered vp great troupes of men from farre.
And to the bridge of Tibur then,
marching as he were wood:
His holy keyes he tooke, and cast them downe into the floud.
And afterward into his hand,
he tooke a naked sword:
And shaking it, brake forth into this fierce and warlike word:
This sword of Paul (quoth he) shall now defend vs from our foe:
Since that this key of Peter doth nothing auaile thereto.

The popes law giueth leaue to kill all that be accursed of him.

The warres and bloudshed of Pope Julius 2.

Of this Julius it is certainly reported, that partly with his warres, partly with his cursings, within the space of 7. yeares, as good as 200000. Christians were destroyed. First he besieged Rauenna against the Venetians, then Seruia, Imola, Fauentia, Forolivium, Bononia, and other cities, which he gate out of Princes hands, not without much bloudshed. The Chronicles of John Sleidan maketh mention, that when this Julius was made Pope, he toke an oath, promising to haue a councell within two yeares: but when he had no leasure thereunto, being occupied with his warres in Italy among the Venetians, and with the French king, and in Ferraria, and in other countreyes; nine of his Cardinals departing from him, came to Millaine, and there appointed a Councell at the City of Pise, amongst whom, the chiefe were Bernardus, Cruceius, Gulielmus Prenestinus, Franciscus Constantinus, with diuers others: amongst whom also were adioyned the Procuratours of Maximilian the Emperour, & of Charles the French king. So the Councell was appointed the yeare of our Lord 1511. to begin in the Kalends of September. The cause why they did so call this Councell, was thus alledged, because the Pope had so broken his oth, and all this while he gaue no hope to haue any Councell, and also because there were diuers other crimes, wherupon they had to accuse him. Their purpose was to remoue him out of his seat, the which he had procured through bribes and ambition. Julius hearing this, giueth out contrary commandement vnder great paine, no man to obey them, and calleth himselfe another Councell against the next yeare, to be begun the 19. day of Aprill. The French king vnderstanding Pope Julius to ioyne with the Venetians, and so to take their part against him, conuented a Councell at Thurin in the moneth of September; in the which Councell these questions were proposed.

VVhether it was lawfull for the Pope to moue warre against any Prince without cause.

VVhether any Prince in defending himselfe, might inuade his aduersary: and deny his obedience.

Vnto the which questions it was answered, that neither the bishop ought to inuade, and also that it was lawfull for the king to defende himselfe. Moreouer, that the Pragmaticall sanction was to be obserued throw the realme of France: Neither that any vniust excommunications ought to be feared, if they were found to be vniust. After this, the king sent vnto Julius the answere of his Councell, requiring him either to agree to peace, or to appoint a generall Councell some other where, where this matter might be more fully decided. Julius would neither of both these, but forthwith accursed Charles the French king, with all his kingdome. At the length, at Rauenna, in a great warre, he was ouercome by the French king, and at last, after much slaughter and great bloudshed, and mortall warre, this Pope died in the yeare of our Lord 1513. the 21. day of February.

The Pragmaticall Sanction stablished, mentioned before, page 665.

No vniust excommunication to be feared.

IF it were not that I feare to ouerlay this our volume with heapes of forreine histories, which haue professed chiefely to intreate of Acts and Monuments here done at home: I would adioine after these Popes aboue rehearsed, some discourse also of the Turkes story: of their rising, and cruell persecution of the saints of God, to the great annoiance and perill of Christendome: yet notwithstanding, certaine causes there be, which necessarily require the knowledge of their order and doings, and of their wicked procedings, their cruell tyranny, and bloudy victories, the ruine & subuersion of so many Christian Churches, with the horrible murders and captiuitie of infinite Christians, to be made plaine and manifest, as well to this our countrey of England, as also to other nations.

The Turkes, doing requisite to be knowne of Christians.

First, for the better explayning of the prophecies of the new Testament, as in S. Pauls epistle to the Thessalonians, and also in the Reuelation of S. John. Which Scriptures otherwhile, without the opening of these histories, can not so perfectly be vnderstood. Of the which Scriptures, we minde hereafter (Christ graunting) orderly, as the course of matter shall leade vs, to make rehearsall.

The first cause.

An other cause is, that we may learne thereby either with the publique Church, to lament with our brethren such a great defection and decay of Christian faith, through these wicked Turkes: or els may feare thereby our owne danger.

The second cause.

The third cause, that we may ponder more deeply with our selues, the scourge of God for our sinnes, and corrupt doctrine, which in the sequele hereof, more euidently may appeare to our eyes, for our better admonition.

The third cause.

Fourthly, the consideration of this horrible persecution of the Turkes, rising chiefely by our discord and dissention among our selues, may reduce vs againe from our domesticall warres, in killing and burning one of an other, to ioyne together in christian patience and concord.

The fourth cause.

Fiftly, but chiefely, these great victories of the Turkes, and prosperous speede of our men fighting against them, may admonish & teach vs, following the example of the old Israelites, how to seeke for greater strength to encounter with these enemies of Christ, then hitherto we haue done. First we must consider, that the whole power of Sathan the prince of this world, goeth with the Turkes. Which to resist, no strength of mans arme is sufficient, but only the name, spirit, and power of our Lord Jesus the Sonne of God, going with vs in our battels; as among the old Israelites, the Arke of Gods couenant and promise went with them also, fighting against the enemies of God. For so are we taught in ỹ scripture, that we christian men haue no strength, but in Christ onely. Whether we warre against the diuell, or against the Turke, it is true that the Scripture saith: Sine me nihil potestis facere. i. without me you can do nothing. Otherwise there is no puissance to stand against the diuell or to conquer the world, Nisi fides nostra: that is, our faith onely: to which all the promises of God (touching saluation) be annexed, beyond which promises we must not go, for the word must be our rule. He that presumeth beyond the promises in the word expressed, goeth not, but wandereth he can not tell whither. Neither must we appoint God, how to saue the world, but must take that way which he hath appointed. Let vs not set our God to schole, nor comprehend his holy spirit within our sculles. He that made vs without our counsell, did also redeeme vs as pleased him. If he be mercifull, let vs be thankefull. And if his mercies surmount our capacity, let vs therefore not resist, but search his word, and thereunto apply our will: which if we will do, all our contentions will soone be at a point. Let vs therefore search the will of our God in his word, and if he will his saluation to stand free to all nations, why do we make merchandise thereof? If he haue graciously offered his waters to vs, without money or money worth, let vs not hedge in the plenteous springs of his grace giuen vs.

Ammonition to fight against the Turke.

Christian faith necessary to be ioyned with outward forces against the Turke.

Gratis venum dati estis, gratis redimemini. Esay 52.

Omnes sitientes venite ad aquas, emite absque argento & commutatione. Esay 55.

And finally, if God haue determined his owne Sonne only to stand alone, let not vs presume to admire with his maiesty any of our trumpery. He ỹ bringeth S. George or S. Denyse as patrons to the field to fight against the Turke, leaueth Christ (no doubt) at home. Now how we haue fought these many yeares against the Turke, though stories keepe silence, yet the successe declareth. We fight against a persecutour, being no lesse persecutours our selues. We warre against a bloudy tyrant, and our hands be as full of bloud as his. He killeth Christs people with the sword, and we burne them with fire. He obseruing the works of the law, seeketh his iustice by the same, the like also do we. But neither he nor we seeke our iustification as we should, that is, by faith onely in the Sonne of God.

And what maruell then, if our doctrine being as corrupt almost as his, and our conuersation worse, if Christ fight not with vs, fighting against the Turke? The Turke hath preuailed so mightily, not because Christ is weake, but because that Christians be wicked, and their doctrine impure. Our temples with Images, our harts with idolatry are polluted: Our Priests stinke before God for adultery, being restrained from lawfull matrimony. The name of God is in our mouthes, but his feare is not in our harts. We warre against the Turke with our works, Masses, traditions and ceremonies: but we fight not against him with Christ, and with the power of his glory, which if we did, the field were wonne.

Reformation of religion requisite before we fight with the Turkes.

Wherefore briefely to conclude, saying my iudgement in this behalfe, what I suppose: this hope I haue, and do beleeue, that when the Church of Christ with the Sacraments thereof, shall be so reformed, that Christ alone shall be receiued to be our iustifier, all other religions, merits, traditions, images, patrons and aduocates set apart, the sword of the Christians, with the strength of Christ, shal soone vanquish the Turkes pride and furie. But of this more largely in the processe of this storie.

Faith getteth victory.

The sixth cause.

The sixt and last cause, why I thinke the knowledge of the Turkes history requisite to be considered, is this: because that many there be, which for that they be farther from the Turkes, and thinke therefore themselues to be out of danger, take little care and study, what happeneth to their other brethren. Wherefore to the intent to excite their zeale and prayer to almighty God, in this so lamentable ruine of Christs Church, I thought it requisite by order of history, to giue this our nation also something to vnderstand, what hath bene done in other nations by these cruell Turkes, and what detriment hath bene and is like more to happen by them to the Church of Christ, except we make our earnest inuocation to almighty God, in the name of his Sonne, to stop the course of the diuell by these Turkes, and to stay this defection of Christians falling daily vnto them, and to reduce them againe to his faith which are fallen from him. Which the Lord Iesus of his grace grant with speede. Amen.

Earnest inuocation necessary in the Church of Christ.

Before we enter into this story of the Turkes and Saracens, first let vs call to remembrance the prophecy and forewarning of S. Paul writing to the Thessalonians, in his 2. Epistle, in these words: Be not moued nor troubled in your minds, either by preaching, or by writing, or by letter from vs, as though the day of the Lord were at hand: for the Lord will not come except there come a defection first, and the wicked person be reuealed, &c. Of this defection, sundrie mindes there be, of sundry expositours: some thinking this defection to meane a falling away from the Empire of Rome: some from the obedience of the Pope. But as Saint Paul little passed vpon the outward glory of the Romane Empire: so lesse he passed vpon the proud obedience of the Pope. What Saint Paul meant by this defection, the reading of these Turkish stories, and the miserable falling away of these Churches by him before planted, will soone declare.

Another mystery there is in the Reuelation, Apocalyp. 13. where the number of the beast is counted 666. Whereby may seeme by all euidences, to be signified the first origine and springing of these beastly Saracens, as by sequele hereof may appeare by the first rising of this diuellish sect of Mahumet.

The number of the Apocalyps, cap. 13. expounded.

Moreouer, an other place there is, cap. 16. Apocal. where we reade, that by powring out of the Viall of Gods wrath, of the first Angell, the great floud Euphrates was dried vp, to let in the kings of the East: the opening of which prophecy, may also more euidently appeare, in considering the order and maner of the comming in of these Turkes into Europe.

Another place Apocal. 16. Et sextus Angelus effudit phialam suam, &c.

Some also apply to the Turkes certaine Prophecies of Daniel, Ezechiel, and other places of the old Testament more, which heere I omit, for so much as the Prophecies of the old Testament, if they be taken in their proper and natiue sense, after my iudgement, do extend no further, then to the death of our Sauiour, and to the end of the Iewes kingdome. Albeit herein I do not preiudicate to any mans opinion, but that euery man may abound in his owne sense.

As touching the yeare and time when this pestiferous sect of Mahumet first began, histories doe not fully consent: Some affirming that it began, An. 621. and in the 10. yeare of Heraclius the Emperour of Constantinople: in which minde is Ioannes Lucidus. As Munsterus counteth, it was in the yeare of our Lord 622. Martin Luther and John Carion referre it to the 18. yeare of the raigne of Heraclius, which is the yeare of our Lord 630. Vnto the which number, the computation of the beast signified in the Apocalyps, doth not farre dilagree, which numbreth the name of the Beast, with three Greeke letters ϰ ξ ϛ, which Greeke letters after the supputation of the Grecians make the number of 666.

The time of Mahumet the false prophet expounded.

The number of the beast.

In this all writers agree, that this damnable Mahumet was borne in the countrey of Arabia, bordering on the East part of Iewry. His father was a Syrian, or a Persian, his mother was an Ismaelite; which Ismaelites being a people of Arabia were called then Agarens: Which terme Mahumet afterward turned to the name of Saracens. Of this wretched Mahumet mention was made before, page 112. where we shewed, how he making himselfe the highest Prophet of all other, yet denieth not Christ to be an holie Prophet, and next to him, and Moses also to be an other. Moreouer, he denieth not Marie the mother of Christ to be a virgin, and to haue conceiued Christ by the holie Ghost: affirming further that Christ in his owne person was not crucified, but another called Judas for him. He greatlie commendeth also Iohn the sonne of Zacharie for a virgin: when he himselfe permitteth a man to haue foure wiues, and as manie concubines as he is able to finde: and saith, that whereas Christ & other Prophets had the gift giuen them to worke miracles, he was sent by force of sword, to compell men to his religion.

The prodigious lies and blasphemies of Mahumets Alchoran.

The prodigious vanities, lies and blasphemies conteined in his law called Alchoran, are rather to be laught at then recited.

Mahumets Alchoran mingled with diuers lawes.

It is thought, that Sergius a Nestorian was a great doer with Mahumet, in contriuing of this lying Alchoran, and so it doth well appeare by the scope and pretence thereof, which especiallie tendeth to this end, to take the diuinitie from the person of Christ, whom he graunteth notwithstanding to be a most holie man, and also that he is receiued vp to God, and shall come againe to kill Antichrist, &c.

Moreouer, this ridiculous Alchoran is so blanched and powdered with so diuers mixtures of the Christians, Iewes, and the Gentiles lawes, giuing such libertie to all wantonnesse of flesh, setting vp circumcision, abstaining from swines flesh, and Iudaicall lotions, and so much standeth vpon Father Abraham, that it is supposed of some, this filthie Alchoran not to be set out in the daies of Mahumet, but that certaine Iewes had some handling also in this matter, and put it out after his death: and so seemeth first to take his force about the number of yeares limited in the Apocalyps, as is afore said, where thus it is written: He that hath intelligence, let him count the number of the Beast: for it is the number of a man, and his number is fiue hundred, fiue score and fiue.

The numeration of the Apocal. 666.

After this diuelliih Mahumet had thus seduced the people, teaching them that he came not by miracles, but by force of sword to giue his law, and that they which will not obey it, must either be put to death, or else pay tribut (for so be the words of the Alchoran;) and after that he had gathered strength about him of the Arabians, which Arabians had then occasion to rebell against the Emperour, because their stipends were not paid them of Heraclius the Emperors officers: he began to range with force and violence in the parts of Syria bordering neere vnto him, and first subdued Mecha, then Damascus: and further increasing in power, entred into Egypt and subdued the same. From thence he turned his power against the Persians, with whom Cosroes the king of Persia encountring with a puissant army, ouerthrew the Saracens, and put Mahumet to flight. Of these Persians came the Turkes, which afterward ioyning with the Saracens, maintained them against the Christians. Ex Munster.

Damascus subdued of the Saracens.

Mahumet put to flight by Cosroes king of the Persians.

After the death of this beast, which, as some say, was poysoned in his house, succeeded Ebocara, or Ebubecer his father in law, or as Bibliander affirmeth, his sonne in law, who tooke vpon him the gouernment of the Saracens, & got the City Gaza, and besieged also Hierusalem two yeares. He raigned two yeares, hauing for his chiefe City Damascus.

Hierusalem besieged.

After him, followed Omar, or Ahumar, who conquered a great part of Syria, and got Egypt.

The fourth king of the Saracens after Mahumet, was Odmen, then followed Haly, and after him Muhanias: which after the siege of 7. yeares, obteined and got the Christian city of Cesarea: also ouercame the Persians, with their king Orimasda, and subdued that countrey to his law.

Cesarea got of the Saracens.

The kingdome of the Persians subdued to the Saracens.

Thus the wicked Saracens in the space of 30. yeares, subdued Arabia, got Palestina, Phenicia, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, which came directly to the 666. yeares, prophesied of in the Reuelation of S. Iohn, as is afore said. And not long after, they proceeded further, and got Affrike, and then Asia, as in the processe of their story shall appeare the Lord willing.

Arabia, Palestina, Phenicia, Syria, Egypt, and Persia subdued of the Saracens.

Not long after Heraclius Emperour of Constantinople, succeeded Constance his nephew, who in the 13. yeare of his Empire, fighting vnluckily against the Saracens in Lycia, was ouerthrowne of Muhanias afore said, in the yeare of our Lord 655. Which Constance, if he were not prospered by the Lord in his warres, it was no great maruell, considering that he had slaine his brother Theodosius before at home: moreouer, liued in incestuous matrimony: also, being inclined to certain new sects, could not abide the contrary teachers, but slew them which admonished him therof. The said Constance going afterward to Italy, was also ouercome of the Lumbards, &c. The Saracens after this victory spoiled also Rhodes.

Constance the Emperor ouercome by the Saracens.

Rhodes spoyled of the Saracens.

Although

Although these cursed Saracens in these their great victories and conquests were not without domesticall seditions and diuisions among themselues, yet the princes of the Saracens, being called then Sultans, had in their possession the gouernment of Syria, Egypt, Afrike, and of a great part of Asia, about the tearme of 400. yeares (till at length the Saracen king which ruled in Persia, fighting against the Saracen of Babylon, sought aide of the Turkes, to fight with him against the Sultan of Babylon. The which Turkes by little and little surprised vpon the Sultan of Persia, and not long after putting him out of place, vsurped y kingdom of Persia: which afterward went further, as ye shall heare the Lord willing. And this is the first beginning of the Turks dominion.

Sultanes first called.

The first rising of the Turkes.

These Turkes after they had thus ouercome great countreys and prouinces, and made their power large and mighty both in Asia, and Europa, began to diuide their kingdomes, and countreys amongst themselues. But when they could not agree, but with deadly warre contended for the bounds of those kingdomes and dominions, in the meane time 4. of the principall families conquering and subduing all the rest, parted the whole Empire amongst themselues. And yet they also not so contented, fell to such cruell hatred, contention, warre, and slaughter, (no doubt by the iust iudgement of God against his blasphemous enemies) that there was no end thereof, vntill the remnant of the ancient Turkes was vtterly roted out.

The Turkes dominions parted into 4. families.

For it is euident, that there are few now remaining, which are Turkes indeed by birth and bloud, and that the state of that great Empire is not vpholden, but by the strength and power of souldiors, which haue bene Christians, and now are turned to Mahumets religion: so that euen their owne naturall language is now out of vse amongst them, sauing in certaine families of their nobilitie and gentlemen.

These 4. families aboue mentioned, with their Captaines and armies, about the yeare of our Lord 1330. went raging throughout all Asia and Europa, and euery one of them conquered some part of the countreys where they passed.

The diuision of the Christians do make the Turke so strong.

The causes of these great inuasions and victories, were the dissention and discord, falsehood, idlenesse, vnconstancie, greedie auarice, lacke of truth, and fidelity among Christian men of all states and degrees, both high and low. For by the wilfull defection and backsliding of the Christians, the Turkish power did exceedingly increase, in that many desiring the licentious life and liberty of warre, and allured with the prosperous successe of things, forsooke the Church of God, and made themselues bondslaues to Mahumet and his diuellish sect: both because that fleshly liberty is delighting to all men, and partly also because as fortune fauoureth, so commonly the willes of men encline: And againe, such as be prophane, and without the feare of God, (whereof there is an infinite number in the Church) in all ages, are wont commonly to iudge of religion, according to the successe of realmes and kingdomes. For many, not only for the variety of opinions, but also for the diuersitie of euents and fortune amongst men, haue enquired and do inquire, whether there be any Church of God distinct from other nations: what it is, and where it is: especially, for so much as the greatest part of men, both in the old time, when as the foure Monarchies flourished in order, was ignorant of this doctrine, which is peculiar to the Church alone, and now also the barbarity of Mahumet preuaileth and raigneth in the most part of the world. And how standeth this with mans reason, that a small number both miserable and also feebled and broken with many battailes, should be regarded and loued of God, and the other flourishing in all wealth, prosperitie, victories, authoritie and power, should be reiected and despised of God, seeing there is no power and authoritie, but by the ordinance of God? Albeit therefore, the power of the Turkes hath bene for these two hundred yeares, of greater force, then any other Monarchy of the world besides, yet is there no Imperiall dignity to be esteemed in that Turkish tyranny, but amongst those nations onely, where the heauenly doctrine of the Gospell is preached, and other disciplines necessary for the Church of God, and the common life of man maintained and regarded; where the lawes of God, and other honest and ciuill ordinances agreeable to the same, do flourish and reigne: where lawfull iudgement is exercised: where vertue is honoured and rewarded: where sinne and wickednes is punished: where honest families are maintained and defended.

No imperiall countrie in all the Turkish dominions.

These things are not regarded amongst the Turkes, the enemies of the Sonne of God, and all lawfull Empires: because they dissolue and reiect all godly societies, honest discipline, good lawes, policies, righteous iudgements, the ordinance of matrimony, and godly families. For what hath the Empire of the Turkes beene hitherto, but most deadly, cruell, and perpetuall warre, to worke all mischiefe, destruction and desolation: to subuert good lawes, Cities, Kingdomes, policies, and to enlarge their cruell power and dominion: The stay and strength whereof, is not loue and fauour proceeding of vertue and iustice, as in lawfull and well gouerned Empires: but feare, violence, oppression, swarmes, and infinite thousands of barbarous and most wicked people, ministers of Satans malice and fury. Which kinde of dominion and tyranny hath bene condemned by the voyce of God many yeares agoe: the testimonies whereof, the Lord would haue to remaine in the Church, lest the godly being moued with the power and successe thereof, should fall away and forsake the Sonne of God.

The description of the Turkes vnordinate Empire.

Ezech. 38. Apoc. 20.

Wherefore, let vs not seeke for any Imperiall state in that barbarity: but let vs be thankefull, and acknowledge the great benefite of God, for that he hath reserued to vs certaine remnants of the Romaine Empire: And let vs call vpon him daily with heartie petitions and grones, and with zeale and loue to the house of God, that this Turkish power ioined with the malice of Sathan, against the Sonne of God, preuaile not against the poore congregations and little remnant of his Church, as it hath hitherto done against those strong and noble Christian kingdoms and churches, where now wee see the Turkish tyranny to raigne, and Sathan to haue taken full possession. Whose state was once farre better then ours is now, and more like to continue without such horrible ouerthrowes and desolation. Oh that we might foresee a little the great danger that hangeth ouer our heads! For though the Turke seemeth to be farre off, yet do we nourish within our breasts at home, that may some cause vs to feele his cruell hand and worse, if worse may be, to ouerrunne vs: to lay our land waste: to scatter vs amongst the Infidels, the enemies and blasphemers of the Sonne of God.

The Christian Kingdoms and churches destroyed by the Turkes, are a warning for vs, whom God hath yet spared.

Now, although these foure families aboue mentioned, long continued together in bloudie warres, and deadly hatred, yet one of them passed the rest in all crueltie and tyrannie, and subduing the other three families, tooke vpon him the gouernment alone, and so became the first Monarch, or Emperour, that reigned among them, called Ottomannus, of whom, all that raigned after him, were called Ottomanni. Who succeeding orderly of his line, haue occupied the same dominion and seate of the Turkes, from the yeare of our Lord 1306. vnto this present time, which haue been to the number of 12. Of the which 12. in such order as they liued and raigned, I intend (Christ so permitting) seuerally and compendiously something to intreate, briefely abstracting out of prolixe and tedious writers, such specialties, as for vs Christians shall be chiefely requisite to be knowne.

Foure principall families of the Turke.

The family of Ottomannus.

¶ Ottomannus the first great Emperour, or Tyrant of the Turkes.

Ottomannus the first Emperour of the Turkes.

THis Ottomannus was at the first of poore estate, and obscure amongst the common sort of men, comming of a base progeny, and of rusticall parents: but through his valiantnes and actiuitie in warre, he got him a great name amongst the Turkes. For he being a man of fierce courage, refusing no labour, and delighting in warre, and gathering together by great subtiltie a multitude of common souldiers, began to make warre, and by conquests and victories, to aduance himselfe and his familie. First, hee began to rob and spoyle with a great band of rouers, and afterward he attempted to set vpon all men. Neither did he vexe and destroy the Christians onely, but set vpon his owne nation also, and sought all occasion to subdue them wholly vnto him. For now the Princes and Captaines of the Turkes, inflamed with ambition and desire of rule, began to fall out and contend among themselues, in so much that they fell to domesticall and inward warre, with all the power they could.

Inward warre among the Turkes.

Ottomannus hauing this occasion very fitte and meete to accomplish that, which he long had sought for, gathering vnto him all such as he thought to be giuen to robbing and spoiling, and set all vpon mischiefe, in short time began to grow in authoritie, and first set vpon certaine townes, as he saw opportunitie to serue him: Of which townes, some he tooke by force, some by yeelding, othersome he spoyled and ouerthrew, to terrifie the rest, thus laying the first foundation of his rising. In the meane time, the discord which was among the Christians, was no small aduantage to this Ottomannus, by occasion whereof, he within tenne yeares space subdued Bythinia, and all the prouinces about Pontus: Also Natolia, which comprehendeth all the dominion of the Grecians within Asia: Ancyra a City in Phrygia: Synope a City in Galatia: and Sabastia a City in Cappadocia: and thus still preuailing, he increased in short time to a mighty power, either through the secret iudgement of God against that nation, or els because God would haue them so farre and so cruelly to preuaile, for the punishment of the sinnes of other nations, like as it was prophecied before, that such a kingdome there should be of Gog and Magog.

Turkes after his father. Who after he had drawne to him the harts of the multitude, such as had their dispositions set vpon the licentious life of warre, conuerted his power further to enlarge his fathers dominion, winning and subduing Mysia, Lydia, Lycaonia, Phrygia and Caria: All which countreys, being within the compasse of Asia, vnto the sea side of Hellespontus, and the sea Euxinus, he added to the Turkish Empire. Also he wanne Prusia, which was the metropolitane city of Bithynia, which then he made the chiefe seate of the Turkes Empire. Besides these moreouer, he conquered Nicea, and got Nicomedia: all which were before Christian Cities and regions. And yet all this could not make the Christian Princes in Grecia, to cease their ciuill warres, and to ioyne and accord among themselues: Such debate, and variance was then betweene Cantacuzenus on the Grekes part, and Paleologus the Emperour of Constantinople. By reason whereof, the Turkes aide was sent for out of Asia, to helpe our Christians one to kill an other, and at length to get all those parts of Europe from them both. Who if they had according to their profession, so well ioyned in brotherly vnitie, as they did in cruell hostilitie dissent, neither had Orchanes so preuailed in getting Prusia from the Grecians, neither had the Turkes so sone presumed into Europe as afterward they did. Orchanes after these victories, when he had raigned 22. yeares, was stroken, as some say, with a dart in the shoulder, at the siege of Prusia. The opinion of others is, that he fighting against the Tartarians, where he lost a great part of his army, was there also slaine himselfe. An. 1349.

Christian cities subdued of the Turkes.

Ciuill warre among the Grecians.

By the discord of Christians the Turkes increase.

Amurathes the 3. after Ottomannus.

THe Greke writers doe holde that Orchanes had two sonnes, Solimannus and Amurathes. Of which two, first Solimannus raigned, albeit not long. After him, followed Amurathes, who after that Asia now was subdued by his predecessors, sought by all meanes and waies how to procede further, and to inuade Europe. To whose ambitious purpose the domesticall warres of the Christians gaue vnprosperous occasion, which occasion is thus declared: Certaine discord fell betweene the Princes of Grece (whose Captaine was Cantaguzenus) and Paleologus Emperor of Constantinople. Whereupon Paleologus, for that he was not able to make his partie good with the Grecians, most vnwisely sent for Amurathes to helpe him. Who being glad to haue such an occasion offered, which he so long had sought, sent to aide him 12000. Turkes into Thracia: but first vsed all delayes he could of craftie policie, to the intent that the Grekes first should waste their strength and power vpon themselues, whereby he might be more able afterward to set vpon them, and to accomplish his conceiued desire.

Amurathes the third after Ottomannus.

Amurathes seeketh occasion to inuade Europe.

The Turkes thus being called into Europe, by the Christians, whether they talking the sweetnesse of the soyle, incensed Amurathes their Emperor to make inuasion, or whether Amurathes of his owne head thought good to vse the time, in the yeare of our Lord 1363. he came himselfe ouer into Europe with 60000. Turkes, falling vpon the Grecians, being wasted and spent with their long warres and battailes before. The pretence of the diuelish Turke was, to aide and to assist the Emperour Paleologus, whether he would or no, and to subdue such as had fallen from him. The Christian shippes of the Ligurians for money were hired to conduct them ouer, taking for euery souldiour a peece of gold. Ex Peucer. & alijs.

The first coming of the Turke into Europe.

The couetousnes of Christians brought ouer the Turkes.

Thus the Turkes armie being conueyed ouer by the Grecians sea called Hellespontus, first got Callipolis, with other townes and cities bordering about the sea, and there planting themselues, and preparing shippes of their owne for transporting their munitions out of Asia, aduanced their power further into Thracia, and there wanne Philippolis, then got Adrianopolis, which was not farre from Constantinople, and there Amurathes made his chiefe seate. Then began Paleologus the Emperour at length to bewaile his offer couenant made with Amurathes. When the Turkes had expugned thus a great part of Thracia, they extended forth their army vnto Mysia, which they sone subdued: from thence proceeding and conquering the Bellos and Triballos, they intred into Seruia, and Bulgaria, where they ioyning battaile with Lazarus Despota, Prince of Seruia, and with other Dukes of Dalmatia, & Epyrus, wanne of them the field, and put them to the worse: where Lazarus Despota being taken, and committed to prison, ended his life. This Lazarus had a certaine faithfull client or seruant, who to reuenge his masters death, with a bold courage, although seeing death before his eyes, yet ventred his life so farre, that he came to the tyrant and thrust him through with his dagger. This Amurathes reigned 23. yeares, and was slaine in the yeare of our Lord 1372.

Baiazetes the 4. after Ottomannus.

THe power of the Turkes began to increase in Europe, what time Baiazetes, the first of that name, after the death of his father, entred the possession of the Turkes kingdome.

Baiazetes the 4. after Ottomannus.

This Baiazetes had two brethren, Solimannus, and Sauces. Which Sauces had his eyes put out by his father for striuing for the kingdome. Solimannus was slaine of his brother. Thus Baiazetes beginning his kingdome with the murther of his brother, reduced his Imperiall seate from Prusia a City of Bithynia, vnto Adrianople, intending with himselfe to subdue both Asia and Europe to his owne power. First he set vpon the Seruians and Bulgarians, thinking to reuenge his fathers death, where he gaue the ouerthrow to Marcus Despota, with all the nobilitie of the Seruians and Bulgarians, and put all those parts vnder his subiection, vnto the fines and borders of the Illyrians. All Thracia moreouer he brought likewise vnder his yoke, onely Constantinople and Pera excepted. That done, he inuaded the residue of Grecia, preuailing against the countreys of Thessalia, Macedonia, Phocides, and Attica, spoyling and burning as he passed, without any resistance: and so returning with innumerable spoile of the Christians vnto Adrianople, laid siege to Constantinople the space of eight yeares, and had expugned the same, but that Paleologus being brought to extremitie, was driuen to craue aide of the Frenchmen, and of Sigismund the Emperour. Who being accompanied with a sufficient power of Frenchmen and Germaines, came downe to Hungaria, and toward Seruia, against the Turke. Baiazetes hearing of their comming, raised his siege from Constantinople, and with 60000. horsemen, came to Nicopolis, where he encountring with them, ouerthrew all the Christian army, take John the Captaine of the French power prisoner: Sigismundus, which before in the Councell of Constance, had burned John Hus and Hierome of Prage, hardly escaped by flying. Baiazetes after the victory got, carried away Duke John, with fiue other in bands, into Prusia, where before his face he caused all the other Christian prisoners to be cut in peces. Afterward the said John being ransomed with 200000. crownes, was deliuered. Some authors referre this story to the time of Calepinus, as followeth hereafter to be seene.

The barbarous cruelty of the Turkes against the Christians.

Baiazetes the cruell tyrant after this victory wonne, and tyrannie shewed vpon the Christians, returned againe to his siege of Constantinople, fully bending himselfe to conquer and subdue the same; which thing no doubt he had accomplished, but that the prouidence of God had found such a meanes, that Tamerlanes king of Parthia, with an hundred thousand horsemen, and swarmes of footmen, like a violent flood, ouerrunning Asia, and prelling vpon Syria and Sebastia, had taken Orthobules the sonne of Baiazetes, prisoner, and afterward slue him, exercising the like cruelties vpon his prisoners, as Baiazetes had done before vpon the Christians: insomuch that he spared neither sere nor age of the Turkish multitude: of whom, he cause xij. thousand at one time, to be ouerridden and troden downe vnder his horses feete. By reason whereof, Baiazetes the tyrant was enforced to raise his siege from Constantinople, and to returne his power into Asia: where he neere the hill called Stella, pitched his tents there to encounter with Tamerlanes.

The fight betweene these two, was long and great on both sides, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1397. and the second yeare after the slaughter of our Christians at Nicopolis in Pannonia; but the victorie of this battaile fell to Tamerlanes at length. In the which battaile, as Munsterus writeth, were slaine 2000000. Turkes. Among whom, Baiazetes the tyrant, hauing his horse slaine vnder him, was taken prisoner; and to make a spectacle of his wretched fortune, was bound in golden fetters, and so being inclosed in an iron grate (whom before all Grecia could not hold) was led about and shewed through all Asia, to be scorned and laught at: and moreouer was vsed in stead of a footestole to Tamerlanes, or a blocke, as often as he mounted vpon his horse. Some adde also, that he was made like a dog to feede vnder Tamerlanes table. The tyranny of which Baiazetes against the Christians, as it was not much vnlike to the cruelties of Valerianus the Romane Emperour aboue mentioned, pag. 61. so neither was the example of his punishment much discrepant; for as Sapores King of the Persians did then with Valerianus in time of the eighth persecution of the primitiue Church, so likewise was Baiazetes this persecutor worthily handled by Tamerlanes King of the Parthians, as in manner aboue said.

Tamerlanes after this conquest, passed with his army into Mesopotamia, to Egypt, and all Syria, where he victoriously subduing the Cities and munitions of the Turkes, at length also conquered Damascus. In his sieges his manner was, the first day to go all in white attire, the second day in red, the third day in blacke: signifying thereby mercie the first day, to them that yelded; the second day the sword; the third day fire and ashes. At last, after great victories, and spoiles gotten of the Turkes, he returned into his countrey againe, and there died, anno 1402.

In the meane time Baiazetes in the second yeere of his captiuitie, died, leauing behind him diuers sonnes, Jesus or Josua the eldest, Mulsumanes, Moses, Celebinus, or Calepinus, Jesus the yonger, Mustaphas, and Hali, of whom first Jesus the eldest was ouercome and slaine of Mulsumanes: which Mulsumanes afterward was deliuered to Moses his brother, and by him was slaine likewise, which Moses had also the like end by his brother Calepinus, hauing his necke broken with a bowstring, which was then the vsuall maner among the Turkes in killing their brethren. The same Calepinus sparing only the life of Mustaphas his other brother, condemned him to perpetuall prison. Jesus the yonger was baptised, and shortly after departed at Constantinople. In these such discords and diuisions among the Turkes, what occasions were giuen to the Christians to haue recouered againe of the Turkes that they had lost, if they had not beene either negligent, or in their owne priuate wars otherwise occupied with themselues.

¶ Calepinus the 5. after Ottomannus.

Calepinus the fifth, after Ottomannus.

CAlepinus, or Celebinus was the sonne of Baiazetes, and of foure brethren, the eldest: who being all taken captiues of the Parthians, hee onely escaped and obtained his fathers kingdome. This Calepinus encouraged by the sloth and negligence of the princes of Europe, and by the discord of the Grecians amongst themselues & other nations neere about them, long troub'ed and vexed the Bulgarians, Seruians, and Macedonians, euen to the time of Sigismundus. Which Sigismundus seeing now Baiazetes to be ouercome and taken of Tamerlane, and the power of the Turkes weakened in Europe, and hauing such occasion offered him, as it were from heauen to destroy and vtterly to rote out, not only out of Asia, but also all Europe, that barbarous nation, and cruell enemies to the name and religion of Christ: and also to reuenge the great slaughter and discomfiture of his army fighting before with Baiazetes at Nicopolis a city in Mysia: with great power made warre against Calepinus at Columbatium a towne in Seruia, as is also before mentioned, pag. 661. but as vnluckelie & with as little successe as he did before against Baiazetes his father: For in that battell were slaine of the Christians to the number of twentie thousand, and the rest vtterly discomfited, the king himselfe escaping so hardly, that he entred not againe into his kingdome for the space of eighteene monethes after. Some write that this was done vnder Baiazetes, other some refer this battell to Amurathes; but howsoeuer it was, most pernicious was it to the Christians. He raigned but fyre yeeres and died very yong, an. 1404.

Orchanes and Moses his vncle.

Diuersitie in histories.

AFter the captiuitie of Baiazetes aboue mentioned, histories diuersly do dissent. The Greeke writers making no mention at all of Calepinus, only make mention of the sons of Baiazetes, and of the contention among them, vntill the time of Mahumetes. The Latine stories writing of the children of Baiazetes and of their succession, do not therein agree, some affirming that Baiazetes had two sons, Orchanes surnamed Calepinus, and Mahumetes his brother, which within two yeeres slew the said Calepinus, and entred his dominion. Other attribute to Baiazetes moe sonnes, as is aboue rehearsed. Some againe do giue to Baiazetes only these two sons, Celebinus and Mustaphas; and hold that Calepinus or Celebinus had two sonnes, to wit, Orchanes and Mahumetes; and adde moreouer that the said Orchanes being somewhat yong, was slaine of his vncle Moses, who gouerned but two yeeres. For Mahumetes to reuenge his brothers death slew Moses, and inuaded his dominion. The Greeke stories make no mention at all of Orchanes,

THis Mahumetes, whether he was the son of Baiazetes, or else of Calepinus, conuerted to himselfe alone the kingdome, or tyrannie rather of the murdering Turkes. Who afflicted the Christians with sore wars within Europe, especially the countrie called Wallachia, lying not far from the floud Danubius, betweene Hungarie and Thracia. From thence he remoued into Asia, where he recouered diuers parts in Galatia, Pontus, Cappadocia, Cilicia, which before Tamerlanes had alienated from the Turkes. This Mahumetes planted his chiefe Imperial seat in Adrianople not far from Constantinople, within the countrie of Thracia. In some writers the conflict betweene Sigismund and the great Turke, wherein the Christians were so discomfited, is referred rather to this Mahumetes, then to Calepinus: of which conflict mention is aboue made in the storie of Sigismundus, page 661. ¶ Amurathes the second, 8. after Ottomannus.

Amurathes the 8. after Ottomannus.

AMurathes, as Philelphus saith, was the sonne of Celebinus, as Laonicus Chalcondiles testifieth, of Mahumetes: whose sonne soeuer he was, a wretched tyrant he was, and permitted as a scourge of God, to correct the sinnes of the Christians. In the story of Baiazetes, mention was made before of Mustaphas his sonne, who was condemned to perpetuall prison by Calepinus his brother. This Mustaphas escaping out of his brothers prison, was conueied to the Grecians, where he remained long in captiuity, till at length they vnderstanding the purpose of Amurathes, set him vp with sufficient habilliments and furniture of warre, to fight against the said Amurathes his nephew. But in conclusion, hee being not able to make his party good, came into the hands of his enemy, and had his necke broke with a bowstring, after the manner of the Turkish execution.

Mustaphas murdered by Amurathes his nephew.

The Grecians then terrified with this smitter aduersity, required truce of the Turke; but when that would not be granted, they procured vnto them Mustaphas, the other brother to Amurathes, being of the age of xiij. yeeres: who likewise being armed of the Grecians, got the citie of Nice in Bithynia, from Amurathes his brother: Albeit it was not long but he was circumuented in the same citie, and brought to Amurathes: who caused him likewise to take of the same whip, as the other Mustaphas had done before. Amurathes being now out of all feare and doubt of brethren and kinssolke to rise against him, conuerted al his power against the Grecians: and first ranging throughout Thracia, where diuers cities yeelded vnto him, which before belonged to the emperor of Constantinople, from thence he set forward to the noble and famous citie Thessalonica, being then vnder the league and protection of the Venetians. This Thessalonica is a citie in Greece, bordering vpon Macedonia, to the Citizens whereof Saint Paul writeth somewhat vnto them in his 2. Epistle, of a defection to come before the comming of the day of the Lord, 2. Thes. 2. By the which apostasie or defection, what the holy Apostle doth meane, this storie of the Turkes may easily declare. After Thessalonica was subdued, Phocis, with all the countrie about Athens, Beotia likewise, Aetolia, Acarnania, with all the region beyond Peloponesus, vnto the coast of Corinth, to whom S. Paul also wrote other two epistles, were brought in bondage and slauery vnto the Turke.

In Epyrus, and in that quarter that adioyneth to Macedonia, named Albania, raigned then one Joannes Castriotus, who perceiuing himselfe too weake to match with the Turkes power, made with the Turke this conuention, that he should haue Croia, a famous city in Grecia, and also gaue to him his three sonnes for hostages, to wit, Constantinus, Repolius, and Georgius.

In this George, such towardnesse of noble courage, such vigour of minde, and strength of body singularly did appeare, that the Turk caused him more freely to be instructed after the Turkish religion and maner in his owne court: where he being traced vp, did so shoote vp as well in feates of actiuitie, as in strength of body, that he excelled all his equals: in so much that he was named Scanderbeius, which soundeth as much as Alexander Magnus.

Georgius Scanderbeius, Alexander the great.

After this Alexander was growne vp to mature ripenesse of age, and was well trained vp in feates of warre, hee was sent out by the Turke, to warre against Caramanus of Cilicia, the Turkes enemy. In which expedition he sped himselfe most manfully, fighting hand to hand, first with a footeman of Scythia, then with an horseman of Persia, being challenged by them both to encounter, first with the one, after with the other: whom he so valiantly ouerthrew, that he wan great renowme with the Turke: In so much that he trusting to the Turks fauor, when he heard of the decease of his father, durst aske of the Turke the grant of his fathers dominion to be giuen vnto him. Which request, although Amurathes the Turke did not deny him: yet notwithstanding he perceiuing the matter to be dallied out with faire words, by subtill meanes and policy slipt out of the Turkes Court, and came to Epyrus his owne inheritance, where first by forged letters he recouered Croia. The other Cities of their voluntary minde, yeelded themselues vnto him; who then gathering vnto him the people of Epyrus and Macedonia (which were not so many in number, as with good willing minds they flucke vnto him) so manfully and valiantly behaued himselfe, that against all the puissance both of Amurathes, and also of Mahumetes, he maintained his owne, repulsed their violence, and put to flight their armies, many yeares together. But to returne againe to the course of Amurathes victories, after he had thus preuailed (as is before signified) against the East parts of Europa and Grecia, and had conuented this for the dominion of Epyrus, he inuaded Illyricum, (otherwise called now Sclauonia) containing in it Dalmatia, Croatia, Istria, and Liburnia: which countreys after he had spoyled and wasted, he continued his course

Georgius Despota prince of Seruia.

There reigned at the same time in Seruia a certaine prince named Georgius Despota, who made great sute to the Turke for truce and peace, promising to giue his daughter to marriage: for by the Turkes law they may marrie as many wiues as they lust. It was not long after Amurathes had maried the daughter of Despota, but hee contrary to his league and promise, made warre vpon Despota his father in law, and expelled him out of his kingdome, taking from him diuers cities, as Scopia, Nouomonte, Sophia, and all Mysia. Georgius himselfe fled into Hungarie, leauing behind him his sonne to defend the towne of Sinderonia. Amurathes vnderstanding of the flight of Despota his father in law, compassed the city of Sinderonia with a strong siege, which when hee in few daies had expugned, he tooke his wiues brother, sonne of Despota, and without all regard of mercy and affinity, after the barbarous tyranny of ỳ Turkes, put out his eyes, with a basen red hot set before his eyes, and after that led him about with him in derision and despite of his cowardly father. Ioannes Huniades, Uaiuoda.

In the meane time Ioannes Huniades (of whom mention was made before, pag. 662.) had got great victories against the Turkish power, and had recouered part of Seruia, and all Muldauia: against whom Amurathes the Turke, with a mightie armie, moued into Pannonia. But Huniades with the power and aide of Ladislaus king of Polonia (but specially by the power of the Lord) did soone infringe the puissance of the Turke, and gaue him the ouerthrow, recouering vnto the christians the greatest part of Seruia and Bulgaria.

Fiue victories of Iohn Huniades, against the Turke gotten in one day.

In this battell Huniades had fiue sundrie conflicts with the Turkes vpon one day, and with fiue victories put them to the worse, and toward night did so discomfit and ouerthrow the great captaine of Amurathes, called Bassa, the duke of Anatolia (which is otherwise named Asia Minor) that he slew of the Turkes that day, to the number of thirtie thousand. Amurathes, although he was not a little thereat discouraged, yet dissembling his feare, with stout countenance sent for Carambeius his principall stay and captaine, with a new power brought out of Asia, to assist him in his warres. This Carambeius, in the downes of Transiluania, Ladislaus the foresaid king of Polonie (the Lord so working) through the industrie of Ioannes Huniades, so receiued and with such celeritie oppressed him vnprouided, that all his stout and sturdie armie either was slaine downe right, or else put to flight and disparkled, Carambeius the captaine being himselfe taken prisoner in the same field.

The great Turke brought to a great distresse

These victories of Huniades stroke no little terrour to Amurathes, in so much that for distresse of mind he was ready to destroy himselfe (as some do write) but being confirmed by Helibeus Bassa his counseller, he kept himselfe within the straites of the mount Rhodope. Who then hearing that Caramannus inuaded the same time the countrie of Bithinia and Pontus in Asia: was glad to take truce with Ladislaus and Huniades vpon such conditions as they liked to make themselues: which conditions were these, that Amurathes should depart clearelie from all the region of Seruia, and should remoue from thence all his garrisons, which were placed in the castles and forts of the same: Also he should restore George Despota (which is to say) prince of Seruia vnto his possession, and set his children free, whom he had in captiuitie, and restore them to their inheritance. Item, that hee should make no more claime nor title to the countrie of Moldonia aboue mentioned, nor to that part of Bulgraria which he had lost: and that he should desist hereafter from all wrongs and iniuries against the Christians. Upon these conditions the Turke being agreed, so was truce concluded on both parts for ten yeeres, and with solemne oth betweene them confirmed.

This done, Amurathes the tyrant addresseth himselfe toward Asia, to resist the inuasion of Caramannus aforesaid. At what time pope Eugenius so soone as he heard the Turke to be returned into Asia, sendeth Iulianus Cæsarianus his cardinall (whose storie is before touched, page 615.) vnto Ladislaus the foresaid king, with full dispensation and absolution to breake his oth and league with the Turke, promising moreouer great hope of aid, if he would go in armes stoutly against the tyrant.

¶ Where by the way is to be noted, that as there is no truth of promise in that pestilent see of Rome, neither was there euer any war prospered, which was taken in hand by the popes counsell so was there neuer any counsell of the pope that brought with it more detriment to Christianitie, then this

The popes rash counsell pernitious to christendome.

But the pope belike thought, that as he might lawfully breake promise with John Hus, and with other Christians, so also he needed not to obserue any league or truce taken with the Turk: but it turned much otherwise then the popes blind braines imagined, as by the sequell is to be seene, For Ladislaus being thus excited by the vnaduised and sinister instigation of pope Eugenius, contrary to the truce stablished a little before, set out with his army from Seledinus, and so proceeding to Walachia and Burgaria, came to Uarnã, a towne of Bulgary, where he fell sicke.

Nothing prospereth that is taken in hand by the popes setting on.

The pope breaketh truce made betweene the Christians and the Turke.

It was not long but the Turk hauing thereof intelligence, left his warres begun with Caramannus in Asia, and with great iournies made haste into Europe, passing ouer by the straits neere to Callipolis; where all the Italian nauie still looking on, and whether of purpose, or whether for cowardlinesse, would not stirre one oze to stop the passage of the Turkish army. When Amurathes was come to Adrianopolis in Thracia, vsing such celeritie as no man loked for, within 8. daies he was in Burgaria, and there encamped himselfe against Ladislaus. The day of battell being set, the armies ioyned on both sides. Huniades was himselfe there present, but all the matter was ruled by Julianus the Cardinall, and the popes clergie. The fight continued three dates and three nights together, with great courage and much bloudshed on each side: insomuch that the field did stand with lakes of bloud. It seemed at the first to incline to the Christians, by breaking the first rankes of the Turkes. But the priests and prelats which were at the field (which had been more fit to haue been in the Church) seeing the Turkes to begin to flie, vnskilfully left their array to pursue the enemie, so that they leauing the other standings of the Christians naked, gaue great aduantage to the Turkes, with their darts and shot to disturbe the Christian ranks. By the which occasion, Amurathes inclosing the Christians with his army round about, obtained the victorie. In the which field, Ladislaus the young king of Polony, hauing his horse first killed vnder him, was stricken downe, and slaine. The popes bishops flying to saue themselues, fell into the marishes, and there were destroyed, sustaining a durtie death condigne to their filthie falshood and vntruth. Julianus the Cardinall, which with the pope was the chiefe doer in breaking the league, in the way was found dead, being full of wounds, and spoiled to his naked skinne. Of the rest of the army that escaped by flying, part was drowned in the marishes, some perished miserably for hunger, some for cold, watching and wandring in the woods. Huniades hardly escaped the danger, by the mercifull prouidence of God, being reserued to the further profit and commoditie of Christendome.

This John Huniades the worthy warrior was borne in Walachia, being earle of Bistrice, of all captaines that euer went against the Turks, most famous and singular, prudent in wit, discreet in counsell, expert and politike in war, prompt of hand, circumspect before he attempted, quicke in expedition: in whom wanted almost no good property requisite in a warlike captaine. Against two most mighty and fierce tyrants, Amurathes and Mahumetes, through the Lords might, hee defended all Pannonia, and therefore was called the thunderbolt and terror of the Turks. Like as Achilles was vnto the Grecians, so was he set vp of God to be as a wall or bulwarke of all Europe against the cruell Turks and enemies of Christ, and of his Christians. Neither wes there any king or prince that euer atchieued such noble victories, either so many in number, or so profitable for the publike vtility of all Europe, as did he, and that not only in the daies of this Amurathes, but also of Mahumetes his successor, as hereafter remaineth further to bee seene. This battell of Amurathes against the Christians at Uarna in Bulgaria, was fought in the yeere of our Lord, 1404.

The worthy commendation of Iohn Huniades.

Amurathes taketh his voyage against the Grecians.

Amurathes by reason of this victorious ouerthrow against the christians, surprised with no small pride, directed his iourny incontinent toward the Grecians, where Castriotus was, otherwise called Scanderbeius. And first, comming to Peloponesus, and breaking downe the wall about the straits of Corinth, encountred with the brother of the emperor of Constantinople, whom with his sudden comming he oppressed, with all the Greeks army, ere they were prouided. Paleologus the emperor after that, did build vp the wall againe: but at the Turks bidding he was compelled to vndoe it againe: which wall afterward the Uenetians did repaire. After the demolition of the wall, Amurathes entring into Peloponelus, tooke diuers townes and cities, as Cycione, and Patris, and moreouer made all the parts of Thessalia and Achaia tributaries vnto him.

Peloponesus Sycione, Patris, with all the parts of Thessalia & Achaia, brought vnder the Turke.

The nert yeere after this battell of Amurathes fought against the christians at Uarna, the Turke being now about the parts of Grecia, purposed to bend all his force and maine against the country of Epyrus belonging to Georgius Castriotus Scanderbeius. Of this Scanderbeius mention was made before, how hee was brought vp in the Turkes court, from whence we declared also how subtilly he conueied himselfe, and came to the possession of his owne patrimony of Epyrus. [b] Which Epyrus this noble and victorious Scanderbeius (whom the Lord also had raised vp the same time with Huniades to bridle the furie of the Turkes) valiantly defended against all the power of Amurathes: insomuch that he discomfited & vanquished 7. of the most expert Baßaes or dukes of the Ottoman emperor, one after another, with all their armies of most picked and chosen souldiers, dislodged them of their tents, and expulsed them vtterly out of all Epyrus. Also when Amurathes himselfe with his wholepuissance, had enuironed about the city of Croia, with cruell siege and ordinance out of measure, yet notwithstanding the said Scanderbeius (through the power and blessing of the Lord) beat him out of the field, and repulsed him from the siege.

Huniades,

Seuen captaines of the Turkes ouercome by Castriotus Scanderbeius.

Amurathes renounced his dominion, and made himselfe a Turkish monke.

After this discomfiture, the saying is, that Amurathes, to keepe his vow made before, after his victory at Varna, gaue himselfe vnto a religious order, liuing a contemplatiue life with certaine other priests ioyned vnto him, in the forest of Bithynia, renouncing the gouernment of his realme to the hands of Haly one of his princes (for thou must vnderstand, good Reader, that the Turkes also be not without their sundry sects of religion, no more then wee christians are without our friers and monks.)

Two christian warriers in Europe stirred vp of God to vanquish the Turkes.

In the meane time while Amurathes this Turkish tyrant was cloistered vp in his monkish religion, Ioannes Huniades in the kingdome of Hungarie, and Castriotus Scanderbeius in Grecia, kept great warre against the Turkes. By reason whereof Amurathes was taken againe from his monkish vow and profession, and brought againe into the field: For first Huniades had rescued the whole countrie of Hungary: and had propulsed moreouer all the might of the Turkes far from Seruia. And although the pæuish practise of Georgius prince of Seruia, had oftentimes disclosed his counsels vnto the Turkes, whereby twice hee was brought in danger, yet notwithstanding (through the Lords gratious protection) he was preserued and deliuered by the said George vnto the Hungarians againe, and after that manfully vanquished the Turkes, so that they had no resting place about those parts of Seruia and Bulgaria, so long as he liued.

This Iohn Huniades is reported of 20. battels with the Turke, to lose but two.

Epyrus and Macedonia, defended by Scanderbeius.

On the other side in Grecia, Castriotus Scanderbeius so foiled the Turke in defence of his countrie Epyrus and Macedonia, and kept Amurathes so short, that not onely he was not able to winne any great towne in all Epyrus: but also comming from Epyrus in the straites, was so intangled by Castriotus, that he was forced to giue battell: In the which battell he was so vanquished, and most part of his armie slaine, that for griefe and sorrow conceiued, he falling into a rauing sickness, was transported out of his pauilion vnto Adrianople, and there in furie and madnes died, after he had raigned 34. yeeres, which was about the yeere of our Lord 1450.

Amurathes ouercome by Scanderbeius.

This Amurathes first ordained the order of the Janizarits. Which were the men children of such Christians as he conquered and tooke captiue: whom he forced to renounce the faith of Christ, wherin they were baptized, and brought them vp in Mahumets law, and exercised them in the same feates of war as he did his own people, and after that they came to mens estate, he named them Janizari (that is to say) souldiers of a strange countrey, and made them to guard his person. They weare on their head in stead of an helmet, a white attire made of the grossest sort of woll, and in so many folds about their head, that it cannot be pierced with a sword. It hangeth downe on the backe with a taile, and before on the forehead it is garnished with gold and siluer. They were wont to vse bowes and launces in the field, but now they vse dagges as our horsemen do.

Janizari among the Turkes.

At the first institution there were but 8000. in their garrison, but now they be twice so many. This of all bondage and seruitude that the Christians suffer vnder the Turke is most intollerable, and greatly to be of all true Christians lamented. For what can godly minds behold more to their griefe, then to see their children pulled from the faith of Christ, wherein they were baptized, and by whose blood they should eternally be saued, and to be instructed and nourished with the blasphemous doctrine of Mahumet, and so be professed enemies of Christ and his church, to make war against heauen, and to perish euerlastingly? And finally, what a lamentable thing is it, to see and behold our owne children borne of our owne bodies, to become our mortall and cruell enemies, and to cut our throats with their owne hands? This seruitude of mind is far greater then death it selfe: which if our princes would well consider, it would cause them the rather to agree, and bend their whole force and power against this cruell enemie.

A lamentable slauerie of christian mens children vnder the Turke.

✻ Mahumetes second, the ninth after Ottomannus.

Mahumetes the ninth Turke after Ottomannus.

AMurathes left behind him three sonnes, Mahumetes borne of the daughter of Despota, prince of Seruia, being twentie yeeres of age, the second sonne called Turcines, the third named Calepinus. This Turcines being an infant, and but eighteene moneths old, was strangled at the commandement of the Turke, by his seruant Moses, himselfe being there present, and beholding the horrible murther. And when Moses the executor of the murther had desired him not to pollute his hands with the blood of his brother, hee answered, that it was the manner of all the Ottoman Turkes, that all the other brethren being destroyed, none should be left aliue but one to gouerne the empire. Wherefore Moses was commanded by the tyrant there presently, and in his sight, to kill the infant. This horrible fact when the mother of the child vnderstood, she crying out, and almost mad for sorrow, cursed the tyrant to his face. But he to mitigate the rage of his mother, at her request, being desirous to be reuenged vpon the executor of her sonnes death, deliuered the said Moses bound into her hands, who then in the presence of the tyrant, thrust him to the heart with a knife, and opening his side tooke out his liuer, and threw it to the dogges to be deuoured.

The tyranny of Mahumetes in murthering his brethren.

The third son called Calepinus, which was but fiue months old, the foresaid Amurathes his father commended to the custodie of Halibassa one of his nobles, who to gratifie and please the tyrant, betraied the infant, and brought him vnto him, and thereupon he at the tyrants commandement was strangled. Some affirme, that in stead of Calepinus, another child was offered vnto the tyrant, and that Calepinus was conueied to Constantinople, and after the taking of Constantinople, was carried to Uenice, and then to Rome to pope Calixt, where he was baptized, and afterward came into Germanie to Frederike the emperor, and there was honorablie entertained, and kept in Austrich during his life. Where note how the mercifull prouidence of God, whom he list to saue, can fetch out of the diuels mouth. And note moreouer touching the foresaid Halibassa the betrayer of the infant, how he escaped not vnreuenged: For Mahumet vnderstanding him to be a man of great substance & riches, through forging of false crimes, with great torments put him to death to haue his riches: for this tyrant was giuen to insatiable auarice. Thus this bloudy Mahumet began his regiment with horrible murther, after the example of other cursed tyrants his predecessors.

Halibassa a traitor to his master.

Horrible parricide of the abominable Turk.

Gods prouidence can fetch out of the diuels mouth whom he list to saue.

Note here Gods punishment vpon the betrayer of innocent bloud.

Although this Mahumet, notwithstanding that he came of a Christian mother, being the daughter of Despota prince of Seruia, and by her was brought vp and instructed from his childhod in the precepts of Christian religion and manners, yet he some forgetting all, gaue himselfe to Mahumets religion, and yet so, that hee being addicted to neither religio, became an Atheist, beleeuing and worshipping no God at all, but only the goddesse of good fortune, striuing and mocking the minds and iudgements of men, which beleeue that God by his prouidence, gouerneth and regardeth the state of humain things on earth.

After that this Mahumet heard of the victories and conquests of other his predecessors, and had vnderstanding how Baiazetes lay eight yeeres about Constantinople, and could not win it: he displaying Baiazets, and disdaining that so long time should be spent about the siege thereof, and yet no victory gotten, bent all his studie and deuice how to subdue the same. But first hauing a priuie hatred against the Citie of Athens, and hauing his hands lately imbrued with the blood of his brethren, this murthering Mahumet first of all taketh his voiage to subuert and destroy the citie aforesaid, being a famous Schole of all good learning and discipline. Against the which citie he did so furiously rage for the hatred of good letters, that he thought he ought not to suffer the foundation thereof to stand, because that city was a good nurse and kokerer of good Arts & Sciences: wherefore, he commaunded the citie to be raced and vtterly subuerted: and whersoeuer any monuments or bookes could bee found, he caused them to be cast into durty sinkes and the filthiest places of the citie, or put to the most vile vses that could be deuised, for extirping and abolishing of all good literature; and if he vnderstood any to lament the case, and ruine of that noble place, those hee greeuously punished and put to death.

Mahumet first setteth vpon Athens.

Athens destroyed.

Thus the famous and auncient Schole of Athens being destroied and ouerthrowne, he returned his army and power into Thracia, where in all haste he gathering his power together both by sea & by land, with a mighty multitude compassed the citie of Constantinople about, and began to lay his siege against it, in the yeare of our Lord 1453. and in the 54. day of the said siege it was taken, sacked, and the Emperour Constantinus slaine. As touching the cruelty and fiercenesse of the Turkes in getting of this citie, and what slaughter there was of men, and women, and children, what calamitie and misery was there to be seene, forsomuch as sufficient relation, with a full description thereof, hath beene made before, pag. 651. it shall be superfluous now to repeate the same. This only is not to be omitted touching three principall causes of the ouerthrow of this citie: whereof the first was the filthy auarice of those Citizens, which hiding their treasures in the ground, would not imploy the same to the necessary defence of their city. For so I find it in story expressed, that when the Turke, after the taking of the citie, had found not so much treasure as he looked for, suspecting with himselfe (as the truth was) the treasures & riches to be hidden vnder the ground, commanded the earth to be digged vp, and the foundations of the houses to be searched: where when hee had found treasures incredible, What (quoth hee) how could it be that this place could euer lacke munition and fortification, which did flow and abound with such great riches as heere is, and plenty of

of all things: The second cause was the absence of the nauie of the Uenetians, which if they had beene ready in time, might haue beene a safegard against the inuasion of the enemies. A third cause also may be gathered vpon occasion incident in stories, either for that the citie of Constantinople fiftéene yéeres before did yéeld to the bishop of Rome, as is before to bee séene pag. 644. or else because (as in some writers it is euident) that images were there receiued and maintained in their churches, and by the Turkes the same time destroyed.

Vide supra pag. 644.

Ex Ramo, An image of the Crucifixe in Constantinople.

Ioannes Ramus writing of the destruction of this citie, amongst other matters maketh relation of the image of the Crucifixe, being there in the high temple of Sophia; which image the Turke tooke, and writing this superscription vpon the head of it: Hic est Christianorum Deus. i. This is the God of the christians, gaue it to his souldiers to bee scorned, and commanding the said image with a trumpet to be caried through all his army, made euery man to spit at it most contumeliously. Wherein thou hast (good Reader) by the way to note, what occasion of slander and offence wee christians giue vnto the barbarous Infidels by this our vngodly superstition, in hauing images in our temples, contrary vnto the expresse commandement of God in his word. For if saint Paul writing to the Corinthians, saith: We know Christ now no more after the flesh: how much lesse then is Christ to bee knowne of vs in blind stockes and images set vp in our temples, seruing for none other purpose, but for the Infidels to laugh both vs and our God to scorne, and to prouoke Gods vengeance: which by the like example (I feare) may also fall vpon other cities, where such images and Idolatrous superstition is maintained; whereof God grant Uienna to take heede betime, which hath beene so long, and yet is in such great danger of the Turke, and polluted with so many images, and plaine Idolatry.

What offences be giuen to the Infidels, by images in christian churches.

Uienna admonished.

In summa, to make the storie short, such was the cruelty of these Turkes in winning the city, that when Mahomet had giuen licence to the souldiers three daies together, to spoile, to kill, and to doe whatsoeuer they lusted, there was no corner in all Constantinople, which did not either flow with christian blood, or else was polluted with abominable abusing of maides, wiues and matrones, without all reuerence of nature. Of the which citizens, some they murthered, some they rosted vpon spits, of some they fleyed off their skin, hanging them vp to consume with famine, of othersome they put salt into their wounds, the more terrible to torment them, in so much, that one of them contended with another who could deuise most strange kinds of new torments and punishments, exercising such cruelties vpon them, that the place where the citie was before, séemed now to be no citie, but a slaughter house or shambles of Christian mens bodies. Among the dead bodies, the bodie also of Constantine the emperour was found; whose head being brought to Mahumet, hée commanded to be carried vpon a speare through the whole citie for a publike spectacle and derision to all the Turkish armie. And because he would diminish the number of the captiues, which séemed to him to be verie great, he neuer rose from his table, but hée put euerie day some of the nobles to death, no lesse to fill his cruell mind with blod, then his bodie was filled with wine: which he vsed so long to doe as any of the nobles of that citie was left aliue: And of the other sort also, as the stories doe credible report, there passed no day, in the which he did not orderlie slay more then three hundred persons, the residue he gaue to his rascall souldiers to kill, and to doe with them what they would. Where is to be noted, that as Constantinus the sonne of Helena was the first emperour of Constantinople, so Constantinus the sonne also of Helena, was the last emperour thereof.

The bloodie cruelltie of the Turke against the christian captiues.

Not farre from the said citie of Constantinople, there was another little citie called Pera, and once called Gallatia, situated by the sea side: who hearing of the miserable destruction of Constantinople, and séeing the citie flaming with fire, sent certaine of the chiefe men with spéed to Mahumet, declaring vnto him that they neither had sent any helpe to the citie of Constantinople, neither yet wrought any detriment to anie of his armie: wherefore they desired and prayed him, that as they would gladlie yéeld vnto him, so he would be fauourable vnto them and spare them, and not to punish the guiltlesse with the guiltie. Mahumet although he was not ignorant that for feare, rather then of any good will, they submitted themselues, and that they would rather resist him if they had bèen able, yet he receiued for that time, the submission of the messengers: but sending with them his ambassadour into the citie, he commanded also his armie to follow withall, and to enter with him into the citie, which, although it was greatly suspected and misliked of the citizens, yet they durst no otherwise doe, but suffer them to enter: which being done, the ambassadour gaue a signe to the souldiours, euerie man to doe what soeuer he was bidden: of whom, some ran to the wals, some to the temples and churches, some to the stréetes and houses of the citie, plucking all things downe to the ground, sacking and ranging with no lesse furie and abominable filthinesse, then they had done at Constantinople before, sauing only that they abstained from murther: but the same day letters came from Mahumet to the Ambassadour, that hee should spare none, but destroy and murther all that euer were in the citie: which message because it seemed to the Ambassador to bee too cruell, forsomuch as they had yéelded themselues, he staied his hand a little vntill night came. In the meane time, drunken Mahumet comming something to himselfe (whom drunkennes had before ouercome) sent his second letters to reuoke the first. VVhere againe is to be noted the mercifull prouidence of God towards his people in their deserued plagues, by staying the hands, and bridling the fury many times of their enemies, when otherwise the case seemeth to be past all remedie.

Mahumet thus being in himselfe not a little aduanced and eleuated by the winning of Constantinople, where he had now made the imperiall seat of the Turkish dominion, the third yéere next following, to aduenture more matteries, he set out to the siege of Belgradum, a citie of Hungarie, lying nére to the banks of Danubius, thinking to haue the like successe there, as hee had in the winning of Constantinople, albeit through the Lords disposing, it fell out much otherwise. Within the Citie of Belgradum the same time of the siege thereof, was Ioannes Huniades, the valiant captaine, of whom in diuers places mention hath bèen made before, who with a sufficient strength of picked souldiers, albeit in number nothing equall to the Turks army, valiantly defended ꝑ city with great courage, and no lesse successe. In the which siege great diligence was bestowed, and many of the Turks slaine. Among whom also Mahumet himselfe being strucken with a pellet vnder the left arme, was faine to bee caried out of the field for half dead, and the rest so put to flight, that of the Turks the same time were destroyed to the number, or not much vnder the number of 40. thousand, besides the losse of all their ordinance, which the Turks in hast of their flight, were forced to leaue behind them.

40000. Turks slaine at the siege of Belgradum.

Hieronymus Zieglerus writing of the siege of this Belgradum, addeth moreouer, that when Mahumet was at the siege thereof, séeing the towne to be so smal and weak of it selfe, that it could not be won with al his great multitude, he staring and faring like a mad man, commanded al his brasen péeces to to bee laid, to batter downe the walles and towers of the towne: So that the Christians within the walles were vehemently distressed, for the siege continued both night and day without intermission. Among the rest of the Christians which defended the towne, Hieronymus Zieglerus maketh mention of a certaine Bohemian, much worthie of his condigne commendation: Who being vpon the walles, and séeing a Turke with a banner or ensigne of the Turkes to bee gotten vp, by the sight whereof the whole towne was in danger to be conquered and taken, runneth vnto the Turke, and clasping him about the middle, speaking to Iohn Capistranus standing beloW, asking him, whether it were any danger of damnation to him, if he of his voluntary mind, did cast himselfe with that dogge (so he termed him) downe headlong from the wall to be slaine with him: what should become of his soule, and whether he might be saued or not: To whom when the other had answered, that hee should be saued without doubt, hée eftsones tumbleth himselfe with the Turke, downe of the wall, where by his death he saued the same time, the life of all the Citie. Mahumet being so wounded and in despaire of winning the Citie, was caried (as ye heard) out of the field. Who at length comming againe to himselfe, partly for feare and partly for shame, was ready to kill himselfe. And thus was the towne of Belgradum at that time rescued through Gods prouidence, by the meanes of Ioannes Huniades and this good Bohemian.

The towne of Belgradum valiantly defended from the Turke.

This siege of Belgradum began in the yeare of our Lord, 1456. and endured 46. daies. At the which siege were numbred of the Turkes 200. thousand. Of whom more then 40. thousand (as is aforelaid) were slaine: where the victorie fell to the Christians through the prosperous successe giuen of God to Ioannes Huniades, and Capistranus. Which Huniades not long after the said victory, through the importune labour & trauaile in defending the said towne, was taken with a sore sickenes & thereof departed, to whose valiant prowesse and singular courage, stories do giue great laud and commendation.

200. thousand Turkes at the siege of Belgradum.

The decease of Ioannes Huniades.

Mahumetes the Turke after this done in Europe, returned into Asia to warre with Usumcassanes a Persian, one of the Turkes stocke, with whom he had three battailes. The first was about the Riuer Euphrates, where the Turke lost tenne thousand men, and was put to the worse. In the second field likewise he was discomfited. The third battaile was at Arsenga, where through the terrible noise of the brasen peeces the Persian horses disturbed the Campe, and so was Usumcassanes ouercome.

The Turkes warre against Usumcassanes.

The Turke again returned against the Christians.

From thence the Turk reduced againe his power against the Christians, and first subdued vnto him Synope and all Paphlagonia: Also the kingdome of Trapezunce, which he besieging both by land and water, wanne from the Christians, and sent Dauid the king of the same with his two sonnes and Calus his vncle, vnto Constantinople, where they were miserably and cruelly put to death, and all the stocke of the Connent, which were of the kings stocke, by the Turke were destroyed. Which was about the yeare of our Lord, 1459. at which time this this mischieuous Mahomet was first saluted emperor.

Corinthus, Mitylene, Lesbos, Lemnus subdued of the Turke.

Not long after, he got from the Grecians Corinthus and Mitylene, not without great slaughter of christian men: insomuch that the whole citie of Mitylene was vtterly to the ground almost destroyed. The iles also of Lemnus and Lesbos he wanne from the Venetians: in the which iland of Lesbos is the citie of Mitylene aforesaid.

Not farre from this ile of Lesbos and Mitylene, there is a countrie in Asia toward the sea side bordering next to Europe, called Mysia, or of some called Moesia, wherein stood the citie of Troy. This countrie Mahomet coueting to winne rather by policie and falshood, then by doubtfull danger of warre, secretly sent for the prince thereof to come to speake with him for certaine causes (as hee pretended) which should concerne the profit and commoditie of them both. Which when the king of Mysia, either for shame would not, or for feare durst not denie, he came to him as to conferre vpon necessarie affaires in common to them appertaining. Mahomet when he had brought that to passe which he would, he caused the king to bee apprehended, and cruelly to bee slaine, or rather torne in peeces: and so inuading the land of Mysia, exercised the like tyrannie vpon all his kindred and affinitie.

The falshood of the wretched Turke against the prince of Mysia.

The cruelty of the Turke against the king of Mysia.

This Mysia by fraud being taken and lost, Mahomet flieth againe toward Europe, where hee assailed the iland Euboia, otherwise called Nigroponte, making a bridge of a maruellous frame ouer the sea Euripus, to conuey ouer his armie out of Grecia, and there laid his siege to the citie Chalcis, which at length in thirtie daies he ouercame, not without a great slaughter of his armie: who in the siege thereof is said to haue lost 40. thousand of the Turkes. But the slaughter of the christians was greater: for when the citie was wonne, the tyrant commanded most cruelly, none to be spared within the whole citie, but to be put to the sword, whosoeuer was aboue the age of twentie yeeres. This cruelty was shewed of the barbarous tyrant for anger and furie, because such a number of his Turkes were slaine at the siege thereof, being reckoned (as is said) to 40. thousand. In the fierce siege of this citie, it is memorable that is in stories recorded, how that the women of that citie, seeing the men to beginne to faint, and the citie to lie in present danger, tooke the matter themselues in hand, and playing the men, went to the walles, and there defended the citie with no lesse trouble to the enemy, then the men had before done, and so for a space continued, so long as any mans strength and diligence could do any good. A great cause of the losse of this citie and Iland, is imputed to the cowardly timiditie of the Venetians naue: who being there present, and hauing prosperous winde, yet durst not, or would not aduenture vpon the Turkes bridge, which if they had done, the Iland of Euboia and Chalcis, had not so soone been ouermatched of the Turkes.

Thus all the East parts of Grecia being subdued to the Turkish tyrant, with all Achaia, Attica, Acarnania, and Euboia, shortly after followed also Peloponesus, brought in like subiection to the Turke. Within this Peloponesus were these prouinces contained, Achaia, Messenia, Laconia, Argolica and Archadia, &c. The Venetians in this Peloponesus had great possessions, and had made vp the wall againe toward the sea side, neare to the straites of Corinth before mentioned, where for the more speed of the worke, they had thirtie thousand workmen to the building thereof: which when it came to the knowledge of the Turke, he brast into the countrie of Peloponesus with an armie of eightie thousand, and first wasting the regions of the Corcyreans, and Methoncans, and making a great slaughter of the Venetians, in short time hee brought the whole dominion of Peloponesus vnder his yoke and tribute.

Peloponesus, Achaia, Messenia, Laconia, Argolica, Archadia, christian prouinces in Grecia, subdued of the Turke.

Long it is and more lamentable to recite all the victories of this Mahumet gotten against the christians both by land and sea: who after he had ouercome the Ile Lesbos aboue mentioned, and had cruelly slaine Nicolaus Catalusius the prince thereof, turning his armie toward the sea of Pontus Euxinus, got the countrie of Capha from the Genuans. Before was declared how truce was taken betweene Georgius Scanderbeius, and the Turke for ten yeres: which truce being expired, Mahumet leaueth no time vnspent, no diligence vnsought, but maketh all his power to Epyrus and Albania, which he after long fatigation of siege, at length ouercame and subdued. In the which tract also he wanne from the Venetians, Scodra, Lyssen and Dinastrum. Notwithstanding, when Scanderbeius the valiant captaine had done against the Turk what in mans strength did lie, yet being ouermatched with power and multitude, seeing no possibilitie to make his partis good, was forced to depart his countrie as an exile, and went to Italie, and there being sent for by the popes letters, openly declared not to be possible otherwise to resist the furious rage of the barbarous Turkes by the strength of any one king or prince, vnlesse all Europe, with one consent should ioyne their power and force together. And thus Georgius Scanderbeius a man of puissant courage, being driuen out of his countrie, continued his age in exile. Whose courage and vehemencie is reported to haue been such; that in fighting against the barbarous enemie, for verie eagernesse of spirit, his blod was sceene to burst out of his lips. It is testified also of him, that being prouoked, hee neither denied to fight, and in his fighting, neuer turned his backe, neither yet was euer wounded, but onelie once with a light shaft in his foot, neither euer set against the Turke with moe then 6000. horsemen, and 3000. footemen: who is said with his owne hand to haue slaine aboue 2000. Turkes, whom with such violence hee did strike, that many of them he did cleaue asunder from the head to the middle.

A notable example of singular courage in a captaine.

The commendation of Scanderbeius against the Turkes.

Neither yet was the insatiable greedinesse of this Turkish helhound with all this satisfied, but still he conceiued greater things in his mind, thinking to conquere the whole world, and so passing forward towards Europe, subdued all Illyria, slaying Stephanus the king of Bosna, about the yeere of our Lord 1463. But afterward Matthias Coruinus, the sonne of Huniades afore mentioned, recouered againe the said kingdome of Bosna, with many other cities nere vnto Croatia and Dalmatia, and moreouer repulsed Mahumet the Turke in his second siege of Jaitza, taking his tents and munitions left behind him.

Matthias the son of Huniades.

Moreouer, the said Mahumet passing vnto Walachia, set vpon Dracula the prince thereof; which Dracula, although hee had no great power of souldiers, yet he so inclosed and enuironned the Turke, that he had almost lost his whole armie, of whom a great part notwithstanding was destroyed, and many of his ensignes taken. Into Dalmatia was sent two captaines of the Turke, who fighting against the prouinces of the Venetians, made great spoile and wast about the regions of Stiria and Carinthia: where also the Venetian power was discomfited, and Hieronymus Nouell their captaine slaine. At length truce was taken betweene the Turke and the Venetians, vpon this condition, that Scodra, Tenarus, and Lemnus should be yelded vnto him, and that they should pay to him yerely 8. thousand duckets for the free passage of their merchants.

Stiria and Carinthia taken of the Turke.

After this peace concluded with the Venetians, Mahumet himselfe saileth ouer into Asia, sending two of his great captaines abroad to sundrie places: of whom, Mesithes was sent against the Rhodes with a mightie naue. The other called Acomates Balla was sent into Italie to take Rome and all the West Empire. Concerning the voiage of which two captaines, this was the euent, that Mesithes after his great trauell and bloudie siege against the Rhodians, was faine to retire at length with great shame and losse. The other captaine Acomates (as is said) was sent into Italy, with a naue of a hundred ships, and fifteene thousand men, who by the way in his sailing got Leucadia (which now they call S. Maure) Cephalenia, and Zacynthus, and sayling by Fauelona, arriued in Apulia, and so passing along by the sea side, spoiled and wasted diuers parts by the coast, till at length he came to Hydruntum a citie of Calabria in Italy, which after long siege he ouercame and subdued, and brought such a terrour into all Italy, that the Pope forgetting all other things, yet mindfull of himselfe, with all haste fled out of Rome. After the Citie of Hydruntum was taken, and the Turks placed in the same, which was the yeare of our Lord 1481. Matthias Coruinus Huniades son was sent for by the Italians, to set vpon the said citie: vnto the rescue whereof, when Acomates was about to make his returne with 25. thousand Turks, in the mean time newes came that Mahumet the great Turke was dead; by reason whereof the siege brake vp, & the citie was deliuered to the Italians againe, and so was Italy deliuered at that time out of that present perill and danger. This Mahumet wan from the Christians 200. cities and twelue kingdomes, and two Empires, which he ioyned both together. He died in the yeare aboueslad, an. 1481.

✠ Baiazetes second, the 10. after Ottomanus.

MAhumetes aforesaid had three sonnes; of the which, Mustapha the eldest, through voluptuousnesse and carnall lust, died before his father. The other two were Baiazetes and Demes, otherwise called Zizimus. About whom, great controuersie arose amongst the Turkes, which of them should succéede in their fathers kingdome: For neither of them was present at Constantinople when Mahumetes died: Baiazetes being in Cappadocia, and Demes in Lycaonia; wherefore when great dissension was among the nobles for the succession, and great strife and bloudshed for the matter, the Janizarites, which were the Turkes garde, did proclaime Baiazetes Emperour: others in the absence of Baiazetes the father, did choose Corcuthus his sonne. Baiazetes the father comming at length from Cappadocia, partly through yeelding, partly by corrupting with mony, got ỳ wils of the Janizarites, and was made Emperor. Demes the other brother being in Lycaonia more neare, although he made no lesse speede in his comming, yet was preuented of Baiazetes, and excluded out of Constantinople. Wherfore he being put backe from all hope of his kingdome, incited by some of his friends, moued war against his brother, who being ouercome in three battailes by Acomates Baiazetes captain, who had got Hydruntum before, did flie to the great maister of the Rhodes, leauing in a place called Carræ, his mother and two yong children, whom Baiazetes slue.

This Gemes being with the maister of the Rhodes, was desired first of pope Innocent the 4. then of Ludouicus the 2. French king, but especially of Matthias Coruinus, king of Hungarie intending by him to obtaine great victorie against Baiazetes. But in conclusion the knights of the Rhodes sent him to the bishop of Rome, where hee being kept, and afterwards sent to Charles the 8. French king, for an hostage of pope Alexander the 6. was poysoned by the way at Terracina, by the said pope Alexander, as is before declared. After whose death Baiazetes, to requite the foresaid Acomates for his good seruice, put him to the halter, partly misdoubting his power, partly for lucre sake to haue his treasure: Whose death redounded to the great profit of the christians, forsomuch as hee was euer an vtter enemie to the religion and name of Christ.

Reade before pag. 674.

False treason worthily recompensed.

Baiazetes thus being confirmed in his tyrannie, made his first expedition against Wallachia, wher he subdued two great forts, one called Lithoscomus, the other called Moncastrum. From thence he remoued his power, taking his voyage into Asia, thinking to be reuenged of the Sultane of Egypt, which had succoured and entertained before his Brother Gemes against him; where he lost two great battels, the one fought at Adena, the other at Tarsus: but especially at the field at Tarsus the armie of the Turke tooke such a wound, that of a hundred thousand brought into the field, scarce the third part remained vnslaine. But as touching the Rhodians, although they were succourers of Gemes aforesaid, yet Baiazetes (whether for feare, or for subtiltie, abstained to prouoke them with war, but rather entred with them the league of peace; requiring the maister of the Rhodes to keepe his brother safe vnder his custodie, promising for his yeerly salary, to be payed vnto him euery yeere in the moneth of August, 45000. duckets.

Lithoscomus, Moncastrum, christian forts subdued of the Turke.

The Turke ouerthrowne at Tarsus.

Thus Baiazetes being ouerthrowne and terrified with euill lucke fighting against the Sultane of Egypt, remoued from Asia, and directed his armie into Europe, where hee got Dyrrachium neere vnto Uelona, and had a great victorie ouer the christian armie in the countrie of Croatia, where the Illyrians, Pannonians and Croatians ioyning their power together encountred with the Turke and lost the field, about the yeere of our Lord 1493.

Dyrrachium taken of the Turke.

From thence the Turke leading his army against the Uenetians had with them diuers and doubtfull conflicts, where the Turke sometimes was put to the worse, and sometimes again preuailing, out of Jadra and diuers other cities about Dalmatia, caried away great multitudes of christians into captiuitie, which was about the yeare of our Lord 1498.

The Turke against the Uenetians.

The christians carried away captiues.

Two yeeres after this, which was the yeere of our Lord 1500. Baiazetes with 150. M. armed men, entred into Peloponesus; which although Mahumet had expugned before, yet the Uenetians had defended Methone, otherwise called Modon, all this while against the Turkes. Which Methone the Turke besieged with three armies, hauing about the wals fiue hundred great brasen canons, whereof twentie two were most violent and hurtfull, wherewith he battered the citie both day and night: but the citizens, which were within the citie, committing themselues to God, defended their citie as well as they could, rather chusing to die then to yeeld vnto the Turks tyrannie. But the Turke preuailing, and they not able to withstand the siege, the christians conuented together into a certaine house prepared for the purpose, both men, women and children; where they setting the house on fire, gaue themselues rather to bee burned, then to come into the tyrants hands. Certain women also with their children, cast themselues headlong into the sea, by that means to auoid the Turkish captiuitie. Some writers there be which affirme that the Methonians, seeing fiue great ships of the Uenetians comming with men and victuals toward them, issued downe from the wals to the sea side to receiue them; which were all taken captiues, being aboue the number of a thousand: which all being tied with long ropes, were brought before the tyrant, and in his sight were cruelly slaine except certaine nobles, whom Cherseogles, son in law to Baiazetes, got to be pardoned, amongst whom was Andreas Gritto. The citie of Coron, and also Pilus, cities in Greece being terrified with the example of the Methonians, yeelded themselues to the power of the Turkes. Crisseum otherwise called Caput Sancti Galli, was expugned by Cherseogles, by force of guns.

Methone taken of the Turkes, and miserablie destroyed.

Coron, Pilus, Crisseum yeelded to the Turkes.

These things thus atchieued, although Baiazetes went away victor vnto Constantinople, yet notwithstanding the Uenetians, through the help of the kings of France and Spaine, had won from the Turke Chephalenia an Iland very commodious for their trafficke: Also had gotten other two Ilands, Leucas and Nericus, otherwise called Sancta Maura, slaying all the garrison of the Turkes. But afterward peace being taken betweene the Uenetians and the Turkes, by the counsell of Andreas Gritto aforesaid, the Turkes so agreed, that Leucas and Nericus the Ilands abouesaid, should be rendred vnto the Turkes, and the Uenetians should keepe still the possession of Chephalenia.

Chephalenia, Leucas, Nericus, Ilands recouered of the Turkes by the Uenetians.

Truce between the Uenetians and the Turke.

Vnto this league the Turke did the rather condescend, for that he had to maintaine warre against Ismael Sophus in Asia, king of Persia: Which Sophus was stirred vp by Gods prouidence to warre with this Baiazetes, whereby the Christian Churches in Europe might haue some breathing time, and freedome from the Turks cruell tyrannie and bloudshed. This Sophus was a valiant Turke, who with great power and victories had ouerrunne a great compasse of the East parts of Asia: then passing from Assyria into Media, and returning againe into Armenia, he made warre against the Albanians, Hiberians, and Scythians, and from thence comming vnto Asia Minor, encountred with Corcuthus Baiazetes son, and afterward comming to Bithynia, fought with Caragius Bassa, Baiazets captaine, whom hee ouercame and put to flight, and afterward tooke him aliue and his wife prisoners. Afterward hee was encountred by Haliballa another captaine of the Turks, whom Techelles one of the said Sophus captaines meeting in the plaine of Galatia did withstand, and so by the way slue Caragius the captaine, and hanged him vpon a pole in the sight of Haliballa; which Haliballa shortly after was slaine in war, and his army scattered and put to flight.

War betweene Sophus and Baiazetes.

Haliballa the Turks captain slaine.

Thus through the admirable example of Gods iustice and prouidence, were these Turkes kept occupied, and so came it to passe, that these Barbarians being blasphemous against the sonne of God, should thus horriblie run one to the destruction of another, being worthily punished with mutuall slaughter and bloudshed for their impietie and blasphemy against Christ and his religion, whereby in the meane time some rest was giuen to the Christians.

Rest giuen to the Christians, by the discord of the Turks.

Baiazetes partly by these victories discouraged, partly diseased and languishing of the gout, and partly also broken with age, finding himselfe vnweldie to the regiment of that tumultuous kingdome, began to haue talke with his nobles about the chusing of one to succeede him. The occasion whereof ministred much matter of inward warres amongst the Turks. This Baiazetes had in all 6. sonnes, whereof three died before him, and three yet were left aliue, to wit, Acomates, Corcuthus and Zelymus: Baiazetes himselfe had most mind to Acomates, but the chiefest of his nobles did fauor rather Zelymus: who through their tratterous incitation prouoked him to stirre warre against his father: and notwithstanding that he was ouercome in warre, yet through intercession he was reconciled againe to his father, and afterward proclaimed againe Emperour against his fathers will, through the helpe and fauour of the souldiers, entring the first beginning of his kingdom, with the murthering of his owne father. The story whereof in some authors is thus declared.

Zelymus made emperour against his fathers will.

After that the Janizarites had perswaded with Baiazetes, for that he himselfe was vnweldy, therfore he should do well to constitute some successor, and that he had assigned Acomates to succeede him, the Janizarites being offended with the said Acomates, because he would not enlarge their stipends and bribe them, compassing about the kings palace with their priuy swords which they had vnder their garments, with a mighty crie, required Zelymus to be appointed for their Emperor. Vnto whom when Baiazetes had answered, that he had assigned Acomates, they refused him, because he was fat, grosse and vnable thereunto: but needes would haue Zelymus, which was stout and warlike, to bee made Emperour: and withall drew out their swords, crying Zelymus, Zelymus. Then Baiazetes giuing place to their fury, shewed himselfe content to giue them Zelymus: whom the Janizarites receiuing, brought him into the palace: vnto whom Baiazetes his father giuing place, willed him not to be so hastie and furious in his doings, but to be modest and take heede what he did, and not to follow his fury but to giue place vnto time, which reueleth all things, and thinke himselfe to be a man subiect to dangers and iopardies as other men are: and thus speaking, he resigned his imperiall throne and seat vnto him, and went away all heauy, entring into a certain order of their religion. Whereupon followed great exclamations of the people saluting Zelymus as Emperor. Who then taking the rule vpon him, began with great cruelty to gouerne, destroying many of his Nobles, such as had stood against him, some with poyson, some by other cruel means, and aduancing his owne side with great honors and promotions.

What these Janizarites were, read pag. 681.

The counsell of Baiazetes to his sonne Zelymus.

Not long after that Zelymus was thus setled in his kingdome, Baiazetes his father intending to see and proue how he behaued himselfe in his gouernment, first entred into the treasure house, where he found all his riches to be scattered and gone. Afterward he came into his armorie, where all the spoiles gotten by warre were likewise wasted: then entring into the iewell house, where all his plate and gifts sent from Kings and Princes were kept, which likewise were dispearsed and giuen away. At length he came into the stable, where also he seeing his principall horses to be lacking, sighing with himselfe, & crying vengeance vpon him, he prepared himselfe with the residue of the treasure which was remaining, to saile ouer into Natolia vnto his eldest sonne, and passing by an Orchard neare to the sea side, where he had appointed to take ship, in the meane time whilest the ships were in furnishing he sate down vnder a tree, and began to curse his sonne, and to aske vengeance ance vpon him, for that he had so despised his father and was become so impious a wretch.

Zelymus vnderstanding of his fathers departure, came into the orchard where his father was, seeming to be very heauie, and much lamenting that his father would so priuilie depart and go away, seeing that he desired not the gouernment of the Empire, but was contented only with the title thereof. O father (said he) doe not thus priuilie depart away: do not procure this shame to your sonne, who so tenderlie loueth you. Let me haue but the name onelie, and be you the Emperour indeed. The end of your naturall life most patientlie I shall expect, which I pray God may long continue. And thus vsing many faire & flattering words to his father, he commanded a banquet with many daintie iunkets to be brought vnto him, but tempered and infected with poyson. Which assone as Baiazetes had begun to taste of, and felt the strength of the poyson working in his bodie, he tooke his last farewell of his sonne, and going out of the citie accompanied with a great retinue of men yelling and crying out in the streetes, in the middle of his iourney fell downe and miserablie died, in the yeare of our Lord, 1512. Here mayst thou see, good Reader, a cursed brood of this Turkish generation, where the father dieth in cursing the sonne, and the sonne raigneth by poysoning his father.

Zelymus the 11 after Ottomannus.

AFter that this wretched Zelymus had exercised his barbarous crueltie vpon his father, with like impietie he seeketh the destruction of his brethren and their children, first beginning his murther with the fiue children his nephewes, which were the sonnes of his three brethren before departed. Which done, then remained his other two brethren yet aliue, Acomates and Corchutus with their children, likewise to be destroyed. Of whom the one had three sons, whom the father sent to Zelymus his brother, and their vncle, with faire and gentle words to entreat him to be good vnto their father, offering to him their dutie and seruice in all things, honouring him also as Emperour. But cruell Zelymus commanded forthwith his said Nephewes to be strangled. The father hearing of the cruell murther of his sonnes, leauing house and home, went and hid himselfe in mountains, where he liued for a space with hearbes and wild honie, but being bewraied by one of his men, was brought to Zelymus, and so was strangled.

The crueltie of Zelymus against his father and his brethren.

The crueltie of Zelymus against his cosens.

Ex Christ. Rich.

Christopherus Richerius, writing of these matters, seemeth something to differ from other stories, and saith, that Zelymus after the death of his brother Corchutus, came to Bursia, where he, vnder the colour of making a great triumph, ordeined a feast for his friends and kinsfolke, whereunto were called especiallie his nephewes: who then at the end of the feast calling his nephewes aside (as vnder the pretence of conferring with them secretlie about his necessarie affaires) committed them to his seruants to be strangled & put to death. All this while Acomates his other brother, through the helpe and instruction of his mother, was kept out of the tyrants hands, till at length, after great labour and search made how to get him, certaine forged letters were cast abroad, wherein was contained that Acomates, to reuenge the great impietie and subdue the tyrannie of Zelymus his brother, should shew himselfe abroad. Which if he would doe, he should find friends enow to take his part. Acomates circumuented with these subtill traines, partly for hope of reuengement, partly for desire of the Empire, shewed himselfe abroad with such power and strength as he had: who being set vpon incontinent by Zelymus his brother, was ouercome in battell, and falling from his horse, being a man corpulent and grosse, and his horse falling vpon him, was so ouerpressed and slaine.

Zelymus the Turke warreth against his brother.

Touching the death of this Acomates, Munsterus somewhat differing from this narration, addeth moreouer & saith, that he was not killed with the fall from his horse, but sitting all dismaied vpon a stone, and seeing no other remedie but death, desired the Captaine, taking his rings from his fingers, to deliuer the same to his brother, desiring him that hee might not be put to any extreme crueltie of death, but that he gentlie would suffer him to be let bloud in the bath, and so to die. But Zelymus being not ignorant of this, suborneth priuie tormenters, who binding his hands behind him, with their feet cast him downe vpon the ground, and so twiring his neck with a corde, did strangle him. This Acomates had two sons, who hearing of the death of their father, did flie for succour, the one to Sophus in Persia, and the other to the Sultane in Egypt.

The crueltie of Zelymus against his brother. The two sons of Acomates fly away from the tyrannie of Zelymus the Turke.

By the meanes whereof, new occasion of warre grew vnto Zelymus, whereby he was kept in Asia, at home, to fight against the Persians and Egyptians: so that through the lords prouidence, Christendome by that meanes was deliuered from great danger and perill of the Turkes tyrannie: For otherwise, the Turke was wholly minded, with all his force and puissance to inuade the Christians, being in doubt whether first to begin with Rhodes, or whether to assault Pannonia, or else to set vpon Italie, being then at great discord within it selfe: but this cause occupied the Turks minde otherwise, and kept him at home. Such was then the prouidence of the Lord for the safegard of his people.

The prouidence of God in stirring vp occasions for his people.

Wherefore, forsomuch as the affaires and doings of this Turke were spent for the most part in the Turkish and Heathenish countries: it shall not be greatly necessarie to trouble our Christian stories therewith, but only shall suffice to contract them in a briefe summe, declaring superficially what vnquietnesse was amongst them there, which could neuer be quiet, but euer working some mischiefe either abroad, or at home. Amurathes the Turkes nephew aforesaid, after he had obtained aide of Sophus the king of the Persians, first inuaded Cappadocia: not long after whom followed Ismael Sophus the Persian king. By reason whereof a great battell was fought betwixt the Persians and Zelymus, in the fields of Armenia maior. In the which battell Ismael Sophus the Persian king was hurt on the shoulder with a pellet, and so being caried out of the field, left the victorie to Zelymus: who albeit had an armie of 150. M. men, yet he in the same field lost about 30000. of his Turkes. Which field was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1514. Zelymus after this victorie went to Tauricia the imperiall citie of the Persians, which he by yeelding subdued.

War betweene Zelymus & Sophus the Persian king.

In this meane time it happened that one Aladulus a king in Armenia the greater, was also a helper to Ismael against the Turke, whereupon Zelymus the Turke taking great indignation, the next yeare following, leauing the Persians, fought against the said Aladulus, and in the end ouercame him, & afterward being found in a cane in a wood, was taken out & brought to Zelymus and so beheaded: whose head being first caried about Asia for a triumph, was afterward sent to the Senate of Uenice for a terror vnto them. The eldest sonne of Aladulus scaping the hands of his pursuers, fled into Egypt. This battell thus fought and ended, Zelymus after he had diuided the kingdome of Aladulus into three prouinces, went to Lycoma, and from thence to Europe, there to defend the citie of Samandria, against the Christians in Hungarie. But the Hungarians being sone repressed by Juno Balla the Turks captaine, great preparation began to be made by the Turks against the confines of Seruia bordering vpon Hungarie: The terror whereof stirred vp Maximilian the emperour, and Ladislaus king of Hungarie, and Sigismundus king of Polonie, to consult together, & conioine their power for defence of christendome. But through new incumbrances incident, the Turke leauing Europe, made hast againe into Asia to renue againe his wars against the Persians, who had made a vow not to giue ouer that warre before Ismael was ouerthrowne.

The Turke called away from the Christians.

A Turkish vow.

But before he entred that war, first he sent his messengers to the Sultane of Egypt, requiring him not to entermeddle in that warre; for this Sultane before had promised to assist the Persians against the Turke. The name of the Sultane which reigned then in Egypt, was Campson, set vp by the Mamaluci. These Mamaluci were a certaine order amongst the Egyptians much like to the Ianizarites about the Turke, being the children of Christian men, and after denying Christ, were the chiefest doers in the Sultans court, & being growne into a great multitude, did degenerate into a Turkish barbaritie, or rather became worse then Turks. This Campson vnto the messengers of the Turke gaue this answere againe, that vnlesse he would leaue off his warre against Ismael, and restore the sonne of Aladulus, otherwise he would not lay downe his armour.

Campson the Sultane or ruler of the Egyptians. Mamaluci.

Zelymus being incensed not a little with this insolent answere of the Sultane, leauing all other warres aside, with great celeritie aduanced his power against the Sultane. Which Sultan partlie through the falshood of his captaine Caierbeius, partly by the suddennesse of the Turkes comming, not farre from the citie of Damascus encountred with the Turke, and there ouerthrowne from his horse, being a fat and grosse bodie, and falling vnder his horse, and his horse also falling vpon him, was quashed in peeces and so died, which was the yere of our Lord, 1516.

Caierbeius falle to his matter.

Campson slain.

The Mamaluci, of whom more then a M. in this battell were slaine, flying from thence to Memphis, set vp Tomoumbeius in stead of Campson: whose captaine Gazelles was ouercome at the citie of Gaza, and he afterward himselfe driuen out of Memphis, where a great part of the Mamaluci were destroyed. Then Tomoumbeius flying ouer the flood Nilus, renued his armie againe: but in the end was discomfited and chased into a marish, where he was found standing in the water vp to the chin, and so being brought to Zelymus, was put to the racke and great torments, to make him confesse where Campsons treasures were. But when he would not declare, he was caried about the towne with a halter about his neck, and hanged vp vpō a hie gibbet for a spectacle to all Egypt: which was the yeare of our Lord, 1517. And thus were the two Sultanes in Egypt destroyed with the Mamaluci, which there had borne the rule in Egypt the space of 243. yeares. The progenie of the which Mamaluci remaining of the warres, the Turke commanded in the prison gates of Alexandria to be cut in peeces. Zelymus from thence, triumphing departed to Cōstantinople, intending to spend the rest of his time in persecuting the Christians: But in that meane space he was stricken with a cankred sore rotting inward, and died after he had raigned seuen yeares like a beast, in the yeare of our Lord 1520.

The raigne of this Turke was but short in number of yeares: but in number of his murders and cruell bloudshed it might seeme exceeding long, which liued more like a beast then a man; for he neuer spared any of his friends or kindred. His father first he poysoned, his brethren and all his cosens he quelled, leauing none of all his kindred aliue. Moreouer, his cheefe and principall captaines for small occasions he put to death, as Mustapha, Calogere, Chendeme, Bostang his son inlaw, and Junobasta.

The beastly cruelty of Zelymus against his kinred.

It is said moreouer that he intended the poysoning of his owne sonne Solyman, sending vnto him a shirt infected with poyson, because he seemed something freely to speake against the cruell demeanor of his father: But by the meanes of his mother, the gift being suspected, was giuen to another which was his chamberlaine, who putting on the shirt, was strucken with the poyson thereof, and therewithall died.

The cruelty of Zelymus against his son Solyman.

As touching this Turke Zelymus, by the way here may be noted how the secret prouidence of the Lord kept him occupied with his Turkish warres at home, while that the reformation of Christian religion here in Europe the same time begun by Martin Luther, might the more quietlie take some rooting without disturbance or interruption. For so it appeareth by the computation of time, that in the dayes of this Zelymus, Martin Luther first began to write against the popes indulgences, which was in the yeare of our Lord, 1516.

A note of Gods prouidence for the reformation of religion.

Solymannus the 12. after Ottomannus.

SOlymannus the only sonne of Zelymus succeded after his fathers death, who in the first beginning seemed to some to be simple and sheepish, and not meete for the Turkish gouernment. Wherefore certaine of his nobles consulting how to depose him, intended to set vp another Emperour. In which conspiracie, especiallie are named Caierbeius and Gazelles. This Caierbeius was he that betrayed before Campson the Sultan of Egypt to Zelymus, as is aforesaid: who now also being in consultation with Gazelles and other about this matter, detected them also vnto Solyman. Wherefore the said Gazelles and his fellowes being thus detected, were put to death by Solyman, declaring thereby that he was not so sheepish as he was thought of them to be, and as also by his acts afterward did more appeare.

Belgradium again besieged of the Turke. Read before pa. 682.

Solymannus, after this execution done vpon the conspiratours, taking his voyage into Europe, first besieged Belgradum: which being a citie in Hungarie, was the strongest fort of all the Romaine Empire, and the chiefe defence at that time, of all Christendome; which also being assaulted before time by Amurathes the 2. was valiantly defended by Joannes Huniades as is aboue specified. But here now lacked such a one as Huniades was: For the kingdome of Hungarie at that time, was vnder the gouernment of Ludouicus a yong king, vnexpert and of a simple wit. Whom other Princes, and specially the couetous churchmen did so pill and poll, that they left him nothing but onlie the bare name and title of his kingdome: whereby he being vnfurnished both of men and money, was vnable to match with such an enemie.

Another vantage also the Turkes had in besieging of Belgrade: For the christian princes at that time were in ciuill dissension and variance amongst themselues: and the pope with his churchmen also were so busie in suppressing of Luther, and of the gospell then newly springing, that they minded nothing else, except it were to maintaine the wealth of their owne bellies. Which pope if he had set his care (as his dutie was) so much in stirring vp princes against the common enemie, as he was bent to deface the Gospell, and to persecute the true professors thereof: some might he haue brought to passe, not only that Belgrade might haue beene defended against the Turk, but also that to be recouered againe which was lost before: and moreouer might haue stopped the great dangers and perilles which now are like to fall vpon the religion & church of Christ: which the Lord of his great mercy auert and turne away.

Discord amongst christiã princes, what mischiefe it bringeth.

The pope so busy against Luther, that he neglecteth the ruine of Christendome.

Certes whatsoeuer the pope then did, this had been his dutie, setting all other things apart, to haue had an earnest compassion of so many miserable and lost captiues, which were fallen from their faith and religion, vnto the miserie and slauerie of the Turke, and thraldome of the diuell, and to haue sought all meanes possible to haue reduced them, as lost sheepe into the folde againe: Which then might some haue been done, if prelates and princes ioyning together in christian concord, had loued so well the publicke glorie of Christ and soules of christians, as they tendered their owne priuate, worldly, and friuolous quarels. And admit that the pope had conceiued neuer so much malice against Luther, his quarell also being good: yet the publike church standing in such danger, as it then did by the inuasion of the Turke, reason would, nature ledde, religion taught, time required, that a good prelate forgetting lighter matters, should rather haue laid his shoulder to the excluding of so great a danger, as then was imminent both to himselfe, and the vniuersall church of Christ: But now his quarell being vniust, and the cause of Luther being most iust and godly, what is to be said or thought of such a Prelate, who forbearing the Turke, whom in a time so dangerous he ought cheefly to haue resisted, persecuted the truth, which he should specially haue maintained? But Christ for his mercy stãd for his church and stir vp zealous princes and prelats, if not to recouer that that is lost, yet at least to retaine that little which is left.

True compassiõ lacking in the Pope.

Solyman therefore taking his occasion, and using the commoditie of time, while our princes were thus at variance betwixt themselues, without any resistance or interruption, brought his armie vnto Belgrade, in the yeare of our Lord, 1521. Which citie being but slenderly defenced, the Turke through his vnderminers, guns and other engines of warre, without great difficultie, and with little losse of his souldiours, soone subdued and ouercame.

The citie of Belgrade won of the Turke.

After this victorie, Solyman resting himselfe a whole yeere, and casting in his mind how to make all sure behinde him, for feare of enemies to come vpon his backe, thought it expedient for his purpose if he might obtaine the Iland of Rhodes: for that only remained yet Christian betwixt him and Asia: wherefore the next yeere following, he brought his armie of 450. ships, and 300. M. men, to the besieging thereof. This Rhodes was a mightie and strong Iland, within the sea called Mare mediterraneum. The inhabitans whereof at the first did manfully resist the Turke, sparing no labour nor paines for the defence of themselues and of all Christendome: But afterward being brought to extremitie, and pinched with penurie, seeing also no aide to come from the Christians, some what began to languish in themselues. The Turks in the meane time casting vp two great mountaines with strength of hand, two miles off from the citie, like rolling trenches caried them before them neere vnto the citie, in the tops whereof they planted their ordinance and artillerie, to batter the citie. The master of the knights of the Rhodes was then one Philippus Villadamus a Frenchman, in whom no diligence was lacking that appertained to the defence of the citie. The Rhodians likewise so valiantlie behaued themselues vpon the wals, that with their shot all the ditches about the citie were filled with the carcases of dead Turks. Besides this, such a disease of the bloudie flixe raigned in the Turks campe, that 30. M. of them died thereof: and yet for all this, Solyman would not cease from his siege begun: who at length by vnderminers casting downe the bamures and vttermost parts of the citie, wan ground still more and more vpon the Rhodians, and with mortarie peeces so battered the houses, that there was no free place almost standing in all the citie. And thus continued the siege for the space of fiue or sixe moneths, and yet all this while came no helpe vnto them from the Christians. Wherefore they being out of all hope, through the aduice of Villadamus yeelded themselues vnto the Turke, vpon condition that he would spare them with life and goods: which conuention the Turke kept with them faithfullie and truelie.

Rhodes besieged.

Thus Solyman with his great glorie and vtter shame to all Christian princes and also ruine of all Christendome, got the noble Ile of Rhodes, although not without great losse and detriment of his armie: insomuch that at one assault 20. thousand Turkes about the walles, were slaine with fire, sword, stones, and other engines. Whereby it may be coniectured what these Rhodians might or would haue done, if succor had come to them from other Christian princes as they looked for. This citie was won vpon Christmas day, An. 1522.

Rhodes won of the Turke.

This conquest of Rhodes obtained, Solyman the 4. yeare after bringeth backe his armie againe into Hungarie, where he found none to resist him but onely Ludouicke the young k. who being accompanied with a small armie, and nothing able to match with the Turke, yet of a hastie rashnesse and vaine hope of victorie, would needes set vpon him: who if he had staid but a little, had prospered the better. For Joannes Waiuoda being a captaine well exercised in Turkish wars before, was not farre off, comming with a sufficient power of able souldiours. But Paulus the archbishop Colosl. a Franciscane Frier, a man more bold then wise, with his temeritie and rashnesse troubled all their doings: For the whole summe of the armie of the Hungarians, contained in all but onely foure and twentie thousand horsemen and footmen, who at length comming vnto the battel, and being compassed about with a great multitude of the Turkes armie, were brought into great distresse. The Turks twice shot off their peeces against the Christian armie: yet scarce was any Christian touched with the stroke thereof: which was thought to be done of purpose, because they were Christians which had the ordering of the guns, for then the speciall gunners of the Turkes were Christians, whom for the same cause they spared. Then the Turkes horsemen comming vpon the backe of the Christian armie, compassed them about, and by reason of their multitude, ouercharged their horsemen. Amongst whom was slaine the same time the archbishop frier aboue said, with the bishops of Strigone and Varadine and many other nobles beside. Also the king himselfe being destitute of his necessaris aide and succour, was compelled to flie into a marish, where he falling from his horse, being heauie laden with his harnesse, was not able to rise againe, but there miserablie perished.

the kingdome, being duke of Auſtria and king of Hungarie. Then Solyman ſetting contention betwixt Joannes Vaiuoda and Ferdinandus for the kingdome of Hungarie, ſped his voyage to the citie of Buda, which alſo in ſhort time hee made to be yelded vnto him, vpon condition that they ſhould eſcape with their liues and goods: which condition ſome ſay he kept, and ſome ſay he did not. Beſides Buda diuers places and munitions the ſaid Turke, contrarie to his league made before, did ſpoile and waſte, as Varadinum, Quinque Eccleſias, and other forts and munitions moe, bordering about the coaſts of Hungarie.

Vaiuoda flieth to the Turkes.

In the yeare of our Lord 1529. Ferdinandus king of Hungarie aforeſaid, recouered diuers holds gotten of the Turke before, and alſo warring againſt Joannes Vaiuoda his enemie, with whom he had variance (as ye heard before) erpulſed him out of his kingdome. Whereupon Vaiuoda flying to the Turke, deſired his aide. The Turke glad to take that occaſion, with great preparation addreſſed himſelfe to returne into Hungarie, where he recouering again the citie of Buda, which Ferdinandus had gotten from him a little before, remoued his armie into Auſtria, ſpoiling and deſtroying by the way all that came to his hands, ſhewing many examples of great crueltie and tyranny moſt lamentable to heare & vnderſtand.

Horrible examples of ỹ Turks cruelty.

For of ſome he put out their eyes, of ſom he cut off their hands, of ſome their eares and noſes, and of their children he cut off their prime membres. The maydens he corrupted, the matrones had their breaſts cut off, and ſuch as were with childe, were ript and their children caſt into the fire. And theſe examples of horrible and barbarous tyrannie, this wretched Turke perpetrated by the way comming toward Vienna a noble citie in Auſtria, beſides the captiues which he tooke by the way and led into ſeruitude moſt miſerable, mounting to the number of thirtie thouſand.

Among other holds by the way as the Turke came, there was a caſtle called Altenburch, ſtrongly by nature ſituated, and by art defenced; which caſtle the Turke intending not to ouerpaſſe, becauſe he would make all things ſure behind him, began to make his aſſault, and lay his ordinance againſt it. The warders and keepers of the caſtle, ſo ſone as the Turke began to lay ſiege againſt them, making no reſiſtance, of a womanlie cowardlines, ſent their meſſengers to the Turke, to yéeld themſelues readie to doe his commandement, and further him with their victuall. Amongſt whom were three hundred Bohemians, who were commanded to follow the hoſt, that the Turke by them might learne what ſtrength was in the citie of Vienna: alſo where the king was, and what was to be done for the winning thereof.

The effeminate cowardlineſſe of the ſouldiors in Altenburch.

The caſtle of Altenburch yeelded to the Turke.

Of whom when the Turke had vnderſtanding how al things ſtood, and how that there were but twentie thouſand men in Vienna able to beare armor, and that other cities of Auſtria would ſone yéeld if that were gotten, and that Vienna was victualled but for two monethes, and that the king was of late in Boheme; thus the Turke of all things being certified, hauing no doubt in his minde of victorie, made ſpéed toward Vienna: and firſt comming to Neapolis, a citie but 8. miles diſtant from Vienna, he required them to yéeld themſelues: who notwithſtanding withſtood them, and repulſed them valiantlie. Then the Turkes aſſigned a place for the pitching of their tents; which becauſe it ſeemed ſomething too little for ſuch a great multitude, they tooke in more ground to the compaſſe of ſeuen miles circuit. The multitude of his armie, which he there planed, is accounted of ſome to extend to 250 thouſand ſouldiours. The Turke thus being planted, made dailie ercourſes ouer all the countrey of Auſtria, ſpecially about the citie of Vienna, walking & ſpoiling with great crueltie and murther amongſt the poore Chriſtians.

Moreouer, to make all things more ſure toward the preparation of the ſiege, ſcoutes were ſent abroad, & ambuſhments were laid about the riuer ſide of Danubius, to prouide that no aide nor victuall ſhould be brought to Vienna. So it pleaſed the prouidence of the Lord (who diſpoſeth all things) that three dates before the comming of the Turke, Fridericus the Earle Palatine, which was then aſſigned by the Empire to take the charge of Vienna, was come downe by the riuer of Danubius with 14. M. and with a certaine troope of horſemen well appointed and picked for the purpoſe. After the comming of this Fridericke, prouiſion alſo of victuall was appointed to follow ſhortlie after, by the ſaid riuer of Danubius.

Vienna beſieged of the Turke.

Fridericus earle Palatine captaine of Vienna.

In the meane time, they wich had the cariage and tranſporting thereof, hearing how the wayes were laid, and all the paſſages 10. miles about Vienna, ſtopped by the Turkes, although they knew the citie to ſtand in great néede of victuall, yet ſéeing there was no other remedie, rather then it ſhould come to the enemies hand, thought it beſt to ſinke their boats with their cariage, & ſo they did. Whereby albeit the Chriſtians wanted their releéſe, yet were the Turks diſappointed of their pray & purpoſe. The captains which had the kéeping of the citie, which were chéefly Fridericus ỹ earle Palatine, Gulielmus Rogendorffius, & Nicolaus earle of Salme, ſéeing themſelues ſo trained contrarie to their expectation, although they had great cauſes to be diſcouraged, yet calling their courage vnto them, they conſulted together for the beſt way to be taken:

Fridericus earle Palatine, William Rogendorffius, Nicolaus earle of Salme, captains of Vienna.

& ſéeing that the little citie Neapolis (aboue mentioned) being eight miles diſtant from them, ſo valiantlie withſtood ỹ Turks, that in one day they ſuſtained ſeuen greeuous aſſaults againſt all the maine force of the Turkiſh armie: by their example and manfull ſtanding, being the more animated and encouraged, thought to abide the vttermoſt before they would giue ouer; and firſt plucking downe all the ſuburbs, and buildings without the walles, whereby the enemie might haue any ſuccour, they willed all the farmers and inhabitans about the citie to ſaue themſelues; and to bring in their goods within the walles. Such places as were weake within the wals, they made ſtrong. About the towers and munition of the walles, they prouided rampiers and bulwarks diſtant 80. foote one from another, to keepe off the ſhot; and euery man had his place and ſtanding awarded to him vpon the wall, and his office appointed what to doe: but eſpecially that ſide of the citie which lieth to the riuer of Danubius, they fortified after the beſt wiſe: for that way only now remained for victuall to bee tranſported from the Bohemians vnto them. Wherefore 8. enſignes were aſſigned to the keéping of the bridge; and in the plaine, which was like an Iland incloſed within the riuer, a ſufficient garriſon of horſmen were placed, lying within the gunſhot of the citie, to the intent that if any graine or victuall were ſent from the Bohemians, they might prouide the ſame ſafelie to be brought into the citie.

Prouiſion made for victualling the citie.

These things thus being diſpoſed and ſet in order, L. William Rogendorffe, to allay the ſtrength of the Turks, made diuers rodes out with his horſemen, albeit much againſt the minds of the Auſtrians: who knowing the maner of the Turks, thought it better to ſuffer them, while either with time they might be ouerwearied, or for lacke of victuals conſumed. Among many and ſundry ſkirmiſhes which the Chriſtians had with the Turkes, one eſpeciallie was to our men vnproſperous: in which certaine of the horſemen eſpying a ſmall troope of the Turkes ſcattering abroad from their company, made out after them, who ſuddenly and guilefullie were incloſed and circumuented by the Turks, before they could recouer the gates of the citie, and ſo were all taken aliue: Of whom three were ſent from the Turkes into the citie, to declare to the Viennians what ſtrength they had ſéene in the campe of their aduerſaries, and to ſolicite them to yéeld their citie for feare of puniſhment which would follow: The reſidue they reſerued to torments and puniſhment, whom in the ſight of the whole armie, and of the Chriſtians (which ſhould tell the ſame to the citizens) they cauſed euery man to be drawne with foure horſes a peece, and ſo to be diſmembred and plucked aſunder.

Good counſell and experience refuſed.

The wretched cruelty of the Turks againſt the Chriſtian captiues.

After this done, the barbarous Turke immediatlie ſent his Herald to talke with the captaines of the citie, whether they would yéeld the citie vpon honeſt conditions, or elſe would abide the arbitrement of warre. If they would gentlie ſubmit themſelues, they ſhould haue all gentleneſſe to them ſhewed: If they would be ſtubborne, and ſtand to their defence, hee would alſo ſtand to his ſiege begun, ſo that he neither would ſpare man, woman, or child. To this the captaines anſwered againe, that they were contented, Solyman to ſtand to his ſiege begun, and to doe his vttermoſt, what he would, or what he could. As for them, they were at appoint to defend themſelues and their citie ſo long as they might: the euent and fall of victorie to be doubtfull, and many times ſo to happen, that they which begin the warre are wearied ſoner then they which be prouoked: neither againe, that they were ſo vnmindfull either of themſelues, or of their countrey, but that they did remember well what they are, and what they be called, named to be Germaines: who vſe alwaies firſt to aſſay the aduerſarie, what he is able to do, and not rathlie to commit themſelues into their enemies hands.

The meſſage of the Turke to the Viennians.

The anſwere of the Viennians to the Turke.

Solymannus not a little diſdaining at this anſwer, firſt burning and conſuming all the villages, houſes, and places round about the citie, infecting alſo the ſpringes and fountains which gaue water into the citie, and ſo ſtopping all paſſages, that no releéſe ſhould haue way vnto them, began with angrie mood to approch more nére to the citie, with three great camps; ſending them word in ſcorne and contumelie, by one of his captiues, that if they ſtood in néed of help of ſouldiors, he would ſend vnto them the 300. Bohemians (mentioned a little before) to aide them in their defence. To whom the Palatine directed anſwere againe, that they had more ſouldiours in the citie then they néeded. As for the Bohemians which had yeelded themſelues, he might doe with them what he would, for Vienna ſtood in no great néed of them.

Solymannus approcheth Vienna with 3. great armies.

In the meane time a meſſenger comming from Ferdinandus, was priuilie let in by night into the citie, which brought word that they ſhould play the men in keéping out the enimie a while: for it would not be long, but both Ferdinandus and Carolus his brother, with the ſtrength of all Germanie, would bee readie to reſcue them. At which meſſage the hearts of the ſouldiors began ſomewhat to be cheared, and to contemne the huge multitude of the aduerſaries, being ſo great as they neuer did behold, nor did euer almoſt heare of before. The largeneſſe of whose armie, extended to no leſſe in compaſſe (as is aboue ſaid) then of ſeuen miles rounde about the citie walles.

The ſiege of Vienna begineth.

Long it were to recite the whole order of this terrible ſiege, with all the partes and circumſtances thereof. Briefly to touch ſo much as ſhall ſuffice for this hiſtorie, with fewer words then were ſtripes giuen at the ſiege thereof: this is to be iudged and confeſſed, whoſoeuer beholdeth the number and fiercenesſe of the Turkes, the abſence of king Ferdinandus, the lacke of prouiſion and victuall within the citie, the noiſe of the guns, the violence of the ſhot, the terror of the fight, and yet no ſuccour ſent vnto them: that the cuſtodie of that citie was no mans doing, but the arme only of the Lord God of hoſts, according to the true ſaying of the Pſalme: Vnleſſe the Lord doe keepe the citie, the watchmen watch in vaine, which watch to ſaue it: Vnleſſe the Lord doe build the houſe, the builder ſtriueth in vaine, which taketh vpon him to builde it. Experience whereof in keeping this citie may well appeare.

The Lords power and prouidence in keeping the city of Vienna.

First Solymannus bending his ſhot and ordinance againſt the citie, beat downe to the ground the vamures with all the vttermoſt ſuburbs of the citie, and that in ſuch a ſhort moment of time, that the harts of the Viennians a little before refreſhed, were now as much appalled againe with feare, miſdoubting whith themſelues, leſt the Turke with the ſame celeritie and violence, would haue preuailed againſt the inward walles, as he did in beating downe the outward vamures. And no doubt the ſame time the Turke had put the city in great hazard, had not night comming on, broken off the ſiege for that day.

The ſlaughter of the Turkes about the wales of Vienna.

In the meane time the citizens laboured all night in repairing and refreſhing the walles, to make all things ſure againſt the next aſſault. The next day early in the morning, ỹ Turkes approching the citie againe with a new aſſault, thinking to ſcale the wals, were ſo repulſed and manfully reſiſted by the Germaines, that vneth any ditches about the walles could be ſeene for the bodies of the dead Turks, wherwith they were replenished: ſo that the Turkes were faine to fight ſtanding vpon the bodies of them which were ſlaine. By the which calamitie the force of the enemie was not a little abated.

The manlineſſe of captaine Rogendorffius againſt the Turkes.

It happened the ſame time, that a company of the Turkes being eſpied out of the citie wandering out of order, the captaine Rogendorffius with two legions of horſmen iſſuing out of the citie gate called Salmatia, and ſo paſſing cloſelie vnder the hils ſide, did ſo ſet vpon them, that they ſlewa great number of them: the reſt being driuen to take the riuer, whom with ſtones and ſhot likewiſe they deſtroyed, and ſo retired backe into the citie againe. By this victorie the captaine Rogendorffius began to be terrible to the Turks. For in the ſame ſkirmiſh (as after was knowne) were ſlaine of them ſo many, that of 5000. and three hundred horſmen and footmen, ſcarſe 140. eſcaped aliue.

Another aſſault of the Turkes againſt Vienna.

Solyman diſdaining at this repulſe, thought to proue another way, and ſo bringing his power toward the gate called the kings gate, there making his trenches and bulwarkes, planted his ordinance, with the violence whereof the walles were ſo battered and ſhaken, that no man was able there to ſtand. Wherfore the Turk ſeeing 2. great breaches made in the wall, commanded his ſoldiors couertlie in the darke ſmoke of the gunpouder to preaſe into the citie. The like alſo was done at the Scotiſh tower, whereby the citie was inuaded in 2. ſundry places at one time. The Viennians at the firſt, freſhly began to withſtand them, new ſoldiors ſtill comming in the place of them that were ſlaine and hurt: and ſo this aſſault continuing more then ſix houres together, our men began at length to languiſh and faint, not only in ſtrength but alſo in courage: whereby the citie had been in great danger of loſing, had not the two aforeſaid captaines Rogendorffius in the one place, and the Earle of Salme in the other place, manfullie encouraged the ſouldiors to abide the brunt, and to beare out a while the violence of the Turkes, promiſing that immediatlie they ſhould haue aide from Ferdinandus.

Another repulſe of the Turks.

In the meane time the Turks came ſo thick for the greedines of the victorie, ſcaling, climing, and fighting vpon the walles, that had it not bin for the preaſe and throng of the great multitude of the Turks, comming ſo thicke that one of them could not fight for another, Vienna that ſame day had bin taken and vtterlie loſt: But by the policie of the captains giuing a ſigne within the citie, as though new ſouldiors were called for, our men began to be encouraged, and the Turks hearts to be diſcomfited.

Vienna vndermined by the Turkes.

When Solymannus ſaw his armie the ſecond time repulſed, he began to attempt a new way, purpoſing by vndermining to ouerthrowe the citie: in the which worke ſpeciallie he vſed the helpe of the Illyrians, of whom he had a great number in his campe, expert in that kind of feat. Theſe Illyrians beginning to breake the earth at the gate Carinthia, and comming neere to the foundations of the Tower, which they by ſtrength of hand attempted to break, could not worke ſo cloſely vnder the ground, but they were perceiued by certain men aboue, which were ſkilfull and expert in that kinde of matter: who contrariwiſe vndermining againſt them, and filling their trenches as they went, with gunnepouder, ſo conueied their traine, that when fire ſhould be ſet vnto it, the violence thereof ſhould braſt out by the trenches of the enemies: which done, ſuddenly the ground beneath made a great ſhaking, ſo that the tower did cleaue aſunder, and all the vnderminers of the Turks working in their trenches, were ſmothered and deſtroyed; which came to the number (as it was ſuppoſed afterward) of 8000. perſons: inſomuch that yet till this day a great number of dead mens ſculs are found in the ground.

Another aſſault of the Turkes againſt Vienna.

When Solyman ſaw that this way alſo would not ſerue, & had priuie intelligence that the walles about the gates of Stubarium were negligentlie kept, and that he might haue there more eaſie entrance: ſecretlie he conueyeth about 10. garriſons of freſh ſouldiors, in ſuch ſort as the townesmen ſhould not perceiue them: who came ſo ſuddenly vpon them, that they had filled the ditches, and were vpon the top of the fortreſſes & munitions, before that our men were aware of them, or could make themſelues readie to reſiſt them. For although there was no lacke of ſouldiors within the citie, yet forſomuch as the whole brunt of the ſiege did lie, ſpeciallie at the 2. gates aforeſaid, from whence the ſouldiors which were there warding, could not bee well remoued, for a ſhift the reſcuers (which within the citie were readie for all ſudden aduentures) were ſent to the wals: by whoſe comming, thoſe few which kept the enemies off before, being ſore hurt and wounded, were ſuccoured and ſent to ſurgerie: and thus the ſaid aſſault continued terrible and doubtfull vntill (the darke night comming vpon them) they could not well know the one from the other. In this bickering were counted of the Turkes to be ſlaine, more then fiue thouſand.

The Turkes againe repulſed.

Then the captaine Rogendorffius commending the valiant ſtanding of his ſouldiors, miſdoubting with himſelfe (as it happened indeed) that the Turks would not ſo giue ouer, but would ſet vpon him the next day with a freſh aſſault, prouiding with all diligence for the purpoſe, made vp the breaches of the walles, and prepared all things neceſſarie for reſiſtance. The next morning following, which was ſomething darke and miſtie, the Turkes thinking to preuent our men with their ſudden comming, began againe buſilie to bicker vpon the toppe of the walles.

It would require a long tractation here to deſcribe the great diſtreſſe and danger that the citie thoſe three dayes following was in. During all the which time, there was no reſt, no intermiſſion, nor diligence lacking, either in the enimies, fighting againſt the citie, either in our men in defending the ſame. For the Turkes beſides the multitude of the great ordinance, wherewith (as with a great tempeſt of gunſhot) they neuer ceaſed, ſtill battering the walles and beating the munitions of the citie, ſent alſo ſuch heaps and multitudes of the Turkes, to the ſcaling and climing of the walles, that vneth with all the ordinance & ſhot of the citie, either the violence of them could be broken, or the number of them diminiſhed: till at the laſt the ſouldiors of the Turkes, perceiuing themſelues able by no meanes to preuaile, but only to run in danger of life, & to do no good, began to wrangle among themſelues, grudging and repining againſt their dukes and captaines, imputing the whole cauſe only to them, that the citie was yet vntaken, ſeeing there was in them neither diligence nor good will lacking: and ſo ceaſed the ſiege for that time.

Another aſſault of the Turkes repulſed.

The Turkes at variance among themſelues.

After this, when Solymannus had purpoſed in himſelfe with his laſt and ſtrongeſt ſiege, to try againſt the citie the vtermoſt that he was able to doe, and had encouraged his ſouldiors to prepare themſelues in moſt forcible wiſe thereunto: the ſouldiors ſhewed themſelues much vnwilling to returne againe from whence they were ſo often repulſed before: by reaſon whereof great commotion began to riſe in the Turks camp. The rumor whereof when it came to Solymans eares, hee ſendeth his grand captaine, to keepe all the ſouldiors in order and obedience; or if they would be ſtubborne, to compell them whether they would or not, to accompliſh his commandement. Who comming to the ſoldiors, ſhewed to them the great Turks meſſage; and to animate and encourage them, declared that the opportunitie of the time preſent was not to bee neglected, neither could they now without great ſhame giue ouer, after ſo many aſſaults attempted: Who if they would ſuſteine but one brunt more, the victorie were in their owne hands. The townesmen he ſaid were waſted, and their victuals ſpent: and the more to enflame their minds, he promiſed them not onelie great thanks and reward of their Emperour, but alſo the whole ſpoile of the citie, in recompence of their trauell.

The Turke and his ſouldiors could not agree.

The Turke entreateth his ſoldiors.

Compulſion of men ſerueth not where the Lord defendeth.

But when all this could not ſtir vp the ſturdie ſtomacks of the tired Turks, vſing compulſion where perſwaſion would not ſerue, he appointed a number of horſemen to be ſet at their backes, whereby to inforce them, either to goe forward, or if they denied, with guns & ſpeares to deſtroy them. The Turks ſeeing themſelues in ſuch a ſtrait, that whether they went or taried, it was to them like perill, yet would they not ſet forward except the captaine would take ỹ venture before them. Who warding forward in his arraie, thus ſpake vnto his fellowes, ſaying: Doe you forſake your faith and allegiance, and betray the Emperour of Conſtantinople vnto the Chriſtians if you will: but I will diſcharge my dutie towards the cõmon wealth and my Emperour, and with that word aduanced his enſigne, making toward the citie walles. Other terrified by their example, gaue backe and left their arraie, and winding themselues by by-waies and vnder couert of hils, returned againe into their tentes, and so came it to passe, that the strength of the enemies daille more and more decreasing, they had lesse hope euerie day more then other of obtaining the citie. For besides the innumerable slaughter of Turkes vpon the walles, the townesmen also watching the forragers and purueyers of the Turkes, as they ranged about for victuall for the campe, euer as occasion serued them, did compasse them about, & so encountred with them by that way, that of a whole Legion, scarsly the tenth part returned againe to their fellowes aliue, by meanes whereof the courage of the enemies began greatlie to faint. Whereby such a maruellous alteration happened, that as our men began to receiue more hope and courage, so the Turkes began still more to droope and to languish with despaire, so that at length scarce durst they appeare without the bounds, where they were entrenched, but onely in light skirmishes, when they were prouoked by our men to come out, and to shew themselues.

The Turkes slaine.

The Turke beginneth to take counsell to retire.

Solymannus perceiuing his souldiors thus daillie to go to wracke, of whom he had lost alreadie more then eightie thousand, and that with long tarying he could do no good, being also in lacke of forrage, for that the countrey about him was wasted: beginneth to consult with his captaines and counsellors, what remained best to be done. Of whom the most part aduised him to raise his siege, and betime to prouide for himselfe. Which to doe, many causes there were that moued him.

First, the losse of his men, which daily were cut from him by great numbers, besides them which lay in his camp wounded, or sicke, or famished. Secondlie, lacke of purueiance. Thirdly, the approching neere of winter. But the chiefest cause was, for that he heard Frederike Palatine aboue mentioned, comming with a great army at Ratisbone towards Vienna, and there had done great molestation to a great number of the Turkes forragers, whom by the way hee preuented and so enclosed in the woods, that he slew them. Whereof when Soliman had intelligence, thinking it not best to abide the comming of the Palatine, made hast with bagge and baggage to remoue his campe and to retire: and first sending away his cariage before him, made speed himselfe with his armie, to follow shortlie after.

Soliman remoueth and raiseth his siege from Vienna.

The Viennians, when they heard of the remouing away of the Turkes, although at the first they scarsly beleeued it to be true, being afterward certified out of doubt, both of their remouing, and also of the order thereof, how it was in a manner of a flight or chase, were greatly desirous to make out of the citie after them. Wherein, albeit the presence of the Palatine with his armie, if he had beene there present, might haue stood them in great stead, yet notwithstanding they tooke the opportunitie of the time present, and issuing out of the citie, in most speedie wise, set after them with their horsemen: and first ouerpassing the tents (where the Turks had pitched their stations or pauillions) for haste of the way: they made such pursute after them, that within little time they ouertooke the rereward or latter end of the armie, whereof they made such hauocke and destruction, that (as the author reporteth) there was neuer a shot of the pursuers, nor weapon drawne, nor stroke stricken, which light in vaine. Which was no hard thing for our men to doe: For as the Turkes in their flight went scattered out of order and array, neither would they in the fore rank (being so farre off from leopardie) returne backe to helpe their fellowes, it was easie for our men, without resistance, to come vpon their backs as they would. Yet notwithstanding in long pursute, when our men could not see the cariage of the Turkes, which was wont in armies to come alway behind after the host, and suspecting (as truth was) some ambush to be left in priuie waite behind them, to come betwixt them and home: called themselues to retrait, and consulted vpon the matter, thinking good, first to send out certaine scoutes, to espie and bring them word, where the enemies laie, and what was the number of them. Whereof when intelligence was giuen them, that the remnant of the Turkes armie was remaining in the tents behinde, word was sent to their fellowes in Vienna, to issue out, and to ioyne also with them against the taile of the Turkes, which had entrenched themselues within the campe. Other were appointed to follow the chase, lest peraduenture the Turkes seeing our men to recule back, might returne againe vpon them and helpe their fellowes. Which things being thus ordered and appointed, in the meane time, while part of the Viennians were houering after the maine army, the rest encountred with them that were left in the campe. Who seeing themselues ouermatched, first defenced their campe with a deepe Ditch and bulwarke, to delay the time, vntill some helpe might come to them from the armie. Secondly, they directed messengers to the Christians, to entreat for peace. Thirdly, they conueyed their priuie letters vnto Solyman for spedie aide and rescue. But all the waies and passages being stopped by the Christians, their letters were intercepted, and so the miserable Turkes being destitute of all hope and succour, seeing no other remedie, made out of their campe, to hazard and proue the vttermost for their defence: but in conclusion, in their desperate venture they were enclosed about by our men on euery side, and there put to the sword and slaine, a few onelie excepted, who escaping out very hardlie by secret passages, shifted after the rest of their fellowes, as well as they could. Their cariage and other furniture left behind them in their tents, was distributed amongst the souldiors, onelie such things reserued as might serue for the publike vse and commoditie of the Citie.

Thus through the mercifull protection and benefit of almightie God, Austria was deliuered from the fierce and barbarous hostilitie of the cruell Turkes: notwithstanding that neither Ferdinandus the king, nor the Emperor his brother were there present, but onlie the power of God, through the valiantnesse of the worthie Germaines, defended that citie, in defence whereof consisted the safetie and deliuerance (no doubt) of all these west parts of Christendome. For the which immortall praise and thankes be vnto our immortall GOD in Christ our Lord, according as he hath of vs most gratiously and worthlie deserued. Wherein by the way take this for a note (gentle Reader) how and after what manner Gods blessing goeth with the true reformers of his religion; and so much the more is it to be noted, for that the Turkes in so many battels and sieges heretofore, were neuer so repulsed and foiled, as at this present time in incountring with the protestants and defenders of sincere religion. This citie of Vienna was besieged and deliuered the yeare of our Lord 1529. The assaults of the Turke against the citie, are numbred to be 20. and his repulses as many. The number of his armie which he first brought, was 250000. whereof were reckoned to be slaine 80. thousand & aboue. During the time of his siege, he led away out of the countrey about many captiues, virgins & matrones he quelled, and cast them out naked, the children he stucke vpon stakes.

Solymannus thus put from the hope of victorie of Vienna, after he had breated himselfe a while at home, the second yeare after, which was an. 1531. repairing his host, returned againe into Hungary, with no lesse multitude then before: where first he got the towne called Gunza, being but slenderlie kept with a small Garrison. By reason whereof the townesmen and Souldiors yelding themselues vnto the Turke, were constrained to agree vpon vnreasonable conditions. Ex Ioanne Ramo.

Melchior Soiterus in his second booke writing De bello Pannonico, touching the foresaid towne of Gunza, or Gunzium, differeth herein something from Ramus, declaring how this Gunza, being a small towne in Hungarie, and hauing in it but onelie a hundred souldiors (or as Wolfegangus Drechslerus in his chronicle reporteth, at the most but 200. souldiors) vnder the valiant captaine Nicolas Iureschitz, defended themselues so manfully and wonderfully, through the notable power of God, against the whole puissance of 200. thousand Turks, that they being notwithstanding distressed with lack and penurie of purueiance, and suddenly of the Turks inuaded, yet with pure courage and promptnesse of hart, sustained the vttermost force and violence of xiij. assaults of that great multitude, for the space of 25. dayes together.

Ex Melc. Soit. lib. 2. de bello Pannonico.

Nicolaus Iureschitz a valiant captaine.

Although the narration of the author may seeme to some incredible, yet thus he writeth, that what time the great Ordinance and battering peeces of the Turkes were planted vpon two mountaines much higher then the towne, whereby the within the towne were oppressed both before and behinde, insomuch that eight Ensignes of the Turks were alreadie within the towne, yet by the reason of women and children, and other impotent persons, who in the middle of the towne were congregate in an house together, such a noise and clamor went vp to heauen, praying and crying to God for helpe that the Turkes within the walles, supposing a new army of fresh souldiors to be sent into the towne, for sudden feare, voided they towne and leaped downe from the walles againe (which before they had got) whom no man either pursued or resisted: for neuer a souldior almost was left on the walles, which was not either slaine or else wounded with the Turkes ordinance. At what time through the Lords prouidence it so happened, that one Ibrahimus Balla, neere about the Turke, seeing both the towne to be small, and the great destruction of the Turkes in the siege thereof, and that the captaine in no case would yeeld, perswaded so the Turke, declaring how the towne being so little, was not worth the losse of so many men, in the winning whereof there was no glorie, and if he were repulsed, great dishonour might follow: whereby the Turke being perswaded, did followe his counsell, which was this: that Nicolaus the Christian captaine being called vnto him, vnder pledges and safe conduct, should receiue the towne as of his hand and gift, with condition that he should doe no violence to his souldiors left behind and wounded, but should procure such meanes as he could for the recuring of them: and so her raising his siege, departed. Another cause might be also, which moued him so suddenly to raise his siege, for that he heard the Palatine not to be far off in pursuing after him, and therefore taking his flight by the mountaines of the Noritians, he returned with much spoile of Christian mens goods vnto Constantinople. Ex Melchiore Soit. lib. 2. de bello Pannonico.

But Solymannus hauing intelligence of this preparation of the Christian power comming toward him, whether for feare, or whether to espie further opportunitie of time, for his more aduantage and our detriment, refused at that time to take their comming, and so speeding his returne vnto Constantinople, retired with much spoile and pray sent before him, as is aboue premised: which was in the yeare of our Lord, 1532.

The Turke refuseth to tary ỹ Christian army.

Not long after, being the yeare of our saluation, 1534. Solymannus intending two wars at once, first sent Corradinus Barbarossa the Admirall of his Nauies into Africke, to warre against the king of Tunece: whom the Barbarossa also dispossessed and depriued of his kingdome: but Charles the Emperour, the next yeare following, ann. 1535. restored the said king againe into his kingdome, and deliuered in the same voiage 20. thousand captiues out of seruitude.

The same time the Turke also sent another captaine into Hungarie, to warre against Uaiuoda, while he himselfe taking his course to Persia, planted his siege against the citie Taurus, which he in short space subdued and erpugned. Albeit he long enioyed not the same: For Tahames king of the Persians, suddenly comming vpon the Turkes vnprepared, slew of them twentie thousand, and toke his concubines, to the great spoile and reproch of the Turke.

Two yeare after this, which was the yeare of our Lord, 1537. Solymannus, who could not be quiet at home, nor rest in peace, returning againe out of Asia into Europe with 270. ships, great and little, set vpon Corcyra, another Iland belonging to the Uenetians, which he besieged ten dayes, wasting & burning the Townes and fields as hee went, beside the destruction of much people therein, whom partlie he slew, partly led away captiues. From thence he sailed to Zacynthus and Cythara, another Iland not far off from Corcyra, bordering neere to the coastes of Cyprus and Grecia. Where he suddenly by night inuading the husbandmen in villages and fields, sleeping and mistrusting no harme, drew them out of their houses and possessions, men and women, besides children, to the number of nine hundred, whom he made his bondslaues: burning moreouer their houses, and carying away all the goods and cattell being without the said cities of Zazinthus and Cythara. Ex Ioan. Crispo.

From thence these helhoundes turned their course to the siege and spoile of Egina, a rich and populous Iland, lying between Grecia and Asia. Where first the Eginians did manfully in battaile resist them, and were like to haue preuailed: but being wearied at length and oppressed with innumerable thousands of fresh Turkes, which still were sent in, to rescue the other which were ouercome before, were compelled to flie into the city of Egina. Which city the cruell Turkes (or rather Diuels on earth) with much labour, and violence of their great ordinance set out of their ships, subdued and cast downe to the ground: the Citizens & inhabitants whereof, the Turke after hee had burned their houses, and ransackt their goods, commanded to bee slaine and killed euery one. The women both noble and vnnoble, with their infants, were giuen to the mariners to be abused, and from thence being shipped vnto Constantinople, were led away to perpetuall misery and slauery, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1537.

This done Solymannus directed his Nauy vnto Apulia, where he set on land 15. thousand footmen, and 2000. horsemen, which spoiled likewise and wasted those parts while the Emperour, the Pope, and the Uenetians, were together in war and dissension. Furthermore, the next yeare following, ann. 1538. great attempts began in Stiria; but by the resistance of the inhabitants, the force of the barbarous Turks was repulsed, notwithstanding great spoiles of men and cattell were caried from thence, and the country miserably spoiled. In the which yeare also the Turke turning into Hungary, gaue battaile vnto the Christians in Sauia: where through the fraudulent falshood of the captaine Cassianerus (Wolfegangus nameth him Calcianus, beeing (as they say) corrupted with money, our men were put to the worse, an. 1538.

The falshood of the Turke with the Uenetians.

After that the Turkes had inuaded the Iland of Corcyra aboue said, the Uenetians with Solyman the Turke had ioyned truce for a certaine time, for the which they gaue the Turk 300. thousand crownes, with the citie Neapolis, and Maluasia, in the borders of Macedonia. But within 4. or 5. yeares, the Turke to get a new stipend of the Uenetians, brake his league, and inuaded their dominions: whereby they were enforced to enter new conditions againe with him.

In the yeare of our Lord, 1540. the restles Turke making his returne toward Hungarie, by the way passing by Dalmatia, lay against the towne called Newcastle, being defended by the Spaniards. In the which towne because they refused to yeeld themselues, all the inhabitants and souldiors were put to the sword and slaine euery one. This Nouum Castellum, or Newcastle, was a strong fort of the Christians, which being now in the Turkes power, he had great aduantage ouer all those quarters of Dalmatia, Stiria, Carinthia, and Hungaria. From thence hee proceeded further, keeping his course into Hungarie, where he planted his power against the citie of Buda.

Nouū Castellum in Dalmatia, ouerthrowne by the Turke, and the people slaine.

This Buda was a principall citie in Hungarie, about which great contention had beene (as ye haue heard before) betweene Joannes Uaiuoda, and Ferdinandus. By reason whereof the Turke occasioned by Uaiuoda, came into Hungarie and deliuered the citie to Uaiuoda. This Uaiuoda liuing not long after, left behind him a sonne, whom beeing an infant, he committed to the gouernance of one Georgius Monachus, who being left tutor vnto the infant, reduced all Transiluania, Buda, Pesta, with other parts of Hungarie, which belonged to Uaiuoda before, to the subiection of the child. Ferdinandus hearing thereof, in a great haste and anger, leuied an armie to recouer his lands in Hungarie, and so laid siege to Buda. Monachus seeing his part weake, first sent his Legat to Ferdinandus, desiring him to talke and conferre with him vpon matters, as he pretended, pertaining to ỹ behoofe of them both. Whereupon both the parties being agreed, the place and manner of their conuention was appointed, and also the day and time assigned. Thus the parties (according to the agreement) conuenting together with their armies, withdrawing a little aside, as they were entred in communication, suddenlie among Ferdinandus men, happened a dag to be heard, which by the heate of the day (as is thought) losing of his owne accord, gaue a cracke. The sound whereof comming to the eares of Monachus, he supposing the same to haue beene discharged against him, in great anger drew out his sworde, bidding Ferdinandus auaunt with his doubling dissimulation, saying that he would neuer any more trust the promises of Christians, and immediatlie vpon the same sent to Solymannus the Turke, for aide against the Christians, promising that he would surrender to him free possession of Hungarie, if hee would come and banquish the armie of Ferdinandus lying about the siege of Buda. The Turk maketh no long tarying, but taketh the occasion, and with a mightie power, flieth into Hungarie, and ekstones discharging the host of Ferdinandus, and putting them off from the siege of Buda, getteth the city into his owne hands, commanding the son of Uaiuoda with his mother, to follow after his campe.

The communication betweene Monachus and Ferdinandus. What hurt may come of rash suspition.

The Turk called again into Hungary by the dissension betweene Monachus and Ferdinandus.

In the historie of Joannes Ramus it followeth, that when Solyman the Turke had thus preuailed against the citie of Buda aforesaid, and against other parts more of Hungary, by the assent of the Empire, one Joachimus Duke of Brandenburg, Prince Elector, was assigned with a puissant armie of chosen souldiors of all nations collected, to recouer the Citie of Buda from the Turke, and to deliuer the other parts of Christendome from the feare of the Turke, Anno 1542. Which Joachimus at his first setting forth, appeared so courragious and valiant, as thought he would haue conquered the whole world: but this great heate was so slaked in short time by the Turke, that before any great iopardie was offered vnto him, hee was glad to bee discharged of the voiage, and with shame enough, returned home againe. And would God he had left behinde him in the fields, no more but his owne shame. For the enemies hauing intelligence before of his cowardlie departure, thinking to worke some point of mastrie or victorie before his going, did set vpon the right wing of his armie (which chieflie consisted of Dutchmen of low Germany) out of the which they toke away with them aboue 500. strong and valiant souldiors, not killing them, but carying them away aliue. For whom it had beene much better to haue stood to their weapon and to haue died manfullie vpon the Turkes, then by yeelding themselues to hee disgarnished of weapon and armour, and so to be left to the cursed courtesie of the foule Turkes. To whom what curtesie was shewed, by the sequele did appeare. For after the Turkes had led them out of Hungarie into their owne Dominion, after a most horrible and beastlie sort they disfigured and mangled them, and so sent them abroad through all Grecia to be witnesses of ỹ Turks victorie. Their kinde of punishment was thus: First they had their right arme thrust thorough with an yron red hot, whereby they should be vnable and vnmeet to all labour and warrefare. Secondly, their heads were shauen to the verie sculles, after the manner of our Friers and Monkes, when they are newly shauen. Thirdlie, they had all their priuie members cut off from their bodies, to the intent to make them vnfruitfull for propagation; which wound was so greeuous vnto them, that the greatest part of them died therupon, the few that recouered the torment thereof, led a life more bitter and more miserable then death it selfe. And this kind of cruelty was executed in order vpō them al: In much like sorte did cruell Pharao exercise his tyrannie against the people of God in Egypt: who to destroy the generation of them, caused all the male children to bee drowned in the riuer. Whereby it is the more to be hoped, that seeing the tyranny of this Turkish Pharao is come to such an extremity, the mercifull goodnesse of God will the more shortly send some Moses or other vnto vs for our speedy deliuerance.

Ex Ioan. Ramo, de rebus Turcicis lib. 2.

This was by the cruell Turkes done, An. 1542. witnessed by Ioannes Ramus, which not only writeth the story, but by the testimony also of his owne eyes recordeth the same to bee true, beholding with his eyes one of the same number in the city of Vienna, who hauing wife and children in Bzurelles, either for shame or sorrow had no mind to returne home to his owne house. Ex Ioan. Ramo.

The falsenesse of the Turkes in keeping no promise with the Christians.

But to returne againe to the city of Buda, from whence we haue digressed, here is not to be pretermitted, what falshood and what cruelty the Turkes vsed toward the Christians there, after their victorie. For after that Solyman the Turke vpon yeelding and submission of the men of Buda, had giuen to them his promise of safety and life, within short time, the said Turke picking a quarrell with them for selling Dren vnto the Christians, and for bargaining with them, slue all the Magistrates of the said city of Buda: like as in all other cities, wheresoeuer the Christians yeelded vnto him, he neuer, or very rarely kept his promise with them, neither did euer any Christians speede better with the Turke, then they which most constantly did resist him.

An horrible example of the beastly cruelty of the false Turkes.

And as his promise with the Magistrates of Buda was false and wretched: so his cruelty with the souldiers thereof was much more notorious and abominable. For in the expugnation of Buda amongst the rest which were slaine, two Cohorts or bands of Christian souldiers came aliue to his hands. To whom, when he seemed at the first to grant pardon of life, he commanded to put on their armour againe, and to dispose themselues in order and battell array after the warlike maner of the Christians. Which when they had accomplished readily, according to his commandement, and hee riding about the rankes of them, had diligently viewed and beholden them a certaine space, at length hee commanded them to put off their armour againe. Which done, certaine of the tallest and strongest of them he picked out, the residue he commanded by his souldiers comming behind them, with swords to bee cut in peeces and slaine. Of the other, whom he had elected and chosen, some he set for markes and buts to be shot at: some he appointed to his two sons, for them to flash with their swords and trie their strength, which of them could giue the deeper wound, and (as they termed it) the fairer blow, whereby the most blood might follow out of their Christian bodies. Ex Mart. Stella. de successibus Turcarum.

Ex epist. Mart. Stellæ, de successibus Turcarum, &c.

After the winning of Buda, the Turke purposing not so to cease before he had subdued and brought vnder his obedience all Hungarie, proceeding further with his armie first brought vnder a strong hold of ỹ Christians named Pestũ or Pesta, where a great number of Christian souldiers partly were slaine, partly were led away to more cruell affliction.

The castle of Walpo won of the Turkes.

Then he came to another castle called Walpo situate in the confines of Bosna, Croatia, and Hungarie. Which fort or castle he besieged three monthes, while no rescue or aid was sent vnto them, neither from Ferdinandus king of Hungarie, nor from any other Christian prince or princes. Whereupon at length the fort was giuen vp to the Turke, but more through the false treacherie or cowardly heart of the souldiers then of the captaine. Wherein is to be noted an example not vnworthie of memorie. For when the cowardly souldiers, either for feare or flatterie, would needs surrender themselues and the piece vnto the Turke, contrarie to the mind of the captaine, which in no case would agree to their yeelding: they thinking to find fauour with the Turke, apprehended their captaine, and gaue him to Solyman. But see how the iustice of God sometimes by the hands of the enemie, disposeth the end of things to the rewarding of vertue, and punishing of vice. For where they thought to saue themselues by the danger of the faithfull captaine, the euent turned cleane contrarie, so that the Turke was to the captaine bountifull and verie liberall: and the souldiers notwithstanding that they had all yeelded themselues, yet were all put to death, and commanded pitiously to be slaine. The city of fiue churches yeelded to the Turkes.

There is in Hungarie another towne bearing the name of Fiue-churches, called Quinquecclesiensis, partly spoiled before, as is aboue mentioned, page 687. but now through the losse of Walpo, and by the hugenesse of the Turks armie (containing in it two hundred and twentie thousand fighting men) was so discouraged, and put out of hope and heart, that the bishop and chiefe nobles of the towne fled before the ieopardie: the rest of the commons, which were partly preuented by the sudden comming of the Turkes, partly for pouertie could not auoid, sent their messengers to the Turke, to yeeld and surrender the towne, vpon promise of life, vnto his hands. Whose promise how firme it stood, the story leaueth it vncertaine. This is affirmed, that three dates after the yeelding of this Quinquecclesiensis, neuer a Turke durst enter the citie, an. 1543. Ex Ioan. Mart. Stella, & alijs.

The bishop leaueth his flocke in the briers.

The next fort or hold gotten by the Turkes in Hungarie, was Socolsia. The towne at the first inuasion of the Turks, was won, sackt, and fiered. The castle within the towne, did something hold out for a time, and first requiring truce for 14. daies, to see what aid should be sent vnto them, to deliberate vpon the conditions that should bee proposed vnto them, after the 14. daies expired, they (trusting to the situation and munition of the place, which was very strong) began for a certaine space stoutly to put backe the enemie: But afterward seeing their walles to be battered, their foundations to shake (for ỹ Turk had set xij. thousand vnderminers vnder the ditches of the castle) and their strength to diminish, and misdoubting themselues not to be able long to hold out, agreed in like manner to yeeld themselues, vpon condition to escape with life and goods. Which condition of sauing their goods, was the losing of their liues, especially of the richer sort. For the Turks perceiuing by that condition, that they were of wealth and substance; omitting the inferiour or baser sort, fell vpon the wealthy men for their riches, and slue them euery one, an. 1543. ibid.

Couetousnesse of worldly goods is the destruction of many a man.

The Turke keepeth no promise.

In the which his history this is also to be noted, that during the time while the castle of Socolsia was besieged, the villages and pages round about the same, came of their owne accord, submitting and yeelding themselues vnto the Turke, bringing in (as they were commanded) all kind of victuall and forage, into the Turks campe. Which done, Solyman the Turke commanded all the head men of the pages to appeare before him: which humblie obeyed and came. Then the Turke warned them to returne againe the next day after, euerie one bringing with him his inferiour retinue, and houshold seruants. Which when they had with like diligence also, according to his commandement accomplished, the Turke immediatly commanded them euery one, in the face of his whole armie, to be slaine, and so was this their reward. Which reward, the more that it declareth the bloudie crueltie of the Turke: the more incourage it may minister to our men, the more constantlie to withstand him. Ex Martino Stella.

Example what commeth by Christian mens yeelding to the Turke.

Another strong towne there is in Hungarie named Strigonium, distant from Buda aboue said, the space of fiue Dutch miles, against the which the Turks made great preparation of ordinance, and all other instruments of artillerie necessarie for the siege thereof. Which citie in like manner began also to be compassed and inclosed by the Turks, before it could be sufficientlie prepared and garnished of our men, but that the archbishop onely of Strigon priuily conueied vnto them 200. men. Such was then the negligence of Ferdinandus king of Hungary, which so slenderlie looked vnto the necessarie defence of his townes and cities. Moreouer, such was the discord then of Christian kings and princes, which in their ciuill dissension and warres were so occupied and hot in needlesse quarrels, that they had neither leisure nor remembrance, to helpe in time there, where true need required. Which slender care, and cold zeale of the christian rulers, not in tendring the publicke cause, while they contended in priuate trifles, hath caused the Turke to come so far as he hath, and yet farther is like, vnlesse the mercie of the Lord doe helpe more, then our diligence. One of the chiefe captaines within the citie, was Martinus Lascanus, a Spaniard.

Strigonium a citie in Hungarie besieged of the Turkes.

Negligence of Christian princes in publicke defence.

The Turkes in the beginning of the siege began first to attempt the citizens with faire wordes, and accustomed promises, to yeeld and gently to submit themselues. But they not ignorant of the Turkes promises wisely refused, and manfullie stood so long as they could to the defence of their city: now and then skirmishing with them in out corners, and killing certain numbers of them: sometime with their shot disturbing their munitions, and breaking the wheeles of their gunnes, &c.

Three speciall helpes of the Turkes in winning townes and cities.

Three speciall meanes the Turkes vse in winning great forts and cities: great multitude of souldiours: great ordinance and mortary peeces: the third is by vndermining. All which here in the siege of this citie lacked not. This siege continued vehement a certaine space: in which the Strigonians had borne out foure strong assaultes, and slue many thousands of the Turkes, till at length the Turkes either departing away, or els seeming to depart vnto Buda, the people at last being so perswaded and made to beleeue of some chiefe rulers of the citie (peraduenture not the truest men) the citizens being erected with hope and comfort, and singing Te Deum, as though the citie had bene free from all danger, suddenly (by whose counsell it is vnknowne) conueied themselues all out of the citie. 300. horsemen also passed ouer the riuer and departed. The Italians which were vnder Franciscus Salamanca a Spanish captaine hardly could be perswaded by him to abide, which were in all scarse 600.

The Citizens of Strigonium flie the citie.

Within three dates after, 300. Germaine souldiours, with two ships laden with shot, pouder, and artillery, were priuilie let into the towne: So that of our men all there were scarse 1300. souldiors. Who seeing the small quantitie of their number, burning and casting downe the towne and suburbes, tooke them to the castle: from whence they beat off the Turks valiantlie with their ordinance, a good space, and with wilde fire destroied great companies of them, till at last they seeing their walles to faile them, and the whole castle to shake by vndermining, but especiallie by the working of a certaine Italian lian surnamed Presbyter, they gaue ouer. This Italian whether for feare or falshood, secretly vnknowing to the rest of the souldiers, accompanied with two other conueied himselfe downe from the walles, and being brought into the tents of the next captaine or Balla of the Turkes, there in the name of all his fellowes, conuented with the Turkes, to giue vp to them the Castle: whereupon the Turkes were bid to cease the shooting. This Italian shortly after with two other Turkes was sent backe to Salamanca his captain, with the Turkes message. The going out of this Italian being priuie to the residue of his fellowes, contrarie to the lawes and discipline of warre, although it seemed to come of his owne head; yet forsomuch as the other souldiers were not sure, but rather suspected lest the other Italians his countriemen had beene in some part of consent therein, and would take his part: neither durst offer him any harme for that his doing, nor yet could well aduise with themselues what was best to doe, for feare of priuie confederacie within themselues.

An Italian feare in yeelding the Castle of Strigonium to the Turke.

Thus while Lascanus the chiefe captaine of the Christians aforesaid, with his fellow souldiers, were in a maze what to do or not to doe: in the meane time came one running, who giuing a signe both to the Christians and to the Turkes, to hold their hands and weapons, for that it was against all law of warre to fight after peace and truce taken: our men, as they were commanded, went into the inward Tower. The Turkes in the meane time, had got into the Castle, and occupied all the vtter parts. Then was Salamanca by the consent of the rest, sent out to the Turke, who there being staied that night, the next morrow the Turkes bull or warrant was sent into the Castle, permitting free libertie to the Christians to depart with bag and baggage. Who now being ready to depart, first were commanded by the Turkes compalling them round about, to cast from them their dagges, launces, and battell axes, into the trench. Then comming to the gate to goe out, their swordes were taken from them, looking then for nothing but present death.

A Turkish truce taken with the Christians, they not knowing thereof.

The false Turkes neuer true in promise.

At last when they were come a little further, other were sent to them to discharge them of their helmets, their tergats, currets, and whatsoeuer piece of harnesse was about them. Whereupon great feare came vpon them, lest some great cruelty should be shewed vpon them. Solyman after he had long deliberated with himselfe, whether to kill them or not, at last contrary to all expectation granted their liues: but before they should be dismissed, hee first caused them, in derision of Christianitie, to be bayted with scornes and mockes throughout all the Turkish armie, and so the next day commanded them being stript out of their coats and apparell, to be reduced againe into the castle by companies, setting ouer them certaine Turkes with cudgels and bats to lay vpon their backes and sides, causing them to burie the dead carcases, and to gather vp the rubbish broken downe from the castle walles, and to scoure the ditches. Which done, the next day following he demanded of them by an interpreter, whether they would enter wages with him, and take horse and armour to serue him in his warres: Which condition diuers for feare were contented to take, seeing no other remedie to auoid present death. Some neither by menacing words, nor for anie feare of death, could be compelled thereunto, of whom certaine which stood stoutly in refusing thereof, were presently slaine, whom I may worthily recite in the number and catalogue of holie martyrs.

The miserable affliction of our Christian souldiours taken at Strigonium.

Holy souldiers and martyrs slaine of the Turkes for their faithfull religion.

Of the foresaid Christians, part were carried ouer the riuer of Danubius, not without great villanie, and contumelie most despitefull: For some had their wiues taken from them and carried away, some had their wiues rauished before their face: and such as made or shewed any resistance thereat, had their wiues before them cast into the riuer and drowned: also their infants and yong children, being appointed by the Turks to the abominable order of the Janizarites, mentioned before pag. 681. their parents not consenting thereunto, were precipitate and throwen into the riuer and drowned. All which things are testified by Iohn Martinus Stella, in his epistles in print extant, written to his two brethren, William and Michael, &c. Which Martin Stella moreouer this addeth and affirmeth, that he himselfe being the same time at Vienna, did see one of the foresaid wiues, who being holden fast by the haire of the head, yet notwithstanding hauing her haire pluckt off, cast her selfe into the riuer Danubius, for the singular loue to her husband, and so swamme to the ship where he was. And thus this miserable companie of Germaines, Spaniards and Italians mixt together, macerate with labours, with hunger pined, with watchings, dolours, and sorrow consumed, came at length to Schinda.

Ex Ioan. Mart. Stella in epist. ad fratres.

Diuers opinions of the Viennans touching these miserable afflicted souldiers.

When the tidings thereof was noised at Vienna, partlie with feare and dread, partly with indignation, all mens hearts were moued and vered diuerslie. Some thought them not worthie to be received into their citie, shewing themselues so dastardly and cowardlie. Others thought againe that mercie was to be shewed vnto them, and commended their fact, for that they being so few, and vnfurnished of aid, neither able to match by any meanes with such an innumerable multitude of the Turkes, kept themselues till better time might serue them. But howsoeuer the matter was to bee thought of, the captaines brought the poore remnant of that rufull company, vnto Possidonium, where the said captains were laid fast, and there kept in durance, to render account of the whole matter, how it was wrought and handled. And thus haue yee the lamentable storie of Strigonium.

The Turke proceeding in his victories, conducted his armie next vnto Tath, and to the pares lying neere about Comaron. This Tath was also a strong hold in Hungarie, wherein were placed certaine garrisons, partly of the Germans, partly of the Italians. The chieftain of the Italians was one Annibal Tasso, constitute by Philippus Tornelius. This Tasso was a man well expert in prowesse of war: but of a filthie corrupt life, and also a foule swearer, and horrible blasphemer of God and his saints. To make the storie short, this fort of Tath, before any siege was laid vnto it, was yeelded and giuen vp to the turks: vpon what conditions, or by whose meanes, the author sheweth not: Thus much he sheweth, that the said Annibal shortly vpon the same, returning into Italie, was commanded by Tornelius aforesaid, to be apprehended and beheaded.

Tath subdued of the Turks.

Mercie hath neuer succeeded vnder a wicked captaine and swearer.

After the turks had subuerted and destroyed the fort of Tath, they turned their power against Alba, surnamed Regalis, for that the kings of Hungary haue been alwaies wont there to bee crowned and buried. This Alba is a little well compacted citie in Hungary, hauing on the one side a marish somewhat foggie or fennie, which made the towne lesse assautable. But neere to the same was a wood, from the which the Turks euery day with vj. C. carts, brought such matter of wood and trees felled for the same purpose, into the marish, that within lesse then 12. daies they made it apt, and hard to their feet, which the townes men thought neuer could bee gone vpon, but only in the hard frosts of winter. At the first beginning of the siege, there stood a little without the munitions in the front of the citie, a certaine Church or Monasterie, which the citizens pretending to maintaine and keepe against the turkes, had priuilie conueighed light matter easily to take flame, with pouder, in secret places thereof, and had bid also fire withall. Which done, they (as against their willes being driuen backe) withdrew themselues within the munitions, watting the occasions, when this fire would take. Thus the turkes hauing the possession of the Church, suddenlie the fire comming to the pouder, raised vp the church, and made a great scatter and slaughter among the barbarous turks. This was not so soone espied of them within the towne, but they issued out vpon them in this disturbance, and slue of them a great number: Among whom diuers of their nobles also the same time were slaine, and one Balla an Eunuch, which was of great estimation with the turks. Moreouer, in the same skirmish was taken one of those gunners which the French king is said to haue sent to the Turke a little before. Which if it be true, let the christian reader iudge what is to be thought of those christian princes, which not onelie forsaking the common cause of Christes Church ioyned league with the turke, but also sent him gunners to set forward his warres to the destruction of Christs people, and to the shedding of their blood, for whom they know the blood of Christ to be shed. If this be not true, I shewe mine author: If it be, then let the pope see and marke well how his title of Christianissimus, can well agree with such doings.

A stratagem of the Christians against the Turks.

A note touching the French king that then was.

Ex epist. Ioan. Marii Stella. ad fratres De Tovcar. in Hungaria successibus.

But to let this matter slepe, although the Turkes (as yee heard) had wonne the fenne, with their policie and industrie, against the citie of Alba, yet all this while the Albanes were nothing inferiour to their enemies, through the valiant helpe and courageous indeuour of Octauianus Setruzatus, a captaine of Millane. By whose prudent counsell and constant standing, the busie enterprises of the Turkes did little preuaile a long time, till at length, suddenly arose a thick fogge or mist vpon the citie, where as round about besides, the sunne did shine bright. Some said it came by Art Magicall, but rather it may appeare to rise out of the fenne or marish, being so pressed downe with mens feete and other matter laid vpon it.

The Turkes vsing the occasion of this misty darkenesse in secret wise approching the walles, had got vp to a certaine fortresse, where the Germaines were, before our men could well perceiue them: where they pressed in so thick, and in such number, that albeit the christian souldiors standing strongly to the defence of their liues, did what valiant men in cases of such extremitie were able to doe: yet being ouermatched with the multitude of the Turkes, and the suddennesse of their comming, gaue backe, seeking to retire into the inward walles. Which when their other fellowes did see to recule, then was there flying of all hands euerie man striuing to get into the citie. There was betweene the outward walles or damures, and inward gate of the citie, a streit or narrow passage, cast vp in maner of a bancke or causey, ditched on both sides: which passage or ingresse happened the same time to be barred and stopped. By reason whereof the poore souldiors were forced to cast themselues into the ditch, thinking to swimme as well as they could, into the citie: where many of them sticking in the mud, were drowned; one pressing vpon another: many were slaine of their enemies comming behind them.

The outward walles got by the turkes.

A miserable slaughter of christian souldiors.

them, they hauing neither hart, nor power to resist. A few which could swim out, were receiued into the city: but the chiefe captaines and warders of the towne were there slaine.

The citizens being destitute of their principall captaines and warriers, were in great perplexity and doubt among themselues, what to doe, some thinking good to yeeld, some counselling the contrary. Thus while the minds of the citizens were distract in diuers and doubtfull sentences, the magistrats minding to stand to the Turkes gentlenesse, sent out one of their heads vnto the Turke, who in the name of them all, should surrender to him the city, and become vnto him tributaries, vpon condition they might enioy libertie of life and goods; which being to them granted, after the Turkish faith and assurance, first the souldiers which were left within the city, putting off their armour, were discharged and sent away. Who being but only 300. left of 4. ensignes of Italians, & of a thousand Germaines, by the way were laid for by the Tartarians, for hope of their spoile: so that they scattering asunder one one way, an other an other to saue themselues as well as they could, fled euery one what way hee thought best. Of whom some wandering in woods and marishes fainted for famine: some were taken and slaine by the Hungarians, a few with bare and emptie, and withered bodies, more like ghostes the men, escaped and came to Vienna. And this befell vpon the souldiers.

Let neuer good Christians stand to the Turkes gentlenesse.

Now vnderstand what happened to the yéelding citizens. So in story it followeth, that when the Turke had entred the towne, and had visited the sepulchre of the kings, for three or foure daies he pretended much clemencie toward the citizens, as though he came not to oppresse them but to bee reuenged of Ferdinandus their king, and to deliuer them from the seruitude of the Germaines. On the fourth day all the chiefe & head men of the city were commanded to appeare before the Turke in a plaine, not far from the city, where the condemned persons before were wont to be executed, as though they should come to sweare vnto the Turke. At this commandement of the Turke, when the citizens in great number, and in their best attire were assembled, the Turke contrary to his faith and promise, commanded suddenly a generall slaughter be made of them all. And this was the end of the citizens of Alba.

The crueltie of the Turkes against the Christians. What it is to yeeld to the Turke and to sticke to his promise. The citizens of Alba destroyed of the Turkes.

In the meane time, during the siege of Alba, the Hungarians meeting sometimes with the horsemen of the Tartarians, which were sent out to stop their victuals from the citie, slew of them at one bickering three thousand Turkes. In which storie is also reported and mentioned of mine author, an horrible sight and example of misery, concerning a certaine captiue (a Christian belike) who comming into Vienna, was found to haue in his scrip or satchell the halfe of a yong child of two yéeres old, which remained yet vneaten, the other halfe being eaten before, an. 1543. Next after this was erpugned the castle of Pappa, by the Turkes. Let the castle now of Papa take heed, lest one day it follow after.

The castle of Pappa wonne of the Turkes.

The like fidelitie the Turkes also kept, with the fort of Wizigradum and the souldiers thereof. This Wizigradum is situate in the mid way betweene Buda and Strigonium. Of the which fort or castle, the highest tower so mounteth vpon the hill, that vnlesse it be for famine and lacke of watter, they haue not to dread any enemie. Notwithstanding so it happened, that the lower piece being won, they in the higher tower abiding foure daies without drinke, were compelled with libertie granted of life and goods, to yéeld themselues. But the diuelish Turks keeping no faith nor promise, slew them euery one, only Petrus Amandus the captaine of the piece, excepted: who priuily was conueyed by the captaine of the Turkes, out of the slaughter, an. 1544.

Wizigradum got and surprised of the Turkes. The false dealing and cruelty of the Turkes against the Christians.

To these moreouer may be added the winning of Nouum Castellum in Dalmatia, where he slew all that were within, both souldiers and other, for that they did not yéeld themselues in time. Thus the Turke, whether they yéelded to him or not, neuer spared the people and flocke of Christ.

Nouum Castellum in Dalmatia wonne by the Turkes.

As the false and cruell Turke was thus raging in Hungarie, and intended further to rage without all mercie and pitie of the Christians, and easily might then haue preuailed and gone whither he would, for that Charles the emperour and Franciscus the French king were the same time in warre and hostilitie, and also other Christian princes, as Henrie duke of Brunswike, against Iohn Fredericke duke of Saxonie, also princes and rulers were contending among themselues: behold the gratious prouidence of our Lord and God toward vs, who seeing the miserie, and hauing pitie of his poore Christians, suddenly as with a snaffle reined this raging beast, and brought him out of Europe into his owne countrie againe, by occasion of the Persians, who were then in great preparation of war against the Turkes, and had inuaded his dominion. By reason whereof the Turkes were kept there occupied, fighting with the Persians a long continuance. Which warres at length being atchieued and finished, (wherin the said Turke lost great victories, with slaughter of many thousands of his Turkes) he was not only prouoked by the instigation of certaine euill disposed Hungarians, but also occasioned by the discord of Christian princes, to returne againe into Europe, in hope to subdue all the parts thereof vnto his dominion. Whereunto when hee had leuied an armie incredible of such a multitude of Turkes, as the like hath not lightly bin heard of, see againe the mercifull prouidence and protection of our God toward his people. As the Turke was thus intending to set forward with this innumerable multitude against the Christians, the hand of the Lord sent such a pestilence through all the Turks armie and dominions, reaching from Bithynia, and from Thracia, to Macedonia and also to Hungarie, that all the Turks possessions almost seemed nothing els, but as an heape of dead corses, whereby his voiage for that time was stopped, and hee almost compelled to seeke a new armie.

The discord of Christian princes within themselues. The Turke occasioned to returne out of Europe into Asia.

The prouidence of God for his Christians.

Another example of Gods prouidence for his.

Besides this plague of the Turks aforesaid, which was worse to them then any warre, other lets also and domesticall calamities through Gods prouidence happened vnto Solymannus, the great rouer and robber of the world, which staied him at home from vexing the Christians, especiallie touching his eldest sonne Mustapha.

This Mustapha being hated and partlie feared of Rustanus the chiefe counsellour about the Turke, and of Rosa the Turkes concubine, and after his wife, was diuers times complained of to his father, accused, and at length so brought into suspition and displeasure of the Turke, by them aforesaid; that in conclusion his father caused him to bee sent for to his pauilion, where 6. Turks with visours were appointed to put him to death: who comming vpon him, put (after their manner) a small cord or bow-string full of knots about his necke, and so throwing him downe vpon the ground, not suffering him to speake one word to his father, with the twitch thereof throtled and strangled him to death, his father standing in a secret corner by, and beholding the same. Which fact being perpetrate, afterward when the Turke would haue giuen to another sonne of his and of Rosa, called Gianger, the treasures, horse, armour, ornaments, and the prouince of Mustapha his brother; Gianger crying out for sorrow of his brothers death: Fie of thee, saith hee to his father, thou impious and wretched dogge, traitour, murderer, I cannot call thée father, take the treasures, the horse and armour of Mustapha to thy selfe: and with that taking out his dagger, thrust it thorow his owne bodie. And thus was Solyman murderer and parricide of his owne sonnes: which was in the yéere of our Lord 1552.

Solyman the Turke murdereth Mustapha his owne sonne.

Wherein notwithstanding is to be noted the singular prouidence and loue of the Lord toward his afflicted Christians. For this Mustapha as he was courageous and greatly expert and exercised in all practise of warre: so had he a cruell heart, maliciously set to shed the bloud of Christians: Wherefore great cause haue we to congratulate, and to giue thankes to God, for the happy taking away of this Mustapha. And no lesse hope also and good comfort wée may conceiue of our louing Lord, hereby ministred vnto vs, to thinke that our mercifull God after these sore afflictions of his Christians vnder these 12. Turkes afore recited: now after this Solyman, intendeth some gratious good worke to Christendome, to reduce and release vs out of this so long and miserable Turkish captiuitie: as may be hoped now by taking away these yong impes of this impious generation, before they should come to worke their conceiued malice against vs: the Lord therefore be glorified and praised: Amen.

The louing prouidence of our Lord for his Christians.

Good hope at Gods hand to be conceiued of the Christians.

Moreouer, as I was in writing hereof, opportunelie came to my hands a certaine writing out of Germanie, certifying vs of such newes and victorie of late atchieued against the Turke, as may not a little increase our hope and comfort vs, touching the decay and ruine of the Turkes power and tyrannie against vs. Which newes are these: that after the Turkish tyrant had besieged with an armie of 30000. men, the famous and strong towne and castle of Iula in Hungary lying 40. dutch miles beyond the riuer Danubius, which citie had, by the space of fiue weekes sustained many grieuous assaults: God through his great mercie and goodnesse so comforted the said towne of Iula and the poore Christians therein, at their earnest praiers, that the Turke with all his host was driuen backe, by the handes of the Generall called Karetshim Laslaw and his valiant companie: who not onely defended the said towne, but also constrained the Turkes to retire, to their great shame and confusion, with a great slaughter of the Turkish rable: For the which the euerlasting God be praised for euer.

Good newes of the Turks lately repulsed by the Christians.

The maner of the ouerthrow was this. As the foresaid generall did see his aduantage with captaine George, and other horsmen of the Sclesians and Hungarians, they set on the rereward of the Turkes and killed about 8000. of them, & toke also some of their artillarie and followed them so fast, that the Turks were constrained to flie vnto a marish ground, and to breake the wheeles of the rest of their artillary, to saue themselues, and therewith they got a very rich bootie, rescuing besides and taking from the Turkes a great number of Christian prisoners. Like thankes also are to be giuen to God, for the prosperous successe giuen to Magotschie the valiant Captaine of Erla, who making toward the Turkes, and encountring encountring with the Tartarians, slue of them about 8. hundred.

A great captain of the Turkes slaine, and his treasure taken.

Not long after this, it happened through the like prouidence of our God, a Turkish captaine called Begen, accompanied with a thousand freshe horsemen came newly out of Turkie, to goe toward the city named Quinque Ecclesiæ, or Finffenkyrchen: with whom the earle of Serin by the way did encounter, and in the night setting vpon him, killed the captaine and tooke eight Camels, and eight Moyles laden with treasure, and also got two red Guidons, with a whole great peece of rich cloth of gold, and with another faire and strange iewell. The horse of this foresaid Turkish captaine, was betrapped and decked most richly. The saddle whereof had the pommell and the back part couered ouer with plate of fine Arabicke gold, and the rest of the saddle, beside the sitting place, was plated with siluer very faire gilded. The seat of the saddle was couered with purple veluet: the trappers and bridle beset with little Turkeies and Rubies: which horse was sent to Vienna vnto the emperour Maximilian for a present.

Although the earle would very faine haue saued the captaine, not knowing what he was, yet the Janizarites labouring to carrie away their captaine, so stiffely defended themselues, that the earle with his company, was constrained to kill both them and their captaine. From whom the said earle of Serin the same time got 15. thousand Turkish and Hungarish Ducates: which money was brought for the paiment of the Turkish souldiers in the towne aforesaid of Finffenkyrchen, &c. All which be good beginnings of greater goodnesse to bee hoped for hereafter, through the grace of Christ our Lord; especially if our Christian rulers and potentates, first the churchmen and prelates for their parts: then the ciuill powers and princes for their parts, withholding their affections a little, will turne their brawles and variance, into brotherly concord and agreement; which the Lord of peace put in their minds to doe, Amen. Or otherwise if it will so please the Lord, that the Turke come further vpon vs, so as he hath begun, for our punishment and castigation, his grace then giue to the flocke of his poore Christians constancie of faith, patience in suffering, and amendment of life: For so I vnderstand by publike fame, although vncertainly rumored by the voice of some, that the Turkes power of late, this present yeere of our Lord 1566. hath pierced the parts of Apulia within Italie, wasting and burning the space of an hundred miles toward Naples. Which if it be certaine, it is to be feared, that the Turke hauing thus set in his foot, and feeling the sweetnesse of Italie, will not so cease before he get in both head and shoulders also so far into Italie, that he will display his banners within the walles of Rome, and do with old Rome the like as Mahumet his great grandfather did with new Rome, the citie of Constantinople, and as the Persians did with Babylon.

The Turke piercing into Italie.

Coniectures why it is to be feared that the Turke shall get Rome.

The causes why we haue so to iudge, be diuers: first, that the see of Rome hath been defended hitherto, and maintained with much blood; and therfore it may seeme not vncredible, but that it will not long continue, but be lost with blood againe, according to the verdict of the Gospell: He that striketh with the sword, shall perish with the sword, &c. Another cause is, the fulfilling of the eighteenth chapter of the Apocalyps: where is written, that great Babylon shall fall and be made an habitation of diuels, and a den of vncleane spirits, and a cage of filthie and vncleane birds: the fall whereof shall be like a millstone in the sea, that is, which shall not rise againe. And this to come before the day of iudgement, the text of the said chapter doth apertly declare: where the words do follow, shewing that the kings of the earth, and the merchants which had to do with the whorish citie, standing a far off for feare of the heat, and beholding the smoke of the said citie flaming and burning with fire, shall bewaile and rue her destruction and desolation, &c. What citie this is, called great Babylon, which like a millstone shall fall and burne, and be made an habitation of vncleane spirits, and beasts, let the Reader cõstrue. This is certaine and plaine by these her kings and merchants standing a far off for feare, and beholding her burning, that the destruction of this citie (what citie soeuer it be) shall be seene heere in earth before the comming of the Lords iudgement, as may easily be gathered by these three circumstances, that is, by the standing, the beholding, and bewailing of her merchants. By the which merchants and kings of the earth, peraduenture may be signified, the pope, the rich cardinals, the great prelats and fat doctors, and other obediencIaries of the Romish see: who at the comming of the Turkes, will not aduenture their liues for their church, but will flie the citie (no doubt) and stand a far off from danger: and when they shall see with their eyes, and heare with their eares the citie of Rome to be set on fire and consumed by the cruell Turkes, the sight thereof shall seeme to them pitious and lamentable, to behold the great and faire citie of Rome, the tall castle of Saint Angell, the popes mightie see (where they were wont to fill out such riches, dignities, treasures, and pleasure) so to burne before their eyes, and to come to such vtter desolation, which shall neuer be reedified againe, but shall bee made an habitation of diuels and vncleane spirits, that is, of Turkes, and heathen Sultans, and barbarous Saracens, &c.

The prophecie of the eighteenth chapter of the Apocalyps expounded.

This (I say) peraduenture may be the meaning of that prophetical place of the Apocalyps: not that I haue here any thing to pronounce, but only giue my gesse, what may probably be coniectured. But the end at length will make this and all other things more plaine and manifest. For mysticall prophecies lightly are neuer so well vnderstood, as when the euent of them is past and accomplished.

The third cause. Ex Paulo Iouio.

Another cause concurring with the causes aforesaid, may be collected out of Paulus Iouius, who writing of the subuersion of Rhodes, which was, as yee heard, an. 1522. vpon Christmas day, saith, that it chanced suddenly the same day in Rome, that as pope Hadrian the vi. was entring into the Church to his seruice, suddenly ouer his head the vpper frontier or top of the chapell doore, which was of marble, immediatlie as the pope was entring, fell downe and slue certaine of his guard waiting vpon him. Whereby peraduenture may bee meant, that the ruine of Rome was not long after to follow the losse of Rhodes.

The fourth cause. Ex Ioan. Auentino Annal. lib. 3. fol. 30.

The fourth cause I borrow out of Ioannes Auentinus, who in his third booke alleaging the names, but not the words of Hildegardis, Brigit, and other prophetical men hath these words; Si vera sunt carmina & vaticinia D. Hildegardæ, & Brigittæ, Sibyllarum Germaniæ, & Bardorum fatidicorum, qui ea quæ nostro æuo completa vidimus, longo ante tempore nobis cecinerunt: Agrippinensis Colonia, nolimus, velimus, Turcarum caput erit, &c. That is, If the sayings and prophecies of Hildegard, of Brigit, and of other prophetical persons bee true, which being foretold long before, wee haue seene now in these our daies accomplished: the towne of Colen will wee, nill wee, must needs bee the head citie of the Turks, &c.

A prophecie.

And this I write not as one pronouncing against the citie of Rome, what will happen, but as one fearing what may fall. Which if it come to passe (as I pray God it doe not) then shall the pope well vnderstand, whither his wrong vnderstanding of the Scriptures, and his false flattering glosers vpon the same, haue brought him.

A counsel to the bishop of Rome, if he be wise.

Wherefore my counsell is to the pope, and all his popish maintainers and vpholders, to humble themselues, and to agree with their brethren betime, letting all contention fall: lest that while the bishop of Rome shall striue to be the highest of all other bishops, it so fall out shortly, that the bishop of Rome shall be found the lowest of all other bishops, or peraduenture no bishop at all.

Ex Paulo Iouio.

Whereunto also another cause may bee added, taken out of Hieronymus Sauonarola, who prophecieth, that one shall come ouer the Alpes like vnto Cyrus, and destroy Italy. Whereof see more pag. 672.

This Solymanus, if he be yet aliue, hath now raigned 46. yeares, who began the same yeare, in the which the Emperour Charles the v. was crowned, which was an. 1520. and so hath continued by Gods permission, for a scourge to the Christians, vnto this yeare now present 1566. This Solyman by one of his Concubines, had his eldest sonne called Mustapha. By another Concubine called Rosa, he had foure sonnes, Mahumet, Baiazetes, Zelymus, and Gianger. Of the which sonnes, Mustapha and Gianger were slaine (as yee heard before) by the meanes of their owne father. And thus much concerning the wretched tyrannie of the Turkes out of the authors hereunder written.

¶ A notice touching the miserable persecution, slaughter, and captiuitie of the Christians vnder the Turkes.

Persecution vnder the Turkes.

HItherto thou hast heard (Christian Reader) the lamentable persecutions of these latter daies, wrought by the Turkes against the people and seruants of Christ. In the reading whereof, such as sit quietlie at home, and be farre from ieopardie, may see what miserie there is abroad: the knowledge and reading whereof, shall not be vnprofitable for all Christians earnestlie to waighe consider, for that manie there be, which fallly deceiuing themselues, imagine that Christiantie is a quiet and restfull state of life, full of pleasure and solace in this present world, when indeede it is nothing lesse, testified by the mouth of our Sauiour himselfe, who rightly defining his his kingdome, teacheth vs that his kingdome is not of this world, premonishing vs also before, that in this world wee must looke for affliction, but in him wee shall haue peace. Examples hereof in all parts of this history thorough all ages are plenteous and euident to be seene, whether wee turne our eyes to the first tenne persecutions in the primitiue church, during the first three hundred yeeres after Christ: or whether we consider the latter three hundred yeeres in this last age of the church, wherein the poore flocke of Christ hath beene so afflicted, oppressed and deuoured, that it is hard to say whether haue been more cruell against the Christians, the infidell Emperors of Rome in the primitiue age of the church, or else these barbarous Turkes in these our latter times of the church now present.

Comparison betweene the persecutions of the primitiue church and of the latter church.

Thus from time to time the church of Christ almost hath had little or no rest in this earth, what for the heathen emperours on the one side, what for the proud pope on the other side, on the third side what for the barbarous Turke: for these are and haue beene from the beginning the three principall and capitall enemies of the church of Christ, signified in the Apocalyps by the beast, the false lambe, and the false prophet, from whom went out three foule spirits like frogges, to gather together all the kings of the earth to the battell of the day of the Lord God almightie: Apocalyps 16. The cruelty and malice of these enemies against Christs people hath been such, that to iudge which of them did most exceede in cruelty of persecution, it is hard to say: but that it may bee thought that the bloodie and beastly tyrannie of the Turkes especially aboue the rest, incomparablie surmounteth all the afflictions and cruell slaughters that euer were seene in any age, or read of in any story: Insomuch that there is neither historie so perfect, nor writer so diligent, who writing of the miserable tyranny of the Turkes, is able to expresse or comprehend the horrible examples of their vnspeakeable cruelty and slaughter exercised by these 12. Turkish tyrants, vpon poore Christian mens bodies, within the compasse of these latter three hundred yeeres. Whereof although no sufficient relation can be made, nor number expressed: yet to giue to the reader some generall gesse or view thereof; let vs first perpend and consider what dominions and empires, how many countries, kingdomes, prouinces, cities, townes, strong holds and forts, these Turkes haue surprised and wonne from the Christians. In all which victories, being so many, this is secondly to be noted, that there is almost no place, which y Turks euer came to and subdued, where they did not either slay all the inhabitants thereof, or led away the most part thereof into such captiuitie and slauerie, that they continued not long after alme, or else so liued, that death almost had been to them more tollerable.

Apoc. 16. The cruelty of the furious Turkes described.

Two things to be noted in the Turkes: how many victories they haue got, and how cruelly they haue vsed their victories.

Like as in the time of the first persecutions of the Romane emperours, the saying was, that no man could step with his foot in all Rome, but should tread vpon a martyr: so here may be said, that almost there is not a towne, citie, or village in all Asia, Grecia, also in a great part of Europa, and Aphrica, whose streets haue not flowed with blood of the Christians, whom the cruell Turkes haue murthered. Of whom are to be seene in histories, heapes of souldiers slaine, of men and women cut in pieces, of children sticked vpon poles and stakes, whom these detestable Turkes most spitefully (and that in the sight of their parents) vse to gore to death: some they drag at their horse tailes and famish to death: some they teare in pieces, tying their armes and legs to foure horses: other some they make markes to shot at: vpon some they trie their swords, how deepe they can cut and slash, as ye before haue read, page 691. The aged and feeble they treade vnder their horses: women with child they spare not, but rip their bodies, and cast the infants into the fire, or otherwise destroy them. Whether the Christians yeeld to them, or yeeld not, all is a matter. As in their promises there is no truth, so in their victories there is no sense of manhood or mercie in them, but they make hauocke of all.

Ex Marino Barletio de Scodr. expugnat. lib. 2.

So the citizens of Troia, after they had yeelded and were all promised their liues, were all destroyed and that horrible. In Mysia, after the king had giuen himselfe to the Turkes hand, hauing promise of life, Mahumet the Turke slew him with his owne hands. The princes of Rasia had both their eyes put out with basens red hot set before them. Theodosia, otherwise called Capha, was also surrendered to the Turke, hauing the like assurance of life and safetie: and yet contrarie to the league, the citizens were put to the sword and slaine. At the winning and yeelding of Lesbos, what a number of yong men and children were put vpon sharpe stakes and poles, and so thrust thorow? At the winning of the citie of Buda, what tyrannie was shewed and exercised against the poore Christians, which had yeelded themselues, and against the two dukes, Christopher Billerer and Joannes Tranbinger, contrarie to the promise and handwriting of the Turke, is to be seene in the storie of Melchior Soiterus, de bello Pannonico.

Ex Michael. Soitero, lib. 1. de Bello Pannonico, fol. 515.

The like also is to be read in the storie of Bernardus de Breydenbach, who writing of the taking of Hydruntum, a citie in Apulia, testifieth of the miserable slaughter of the young men there slaine, of old men troden vnder the horse feet, of matrons and virgins rauished, of women with child cut and rent in peeces, of the priests in the Churches slaine, and of the archbishop of that citie, who being an aged man and holding the crosse in his hands, was cut asunder with a wodden saw, &c. The same Bernardus also writing of the ouerthrow of Nigropontus, otherwise called Chalcides, an. 1471. describeth the like terrible slaughter, which there was exercised: where the Turke, after his promise giuen before to the contrarie, most cruelly caused all the youth of Italie to be pricked vpon sharpe stakes: some to be dashed against the hard stones, othersome to be cut in sunder in the middest, and other more with other kinds of torments to be put to death: insomuch that all the streetes and waies of Chalcides did flow with the blood of them, which were there slaine. In which historie the foresaid writer recordeth one memorable example of maidenly chastitie, worthie of all Christians to bee noted and commended. The story is told of the Prætors daughter of that Citie, who being the only daughter of her father, and noted to be of an exceeding singular beautie, was saued out of the slaughter, and brought to Mahumet the Turke, to be his concubine: But she denying to consent to his Turkish appetite and filthinesse, was commanded therewith to be slaine and murthered, and so died she a martyr, keeping both her faith and her bodie vndefiled vnto Christ her spouse. ibid.

Vide supra, pag. 683. Ex Bernardo Breydenb.

A notable example of maidenly chastitie.

Vid supra, pag. 684.

The like crueltie also was shewed vpon them which kept the castle, and afterward yeelding themselues vpon hope of the Turks promise, were slaine euery one. What should I speake of the miserable slaughter of Methone, and the cittizens thereof dwelling in Peloponesus: who seeing no other remedie but needs to come into the Turkes hands, set the barne on fire where they were gathered together, men, women, and children: some women also with child voluntarilie cast themselues into the sea, rather then they would sustaine the Turks captiuitie. Vide pag. 684.

The miserable spilling of Christian mens bloud by the wretched Turks.

Miserable it is to behold, long to recite, incredible to beleeue all the cruell parts and horrible slaughters wrought by these miscreants, against the Christians, through all places almost of the world, both in Asia, in Africa, but especiallie in Europa. Who is able to recite the innumerable societies and companies of the Grecians martyred by the Turks sword in Achaia, Attica, Thessalia, Macedonia, Epyrus, and all Peloponesus: besides the Iland of Rhodes and other Ilands and Cyclades adiacent in the sea about, numbred to 52. of the which also Pathmos was one, where Saint John being banished, wrote his Reuelations. Where did euer the Turks set any foot, but the bloud of Christians there, without pitie or measure, went to wracke: and what place or prouince is there almost thorough the world, where the Turks either haue not pierced, or are not like shortly to enter? In Thracia, and thorough all the coastes of Danubius, in Bulgaria, Dalmatia, in Seruia, Transiluania, Bosna, in Hungaria, also in Austria, what hauocke hath beene made by them, of Christian mens bodies, it will rue any christian heart to remember. At the siege of Moldauia, at the winning of Buda, of Pesta, of Alba, of Walpo, Strigonium, Soeclosia, Tathe, Wizigradum, Nouum Castellum in Dalmatia, Belgradum, Varadinum, Quinque-ecclesiae: also at the battell of Varna, where Ladislaus king of Polony with all his armie almost, through the rashnesse of the popes cardinall were slaine: at the winning moreouer of Fabiacchus, Lyssus, Dynastrum: at the siege of Guntza, and of the faithfull towne Scorad, where the number of the shotte against their walles, at the siege thereof, were reckoned to 2539. likewise at the siege of Vienna, where all the Christian captiues were brought before the whole armie and slaine, and diuers drawen in peeces with horses: but especiallie at the winning of Constantinople, aboue mentioned, pag. 651. also at Troia and Methone, what beastly cruelties was shewed, it is vnspeakable. For as in Constantinople, Mahumet the drunken Turke neuer rose from dinner, but he caused euerie day, for his disport 200. Christian captiues of the nobles of that citie to be slaine before his face: so in Methone, after that his captaine Omares had sent vnto him at Constantinople 500. prisoners of the Christians, the cruell tyrant commanded them all to be cut and diuided in sunder by the middle, and so being slaine, to be throwen out into the fields.

A diuerse recital of Christian townes and forts wonne of the Turke in Europe.

The crueltie of the Turke against the Citizens of Constantinople. Vide supra, pag. 651.

The crueltie of the Turke against the prisoners of Methone. Ex Leonico Chalcondyla de rebus Turcicis, l. b. 10.

Leonicus Chalcondyla, writing of the same storie, addeth moreouer a prodigious narration (if it be true) of a brute Ore; which being in the fieldes, and seeing the carcases of the dead bodies so cut in two, made there a loud noise after the lowing of his kinde and nature: and afterward comming to the quatters of one of the dead bodies lying in the field, first tooke vp the one halfe, and then comming againe, tooke vp likewise the other halfe, and so (as hee could) ioyned them both together. Which being espied of them which saw the doing of the brute Ore, and marueilling thereat, and word being brought thereof to Mahumet, he commanded the quatters again to be brought, where they were before, to proue whether the beast would come againe: who failed not (as the author recordeth) but in like sort as before, taking the fragments of the dead corpes, laid them againe together. It followeth more in the author, how how that Mahumet being astonied at the strange wonder of the Ore, commanded the quarters of the Christian mans body to be interred, and the Ore to be brought to his house, and was much made of. Some said it to bee the body of a Venetian: some affirmed, that hee was an Illyrian: but whatsoeuer hee was, certaine it is, that the Turke himselfe was much more bestiall then was the very brute Ore: which being a beast shewed more sense of humanity, to a dead man, then one man did to another. Ex Leonic. Chalcondyla.

A strange and prodigious wonder of a brute beast toward a dead christian body.

The bishop with the Citizens of Methone slaine of the Turke. Ex Andrea de Lacuna, & alijs.

To this cruelty adde moreouer, that beside these 500. Methonians thus destroyed at Constantinople, in the said city of Methone, all the townesmen also were slaine by the foresaid captaine Omares, and among them their bishop likewise was put to death. Ex Andrea de Lacuna, & ex Wolfgango & alijs.

Ex Ioanne Fabro, in oratione ad regem Hen. 8.

John Faber in his oration made before king Henry the eighth, at the appointment of king Ferdinandus, declaring therein the miserable crueltie of the Turkes toward all Christians, as also toward the bishops and ministers of the Church, testifieth how that in Mytilene, in Constantinople, and Trapezunda, what bishops and archbishops, or other ecclesiasticall and religious persons the Turks could find, they brought them out of the cities into the fields, there to be slaine like Oxen and Calues. The same Faber also writing of the battell of Solyman in Hungarie, where Ludouicus the king of Hungarie was ouerthrowne, declareth that 8. bishops in the same field were slaine. And moreouer, when the archbishop of Strigon, and Paulus the archbishop Colossensis were found dead, Solyman caused them to bee taken vp, and to bee beheaded and chopt in small pieces, An. 1526.

The cruelty of the Turke in Euboia.

What Christian heart will not pity the incredible slaughter done by the Turkes in Euboia, where as the said Faber testifieth that innumerable people were sticked and gored vpon stakes, diuers were thrust thorough with a hote iron, children and infants not yet wained from the mother were dashed against the stones, and many cut asunder in the middest. Ex Iohan. Fabro & alijs.

The prince of Seruia slaine and slaine of the Turke.

But neuer did countrie taste and feele more the bitter and deadly tyrannie of the Turkes, then did Rasia, called Mysia inferiour, and now Seruia. Where (as writeth Wolfgangus Dreschlerus) the prince of the said countrey being sent for, vnder faire pretence of words and promises, to come and speake with the Turke, after he was come of his owne gentlenes, thinking no harme, was apprehended and wretchedly and falsly put to death, and his skin slaine off, his brother and sister brought to Constantinople for a triumph, and all the nobles of his countrie (as Faber addeth) had their eyes put out, &c.

Let neuer Christian prince trust the Turke.

The Turkes stirred vp of the Diuell to fight against Christ.

The Turkes are butchers of the Christians.

Briefly to conclude, by the vehement and furious rage of these cursed caitifes, it may seeme that Satan the old dragon, for the great hatred he beareth to Christ, hath stirred them vp to be the butchers of all christian people, inflaming their beastly hearts with such malice and crueltie against the name and religion of Christ, that they degenerating from the nature of men to diuels, neither by reason will be ruled, nor by any blood or slaughter satisfied. Like as in the primitiue age of the church, and in the time of Diocletian and Maximian, when the diuell saw that he could not preuaile against the person of Christ which was risen againe, he turned all his furie vpon his silly seruants, thinking by the Romaine emperours, vtterly to extinct the name and profession of Christ, out from the earth: So in this latter age of the world Satan being let lose againe rageth by the Turkes, thinking to make no end of murdering and killing, till he haue brought (as he intendeth) the whole church of Christ, with all the professors therof, vnder foot. But the Lord (I trust) will once send a Constantinus to banquish proud Marentus: Moses to drowne indur at Pharao: Cyrus to subdue the stout Babylonian.

The miserable state of the Christian captiues vnder the Turke.

And thus much hitherto touching our Christian brethren, which were slaine & destroyed by these blasphemous Turkes. Now for so much as besides these aforesaid, many other were pluckt away violently from their countrey, from their wiues and children, from libertie, and from all their possessions, into wretched captiuitie and extreame penurie, it remaineth likewise to intreat somewhat also concerning the cruell manor of the Turks handling of the said Christian captiues. And first here is to be noted that the Turke neuer commeth into Europe to war against the Christians, but there followeth after his army, a great number of brokers or merchants, such as buy men and children to sell againe, bringing with them long chaines in hope of great cheats: In the which chaines they linke them by fiftie and sixtie together, such as remaine vndestroyed with the sword, whom they buy of the spoiles of them that rob and spoile the Christian countries: which is lawful for any of the Turkes armie to do, so that the tenth of their spoile or pray (what soeuer it be) be reserued to the head Turke, that is, to the great master thiefe.

The buying and selling of Christian captiues vnder the Turkes.

Christian captiues tithed of the Turke.

Of such as remaine for tithe, if they be aged (of whom verie few be reserued aliue, because little profit commeth of that age) they be sold to the vse of husbandrie or keeping of beasts. If they be yong men or women, they be sent to certaine places, there to be instructed in their language and Arts, as shall be most profitable for their aduantage, and such are called in their tongue Sarai; and the first care of the Turkes is this, to make them denie the Christian religion, and to be circumcised: and after that they are appointed euery one as he seemeth most apt, either to the learning of their lawes, or else to learne the feates of war. Their first rudiment of warre is to handle the bow, first beginning with a weake bow, and so as they grow in strength, comming to a stronger bow, and if they misse the marke, they are sharpely beaten: and their allowance is two pence or three pence a day till they come and take wages to serue in war. Some are brought vp for the purpose to be placed in the number of the wicked Janizarites, that is, the order of the Turkes champions, which is the most abominable condition of all other. Of these Janizarites, see before pag. 681. And if any of the foresaid yong men or children shall appeare to excell in any beautie, him they so cut, that no part of that which nature giueth to man, remaineth to be seene in all his body, whereby while the freshnesse of age continueth he is compelled to serue their abominable abomination: and when age commeth, then they serue in stead of Eunuches to watt vpon Matrones, or to keepe horses and mules, or else to be scullians and drudges in their kitchins.

O wickednesse passing all miseries!

O miserie aboue all miseries!

The seruitude of yong women captiues.

Such as be yong maidens and beautifull, are deputed for concubines. They which bee of meane beautie serue for matrones to their drudgerie worke in their houses and chambers, or else are put to spinning and such other labors, but so that it is not lawful for them either to professe their Christian religion, or euer to hope for any libertie. And thus much of them which fall to the Turke by tithe.

The other which are bought and sold amongst priuate subiects, first are allured with faire words and promises to take circumcision. Which if they will doe, they are more fauourably entreated, but all hope is taken from them of returning againe into their countrie, which if they attempt, the paine thereof is burning. And if such comming at length to libertie, will marrie, they may: but then their children remaine bond to the Lord, for him to sell at his pleasure: and therefore such as are wise amongst them will not marrie. They which refuse to be circumcised, are miserablie handled: for example whereof, the author (which giueth testimony hereof) doth inferre his owne experience.

Ex Bartholom. Georgionix Peregrina lib. de afflictionibus Christianorum sub Turca.

Such captiues as be expert in any manuall art or occupation can better shift for themselues: but contrariewise, they which haue no handicraft to liue vpon, are in worse case. And therefore such as haue beene brought vp in learning, or bee priests or noble men, and such other, whose tender education can abide no hardnesse, are the least reputed, and most of all other neglected of him that hath the sale or keeping of them, for that he seeth lesse profit to rise of them, then of the other; and therefore no cost of raiment is bestowed vpon them, but they are caried about barehead, and barefoote, both summer and winter in frost and snow. And if any faint & be sicke in the way, there is no resting for him in any Inne, but first he is driuen forward with whips, & if that will not serue, hee is set perauenture vpon some horse: or if his weakenesse be such, that he cannot sit, then is he laid ouerthwart the horse vpon his belly like a calfe; and if he chance to die, they take off his garment such as he hath, and throw him in a ditch.

In the way moreouer, beside the common chaine, which doth inclose them all, the hands also of euery one are manicled, which is because they should not harme their leaders; for many times it happened that ten persons had the leading of 50. captiues: and when night came, their feete also were fettered, so that they lodged in no house, but lay vpon the ground all night.

The miserable calamity of Christian women being in captiuity vnder the Turkes.

The yong women had a little more gentlenesse shewed, being carried in paniers in the day time. But when night came, pitie it was to heare the miserable crying out of such as were inclosed within, by reason of the filthie iniuries which they suffered by their carriers, insomuch that the yong tender age of 7. or 8. yeres, as well of the one sere as of the other could not saue them from the most filthie villanie of the bestiall Turkes.

The maner of christian captiues, how they are brought to markets and sold.

When the morning commeth, they are brought forth to the market, to sale, where the buyer, if he be disposed, plucking off their garments, vieweth all the bones and ioynts of their body: and if he like them, he giueth his price, and carieth them away into miserable seruitude, either to tilling of their ground, or to pasture their cattell, or some other strange kind of misery incredible to speake of: Insomuch that the author reporteth, that he hath seene himselfe certaine of such christian captiues yoked together like horse and oxen, and to draw the plough. The maid seruants likewise are kept in perpetuall toile and worke in close places, where neither they come in sight of any man, neither be they permitted to haue any talke with their fellow seruants, &c. Such as are committed to keepe beasts, lie abrode day and night in the wild fieldes, without house and harbor, and so changing their pasture, go from mountaine to mountaine: of whom also, beside the office of keeping the beasts, other handie labour is exacted at spare houres, such as pleaseth their maisters to put vnto them.

Christians in their captiuitie, put to draw in the plough like horses.

The great danger of Christian captiues which flie out of Turkie.

Out of this miserie there is no way for them to flie, especially for them that are caried into Asia beyond the seas: Or if any do attempt so to do, he taketh his time chiefly about haruest, when he may hide himselfe all the day time in the corne, or in woods, or marishes, and finde food: and in the night onely, he flieth flieth, and had rather be deuoured of wolues and other wild beasts, then to returne againe to his master. In their flying, they vse to take with them an hatchet and coards, that when they come to the sea side, they may cut downe trees, and binde together the ends of them, and so, where the Sea of Hellespontus is narrowest, about the Sestos and Abidos, they take the sea, sitting vpon trees, where, if the winde and tide do serue lurkily, they may cut ouer in foure or fiue houres: But the most part either perish in the flouds, or are driuen backe againe vpon the coastes of Asia, or else be deuoured of wilde beasts in woods, or perish with hunger and famine. If any escape ouer the seas aliue into Europe, by the way they enter into no town, but wander vpon the mountaines, following onely the North starre for their guide.

The maner and shift of our men in getting ouer the sea.

The manifolde dangers by the way in flying.

As touching such Townes and Prouinces, which are won by the Turke, and wherein the Christians are suffered to liue vnder tribute: First all the Nobilitie there they kill and make away, the Churchmen & Clergy hardly they spare. The churches with the belles and all the furniture thereof, either they cast downe, or else they conuert to the vse of their owne blasphemous religion, leauing to the Christians certaine olde and blinde Chappels, which when they decay, it is permitted to our men to repaire them againe for a great summe of money giuen to the Turke: Neither be they permitted to vse any open preaching or ministration, but onely in silence and by stealth, to frequent together. Neither is it lawfull for any Christian to beare office within the citie or Prouince, nor to beare weapon, nor to weare any garment like to the Turkes. And if any contumely or blasphemy, be it neuer so great, be spoken against them, or against Christ, yet must thou beare it, and hold thy peace. Or if thou speake one word against their religion, thou shalt be compelled (whether thou wilt or no) to be circumcised: And then if thou speake one word against Mahumet, thy punishment is fire and burning. And if it chaunce, a Christian being on horsebacke, to meete or passe by a Mulsulman, that is, a Turkish Priest, he must light from his horse, and with a lowly loke, deoutly reuerence and adore the Mulsulman: or if he do not, he is beaten downe from his horse with clubs and staues.

The vse of Christians in their seruice.

If Christians may not goe like Turkes, why should our Gospellers goe like Papists? The Turkes haue their fire and fagots, as well as our papists.

The Christians must light from their horse, meeting a Turkish priest, and adore him.

Furthermore, for their tribute they pay the fourth part of their substance and gaine to the Turke: beside the ordinary tribute of the Christians, which is to pay for euery polle within his family, a ducket vnto the Turke: which if the parents cannot doe, they are compelled to sell their children into bondage. Other being not able to pay, go cheined in fetters from doore to doore begging, to make vp their payment, or els must lye in perpetuall prison:

And yet notwithstanding, when the Christians haue discharged all duties: it remaineth free for the Turkes to take vp among the Christians children, whom they best like, and them to circumcise, and to take them away being yong from the sight of their parents, to farre places, to be brought vp, for the Turkes warres, so that they may not returne to them againe: but first are taught to forget Christ, and then their parents: so that if they come againe amongst them, yet are they not able to know their kinsfolkes and parents.

An other miserie most lamentable in taking away Christian mens children from their parents, to serue the Turke.

This miserie passing all other miseries, no man is able with toung to vtter, or with words to expresse. What weeping and teares, what sorrow and lamentation, what groning, sighes, and deepe dolor, doth teare and rent asunder the woefull harts of the seely parents, at the plucking away of their babes and children: to see their sonnes and their owne children, whom they haue borne and bred vp to the seruice of Christ Iesus the Sonne of God, now to be drawne away violently from them to the warfare of Satan, and to fight against Christ: to see their babes borne of Christian bloud, of Christians to be made Turkes, and so to be pluckt out of their armes, and out of their sight, without hope euer to returne to them againe: to liue perpetually with aliens, barbarous and blasphemous Turkes, and so to become of the number of them which are called fatherlesse, and motherlesse?

O miseries.

This is with teares rather then with words to be expressed.

Albeit the same children afterward do greatly degenerate from the faith of Christ, yet very many of them haue priuily about them the Gospell written of S. John, In principio erat verbum, &c. Which for a token or remembrance of their Christian faith, they cary vnder their arme hole, written in Greeke and Araby. Who greatly desire, and long loke for the reuenging sword of the Christians to come, and deliuer them out of their dolorous thraldome and captiuity, according as the Turks themselues haue a prophecy, and greatly stand in feare of the same. Whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) in the chapter following.

Many Gospellers in Turkie.

An old Prophecie of the Turkes touching the sword of the Christians.

¶ And thus haue ye heard the lamentable afflictions of our Christian brethren vnder the cruell tyranny and captiuity of the Turkes, passing all other captiuities that euer haue beene to Gods people, either vnder Pharao in Egypt, or vnder Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, or vnder Antiochus in the time of the Machabees. Vnder the which captiuity, if it so please the Lord to haue his spouse the Church to be nurtured, his good will be done and obeyed. But if this misery come by the negligence and discord of our Christian guides and leaders, then haue we to pray and cry to our Lord God, either to giue better harts to our guiders and rulers, or else better guides and rulers to his flocke.

And these troubles and afflictions of our Christian brethren suffered by the Turkes, I thought good and profitable for our countrey people here of England to know, for so much as by the ignorance of these, and such like histories worthie of consideration, I see much inconuenience doth follow. Whereby it commeth to passe, that because we Englishmen being farre off from these countreyes, and little knowing what misery is abroade, are the lesse moued with zeale & compassion, to tender their greeuances, and to pray for them, whose troubles we know not. Whereupon also followeth, that we not considering the miserable state of other, are the lesse gratefull to God, when any tranquillity by him to vs is graunted. And if any little cloud of perturbation arise vpon vs, be it neuer so little, as pouertie, losse of liuing, or a little banishment out of our countrey for the Lords cause, we make a great matter thereof, and all because we going no further then our owne countrey, and onely feeling our owne crosse, do not compare that which we feele, with the great crosses, whereunto the Churches of Christ commonly in other places abroade are subiect. Which if we did rightly vnderstand, and earnestly consider, and ponder in our minds, neither would we so excessiuely forget our selues in time of our prosperitie giuen vs of God, nor yet so impatiently be troubled, as we are in time of our aduersitie, and all because either we heare not, or else we ponder not the terrible crosses which the Lord layeth vpon our other brethren abroade in other nations, as by this present story here prefixed may appeare.

Necessary for many causes that the troubles of the Church be knowne.

NOw consequently remaineth, as I haue shewed hitherto, what tyrannie hath been vsed of the Turks against Christs people, so to declare likewise, how farre this tyrannie of the Turkes hath extended and spread it selfe, describing as in a table, to the Christian Reader, what lands, countries and kingdomes the Turkes haue wonne, and got from Christendome; to the intent, that when Christian Princes shall behold the greatnesse of the Turkes dominions spread almost thorough all the world, and how little a part of Christianitie remaineth behind, they may thereby vnderstand the better, how it is time now for them to bestirre them, if euer they thinke to doe any good in Gods Church. And therefore to make a compendious draught as in a briefe table, of such Countries, Kingdomes, and Dominions, got from vs by the Turkes, wee will first begin with Asia, describing what Tracts, Countries, Cities and Churches, the Turke hath surprised, and violentlie pluckt away from the societie of Christian Dominions, taking onelie such as bee most principall, and chiefly them that be in Scripture contained, for that it were too long to discourse all and singular such places by name, as the Turke hath vnder his subiection.

The largenes of the Turkes dominions declared.

The world being diuided commonly into three parts, Asia, Africa, and Europa, Asia is counted to be the greatest in compasse, containing as much as both the other, and is diuided into two portions, the one called Asia Maior: the other called Asia Minor. And although the Empire of the Turke extendeth vnto them both: yet especially his dominion standeth in the other Asia, which is called Asia Minor, which reacheth from the coasts of Europa, vnto Armenia Maior, beyond the riuer Euphrates, and comprehendeth these Regions and Cities following.

Ilands belonging to Asia Minor.

This Cyprus, King Richard the first did once subdue, fighting against the Saracens: Ex Aene. Syl. lib. De Orbis Descrip. cap. 74.

¶ Æneas Syluius, otherwise Pope Pius the 2. in describing of Asia Minor, cap. 74. reciteth a certaine fact of a worthy Virgin: who at what time the Turkes were besieging a certaine towne in Lesbos, and had cast downe a great part of the walles, so that all the townesmen had giuen ouer, putting on mans harnesse, stepped forth into the breach, where not onely she kept the Turkes from entring in, but also slew of them a great sort. The Citizens seeing the rare courage, and good successe of the Maiden, tooke to them againe their harts and harnesse, and so lustily laid about them, that an incredible number of the Turkes were slaine. The rest being repulsed from the land, reculed into their Ships: who beeing then pursued by a Nauy of Calisa, were worthily discomfited likewise vpon the Sea. And thus was the Ile of Lesbos at that time, by a poore Virgin, that is, by the strong hand of the Lord working in a weake creature, preserued from the Turkes. Ex Æne. Syl. Et Seb. Munst. Lib. 5.

A memorable fact of a Virgin, in defence of her countrey.

Besides these Regions and Countries of Asia Minor, aboue described, Sebast. Munster in the fift booke of his Cosmography, declareth moreouer, that the Turkes and Sultanes haue vnder their subiection, both Arabia, Persia, and also India exterior, wherein is Calecute. The which Persia, although it be vnder the Sophi, which is an enemy to the Turke, yet it is to be thought, that he is a Sultane, one of the Turkish and Mahometish Religion. This Persia and India were once seasoned with Christs Gospell, as may appeare by the Primitiue Church, page 87. And thus haue you the parts of Asia described, which in times past being almost all christened, do now serue vnder the Turke.

Ex Sebast. Munst. Cosmo. lib. 5. in præfat.

After the description of Asia, let vs next consider the parts and countreyes of Aphrike: Where although the greatest part either consisteth in deserts desolate, or is possessed with Prester John, which professeth Christ and his Gospell: yet the Turke hath there also no little portion vnder his dominion, as,

The Region of Mysia is diuided into two parts: whereof the one is in Asia, and is diuided into Mysia, maior, and Mysia minor. The other is in Europa, and is diuided into Mysia, or Mœsia superior, and Mysia inferior.

Epidaurus is a citie in Illyria, and also another in Peloponesus.

These regions were in the former time called by the name of Illyria, or Illyricum. And afterward, by reason of certaine Scythians cōming thither they were also called Sclauonia.

Stephanus King of Bosna and afterward of Rascia, and Mysia, was by subtill traine allured to come and speake with Mahumet the Turke, who being come, was taken, and his skinne flaine off.

All this tract of Bulgaria, Walachia, Transyluania, Struia, Rascia, & Moldauia, was wont to be called Dacia, but afterward was seuered into diuers lands and dominions.

¶ As I was writing hereof, a certaine sound of lamentable newes was brought vnto vs, how the Turke, whom wee had hoped before to haue been repulsed by the emperor Maximilian out of Christendome, hath now of late this present yeere 1566. got the towne of Gyula about Transyluania, after they had sustained fifteene of his most forcible assaults, destroying in the same most cruelly, many thousand of our christian brethren, men, women, and children: but because wee haue no full certainty, we will referre the story thereof to further information.

The Prophecies of the holy Scriptures considered, touching the comming vp and finall ruine and destruction of this wicked kingdome of the Turkes, with the Reuelations and foreshewings also of other authors concerning the same.

Prophecies considered for the beginning and falling of the Turkes kingdome.

FOr so much as you haue hitherto sufficiently heard, to what quantity and largenes the dominion of the Turkes hath increased, and do vnderstand what cruell tyranny these wretched miscreants haue and doe dayly practise most haynously wheresoeuer they come against the seruants and professors of Christ: it shall not be vnprofitable, but rather necessary, and to our great comfort, to consider and examine in the Scriptures, with what prophecies the holy spirit of the Lord hath premonished and forewarned vs before, of these heauy persecutions to come vpon his people by this horrible Antichrist. For as the gouernment and constitution of times and states of monarchies & policies fall not to vs by blind chance, but be administred and alotted vnto vs from aboue: so it is not to be supposed, that such a great alteration and mutation of kingdomes, such a terrible and generall persecution of Gods people, almost thorough all Christendome, and such a terrour of the whole earth, as is now moued and gendred by these Turkes, commeth without the knowledge, sufferance, and determination of the Lord before, for such ends and purposes, as his diuine wisedome doth best know. For the better euidence and testimony whereof, he hath left in his Scriptures sufficient instruction, and declaration, whereby we may plainly see to our great comfort, how these grieuous afflictions and troubles of the Church, though they be sharpe and heauy vnto vs, yet they come not by chance or by mans working onely, but euen as the Lord himselfe hath appointed it, and doth permit the same.

Two things to be considered in the time and order of the old Testament. The Scriptures, and the people.

And first to begin with the time of the old Testament, let vs seriously aduise and ponder, not only the Scriptures and Prophecies therein conteined, but also let vs consider the whole state, order and regiment of that people: the Church I meane of the Israelites. For although the Scriptures and Prophets of the old Testament, were properly sent to that people, and haue their relation properly to things done, or that should be done in that common wealth, of which Prophets Iohn Baptist was the last and made an end, as our Sauiour himselfe witnesseth, saying: The law and Prophets be vnto the time of Iohn, &c. Yet notwithstanding the said people of that old Testament, beareth a liuely image and resemblance of the vniuersall Church which should follow, planted by the Sonne of God thorow the whole earth: So that as the Prophets of God speaking to them from the mouth and word of God prophecied what should come to passe in that people: so likewise the whole course and history of those Israelites, exemplifieth and beareth a prophetical image to vs declaring what is to be looked for in the vniuersall Church of God dispersed thorow the world, planted in Christ Iesus his Sonne, according as Phil. Melanchon grauely gathering vpon the same, testifieth in diuers places, in his commentary vpon the Prophet Daniel.

Philip. Melanct. in Dan. Prophe.

As first the history of godly Abel slaine by wicked Cain, what doth it import or prophecie, but the condition of the people and seruants of God, which commonly go to wracke in this world, and are oppressed by the contrary part, which belongeth not to God?

Gen. 4.

The like may be said also of Isaac, and Ismael: of Iacob and Esau. Of whom, those two which were the children of promise, and belonged to the election of God, were persecuted in this world, of the other which were reiected. Where moreouer is to be noted concerning Ismael, that of his stocke after the flesh, came the Saracens: whose sect the Turkes do now professe and maintaine. And as Ismael had xii. sonnes: so it were to be wished of God; that this Solyman, which is the twelfth of the Turkish generation, may be the last. But of this, better occasion shall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter.

The Saracens come of Ismael. Resemblance betweene the 12. sonnes of Ismael, and the 12. Ottomane Turkes. 4. Reg. 17.

Furthermore, of the xii. tribes of Israel, the sacrate history so reporteth, that after they had a long season continued together, by the space of 8. or 9. C. yeares, at length, for their idolatrie, and transgression of their forefathers, x. tribes of them were cut off, and dispersed among the Gentiles 130. yeeres before the captiuitie of Babylon: so that but two tribes onely remained free, and they also at last, after 130. yeeres, were captiued vnder the Babylonians, for a certaine time. No otherwise hath it hapned with the Church of Christ almost in the vniuersall world, of which Church, the greatest part both in Asia, in Africa, and almost in Europe (where the holy Apostles so laboured and trauailed (we see now to be dispersed among the Turkes, and their candlesticks remoued (the Lord of his great grace, reduce them againe; Amen:) So that of xii. parts of Christendome, which was once planted in Christ, scarse two parts remaine cleare, & they how long they shall so continue, the Lord knoweth: And albeit thorough the mercy of the Lord they escape the danger of the Turkes, yet haue they bene so beaten with the Pope, that they had beene better almost to haue beene in the Turkes hands.

The old church of the Israelites beareth a representation or image, of the publicke church of Christ Iesus.

Againe, after the said Israelits returned being restored of Cyrus, let vs consider well their story, the continuance of time, the maner of their regiments, and what afflictions they sustained in the time of the Machabees: and we shall see a liuely representation of these our daies expressed in that prophetical people, according as S. Paul writing of them, sheweth how all things hapned to them in figures: that is, the actions and doings of that one nation, be as figures and types of greater maters, what shall happen in these latter times of the whole Church vniuersally in Christ collected. 1. Cor. 10.

So the transmigration and deliuerance againe of those two tribes, declareth to vs the affliction of Christs Church for sinne: and yet that God will not vtterly reiect his people for his Sonnes sake, as by manifold examples of the Church hitherto may well appeare.

The Church of the Iewes a figure of Christs Church.

Againe, the continuance of the law first giuen by Moses, vnto the destruction of the said people by Titus, amounteth to 1564. yeares: So we counting the age of the new Testament, and reckoning from the day of our redemption vnto this present, be come now to the yeare 1534. lacking but only 33. yeares of the full number.

Ex Phil. Melanct. in Daniel. cap. 9.

Likewise, in counting the yeares from their deliuerance out of captiuitie, to the end of their dissolution, we finde 564. years, during which yeares as the Church of the Iewes was not gouerned vnder the authoritie of Kings, but the high Priests tooke all the power and authoritie to themselues: so we Christians, for the space especially of these latter 564. yeares, what haue we seene and felt, but only the iurisdiction & domination of the Pope and high Priests playing the Rex in all countries, and ruling the whole: whereby, by the count of the yeares, it is to be thought, the day of the Lords comming not to be farre off.

The times and yeares of the old church, compared with the new.

The rule and dominion of the high Priests in the Iewes common wealth, and of our prelates, compared.

Furthermore, in those latter yeres of the Iewes kingdome, that troubles and afflictions that people sustained 300. yeares together, but chiefly, the last 166. yeares before the comming of Christ, by Antiochus and his fellowes, the history of the Machabees can report. Wherein we haue also notoriously to vnderstand the miserable vexations & persecutions of Christ an Churches in these latter ends of the world by Antichrist. For by Antiochus, Antichrist (no doubt) is figured and represented. This Antiochus surnamed Magnus, and Antiochus Epiphanes his sonne, came of the stocke of Seleucus Nicanor; much like as the Mahumets, the Turke, and Solymannus, came of the stocke of Ottomannius. Wherein this is to be noted and pondered, that like as of the said Seleucus issued twelue Syrian kings one after another of that generation, which reigned ouer the Israelites with much seueritie and tyranny: so of this diuelish generation of Ottomannus, haue come twelue Turkish tyrants, whereof this Solyman is now the twelfth; God grant he may be the last. And as the two last Antiochi, being sonnes of the two brethren, did fight together for the kingdome, and in fighting were both slaine, and shortly after the kingdome fell to the Romanes; so the Lord grant for Christs sake, that the bloudie broode of this this old Solyman, (which had reigned now 46. yeates) may ſo fight together, and periſh in their owne bloud, that the bloudy tyranny of theirs may come to a finall end for euer. Amen.

And that the truth hereof may the better appeare to ſuch as be diſpoſed to meditate more vpon the matter, I thought good and profitable for the reader, to ſet before his eyes, in table-wiſe, the Catalogue of both theſe Antichriſtian families, with the names and ſucceſſion of the perſons, firſt of the twelue Syrian Kings, then of the twelue Ottomans, in like number and order.

Reſemblance betweene the Syrian Kings, and the Turks.

These two peſtilent families and generations, riſing out (doubtles) from the bottomles pit, to plague the people of God, as in number of ſucceſſion they do not much differ: ſo in manner of their doings and wicked abominations, they be as nere agreeing, being both enemies alike to the people and Church of Chriſt, both murtherers and parricides of their owne brethren and kindred, both blaſphemers of God, and troublers of the whole world. Where in we haue all to learne and note by the way, the terrible anger of almightie God againſt ſinne, and wickednes of men.

The time of Antichriſt examined by prophecies.

Further more, who ſo is diſpoſed to conſider and caſt the courſe of times, and to marke how things be diſpoſed by the maruellous operation of Gods prouidence, ſhall finde the times alſo of theſe two aduerſaries, in much like ſort to concurre and agree. For in conſidering with our ſelues both the One Antichriſt prefigureth another.

Teſtaments and Churches of God, the firſt of the Iewes, the ſecond of the Chriſtians, loke what time had the Syrian Kings to rage then in Hieruſalem, the ſame proportion of time hath now the tyranny of the Turkes to murther the Chriſtians: ſo that the one Antichriſt may well repreſent and prefigure the other. For as by the booke of Machabees may appeare, Antiochus Epiphanes was about the 191. yeare before the paſſion of our Sauiour, and day of our redemption: ſo now caſting the ſame number from this preſent yeare backward, we ſhall finde it to be about the ſame yeare and time, when Baiazetes the fourth Turke after Ottoman, began to remoue his Imperiall ſeate from Burſa in Bithynia, to Adrianople in Europe, which is a City of Thracia. In which yeare and time began all the miſchiefe in Europe, as is to be ſeene before, pag. 678. and this was the yeare of our Lord 1375. Vnto the which yeare, if we adde 691. it maketh 1566. according to the prophecie of the Apocalypſe, chapter 20. where it is prophecied of Gog and Magog, that they ſhall compaſſe about the tents of the Saints, and the well beloued Citie, by the which wellbeloued Citie, is meant (no doubt) Europa: and this was in the yeare aboueſaid, 1375. Although touching the preciſe points of yeares and times, it is not for vs greatly to be exquiſite therein, but yet where diligence and ſtudious meditation may helpe to knowledge, I would not with negligende to be a pretence to ignorance. And thus much for the times of Antiochus and his fellowes.

Apoc. cap. 20.

Now what cruelty this Antiochus exerciſed againſt the people of God, it is manifeſt in the hiſtory of the Machabees: where we reade, that this Antiochus in the eight yeare of his reigne, in his ſecond comming to Hieruſalem, firſt gaue forth in commandement, that all the Iewes ſhould relinquiſh the law of Moſes, and worſhip the Idoll of Iupiter Olympius, which he ſet vp in the temple of Hieruſalem. The bookes of Moſes and of the Prophets he burned. He ſet garriſons of ſouldiors to warde the Idoll. In the Citie of Hieruſalem he cauſed the feaſts and reuels of Bacchus to be kept, full of all filth and wickednes. Old men, women, and virgins, ſuch as would not leaue the law of Moſes, with cruell torments he murthered. The mothers that would not circumciſe their children, he ſlue. The children that were circumciſed, he hanged vp by the neckes. The temple he ſpoiled and waſted. The Aultar of God, and candleſticke of gold, with the other ornaments and furniture of the temple, partly he caſt out, partly he carried away. Contrary to the law of God, he cauſed them to offer, and to eate Swines fleſh. Great murther and ſlaughter he made of the people, cauſing them either to leaue their law, or to loſe their liues. Among whom, beſides many other, with cruell tormentes, he put to death a godly mother with her ſeauen ſonnes, ſending his cruell proclamations through all the land, that whoſoeuer kept the obſeruancies of the Sabboth, and other rites of the law, and refuſed to condeſcend to his abominations, ſhould be executed. By reaſon whereof, the Citie of Hieruſalem was left voide and deſolate of all good men, but there was a great number, that were contented to follow and obey his Idolatrous proceedings, and to flatter with the king, became enemies vnto their brethren. Briefly, no kind of calamity, nor face of miſerie could be ſhewed in any place, which was not there ſeene. Of the tyranny of this Antiochus it is hiſtoriſed at large in the booke of Machabees: And Daniell prophecying before of the ſame, declareth that the people of the Iewes deſerued no leſſe for their ſinnes and tranſgreſſions.

Machab. lib. & cap. 1.

The furious cruelties of Antiochus againſt Gods people.

1. Machab. cap. 1. Dan. 9.

Antiochus a figure of the Turke.

By conſent of all writers, this Antiochus beareth a figure of the great Antichriſt, which was to follow in the later end of the world, & is alreadie come, and worketh what he can againſt vs: Although as S. Iohn ſaith, there haue beene, and be many Antichriſts, as parts and members of the body of Antichriſt, which are forerunners: yet to ſpeake of the head and principall Antichriſt, and great enemy of Chriſts Churche, he is to come in the later end of the world, at what time ſhall be ſuch tribulation, as neuer was ſeene before: whereby is meant (no doubt) the Turke, prefigured by this Antiochus. By this Antichriſt, I do alſo meane all ſuch, which following the ſame doctrine of the Turkes, thinke to be ſaued by their workes and demerits, and not by their faith onely in the Sonne of God, of what title and profeſſion els ſoeuer they be: eſpecially if they vſe the like force and violence for the ſame, as he doth, &c.

Ex Lyra in Gloſa ordin. cap. 1. Machab.

The name of Antichriſt what it contayneth.

Of the tyranny of this Antiochus aforeſaid, and of the tribulations of the Church in the later times both of the Iewes Church, and alſo of the Chriſtian Church to come, let vs heare and conſider the words of Daniell in the 11. chapter, and alſo in his viij. chapter, prophecying of the ſame as followeth.

He ſhall returne and freat againſt the holy couenant: ſo ſhall he do, he ſhall euen returne and haue intelligence with them that forſake the holy couenant. And armes ſhall ſtand on his part, and they ſhall pollute the Sanctuary of ſtrength, and ſhall take away the daily ſacrifice, and they ſhall ſet vp the abominable deſolation. And ſuch as wickedly breake the couenant, ſhall flatter with him deceitfully: but the people that do know their God, ſhall preuaile and proſper. And they that vnderſtand among the people, ſhall inſtruct many: yet they ſhall fall by ſword and by flame, by captiuitie, and by ſpoile many dayes.

Dan. cap. 11.

Now when they ſhall fall they ſhall be holpen with a little helpe: but many ſhall cleaue vnto them faineedly. And ſome of them of vnderſtanding ſhall fall to be tried, and to be purged, and to make them white, till the time be out: for there is a time appointed. And the King ſhall do what him liſt: he ſhall exalt himſelfe, and magnifie himſelfe againſt all that is God, and ſhal ſpeake marueilous things againſt the God of Gods, and ſhal proſper, till the wrath be accompliſhed: for the determination is made. Neither ſhal he regard the God of his Fathers, nor the deſires of women, nor care for any God: for he ſhal magnifie himſelfe aboue all. But in his place ſhal he honour the god Mauzzim, and the god whom his fathers knew not, ſhal he honour with gold and with ſiluer, and with precious ſtones, and pleaſant things.

Thus ſhall he doe in the holds of Mauzzim with a ſtrange god, whom he ſhal acknowledge: he ſhall increaſe his glory, and ſhal cauſe them to rule ouer many, and ſhal diuide the land for gaine. And at the end of time, ſhal the king of the South puſh at him, and the king of the North ſhall come againſt him like a whirle wind, with chariots, and with horſemen, and with many ſhips, and he ſhall enter into the countreyes, and ſhall ouerflow and paſſe thorough. He ſhall enter alſo into a pleaſant land, and many countreyes ſhall be ouerthrowne: but theſe ſhall eſcape out of his hand, euen Edom and Moab, and the chiefe of the children of Ammon. He ſhall ſtretch forth his hands alſo vpon the countreyes, and the land of Egypt ſhal not eſcape. But he ſhall haue power ouer the treaſures of gold and of ſiluer, and ouer all the precious things of Egypt, and of the Lybians, and of the blacke Moores where he ſhall paſſe. But the tidings out of the East and the North, ſhall trouble him, therefore he ſhall go forth with great wrath to deſtroy and roote out many: And hee ſhall plant the tabernacles of his palace betweene the Seas, in the glorious and holy mountaine, yet he ſhall come to his end, and none ſhall helpe him.

To this place of Daniel aboue preſired, might alſo be added the Propheſie of the ſaid Daniel written in the ſeuenth chapter, and much tending to the like effect: where he entreating of his viſion of foure beaſts which ſignifie the foure Monarchies) and ſpeaking now of the fourth Monarchie, hath theſe words.

Dan. cap. 7. After this, I ſaw in the viſions by night, and behold, the fourth beaſt was grimme and horrible, and maruellous ſtrong. It had great yron teeth: it deuoured, and brake in peeces, and ſtamped the reſidue vnder his feete: and it was vnlike the other beaſts that were before it, for it had ten hornes. As I conſidered the hornes, behold, there came vp among them another little horne, before whom, there were three of the firſt hornes pluckt away. And behold, in this horne, were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth ſpeaking preſumptuous things, and ſeemed more ſtout then the other. Which horne alſo (when I looked on) made battraile with the Saints, and preuailed againſt them: vntill the old aged came, and iudgement was giuen to the Saints of the higheſt, and till the appointed time was come, that the Saints ſhould haue the kingdome.

Thus haue ye heard the plaine words of Daniel. In the which, as he doth manifeſtly deſcribe the comming of Antiochus the great aduerſary, toward the later end of the Iewes: ſo by the ſame Antiochus is figured alſo to vs the great aduerſary of Chriſt, which is the Turke.

Vide Rodulphum Gualt. de Antichriſto. Although ſome there be notwithſtanding, which with great learning and iudgement, do apply this place of Daniel aboue recited, not to the Turke, but rather to the Pope, and that for vij. or viij. ſpeciall cauſes herein touched and noted.

The firſt note. The firſt is this, that the wicked tranſgreſſours of the couenant ſhall ioyne with him deceitfully and hypocritically, which ſhall pollute the Tabernacle of ſtrength, and take away the perpetuall ſacrifice, and bring in the abomination of deſolation.

The ſecond note. The ſecond note is, that the Prophet declareth, how the learned among the people ſhall teach many, and that they ſhall fall vpon the ſword, into fire, and captiuitie, and ſhall be baniſhed, whereby they ſhall be tried, choſen, and made bright and pure, &c. All which (ſay they) is not among the Turkes to be ſeene, but onely in the Popes Church: where the faithfull preachers and teachers of the people are ſlaine and burned, and go to wracke, &c. Where likewiſe it followeth, that they ſhall be holpen againſt Antichriſt, and that many falſe brethren ſhall ioyne vnto them diſſemblingly, &c. To this they alledge, that the Chriſtians haue no ſuch helpe againſt the Turke, whereunto ſuch falſe brethren ſhould ioyne themſelues, as is and hath bene commonly ſeene among the Chriſtians againſt the Pope, from time to time, almoſt in all Countreyes: as in Germany by the Protеſtants, and free Cities: In England in king Henries time by the Lord Cromwell, and afterward by King Edward, and now by Queene Elizabeth: in Scotland, by the godly Nobilitie: In France, by the Queene of Nauarre and her ſonne: and alſo by the Prince of Condy and the worthy Admirall, and his two brethren, and many others: In Flaunders, by them whome the Regent calleth Beggers: ſo as was in the time of the Machabees, againſt Antiochus.

Helpe of the Chriſtians againſt the Pope.

The third note. Thirdly, that the king ſhall eralt himſelfe aboue all that hath the name of God, and ſhall lift vp his mouth to ſpeake preſumptuouſly againſt God.

The fourth note. Fourthly, that he careth not for the deſires of women: which may ſeeme to note how the Popes doctrine ſhall forbid the honeſt and lawfull mariage in Churchmen.

The fift note. The fift ſpecialtie which they apply to the Pope, is that which followeth in the Prophet, ſaying: Neither ſhall he regard the God of his fathers, nor any God: but in ſtead of him, ſhall ſet vp his God Mauzzim, and ſhall worſhip him with ſiluer and gold, and pretious ſtone, &c. which they do apply to the Pope, ſetting vp his god of bread, and worſhipping him with gliſtering golden ornaments, and moſt ſolemne ſeruice. Mauzzim the Popes god.

The firſt note. Sirtly, it followeth: and he ſhall increaſe them with much glory and riches, and ſhall diuide vnto them lands and poſſeſſions, &c. meaning, that the Pope hauing dominion ouer treaſures of gold and ſiluer, and all precious things of the land, ſhall indue his Cardinals, Prelats, his flattering doctours, with Friers, Monkes and Prieſts, and all ſuch as ſhall take his part, with great priuileges, liberties, reuenues, and poſſeſſions. And thus I ſay, ſome there be, which apply this propheſie of the viij. and ix. chapters of Daniel, vnto the Biſhop of Rome. Whom although I take to be an extreame perſecutor of Chriſts Church: yet I iudge rather thoſe two chapters of Daniel concerning the little horne in the middle of the ten hornes, and the great deſtroier of the pleaſant land and glorious holy mountaine, to meane firſt Antiochus, and by him ſecondly to meane the great Antichriſt, the Turke: who hath now ſet already the tabernacles of his palace betweene the Seas, according to the Propheſies of Daniel, as is aboueſaid. The 7. and 11. chapt. of Daniel meaneth the great Antichriſt, the Turke.

Ezechiel cap. 38, 39. Gog and Magog. Ouer and beſides theſe Propheſies aboue alledged, may be added alſo the Propheſie of Ezechiel chapter 39. ſpeaking of Gog and Magog: which as it may be applied to the oppreſſion of the Iewes vnder the heathen multitude, which ſtopped the building of the Citie, and vnder the Syrian kings, &c. yet in the ſame alſo is expreſſed the calamities and afflictions of Chriſtes Churche in theſe later times, vnder the Saracens and the Turkes, &c.

The Propheſies of the new Teſtament concerning the Turke. 2. Theſ. 2. Proceeding further in this matter, let vs come now to the Propheſies of the new Teſtament, and marke the words of Saint Paul, writing to the Theſſalonians, which then were Chriſtened, and now either are Turkiſh, or vnder the Turke, which words be theſe: Be ye not ſodainly moued in your mind, nor troubled, neither by ſpirit, nor by word, nor by letter as ſent from vs, as though the day of Chriſt were at hand. Let no man deceiue you by any meanes, for the Lord will not come before there come a defection, or a departing firſt, and that wicked man be reuealed, the ſonne of perdition, which is an aduerſary, and is extolled aboue all power, and that which is called god: ſo that he ſhall ſit in the temple of God, boaſting himſelfe to be god, &c. Although this defection and departing may haue a double vnderſtanding, as well of the Popes ſect which is gone and departed from the free iuſtification by faith onely in Chriſt, through the promiſe of grace) as of the Turkes: yet leaning a while to ſpeake of the Pope, becauſe it appeareth more notoriouſly in the Turke, wee will chiefly apply it to him: in whom ſo aptly it doth agree, that vnleſſe this great defection from faith in ſo many Churches, had hapned by the Turke, it had bene hard to vnderſtand the Apoſtles minde, which now by the hiſtory of theſe Turkes is eaſie and euident to be known, conſidering what a ruine hath happened to the Church of Chriſt by theſe miſerable Turkes, that Emperies, Nations, Kingdomes, Countreyes, Colonies, and Cities, be remoued from the name and profeſſion of Chriſt, how many thouſands and infinite multitudes of Chriſten men and children, in Aſia, in Africke, and in Europe, are caried away from Chriſts Church, to Mahumetes Religion, ſome to ſeruis for the Turkes guard among the Janizarites, ſome for ſouldiours, ſome for miners, ſome for gunners, to fight and warre againſt the Chriſtians: ſo that the moſt part of all the Churches planted once by the Apoſtles, are now degenerated into Turkes, only a ſmall handfull of Chriſtians reſerued yet in theſe Weſt parts of Europe, of the which ſmall reſidue, what ſhall alſo become ſhortly, except Chriſt himſelfe doe helpe, Chriſt onely himſelfe doth know. The defection of the Pope. How great this defection hath bin, ſpoken of by Saint Paul, thou mayſt ſee (gentle Reader) in the table aboue deſcribed, pag. 698. Vide ſupra pag. 676.

The place of Saint Paul. 2. Theſ. 2. applied to the Pope. Notwithſtanding, this text of the holy Apoſtle (as I afore ſaid) may be verified alſo with no leſſe reaſon, vpon the Biſhop of Rome, then vpon the Turke, both for that he is a man of ſinne, that is, his ſeate and Citie is a great maintainer of wickedneſſe, and alſo for that he is an aduerſary, that is, contrary in all his doings and proceedings to Chriſt.

Thirdly, for that he ſitteth in the temple of God, and ſo did not Mahumet.

Fourthly, becauſe he is an eralter of himſelfe, & ſitteth more like a god then a man in Rome, whereof ſee more in the booke ſet forth in Engliſh, called The Conteſtations of the Popes.

Fiftly, for that he ſeduceth, and hath ſeduced by his apoſtaſie, the moſt part of all Chriſtendome from the doctrine and free promiſes of God, into a wrong and ſtrange way of ſaluation, which is not to be iuſtified freely before God, onely by our faith in Chriſt his welbeloued Sonne (vnto the which faith, the promiſe of God freely and graciouſly hath annexed all our ſaluation onely, & to no other thing) but hath taught vs to worke our ſaluation by an infinite nũber of other things: In ſo much that he bindeth the neceſſitie of our ſaluation alſo to this, that we muſt beleeue (if we will be ſaued) & receiue him to be the Vicar of Chriſt in earth, &c. Ex Bonifacio Extrauag.

But to returne againe vnto the Turkes, among all the propheſies prophecies both of the old Teſtament and of the new, there is none that painteth out the Antichriſtian kingdome of the Turkes, better then doth the Reuelation of S. Iohn, whoſe words let vs weigh and conſider. Who in the Apocalypſe 9. where he ſpeaketh of opening the ſeuenth and laſt ſeale, (which ſignifieth the laſt age of the world) and there writting of the vij. trumpets of the vij. Angels, at the ſounding of the vj. Angell ſaith, Looſe the iiij. Angels, which are bound in the great riuer Euphrates, And ỹ foure Angels were looſed, which were ready both day and houre, and moneth, and yeare, to ſlay the third part of men. And the number of horſemen were twenty thouſand times ten thouſand: and I heard the number of them. And thus I ſaw in a viſion, horſes, and them that ſate on them, hauing fiery habergions, and of Iacinth ſtone, and of brimſtone, and the heads of the horſes were as the heads of Lyons, and out of their mouthes went foorth fire, and ſmoke, and brimſtone, of theſe three plagues was the third part of men killed, that is, of the fire, ſmoke, and brimſtone, which proceeded out of their mouthes, &c.

Apoc. 9.

The 7. trumpets of the 7. Angels in the Apoc. expounded.

By the ſeuenth ſeale is meant the ſeuenth and laſt age of the world, which laſt age of the world, is from Chriſt, to the iudgement and reſurrection of the dead.

By the ſeuen Angels with their ſeuen Trumpets, is ſignified the ſeuen plagues that come in this ſeuenth and laſt age of the world.

The ſixth trumpet.

By the firſt Trumpet of the firſt Angell, is meant the firſt plague comming laſt and nert before the plague of the great iudgement day, which firſt plague is heere deſcribed to come by the Eaſt Kings, that is, by the Turkes, as followeth to be ſeene.

Looſing of the angels vpon the riuer Euphrates.

By looſing the Angels which had rule of the great riuer Euphrates, is ſignified the letting out of the Eaſt Kings, that is, the Turkes, out of Scythia, Tartaria, Perſia, and Arabia, by whome the third part of Chriſtendome ſhall be deſtroyed, as we ſee it this day hath come to paſſe.

Apoc. 9.

It followeth in the propheſie, Their power ſhall be in their mouthes, and in their tayles. For their tayles be like Serpents, hauing heads, and with them they hurt, &c. Meaning that theſe Turkes with the words of their mouthes, ſhall threaten great deſtruction of fire and ſword, to them that will not yéeld vnto them, and in the end, when the Chriſtians ſhall yéeld vnto them, truſting to their promiſes, they like Serpents ſhall deceiue them in the end, and kill them, as appeareth by the ſtory of the Turkes aboue paſt, pag. 682. 683. 692.

Apoc. ca. 16.

The like prophecy alſo after the like words and ſence, is to be ſéene and read in the 16. chapter of the Apocalypſe, where S. Iohn entreating of ſeuen cups, filled with the wrath of the liuing God, giuen to the hands of ſeuen Angels, by one of the foure beaſts (that is in the time of one of the foure Monarchies, which was the Monarchy of Rome) ſpeaketh likewiſe of the firſt Angell, which poured his viall of Gods wrath vpon the great riuer Euphrates, and the waters thereof dried vp, that the way of the kings of the Eaſt ſhould be prepared, &c.

The 4. beaſts in the Apoc. meant the 4. Monarchies.

By the firſt Angell with the firſt viall, is meant as before, the laſt plague ſaue one that ſhall come vpon the Chriſtians. By the kings of the Eaſt are meant the Saracens, and 12. Ottoman Turkes. By drying vp the riuer of Euphrates, is ſignified the way of theſe Turkes to be prepared by the Lords appointment, to come out of the Eaſt to the Weſt parts of the world, to moleſt and afflict the Chriſtians. It followeth more in the text. And I ſaw three vncleane ſpirits like frogs, come out of the mouth of the Dragon, and out of the mouth of the beaſt, and out of the mouth of the falſe Prophet, for they are the ſpirits of diuels, doing wonders, to goe vnto the Kings of the whole earth, to aſſemble and gather them together to the battell againſt the day of the great God omnipotent, &c. And it followeth ſhortly after, And he aſſembled them together into a place which is called in hebreue Armagedon, that is, a trap or traine of deſtruction. And immediatly it followeth in the ſame place, And the ſeuenth Angell poured out his viall in the ayre, and a mightie voice came from heauen, out of the Throne, ſaying, factum eſt, It is done, or finiſhed, &c. Whereby it is to be vnderſtoode, that toward the laſt conſummation of the world, great force ſhall be ſéene, and a mighty army of the enemies ſhall be collected and gathered againſt the people, and Saints of the higheſt, and then commeth the conſummation, with factum eſt, &c.

The Kings of the Eaſt. Drying vp of Euphrates. Ibidem.

Wherefore it is not for naught that the holy Spirit of God in the ſame place, a little before the firſt Angell doth poure out his viall, doth exhort all the faithfull, ſaying: Behold, I come like a theefe in the night, Bleſſed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, leaſt he walke naked, and men ſee his filthines, &c.

Ibidem. An exhortation of the holy ghoſt to the faithfull

Nicol. de Lyra, and Paulus Biſhop of Burdens, and Matthias Dorinke writting vpon the 13. chapter of the Apocal. and expounding the myſtery of the ſecond beaſt, riſing out of the earth, hauing the hornes of a Lambe, &c. doe apply the ſame to Mahumet and the Turkes, with a ſolemne declaration made vpon the ſame. Which interpretation of theirs, although in ſome points it may ſéeme to haue ſome appearance of probabilitie, neither can it be denied but that Mahumet and the Turke be peſtilent and wicked enemies of Chriſt our Lord, and moſt bitter perſecutors of his Church, yet as touching the proper and naturall meaning of the Apoſtle in that place, ſpeaking of the falſe lamb, &c. if we conſider well all the circumſtances of that beaſt, and marke the conſequence of the text, both of that which goeth before, and followeth after, we muſt néeds grant, that Nicol. de Lyra, with his fellowes, and with all ſuch like of the popes ſchoole, that follow that ſchoole be deceiued, and that the deſcription and interpretation of that falſe horned lambe, muſt neceſſarily bee applied only to the biſhop of Rome, and none other, which is to be proued by three principall cauſes or arguments.

Apoc. ca. 13.

The beaſt hauing hornes like the lambe, muſt needs meane the pope.

The firſt reaſon.

The firſt is, for that this beaſt is deſcribed to beare the hornes of a lambe. By the which lambe, no doubt, is meant Chriſt. By the hornes of the lambe is ſignified the outward ſhew or reſemblance of Chriſt our Sauior, which ſhew or reſemblance can haue no relation to Mahumet, for that he taketh himſelfe to be aboue Chriſt, and Chriſt as an excellent Prophet of God, ſitting at his feet. Wherefore ſéeing Mahumet commeth neither as equall to Chriſt, nor as vicar vnder Chriſt, this propheſie cannot agrée in him, but onely in him which openlie in plaine words proteſteth, that all Chriſts lambs and ſheepe not ſingularly, but vniuerſally through the whole world, are committed to him, as vicar of Chriſt, and ſucceſſor of Peter, and that all men muſt confeſſe the ſame of neceſſitie, or els they are none of Chriſts ſheepe, &c. wherein it is eaſie to ſee where the pretenced hornes of the lamb doe grow.

Ex Boniface. 8. Extrau. de Maiorit. & obed.

The ſecond reaſon.

The ſecond argument, And he ſpake like the dragon, &c. A Lambes hornes and the mouth of a dragon, doe not agrée together. And as they doe not agrée together in nature, ſo neither can they be found in any one perſon, either Turke, or other (if we will iudge truly) ſo liuely, as in the biſhop of Rome. When thou heareſt him call himſelfe the apoſtolicall biſhop, the Vicar of Chriſt, the ſucceſſour of Peter, the ſeruant of Gods ſeruants, &c. thou ſéeſt in him the two hornes of a lambe, and wouldeſt thinke him to be a lambe in déede, and ſuch a one as would waſh your feet for humilitie: but heare him ſpeake, and you ſhall find him a dragon. Sée and reade the epiſtle of pope Martine the fift aboue mentioned, pag. 597. charging, commanding, and threatning emperours, kings, dukes, princes, marqueſſes, earles, barons, knights, rectors, conſuls, proconſuls, with their ſhires, counties, and vniuerſities of their kingdomes, prouinces, cities, townes, caſtles, villages, and other places. Note alſo the anſwere of another pope to the king of England, which for the price of the kings head, would not grant vnto him the inueſting of his biſhops. Marke well the words and doings of Pope Hildebrand againſt the Emperour Henrie the fourth, page 161. Alſo of Pope Alexander the 2. treading vpon the necke of Fredericus Barbarolla, not like a lambe treading vpon a dragon, but like a dragon treading vpon a lambe: ſo that his owne verſe might be turned vpon himſelfe: Tanquam aſpis & baſiliſcus ſuper ouiculam ambulans, & tanquam Leo & draco conculcans agnum. Conſider moreouer the behauiour, manner, condition, and propertie almoſt of all the Popes which haue béene theſe 600. yéeres, and what Dragon or Serpent could be more viperous, then their owne doings and words can ſpeake, and giue teſtimonie againſt themſelues.

The pope hath the hornes of a Lambe, but the mouth of a Dragon.

It followeth moreouer in the ſame propheſie of the Apocalypſe for the third argument. And he doth all the power of the firſt beaſt, preſently before his face, and cauſeth the earth, and all the inhabitants therein to honour the firſt beaſt, the ſtripe of whoſe deadly wound was cured, &c.

The third reaſon.

In this propheſy two things are to be noted: firſt, what the firſt beaſt is, whoſe power the ſecond beaſt doth execute. Secondly, what this ſecond beaſt is, which ſo doth exercile his power in his ſight. The firſt of theſe beaſts here in the Apocal. deſcribed, hauing ſeuen heads and ten hornes, muſt needs ſignifie the citie of Rome, which may eaſily be proued by two demonſtrations. Firſt, by the expoſition of the 17. chapter of the ſame Apocalyps, where is declared and deſcribed the ſaid beaſt to ſtand of 7. hils, and to containe 10. kings, hauing the whole power of the dragon giuen: and alſo the ſame citie to bee named the whore of Babylon, drunken with the blood of Saints. All which properties ioyned together, can agrée in no wiſe but onely to the heathen Empire of Rome, which Citie at that time of writing theſe propheſies, had the gouernment of the whole world. The ſecond demonſtration or euidence, may be deduced out of the number of the monethes aſſigned to this beaſt, Apoc. 13. For ſo it is written, that this beaſt had power to make, that is, to worke his malice againſt Chriſtes people 42. moneths, which monethes counted by ſabbathes of yeeres (that is, euery moneth for ſeuen yeeres) maketh vp the iuſt number of thoſe yeeres, in which the primitiue Church was vnder the terrible perſecutions of the heathen Emperors of Rome, as is afore ſpecified, pag. 265.

The two beaſts in the 13. chapter of the Apocalypſe expounded.

A deſcription of the City and Monarchy of Rome.

Which thing thus ſtanding, proued and confeſſed, that the firſt beaſt muſt needs ſignifie the Empire and City of Rome, then muſt it neceſſarily follow that the ſecond beaſt with the lambes hornes muſt ſignifie the biſhop and pope of the ſame city of Rome. The reaſon whereof is euident, and apparent by that which followeth in the prophecie, where it is declared, that the ſecond beaſt hauing two hornes of a lambe, receiued and exerciſed all the power of the firſt beaſt, before or in the ſight of the ſaid beaſt, which cannot bee verified neither in the Turke, nor in any other, but onely in the pope of Rome, who (as you ſée) receiueth, vſurpeth, and deriueth to himſelfe all the power of that city and Monarchie of Rome: Inſomuch that he ſaith, that when Conſtantine or Ludouicus yeelded vnto him the rule and kingdome of that city, he gaue him but his owne, and that which of right and duty belonged to him before.

The deſcription of the beaſt with the two hornes of the lambe. Apoc. 13.

The pope hauing all the rule and power of Rome.

And this authority or power ouer all the empire of Rome, he worketh not in Aſia, or in Conſtantinople as the Turke doth, but in the ſight of the beaſt which gaue him the power, that is, in the city of Rome it ſelfe, which is the firſt beaſt here in this prophecie of the Apocalyps deſcribed.

Fourthly, it followeth more, And he cauſeth the earth, and all the inhabitants therein, to worſhip and honour the firſt beaſt, which had a deadly wound, and was cured, &c. The interpretation of this part, as alſo of all the other parts of the ſame chapter, ſtandeth vpon the definition of the firſt beaſt, for being granted, as cannot be denied, that the firſt beaſt, ſignifieth the city and empire of Rome, it muſt conſequently follow, that the biſhop (whom we call the pope) of the ſame city of Rome, muſt be vnderſtood by the ſecond beaſt, forſomuch as neither Turke nor any other, but only the biſhop of Rome, hath holden vp the eſtimation and dignity of that city, which began to be in ruine and decay by the Vandalians, Gothes, Herulians, and Lombards, about the yéere of our Lord, 456. but afterward by the biſhop of Rome, the priſtine ſtate and honour of that city reuiued againe, and flouriſhed in as great veneration, as euer it did before. And that is it which the holy Ghoſt ſéemeth here to meane of the firſt beaſt, ſaying: That he had a wound of the ſword, and was cured. For ſo it followeth.

Apoc. 13. The fourth reaſon.

The fifth reaſon.

Fifthly, And he cauſed all the inhabitants of the earth to make the image of the beaſt, which had the ſtripe of the ſword and liued. And it was giuen to him to giue life to the image of the beaſt, and to make the image thereof to ſpeake, and to cauſe all them that worſhipped not the image of the beaſt, to be killed: forcing all perſons both little and great, rich and poore, bond and free, to take the marke of the beaſt in their right hand, or in their foreheads, and that none might buy or ſell but they which had the marke, or the name of the beaſt, or the number of his name, &c.

Rome almoſt dead.

By giuing life to the image of the beaſt, and making it to ſpeake is to be preſuppoſed that the beaſt was at a neere point of death, and lay ſpeechles before, inſomuch that the Citie of Rome began to looſe and change his name, and was called a while Odacria, of Odacer King of the Herulians: which by dint of ſword ſurpriſed the Romaines: and yet not withſtanding, by the meanes of this Romaine Prelate, the ſaid Citie of Rome, which was then ready to giue vp the ghoſt, ſo recouered his maieſtie and ſtrength againe, that it is hard to ſay, whether Rome did euer ruffle & rage in his tyrannie before, in the time of Nero, Domitian, Diocletian, and other Emperors, more tragically, then it hath done vnder the Pope: or whether that Rome had all Kings, Quéenes, Princes, Dukes, Lords, and all ſubiects more vnder obedience and ſubiection, when the Emperors raigned, or now in the raigne of the pope. And therefore it is ſaid not without cauſe of the holy Ghoſt: That it is giuen to him, to giue life and ſpeech to the image of the beaſt, cauſing all them to be ſlaine which will not worſhip the image of the beaſt, &c. As for example hereof, who ſeeth not what numbers and multitudes of Chriſtian men, women and children in all Countreyes, haue bene put to the fire and ſword: Stories of all times will declare, what hauocke hath bene made of Chriſtian bloud, about the prehemintence and maiority of the ſea of Rome: what Churches and Countreyes both Greekes and Latin, haue bene excommunicated: what Kings haue bene depoſed, and Emperours ſtripped from their Imperiall ſeate, and all becauſe they would not ſtoope and bend to the Image of the beaſt, that is, to the maieſty and title of Rome, aduanced vp ſo highly now by the Biſhop thereof, as it was neuer higher before in the raigne of Nero or Diocleſian. Wherefore taking the firſt beaſt to ſignifie the Empyre of Rome, which cannot be denyed, it is plaine, that the ſecond beaſt muſt neceſſarily be applied to the pope, and not to the Turke, for as much as the Turke ſéeketh nothing leſſe then the aduancement of that Empire, but rather ſtriueth againſt it, to plucke it downe.

Rome called Odacria.

To giue life to the image of the beaſt.

The Image of Rome ſpeaketh againe as cruelly as euer it did.

Et facies eorum occidi, qui non adorauerint imaginem beſtiæ. Apoc 13.

The firſt reaſon.

The firſt and laſt argument is grounded vpon the number of the name of the beaſt, expreſſed by the holy Ghoſt in the ſame Prophecie, by the letters χξϛ. In which letters, although there lieth great darkeneſſe and difficultie to be vnderſtood, yet certaine auncient Fathers which were diſciples and hearers of them which heard S. Iohn himſelfe, as Irenæus and other, do expound the ſaid letters coniecturally to containe the name of the beaſt, and to be the name of a man, vnder this word λατεινος: Where as elſe no other name lightly of any perſon either in Greéke or Latine, will agrée to the ſame, ſaue onely the foreſaid name λατεινος. Although ſome later writers giuing their coniectures vpon the ſame, do find the name of Lateranus in Hebrew letters, to anſwere to the ſame number. Some faine other names, as ωιπμος or νικαν. made words, which ſignifie nothing, as Diclux, or Luduuic, by Romane letters, &c. But of all names properly ſignifying any man, none commeth ſo néere to the number of this myſtery (if it goe by order of letters) as doth the word λατεινος afore ſaid. And thus much by the way, and occaſion of Nicolaus de Lyra, Paulus Burgen, Matthias Doringus, the author of Fortalilium fidei, and other Commentaries moe of the ſame faction: who writing vpon this thirteenth Chapter of the Apocalips, and not conſidering the circumſtances thereof, both are deceiued themſelues, and deceiue many other, applying that to the Turke, which cannot otherwiſe be verified but onely vpon the pope, as may appeare ſufficiently by the premiſſes: Not that I write this of any mood or malice either to the citie of Rome, or to the perſon of the biſhop, as being Gods creature: but being occaſioned here to entreat of the prophecies againſt the Turkes, would wiſh the Readers not to bee deceiued, but rightly to vnderſtand the ſimple Scriptures according as they lie, to the intent that the true meaning thereof being bolted out, it may be the better knowne what prophecies directly make againſt theſe Turkes, what otherwiſe.

Nicol. de Lyra, and other papiſh writers, deceiued in the 13. chapter of the Apocalyps.

In the which prophecies againſt the Turkes, now to proceed, let vs come to the 20. Chapter of the Apocalyps, wherein the holy Scripture ſeemeth plainelie and directlie to notifie the ſaid Turkes. The words of the prophecie be theſe.

Apoc. cap. 20.

And I ſaw an angell deſcending from heauen, hauing the key of the bottomleſſe pit, and a great chaine in his hand: and hee tooke the dragon, the old Serpent, which is the diuell and Satanas, and bound him vp for a thouſand yeeres, and caſt him in the pit, and ſealed him vp, that he ſhould not ſeduce the people any more, till the thouſand yeeres were expired: and after that hee muſt bee let looſe for a little while, &c.

And it followeth after: And when the thouſand yeeres ſhall be complete, Satanas ſhall be let out of his dungeon, and ſhall goe abroad to ſeduce the people, which are on the foure corners of the land of Gog and Magog, to aſſemble them to battel, whoſe number is like to the ſands of the ſea. And they went vp vpon the latitude or breadth of the earth, and compaſſed about the tents of the Saints, and the welbeloued cities, &c.

The binding and looſing out of Satan examined.

Three things to be noted in this prophecie.

To the perfect vnderſtanding of this prophecie, three things are neceſſarie to be knowne. Firſt, what is meant by binding vp, and looſing out of Satanas the old dragon. Secondly, at what time and yéere firſt he was chained vp and ſealed for a thouſand yéeres. Thirdly, at what yéere and time theſe thouſand yeeres did end, when as hee ſhould be looſed out againe for a little ſeaſon. Which three points being well examined and marked, the Prophecie may eaſily be vnderſtood directly to be meant of the Turke. Albeit Anagogically ſome part thereof may alſo be referred not vnproperly vnto the Pope, as is aboue notified.

What is meant by binding vp of Sathan.

Firſt, by binding and looſing of Satanas, ſéemeth to be meant the ceaſing and ſtaying of the cruell and horrible perſecution of the heathen Emperours of Rome, againſt the true Chriſtians, as is to be ſéene in the ten firſt perſecutions in the primitiue Church aboue deſcribed in the former part of theſe Actes and Monuments: in the which moſt bloody perſecutions, Satanas the diuell then raged without all meaſure, till the time it pleaſed almightie God to ſtop this old Serpent, and to tye him shorter. And thus haue you to vnderſtand what is meant by the binding vp of Sathan for a thouſand yéeres: whereby is ſignified, that the perſecution againſt the Chriſtians ſtirred vp by the beaſt (that is, in the Empire of Rome, through the inſtigation of Sathan) ſhall not alwayes continue, but ſhall breake vp after certaine time, and ſhall ceaſe for a thouſand yeeres, &c.

The time of binding vp of Sathan.

Now at what time and yeere this perſecution, that is, the furie and rage of Sathan ſhould ceaſe, is alſo declared in the Apocalypſe before: where in the 11. and. 13. chapters we read, that the beaſt afore mentioned, ſhall haue power to worke his malice and miſchiefe, the ſpace of 42. moneths, and no more, and then that Sathan ſhould be locked vp for a thouſand yeeres. The computation of which moneths being counted by Sabbathes of yeeres (after the example of the 69. weekes of Daniell, cap. 11.) it doth bring vs to the iuſt yeere and time, when that terrible perſecution in the primitiue Church ſhould end, and ſo it did. For giue to euery moneth a Sabbath of yeeres, that is, reckon euery moneth for ſeuen yeeres, and that maketh 294. yeeres, which was the full time betweene the 18. yeere of Tiberius, (vnder whom Chriſt ſuffered) and the death of Marentius the laſt perſecutor of the primitiue Church in Europe, ſubdued by Conſtantinus, as may appeare by calculating the yeeres, moneths, and dayes betweene the ſaid yeere of the raigne of Tiberius, and the latter end of Marentius: and ſo haue you the ſupputation of the yeere and time, when Satan was firſt bound vp, after hee had raged in the primitiue Church 42. moneths.

Which maketh, as is said, being counted by Sabbaths of yeeres, after the vsuall maner of the Scripture, mounteth to 294. yeeres: and so much was the full time betweene the passion of our Lord, which was in the 18. yeere of Tiberius, vnto the last yeere of Maxentius.

The pope proued to be the second beast mentioned in the Apocal. 13.

And here by the way commeth a note to be obserued, that forasmuch as by the number of these 42. moneths, specified in the Apocalyps the Empire of Rome must necessarily be confessed to be the first beast: therefore it must by like necessitie follow, the Bishop of Rome to be the second beast, with the two hornes of the Lambe, for that he onely hath and doth cause the said Empire of Rome to reuiue and to be magnified, and so doth not the Turke, but rather laboureth to the contrary. Wherfore let euery Christian man be wise and beware betime how he taketh the marke of the beast, least peraduenture it follow vpon him, that he drinke of that terrible cup of wrath mentioned, Apocal. chap. 14.

The third part of the prophesie for the louing out of Sathan.

Thirdly, it remaineth to be discussed touching the third point in this foresaid prophecie, that as we haue found out (through the helpe of Christ) the yeere and time of Satans binding, so we search out likewise the time and season of his louing out, which by the testimonie of Scripture, was appointed to be a thousand yeeres after his binding vp, and rightly according to the time appointed, it came to passe. For if we number well by the Scripture the yeere of his binding vp, which was from the passion of our Lord 294. yeeres and adde therto a thousand yeares, it mounteth to 1294. which was the very yeere when Ottomannus the first Turke began his raigne: which was the first spring and welhead of all these woefull calamities that the Church of Christ hath felt both in Asia, Affrica, and Europe, almost these three hundreth yeeres past. For so we finde in Chronicles, that the kingdome of the Turkes being first deuided into foure families, an. 1280. at length the familie of Ottomannus preuailed, and thereupon came these, whom now we call Turkes: which was about the same time, when pope Boniface the eight was bishop of Rome.

Thus saith the Lord God: Art not thou he, of whom I haue spoken in the old time, by the hand of my seruants the Prophets of Israel, that prophecied in those dayes and yeeres, that I would bring thee vpon them? At the same time also, when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, my wrath shall arise in mine anger. For in mine indignation, and in the fire of my wrath haue I spoken it: Surely at that time there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel, so that the fishes of the sea, the foules of the heauen, the beasts of the field, and all that moue and creepe vpon the earth, and all the men that are vpon the earth shall tremble at my presence: the mountaines shall bee ouerthrowen: the starres shall fall, and euery wall shall fall to the ground, &c.

Methodius prophecies.

Vnto these testimonies aboue excerpted out of the holy Scriptures, let vs adde also the prophetical reuelations of Methodius, Hildegardis, Sybilla, and others. This Methodius is thought of some to be the same Methodius, of whom Hierome, and Suidas make mention: which was bishop first of Olympus in Lycia, then of Tyrus, and suffered martyrdome in the last persecution of the primitiue Church, vnder Diocletian. Vnto whom also Trithemius attributeth the booke intituled: De Quatuor nouissimis temporibus. But that cannot be, forasmuch as the said Methodius doth cite and alleadge the Maister of Sentences, namely, in his second booke, and first distinction, which maister of Sentences, followed more then a thousand yeere after Christ: besides certaine other fabulous matter contained in the same booke. Albeit, because he speaketh there of many things concerning the state of the Church vnder Antichrist, and the reformation of religion, as seemeth rightly to come to passe, and more is like to follow, I thought not to defraud the Reader therof, leauing the credite of the Author to his arbitrement, to esteeme and iudge of him as he seeth cause. Among diuers other places of Methodius, prophecying of the latter time, These words doe follow.

The prophecies of Methodius, concerning the Turkes.

After that the children of Ishmael haue had multiplied in their generations to an infinite and innumerable multitude, in the desert aforesaid, they came out of the wildernes of Arabie, and entred into the habitable land, and fought with the kings of the Gentiles, which were in the land of promise, and the land was filled with them. And after 70. weekes, and halfe of their power wherewith they haue subdued all the kingdomes of the Gentiles, their heart was exalted, seeing themselues so to haue preuailed, and to haue conquered all things, &c. And afterward it followeth of the same matter in this wise.

It shall come to passe that the said seed of Ishmaell, shall issue out and obtaine the whole world, with the regions thereof, in the entring of peace, from the land of Aegypt, vnto Ethiopia: and from the floud Euphrates, vnto India: and from the riuer Tygris, to the entring of Nabaot, the kingdome of Ionithus, the son of Noe, & from the North, vnto Rome & Illyricu Aegypt, and Thessalonica, and Albania, and so forth to the sea Ponticum, which diuideth the said kingdomes from Germany and France; and their yoke shall be double vpon the neckes of all nations, and Gentiles: neither shall there bee nation or kingdome vnder heauen, which shall be able to stand against them in battaile, vntill the number of 8. weekes of yeeres, &c.

The first state or alteration of times concerning the coming of the Saracens.

Briefly, as in a grosse summe, this shall suffice, to admonish the reader, touching the meaning and methode of Methodius Prophecies, which Methodius first describing the long and tedious afflictions of Christs Church, maketh mention of the seede of Ishmaell, which comming out of the parts and deserts of Arabie, shall destroy (saith he) and banquith the whole earth. So that the Christians shall be giuen of God, to the hands of the filthy Barbarians, to be slaine, polluted, & captiued: Persia, Armenia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, Aegypt, the East parts, Asia, Spaine, all Grecia, France, Germania, Agathonia, Sicilia. The Romanes also shall be slaine and put to flight: also the Ilands of the Seas shall be brought to desolation, and to captiuity, and put to the sword. The which tribulation of the Christians shall be without mercy or measure: the raunsome of gold and siluer and other exactions, intollerable, but especially the dwellers of Aegypt and Syria shall be most in the affliction of those times: And Hierusalem shall be filled with multitudes of people brought thither in captiuitie, from the foure windes which are vnder heauen. So that beasts also, and foules and fish in the water, and the waters of the sea, shall be to them obedient. Cities and Townes, which were before full of people, shall be laid wast. Women with child shall be ript: their children sticked: infants taken from their mothers, and cast in the streets, and none shall bury them. The rulers and sage of the people shall be slaine, and throwen out to the beasts. Churches shall be spoiled: the priests destroied: virgins defloured, and men compelled to sell their children, and the comming of them shall be chastisement without mercy, and with them shall goe their foure plagues: captiuity, destruction, perdition, and desolation, with much more, which for breuitie I ouerpasse. And this affliction, saith he, shall last eight weekes, or Sabbaths of yeeres, which I take to signifie eight hundreth yeeres, &c.

Christians plagued by the Saracens.

Secondly after these terrible plagues thus described by Methodius vpon the Christians, which he saith shall fall vpon them for their wicked abhominations recited in the first and second chapter of S. Paule to the Romanes: the said Methodius afterward, in this great distresse of the Christians, being out of all hope and comfort of relefe, declareth and speaketh of a certaine king of the Greekes or Romanes, which shall restore peace againe to the Christians. In which peace they shall reedifie their cities and mansions againe: the priests shalbe deliuered from their grieuances, and men at that time shall rest from their tribulations, and then shall the king of the Romanes dwell in the citie of Hierusalem a weeke or sabbath, and a halfe of times, &c.

The second state or alteration of the Christians relieued of their plagues and tribulations.

Christians abusing Gods benefites.

Thirdly, during the time of this peace, the said Methodius saith, that men shall fall into licentious security, and careleslife: and then according to the words of the Apostle, saying: When they shall say, peace, peace, sodaine destruction shall fall vpon them: then (saith he) shall be opened the gates of the North, and the beastly people shall breake in, which king Alexander the great did close vp within 2. mountaines, making his prayer vnto the Lord God, that he would bind vp that beastiall and execrable people, least with their filthy and detestable pollutions, they should come out & pollute the holy land. Whose intercession being heard, the Lord commaunded them to be inclosed within two mountaines in the North parts, to the deepenesse of 12. cubits (which signifieth peraduenture 12. hundred yeeres) so that neither by witchcraft, nor by any means they could get out, or any might come vnto them, vntill the time of the Lord appointed, which are (saith he) the latter times: and then according to the prophecie of Ezechiel in the latter time of the consummation of the world, Gog and Magog out from the North, shal come forth into the land of Israel, & shal worke all this mischiefe against Christians, aboue recited. And then (saith Method. proceeding in his Prophecies) shal the K. of Romanes, after he hath reigned in Ierusalem a Sabbath of times, and a halfe, that is, saith Met. x. yeeres and a halfe, take the crowne from his head, and yeeld it vp to the crosse in Golgotha where Christ was crucified, and shall die. And the Crosse with

By this reigning vp the crowne to the crucifix in Golgotha, is signified, the ceasing of the raigne of the Christians in Hierusalem till the comming of Christ.

By this tribe of Dan, and the cities Chorosaim, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, is signified Gods great malediction vpon Antichrist.

with the crowne shall be taken into heauen, which shal not appeare againe before the comming of the Lord.

Fourthly, it followeth then moreouer in the Prophecies of Method, which declareth, that when the weeke or Sabbath and halfe weeke of times shall end, & when the K. of Romanes shall giue vp his crowne in Ierusalem, and die: Then immediatly shall Antichrist the sonne of perdition begin to appeare, and be borne in Iewry, of the tribe of Dan, whereof also came Iudas Iscariot, and he shall be borne (saith Methodius) in Chorosaim and shall be bred in Bethsaida, & shall raigne in Capernaum: to the which 3. cities, Christ the Lord gaue his 3. Væ. And when great tribulation shall increase and multiplie in the dayes of this Antichrist, and all lordship and dominion shall be destroyed, the Lord shall send his two faithfull and deere seruants, Enoch and Hely, to reproue and detect the false seducing, and lying forgeries of this Antichrist, openly before all men: so that the people seeing themselues fallsly beguiled, and seduced by this son of perdition, comming out of the temple dissemblingly, to the destruction of many, shall leaue and flie from him, and ioyne themselues to the said two holy Prophets. Which sonne of perdition and Antichrist seeing his proceedings so to be reproued, and brought into contempt, in his fury and anger shall kill the two Prophets of God. And then shall appeare (saith Methodius) the signe of the comming of the sonne of man, and he shall come in the clouds of heauenly glory, and shall destroy the enemie with the spirit of his mouth, &c.

✻ Interpretation.

The interpretation.

TO these prophecies and testimonies of Methodius, what credite is to be giuen, I leaue it to the Reader. But if the meaning of his prophecies goe by such order of times, as is set and disposed in his booke: he seemeth to describe vnto vs foure principall states and alterations of times to come.

The comming of the Saracens.

The first state and alteration is by Mahumete and the Saracens, which be the offspring and sonnes of Ismaell, comming out of Arabie in the time of Heraclius Emperor of Constantinople, An. 630. which rebelling against Heraclius, increased and prevailed still more and more against the Christians, both in Asia, and Africa, and also in many places in Europe, especially in Spaine and Italy.

The comming of the Turkes.

The second state and alteration he prophecisth to come by the Turke, which first comming out of the farre parts of Scythia, that is, out of the North, first ouercame the Saracens, subdued the Persians, & afterward ioyning together with the Saracens, conquered the kingdome of Hierusalem about the yeere of our Lord 1187. then subdued Syria and most part of Asia. &c. And these be they, which Methodius seemeth to meane of, speaking of the vile and miserable people closed vp of the Lord God, at the intercession of Alexander the great captaine in the North, betweene two mountaines the deepenesse of 12. cubits, least that filthy corrupt nation should pollute the earth with their wickednes. Whereby are meant these Turks, which comming out from the vttermost parts of the North, that is, out of Scythia and the mountaines of Caucasus or else Iemaus, were withholden and kept backe of almightie God, for Christs cause, that they might not harme his Church a long space, during the time of 11. C. yeeres: yea, and then, the sinnes of the Christians so deserning, they were permitted of almightie God to breake out, and to inuade the Church: who now ioyning together with the Saracens, haue wrought and daily doe worke, all these greeuances against our Christian brethren: as we see this day is come to passe, & more is like to follow, except the hand of the Lord, which let them out, do pluck them in again.

Victory of the Christians got against the Saracens. Ex Paulo Iouio.

The city of Hierusalem recouered by the Christians from the Sararens.

Hierusalem possessed of the Christians 88. yeeres

Hierusalem won from the Christians by the Turkes, an. 1187.

Moreouer, in the meane space, betweene the raigne of the Saracens and the Turkes, where Methodius speaketh of the K. of Romanes, which should restore quietnes to the Church, and should raigne in Hierusalem, a Sabbath of times and halfe a Sabbath: therby seemeth to be vnderstood the voiage of Christian princes out of the West parts of Europe, vnder Gotfridus Duke of Lotharing and his two brethren, and many other Christian princes, with 300. M. footmen, and 100. M. horsemen: who fighting against the Saracens, recouered againe from them, the citie of Hierusalem, in the yeere of our Lord 1099. which citie before had bin in their possession, the terme of 490. yeers. After which victorie got, first Gotfridus, then Baldwinus his brother, and other after them, to the number of 9. Christian kings, reigned in Hierusalem the space of 88. yeeres, and after that through the discord of the christians not agreeing amongst themselues both Hierusalem and Syria, with other parts of Asia besides, were subdued and won of the Turkes, which to this day they keepe yet still. And this was in the yeere of our Lord. 1187.

The comming and markes of Antichrist described.

About which yeere and time (as followeth in Methodius) when the citie of Hierusalem shall be won of the Turkes, then shall Antichrist begin to be borne of the tribe of Dan, of whom came Iudas Iscariot, and shall be borne in Chorosaim and bred in Bethsaida, and raigne in Capernaum: Meaning, that this Antichrist or sonne of perdition, shall be full of Gods malediction, noted by Judas Iscariot, and these three cities against whom were spoken three Væ of the Lord.

And here is moreouer to be noted, that Methodius saith, not that Antichrist shall bee borne among the Saracens or Turkes, but among the people of God, and of the tribe of Israell. Whereby is to be collected, that Antichrist shall not come of the Saracens, nor Turkes, but shall spring vp among the Christians, and (saith Methodius) shall seeme to come out of the Temple, to deceiue many, &c. Whereby the pope may seeme rather then the Saracen or the Turke, to bee described, for so much as the pope, being elected, nourished and raigning in the midst of Gods people, at Rome, sitteth in the temple, and very place of Christ: and (no doubt) deceiueth many, &c.

The time of Antichrist. Petrus Lombardus. Gratianus. Innocentius. 3.

And now to come to the time assigned of Methodius, here is to be added also, that which we read in Antoninus. Par. 3. that about this said present time, a certaine Bishop of Florence preached that Antichrist was then comming. But the Pope commanded him to keepe silence, and to speake no more therof. How why the pope so did, and why he could not abide the preaching of Antichrist, I referre it to them, which list to muse more vpon the matter. This is certaine, that about this time here assigned by Methodius, came Petrus Lombardus, Gratianus, and pope Innocent the third, the first authors and patrons of transubstantiation. At which time also began the first persecution by the Church of Rome, against the Albingenses or Waldenses, about Tolous, Bitures, and Auinion. Of whom 17. M. the same time were slaine, by the popes crossed souldiers. Among whom frier Dominicke was then the chiefest doer. About which time also was Frier Frances, of which two came the two orders of begging Friers: all which began much about one time together. an. 1215. which were nere, within 20. yeeres after the kingdom of the Christians was taken of the Turks, according to the prophesie aboue said.

Transubstantiation.

The first persecution by the Church of Rome Dominicke. Frier Francis. Ex Antonino part. 3. tit. 19. c. 1.

The orders of Friers began.

It followeth moreouer in Methodius, That in his time all Lordship and domination shall cease and giue ouer, &c. The verity whereof we see now accomplished in the pope. For where the pope with his double sword, and triple crowne doth come, there all secular power must giue place, both Emperours, kings, and princes must stoupe.

The pope exalting himselfe aboue kings and Emperors.

So king John yelded vp his crowne to Pandulphus the popes Legate, and was in his hand fiue dayes. an. 1217.

Notes of Antichrist.

Childericke the French king had his crowne taken from him, and giuen to Pipine an. 747.

Henricus 4. Emperor was forced to submit himselfe and his scepter to pope Hildebrand. an. 1077.

Fredericus Barbarossa Emperor, in S. Markes Church in Venice, was faine to lay downe his neeke vnder the pope Alexanders feet. an. 1177. Which Fredericke also before, was faine to hold the stirrop to pope Adrian, &c.

What should I speake of the Ambassadour of Venice, named Franciscus Vandulus: who being sent to pope Clement the 5. was made to lie vnder the popes table like a dog, and gather vp the crums, mentioned in Sabel. Aenn. 9. li. 7.

Henrie the 3. being Emperor, had his diademe first set on with the feete of the pope, and afterward stroken off from his head with the popes foote againe.

And what shall I speake more hereof: when as Carolus Magnus submitted himselfe so lowe to kisse the feete of Pope Leo. An. 800.

Enoch and Hely.

It followeth then in the prophecie of Methodius: That in the tribulation of those dayes, shall be sent from God two speciall Prophets, Enoch and Hely, to reproue and disclose the fraudulent falsehood of Antichrist, and that many seeing his delusion, shall forsake him and follow them: Whereat Antichrist being grieued shall kill them, &c.

John Hus and Hierome of Prage. Vid. in prima Tom. operum Ioan. Hus. De Anatomia.

Hierome of Prage a prophet and Martyr.

We neuer read yet in story, of any such two prophets to be sent either to the Saracens, or to the Turkes: Whereas against the pope, we read John Hus and Hierome of Prage two learned Martyrs and Prophets of God to haue beene sent, and to haue reproued and described the Anatomie of Antichrist, and at last to haue beene burned for their labour. And what Prophet can speake more plainly, either Enoch or Hely, then did Hierome of Prage, prophecying of the comming of Martin Luther, an hundred yeeres after him: when the pope and his fellowes should answere to God and to him. The time we see came iust. Now let the pope see with his fellowes, what answere they can make.

The negruesse of the Lords iudgement.

It followeth further in Methodius concluding his prophecie. And then (ſaith he) ſhall appeare the comming of the ſonne of man in the cloudes of heauen, with celeſtiall glorie, &c.

Wherefore after the burning of theſe two notable Prophets, with many other thouſands burned alſo ſince their time by the Biſhop of Rome, it is to be thought, that the comming of Chriſts iudgement in the cloudes, is not farre of. Veni cito Domine, Amen.

And thus much touching Methodius, of whoſe propheſies how much or how little is to be eſteemed, I leaue it indifferent vnto the Reader. For me it ſhall ſuffice ſimply to haue recited his words, as I find them in his booke contained: noting this by the way, that of this booke of Methodius, De nouiſſimis temporibus, neither Hicrome in his Catalogue, nor Suidas, nor yet Auentinus in the place where he intreateth purpoſely of ſuch prophecies, maketh any mention. As touching Hildegardis and Brigit, and other whom the French call Bardi for their ſongs and prophetical verſes, ſufficient hath beene alleadged before out of Auentinus: Who in his third booke of Chronicles, writing of the teſtimonies of Hildegard, Brigit, and Bardi, ſeemeth to ground vpon them, that the Turks, whether we will or not, ſhall haue their imperiall ſeat at Colen: And I pray God, that it come not to paſſe, that the Turke doe giue ſome attempt againſt England by the ſeas, before that he come to Colen by land, &c.

The propheſie of Hildegardis & Brigit of the Turkes.

Ex Auentino lib. 3. Annalium. A caueat to England.

Ex Brigitta, lib. 4. cap. 57.

Brieuity cauſeth me to cut off many teſtimonies and reuelations of theſe aboue ſaid, or elſe I could here rehearſe the prophetical words of Brigit, lib. 4. cap. 57. concerning the citty and Church of Rome, which as the ſaith, muſt be purged and ſcoured with three things: to wit, with ſharpe ſword, with fire, and with the plough, and that God will doe with that citie, as one that remoueth plants out of one place vnto another: and finally that the citie of Rome ſhall ſuſteine the ſentence, as if a Iudge ſhould commaund the skin to be flaine off, the blood to be drawen from the fleſh, and the fleſh to be cut in ſmall peeces, and the bones thereof to be broken, ſo that all the marrow may be quiſed out from the ſame, &c. But for Brieuitie I let Brigit paſſe, and ſome thing will declare out of Erythræa Sybilla, in her booke of prophecies found in S. Georges Church in Venice: Where ſhe propheſying many things of the birth of Chriſt vnder Auguſtus, and of the birth of Iohn Baptiſt, and of baptiſme, of the Apoſtles, of the conuerſion of the Gentiles, and of Conſtantinus, &c. hath theſe words: After that the peaceable bull ſhall conclude all the climes of the world vnder tribute, in thoſe dayes a heauenly lambe ſhall come: and the dayes ſhall come, when the power of the flowing ſtreame ſhall bee magnified in water, and the Lyon the Monarch ſhall bee conuerted to the lambe, which ſhall ſhine to all men, and ſubuert kingdomes.

Prophecies of Brigit, against Rome.

The Propheties of Erithræa Sybilla named Erythilla.

Ex Erithræa Sybilla in ſuo Nazilographo, i. imperiali ſcripto.

Moreouer ſaith Sybilla, In the latter age God ſhall bee humbled, and the diuine ofspring ſhall be abaſed, and Deitie ſhall bee ioyned with humanitie, the lambe ſhall lie in hay, and God and man ſhall bee bred vp vnder a maidens attendance, ſignes and wonders ſhall goe before amongſt the circumciſed, &c. Alſo, an aged woman ſhall conceiue a child hauing knowledge of things to come. The world ſhall maruell at Bootes (the ſtar) which ſhall be a leader to his birth. He hauing 32. feete and 6. thumbes ſhall chuſe himſelfe out of fiſhers and abiects, the number of 12. and one diuell, not with ſword nor with battell, &c. afterward this followeth moreouer in Sybilla, ſaying: The health of the lambe lying ſhall bee clothed with a few ſpoiles of the Lyon. Blacke ſhall be turned into red. He ſhall ſubdue the citie of Aeneas, and kings, but in the booke of the fiſher, In deiection and pouerty he ſhall conquere riches and ſhall tread downe pride with his owne death. In the night he ſhall riſe vp, and be changed, he ſhall liue and raigne, and all theſe things ſhall be conſummated, and regeneration (or new things) be made: at laſt he ſhall iudge both good and euill, &c. And thus much briefly collected out of Sybilla Erythræa concerning Chriſt our Lord.

Prophecies of Sybilla of Chriſt.

By his feete is ſuppoſed to be meant the yeres of his age.

* The lambe lying, &c. that is, the church without trauell ſhall be maintained with ſome liuing or poſſeſſions of the chiefe rulers.

Furthermore, touching the ſtate and courſe of the Church and of Antichriſt, it followeth in the ſaide Sybilla, ſaying: Then ſhall foure winged beaſts riſe vp in teſtimonie, they ſhall ſound out with trumpets the name of the lambe, ſowing righteouſneſſe, and the law irreprehenſible. Againſt which law, the beaſt ſhall gainſtand, and the abhomination and froth of the Dragon. But a marueilous ſtar ſhall riſe, hauing the image of the foure beaſts, and ſhall be in a maruellous multitude, he ſhall bring light to the Greekes, and ſhall illuſtrate the world. The lake of the fiſher ſhall bring the name of the lambe with power, into the citie of Aeneas, vnto the end of the world (or time.) Then in the citie of Aeneas, the ſtarre ioyned, ſhall looſe ſuch as were bound of the deuill, and thereof he ſhall reioyce and glory, and glorious ſhall be his end, &c.

By theſe foure beaſts is meant the 4. Monarchies of the world, that is the multitude of all the kingdomes of the Gentiles as in the Apocal.

By the citie of Aeneas is meant Rome.

After this, Sybilla writing (as it ſeemeth) of Antichriſt, inporteth theſe words. And it ſhall come to paſſe, that an horrible beaſt ſhall come out of the Eaſt, whoſe roaring ſhall bee heard to Aphrike, to the people of Carthage, which hath ſeuen heads and ſcepters innumerable, feete. 663. He ſhall gainſtand the lambe, to blaſpheme his teſtament, encreaſing the waters of the dragon. The kings and princes of the world he ſhal burne in intollerable ſwear, and they ſhall not diminiſh his feet. And then two ſtars like to the firſt ſtarre, ſhall ariſe againſt the beaſt, and ſhall not preuaile, till the abhomination ſhall be come, and the will of the Lord ſhalbe conſummate. And againe ſpeaking of the ſame matter, he inſerreth theſe words of the foreſaid two ſtarres aboue mentioned. And toward the latter dayes, two bright ſtars ſhall ariſe, rayſing vp men lying dead in their ſins, being like to the firſt ſtarre, hauing the face of the foure beaſts which ſhall reſiſt the beaſt, and the waters of the dragon, teſtifying (or preaching) the name and lawe of the lambe, the deſtruction of abhomination and iudgement, and ſhall diminiſh his waters, but they ſhal be weakened in the bread of affliction, and they ſhall riſe againe in ſtronger force, &c.

The propheſies of Sybilla of Antichriſt.

The 663. feete doe meane the yeeres of his raigne.

These two ſtars ſeeme to meane Iohn Hus, and Hierom, who being put to death by the P. their doctrine roſe againe more ſtrongly then before.

And it followeth moreouer. After the abhomination, then ſhall truth be reueiled, and the lambe ſhall be known, to whom regions and countries ſhall ſubmit their necks, and all earthly men ſhall agree together in one, to come into one fold, and to be ruled vnder one diſcipline, and after this ſhall be but a ſmall time, &c.

And ſhortly after, the ſaid Sybilla ſpeaking of the latter iudgement to come, declareth how all the abhominations of ſinnes ſhall come before the lambe: and that terrible fire ſhall fall from heauen, which ſhall conſume all earthly things created vnto the top of heauen, &c.

And thus much out of Sybilla, touching her propheſies of Chriſt and Antichriſt, according as I found them alleadged of a certaine Catholicke Romiſh writer, in his booke intituled Onus Eccleſiæ, excerpted, as he ſaith, out of the library of Saint George in the citie of Venice.

Ex libro cui titulus, onus Eccleſiæ.

Philip Melanthon in his preface vpon Bartholomæus Georgienitz Peregrinus, writing of the Origine and manners of the Turkes, alleadged a certaine propheſie of Hilterus, mentioned hereafter, which foreſaid, that the Turkes ſhould beare rule in Italy and in Germany. an. 1600.

Now it remaineth in concluſion of theſe propheſies of the Turkes, ſomething to ſay of the Turks owne propheſies concerning the enduring & ending of their owne kingdome, whoſe propheticall prognoſtication, being taken out of their owne language, and their owne bookes, I thought here to inſert, as I find it alleadged in the booke of the foreſaid Bartholomæus Georgienitz, as followeth.

A Turkiſh propheſie in the Perſian tongue of the raigne and ruine of the Turkes.

PAtiſſahomoz ghelur, Ciaferum memleketi alur, keuzul almai alur, Kapzeiler, iediy ladegh Gyaur keleci ciſkmaſſe, on ikiyladegh onlaron beghlig eder: eufi iapar, baghi diker baheſai baghlar, oglikezi olur, onichi yldenſora Hriſtianon Keleci ciſchar, ol Turchi gereſtine tus churc.

The ſame in Latin.

IMperator noſter veniet, ethnici Principis regnum capiet, rubrum quoque pomum capiet, in ſuâ poteſtatem rediget: quod ſi ſeptimum vſque annum Chriſtianorum gladius non inſurrexit, vſque ad duodecimum annum eis dominabitur. Domos ædificabit, vineas plantabit, hortos ſepibus muniet, liberos procreabit, & poſt duodecimum annum, apparebit Chriſtianorum gladius, qui Turcam quaquâ verſum in fugam aget.

By the prince of the Gentiles the Turks do here meane the kingdomes and dominions of the Chriſtians, whom they call Gentiles, becauſe they are not circumciſed after their maner.

The ſame in Engliſh.

OUr Emperor ſhall come: he ſhall get the kingdome of the Gentiles prince: alſo he ſhall take the red apple and ſhall bring it vnder his ſubiection: and if the ſword of the Chriſtians ſhall not riſe vnto the vij. yeere, he ſhall haue dominion ouer them vnto the xij. yeere. He ſhall build houſes, plant vineyards, ſhall hedge about his orchards, ſhall procreate children: and after the xij. yeere ſhall appeare the ſworde of the Chriſtians, which ſhall put the Turke to flight euery where.

They which make declaration of this Turkiſh prophecy do erpound this xij. yeere to ſignifie the xij. yeere after the winning of Conſtantinople: which Conſtantinople, ſay they, is meant by the red apple: and after that xij. yeere, ſay they, ſhall riſe the ſword of the Chriſtians, &c. and this prophecie being written and tranſlated out of the Perſian tongue, with this erpoſition vpon the ſame, it is to be found in the booke of Bartholomeus Georgienitz. Albett, concerning the erpoſition thereof, it ſeemeth not to be true which is there ſpoken of the xij. yeere, after the winning of Conſtantinople, being now 100. yeeres ſince the winning thereof.

The erpoſition of the Turkiſh prophecie.

Ex Bartbol. Georgienitz.

Wherefore it may rather ſeeme probable, that by the vij. and xij. yeere of the Turkes, this to be the meaning, that if the vij. of the Ottoman Turkes do ſcape the ſword of the Chriſtians, they ſhall continue, build and plant, &c. vntill the xij. Turke, which is this Solymannus, and then after that ſhall riſe the Chriſtians ſword, which ſhall put them to flight, and banquith them in all quarters. And this erpoſition may ſeeme to accord with the place of Geneſis, Wherein is written of Iſmaell, that he had xij. ſonnes, and no mo: So that this Solymannus being the xij. Turke after Ottomannus, may (by the grace of Chriſt) be the laſt, whom we heard credibly to be reported at the printing hereof, to be dead. But howſoeuer this propheſie is to be taken, it appeareth by their owne Oracles, that at length they ſhall be ouercome by the Chriſtians.

Another erpoſition.

An.1100. The Georgians, which be a people of Armenia the greater, vanquished the Turkes out of the kingdome of Persia, after they had cut their king in peeces. Whereby the Turks flying to Cappadocia, there remained vnder Solyman, and ioyned themselues to the Soldan of Egypt, and waxed then strong in Asia minor, called now Turquinia.

An.1170. When Almericus the seuenth king of Hierusalem after Gotfridus, had ouercome the Calipha, or Sultan of Egypt, the Sultan being ouercome, called for the helpe of Saracone the Sultane of Syria. This Saracon after hee had expulsed the Christians out of Egypt, turned his power against the Sultane of Egypt, and vanquished him, tooke to himselfe the kingdome of Egypt: Which kingdome hee with his posteritie did hold till the comming of the Tartarians and the Mamaluches about the space of — 88. yeers

An.1187. Saladinus the nephew of Saracon the Sultane of Egypt, perceiuing the dissention among the Christian states of Palestina, got Antioch, where hee slew Raymundus the prince with his owne hands: Then got Tiberias: From thence went to Accon, where he tooke Guido king of Jerusalem and master of the Templares prisonners: for whose ransome, the Turke had Ascalon yeelded vp to him of the Christians. That done, he subdued Hierusalem, which had been in the hands of the Christians before, the space of — 88. yeers

An.1189. Frederick emperor, Philip French king, Richard king of England, made their voiage into Asia, where Fredericke washing in a riuer at Cilicia died. In this voiage at the siege of Accon, Saladinus wan the field of our men, of whom 2000. were slaine in the chase. Accon at length was got of the Christians. King Richard got Cyprus. The two kings fell at strife. Philip retired home without any good doing. King Richard laid siege to Jerusalem, but in vaine, and so returning homeward, was taken neere to Vienna in Austria, after he had taken truce before with the Soldane, vpon such condition as pleased him. And this good speed had the popes, sending out against the Turks.

An.1215. There was another councell holden at Rome by pope Innocent 3. where was enacted a new article of our faith for transubstantiation of bread and wine, to bee turned into the body and bloud of our Sauior. In this councell also great excitation was made by the pope, and great preparation was through all Christendom, to set forward for recouery of the holy land. A mighty army was collected of dukes, lords, knights, bishops and prelats, that if Gods blessing had gone with them, they might haue gone throughout all Asia and India. — Transubstantiation.

An.1219. The Christians after 18. moneths siege, got a certaine towne in Egypt, called Damiata or Elipolis, with much adoe, but not much to the purpose. For afterward as the Christian army of the popes sending, went about to besiege the citie Cairus or Babylon, the Sultane through his subtill traine so intrapped and inclosed them within the danger of Nilus, that they were constrained to render againe the city of Damiata, with their prisoners and all the furniture therof as they found it, into the Souldanes hand, and glad so with their liues to passe forward to Tyrus. An.1221.

In the meane time the Egyptian Turke caused the citie of Jerusalem to be rased, that it should serue to no vse to the Christians. What great thing else was done in that voiage, it doth not greatly appeare in stories. Albeit Fredericus the 2. emperour was not vnfruitfully there occupied, and much more might haue done, had it not been for the violence and persecution of the bish. of Rome against him: whereby he was enforced to take truce with the Sultan for 10. yeeres, and so returned. After which things done, not many yeeres after, at length the last citie of all belonging to the Christians, which was Ptolomais or Akers, was also taken from them by the Sultane, so that now the Christians had not one foot left in all Asia. — Vide supra, pag. 271.

An.1230. Thus the Christians being driuen out of Asia by the Sultanes and Turkes, yet the said Turkes and Sultans did not long enioy their victorie: For eftsoones the Lord stirred vp against them the Tartarians, who breaking into Asia by the ports of Caspius subdued diuers parts of Asia, namely, about Comana, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, &c. These Tartarians as they had got many captiues in their warres: so for gaine vsed to shippe them ouer customable to Alexandria in Egypt to bee sold: which seruants and captiues Melechsala the great Sultane was glad to buy to serue him in his warres. Which captiues and seruants after they had continued a certaine space in Egypt, and through their — 100. yeers — Tartarians. — Porta Caspiæ.

valiant seruice grew in fauor and estimation with the said Melechsala, and began more to increase in number and strength: at length they slue him, and tooke to themselues the name and kingdome of the Sultane. And thus ceased the stocke of Saracon and Saladinus afore mentioned, which continued in Egypt, about the space as is said of.

Saladinus stocke in Egypt ceaseth.

100. yeers

An. 1240. After the death of Melechsala, the army of these foresaid rascals and captines, set vp to themselues a king of their owne companie, whom they called Turquemenius. Who to fill vp the number of their company that it should not diminish, deuised this order, to get or to buy christian mens children, taken yong from their parents, and the mothers lap: whom they vsed so to bring vp to make them to deny Christ and to bee circumcised, and instructed in Mahumets law, and afterward to bee trained in the feats of war, and these were called Mamaluchi. Among whom this was their order, that none might bee aduanced to bee king, but out of their owne number, or else chosen by them: neither that any should bee made knights or horsemen, but onely the children of christians which should denie Christ before, called Mamaluchi. Also it was among them prouided, that to this dignitie neither Saracens nor Iewes, should bee admitted. Item, that the succession thereof should not descend to the children and offspring of these Mamaluchi. Also that the succession of the crowne should not descend to the Children of the foresaid Sultanes, but should goe by voice and election. The Tartarians with Turquemenius their king, about this time obtained Turquia, that is, Asia minor, from the Turks, and within 2. yeares after, preuailing against the Turks, expelled them from their kingdome, and so continued these Mamaluchi raigning ouer Egypt, and a great part of Asia, till the time of Tomumbeius their last king, which was destroyed and hanged at the gates of Memphis, by Zelymus the Turke, father to this Solymannus, as in his historie is declared, pag. 685. These Mamaluchi continued the space of:

Vide supra, pag. 685.

An. 1245. These Tartarians ranging through the countries of the Georgians, and al Armenia, came as far as Iconium, which was then the imperiall citie of the Turkes.

An. 1289. The Soldane of Egypt and Babylon got from the Christians Tripolis, Tyrus, Sidon, and Berithus in Syria.

An. 1291. Lastly, Ptolomais, which also is called Akers, was surprised by the said Soldan, raced and cast downe to the ground, and all the Christians therein (which were not many left) were slaine. And this was the last citie which the Christians had in Asia. So that now the Christians haue not one foot (as is said before) left in all Asia. Thus the Egyptian Soldanes, and the Tartarians raigned and ranged ouer the most part of Asia aboue the Turkes, till the raigne of Ottomannus the great Turk, about the space of

80. yeers

¶ And thus haue yee the whole discourse of the Turkish storie, with their names, countries, townes, dominions, also with their times, continuance, interruptions and alterations, in order described, and in yeares distinct: Which otherwise in most authors and writers bee so confused, that it is hard to know distinctly, what difference is betweene the Saracens, Turks Tartarians, the Sultans or Soldans, Mamaluches, or Janizarres: what is their Calipha, their Seriphes, their Sultan, or Balla, in what times they began, and how long, and in what order of yeeres they raigned. All which in this present table manifestly to thine eie may appeare.

¶ Wherein this thou hast moreouer (gentle reader) to consider, which is worthy the noting, how the bishop of Rome all this season, from the first beginning of the Turks raigne, hath not ceased from time to time continually, calling vpon Christian princes and subiects, to take the crosse, and to war against the Turkes: wherevpon so many great voiages haue been made to the holie land, and so many battels fought against the Turke and Soldan for winning the holy crosse: and yet no luckie successe hath followed thereof hitherto, nor euer came it prosperously forward, what soeuer through the exciting of that bishop, hath been attempted against that great enemie of the Lord: Insomuch that the Christians haue lost not onelie all that they had in Asia, but also vnneath are able to defend that little they haue in Europe, against his violence. What the cause is of this hard lucke of the bishops doings, it is hard for man to define. Let men muse as their mind leadeth, and as the Gospell saith, hee that hath eies to see let him see. This is certaine, that as there hath lacked no care nor diligence in the bishop of Rome, to stir men vp to that busines: so on the princes behalfe there hath lacked no courage nor strength of men, no contribution of expenses, no supportation of charges, no furniture or abillement of warre: onely the blessing of God seemeth to haue lacked. The reason and cause whereof I would it were so easie to be reformed, as it may bee quickly construed. For what man beholding the life of vs Christians, will greatlie maruell, why the Lord goeth not with our army to fight against the Turkes? And if my verdit might here haue place, for mee to adde my censure, there appeareth to mee another cause in this matter, yet greater then this aforesaid: which to make plaine and eudent in full discourse of words, leisure now doth not permit. Briefly to touch what I conceiue, my opinion is this: that if the sincere doctrine of Christian faith deliuered and left vnto vs in the word of God, had not been so corrupted in the Church of Rome, or if the bishop of Rome would yet reclame his impure idolatry, & prophanations, and admit Christ the Lambe of God to stand alone, without our vnpure additions, to be our onely Iustification, according to the free promise of Gods grace: I nothing doubt but the power of this faith grounding only vpon Christ the sonne of God, had both framed our liues into a better disposition; and also soone would or yet will bring downe the pride of that proud Holofernes. But otherwise, if the B. of Rome will not gently giue place to the milde voyce of Gods word, I thinke not contrary; but he shalbe compelled at last to giue place & roome to the Turk, whether we will or not. And yet notwithstanding, when both the Turke and the pope shall do against it what they can, the truth and grace of Gods testament shall fructifie and increase by such meanes as the Lord shall worke, which beginneth already (praise to the Lord) to come gratiously and luckily forward in most places.

Why the pope cannot preuaile against the Turkes.

God offended with Idolatry and wrong faith of the Christians.

A prayer against the Turkes.

A praier against the Turkes.

O Eternall Lord God, Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, Creator and disposer of all things, iust, gratious, and wise only, in the name and reuerence of thy Sonne Iesus, we prostrate our selues, desiring thine omnipotent Maiestie, to looke downe vpon these afflicted times of thy poore creatures and seruants: relieue thy church, increase our faith, and confound our enemies: and as thou hast giuen thine onely begotten Sonne vnto vs, promising with him life to all that shall beleeue vpon his name: so incline the obedience of our faith to thy promises in him, that our hearts may bee farre off from all other sinfull additions and prophane inuentions, which are besides him, and not in him, grounded vpon thy will and promise. And grant (we beseech thee) to thy church, more and more to see how terrible a thing it is, to set vp any other meanes or helpe of saluation, but onely in him whom thou onely hast sent, and sealed. Reforme thy church with perfect doctrine and faithfull teachers, that wee seeing our owne weakenesse, may put off our selues, and put on him without whom wee can doe nothing. So shall wee stand strong, when nothing standeth in vs, but thy Sonne alone, in whom thou art onely pleased. Renue in this thy church againe the decayed faith of thy Sonne Iesus, which may plentifullie bring forth in vs, not leaues onely, but fruits of christian life: And forgiue our wretched Idolatrie and blind phantasies past, wherewith wee haue prouoked manifold waies thy deserued indignation against vs: For our hearts haue bin full of Idols, our temples full of Images, our waies full of hypocrisie: thy Sacraments prophaned, and thy religion turned to superstition; because the lanterne of thy word went not before vs, therefore wee haue stumbled. Miserably wee haue walked hitherto, like sonnes not of Sara, but of Agar, and therefore these Turkish Agarens haue risen vp against vs. Many hard and strait waies wee haue passed, but the waies of the Lord we haue not found. Much cost we haue bestowed on bread that swageth no hunger, but that bread which only feedeth and commeth freely, we haue not tasted. We haue sailed far and neere in barkes of our owne building, but haue not kept within the Arke onely of thy promise, and therefore these flouds haue taken vs. We haue praied much, but not in thine appointed temple, and therefore haue not bin heard. We haue plowed and tilled, but without thy heifer, and therfore this vntidy ground of ours, bringeth forth so many weeds. We do fish apace and that al night, but because we fish not on the right side of the boate, in our fishing we catch neuer a fin. Our buildings be full of good intentions & great deuotions, but because the ground worke is not surely laid vpon the rocke of thy promise, the East wind riseth and shaketh them all to shiuers. We walke and haue walked long after the precepts & doctrines of men, hauing a shew of wisedom, but not as holding the head, where lieth al our strength, and therfore these Philistian Turks haue hitherto so preuailed against vs. Briefly, all the parts and and bones of the body be shaken out of place. Wherfore we beseech thee (O Lord) put to thy holy hand, and set them in the right ioynt againe. And finally, reduce this same thy misticall body againe, to his perfect and naturall head, which is thine only son Iesus Christ, and none other. For him onely hast thou anointed and appointed. Neither is there any other head, that can minister strength and nutriment to this body, but he alone: forasmuch as all other heads be sinneful, and are not able to stand in thy sight, but make this body rather worse then better. Only this thy welbeloued and perfect sonne is he, in whom onely dwelleth all our strength and fulnesse: him onely we confesse and knowledge. For whom and with whom, we beseech the (O Lord God of hosts) grant to thy church strength and victory against the malicious fury of these Turkes, Saracens, Tartarians, against Gog and Magog, and all the malignant rabble of Antichrist, enemies to thy sonne Iesus our Lord and Sauiour. Preuent their deuices, ouerthrow their power, and dissolue their kingdome, that the kingdom of thy sonne so long oppressed, may recoue and flourish ouer all: and that they which wretchedly be fallen from thee, may happily be reduced againe into the fold of thy saluation, through Iesus Christ our onely mediatour and most mercifull aduocate. Amen.

Anno 1500

IN this long digression, wherein sufficiently hath beene described the grieuous and tedious persecution of the Saracens and Turks against the Christians, thou hast to vnderstand (good reader) & behold the Image of a terrible Antichrist euidently appearing both by his owne doings, and also by the scriptures, prophecied and declared to vs before. Now in comparing the Turke with the pope, if a question be asked, whether of them is the truer or greater Antichrist, it were easie to see and iudge, that the Turke is the more open and manifest enemy against Christ and his church. But if it be asked whether of them two hath bin the more bloudy and pernitious aduersary to Christ and his members: or whether of them hath consumed and spilt more Christian bloud, he with sword, or this with fire and sword together, neither is it a light matter to discern, neither is it my part here to discusse, which doe onely write the history, and the Acts of them both. Wherefore after the story of the Turkes thus finished, now to reenter againe there where as we left, in describing the domesticall troubles and persecutions here at home vnder the Bishop of Rome: after the burning of Babram in Norfolke aboue declared, pag. 671. I signified also of another certaine aged man, mentioned in an old written Chronicle borrowed of one in the tower, intituled Polychron, (although I find not his name in the said chronicle expressed) which suffered the paines of burning in Smithfield, about the same time, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1500. Ex Polychron.

A question whether is the greater Antichrist the Turke or the Pope.

Ex scripto Polychronico.

This aged father, I suppose, be he of whom I find mention made in certaine old papers and records of William Cary citizen (albeit the day of the month doth a little differ) wherein is thus testified, that on the 20. day of July, an. 1500. vpon the day of S. Margaret, there was an old man burned in Smithfield for an heretike, & the same person vpon the 10. day before he was burned, would haue stollen out of ỳ Lollards tower, & so falling out of the tower, did foully hurt himself: wherupon he was caried in a cart to his death, as he went to his burning.

In the foresaid papers of ancient record, is furthermore declared how in the yeere aboue prefixed, which was an. 1499. in the time of one Perseuel, many were taken for heretikes in Kent, and at Pauls crosse they bare fagots and were abiured, and shortly after the same yeere, there went thirteene Lollards afore the procession in Pauls, and there were of them eight women and a yong lad, and the lads mother was one of the eight, and all the 13. bare fagots on their necks afore the procession.

FOr so much as the world is come now to such a morositie and peeuish insensibilitie in these contentious and cauilling daies of ours, that nothing can be so circumspectly written and storied, but shall lie in danger of one sycophant or another, which neuer will credit there, where they list not to like: neither will they euer like that, which seemeth prejudiciall to their faction, or not to serue the humor wherewith their fantasies be infected: therefore to stop the mouths of such carping cauillers with as much possibilitie as I may, be it knowne to all and singuler such persons, who by euidence of truth and witnes will be satisfied, that in the towne of Amersham be yet aliue both men and women, which can and do beare witnes of this that I shall declare. Also there is of the said company, one named William Page, an aged father and yet aliue, witnes to the same. Also another named Agnes Wetherley widow, being about the age of an hundred yeeres, yet liuing and witnes hereof: that in the daies of king Henrie the seuenth, anno 1506. in the diocesse of Lincolne in Buckingham shire (William Smith being bishop of the same diocesse) one Willia Tylsworth was burned in Amersham, in a close called Standley about sixtie yeeres agoe. At which time one Ioane Clerke, being a married woman, which was the only daughter of the said William Tylsworth and a faithfull woman, was compelled with her owne hands to set fire to her deare father: and at the same time her husband John Clerke did penance at her fathers burning, and bare a fa fagot, as did also is aliue, and likewise did beare a fagot with the aforesaid. Furthermore the foresaid Agnes Wetherley testifieth, that at the burning of this William Tylsworth, were lx. and aboue that were put to beare fagots for their penance, of whom diuers were inioyned to beare and weare fagots at Lincolns the space of 7. yeeres, some at one time, some at another, &c. In which number was also one Robert Bartlet a rich man, who for his professions sake was put out of his farme and goods, and was condemned to be kept in the monastery of Alhyge, where he ware on his right sleeue a square peece of cloth, the space of 7. yeeres together.

It followeth moreouer in the testimony of the forenamed, that about the same time of the burning of William Tylsworth (as the Amersham men do say) or the next day after, as recordeth the foresaid Agnes) was one father Roberts burned at Buckingham. He was a miller, and dwelled at Missenden: and at his burning there were aboue 20. persons that were compelled to beare fagots, and to doe such penance as the wicked Pharisies did compell them. After that by the space of 2. or 3. yeeres, was burned at Amersham, Thomas Bernard a husband man, and Iames Mordon, a labourer, they two were burned both at one fire, and there was William Litlepage (who is yet aliue) compelled to be burned in the right cheeke, and father Rogers, and father Reuer, alias Reiue, which after was burned. This father Rogers was in the Bishops prison 14. weekes together, night and day, where he was so cruelly handled with cold, hunger, and yrons, that after his comming out of the said prison, he was so lame in his backe that he could neuer go vpright as long as he liued, as can testifie diuers honest men that be now liuing. Also there were 30. mo burned in the right cheeke, and bare fagots the same time. The cause was that they would talke against superstition and idolatry, and were desirous to heare and reade the holy scriptures. The manner of their burning in the cheeke was this: their neckes were tied fast to a post or stay, with towels, and their hands holden that they might not stirre, and so the yron being hot, was put to their cheekes, and thus bare they the prints and marks of the Lord Iesus about them.

¶ The cruell handling of Thomas Chase of Amersham, wickedly strangled and martyred in the bishops prison at Wooburne, vnder W. Smith bishop of Lincolne.

Anno 1506

Thomas Chase martyr.

AMong these aforesaid, which were so cruelly persecuted for the Gospell and word of Christ, one Thomas Chase of Amersham, was one of them that was thus cruelly handled. Which Thomas Chase by the report of such as did know him, was a man of a godly, sober and honest behauior (whose vertuous doings do yet remaine in memory) and could not abide idolatrie and superstition, but many times would speake against it: Wherefore the vngodly and wicked did the more hate and dispise him, and take him, and brought him before the blind bishop, being at that time at Wooburne in the countie of Buckingham, and as it is written Acts 12. that wicked Herode did vexe certaine of the congregation, and killed Iames the brother of John with the sword, and because hee saw that it pleased the Iewes, &c. hee proceeded farther, and had this same Thomas Chase before him, asking him many questions touching the Romish religion, with many taunts, checkes, and rebukes, but what answere this godly man Thomas Chase made them, it is vnknowne. Howbeit it is to bee supposed, that his answere was most zealous and godly in professing Christs true religion and Gospell, and to the extirpation of idolatrie and superstition and hypocrisie, for that the said Thomas Chase was commanded to be put in the bishops prison called little ease, in the bishops house at Wooburne, which prison had not beene ministred vnto him, had not his answeres beene sound and vpright. There Thomas Chase lay bound most painefully with chaines, gyues, manicles and irons, oft times sore pined with hunger, where the bishops almes was daily brought vnto him by his chaplaines: Which almes was nothing else but checkes, taunts, rebukes and threatnings, floutings and mockings. All which cruelty the godly martyr tooke most quietly and patiently, remembring and hauing respect to Christs promises. Matth. 5. Blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousnesse sake: for theirs is the kingdome of heauen, and as followeth: Blessed are ye when men reuile you and persecute you, &c. When the bishop with his bond of shauelings, perceiued that by their daily practises of cruelty they could not preuaile against him, but rather that he was the more feruent and earnest in professing Christs true religion: and that he did tollerate and beare most patiently all their wickednesse and crueltie ministred vnto him: they imagined how and which way they might put him to death, lest there should be a tumult or an vprore among the people. And as Richard Hun shortly after was hanged or strangled in Lollards tower, about the yere of our Lord 1514. euen so these blood-suckers most cruelly strangled and prest to death this said Thomas Chase in prison, which most heartily called vpon God to receiue his spirit: as witnesseth a certaine woman, that kept him in prison.

Thomas Chase cruelly murthered in the bishops prison.

After that these stinging vipers being of the wicked brood of Antichrist, had thus most cruelly and impiously murthered this faithfull Christian, they were at their wits end, and could not tell what shift to make, to cloke their shamefull murther withall, at last to blind the ignorant sillie people, these bloodie butchers most slanderously caused by their ministers to be bruted abroad, that the foresaid Thomas Chase had hanged himselfe in prison; which was a most shamefull and abominable lie, for the prison was such, that a man could not stand vpright, nor lie at ease, but stouping, as they do report that did know it. And besides that, this man had so many manicles and irons vpon him, that he could not well moue neither hand nor foot, as the woman did declare that saw him dead, in so much that they confessed that his blood bulke was broken by reason they had so vilely beaten him and bruised him: And yet these holy catholikes had not made an end of their wicked act in this both killing and slandering of this godly martyr, but to put out the remembrance of him, they caused him to be buried in the wood called Norland wood, in the high way betwixt Wooburne and little Marlow, to the intent he should not be taken vp againe to be seene: And thus commonly are innocent men laid vp by these clerkly clergie men. But he that is effectually true of himselfe, hath promised at one time or at another, to cleare his true seruants, not with lies and fables, but by his owne true word. No secret, saith he, is so close, but once shall be opened, neither is any thing so hid, that shall not at the last be knowne clearely. Such a sweet Lord is God alwaies to those that are his true seruants. Blessed be his holy name therefore, for euer and euer, Amen.

Thomas Chase falsely slandered to hang himselfe.

Thomas Harding being one of this companie, thus molested and troubled as is aforesaid, in the townes of Auersham for the truth of the Gospell, after his abiuration and penance done, was againe sought for, and brought to the fire, in the daies of king Henrie the eight, and vnder doctor Langlond then bishop of Lincolne, succeeding after cardinall Wolsey. Of whose death and martyrdome, we shall likewise record (Christ willing and granting) in order when we shall come to the time and yere of his suffering.

After the martyrdom of these two, I read also of one Thomas Norice, who likewise for the same cause, that is, for the profession of Christs Gospell, was condemned by the bishop, and burnt at Norwich, the last day of March. an. 1507.

Thomas Norice martyr. Anno 1507

In the next yere following, which was an. 1508. in the consistorie of London, was conuented Elizabeth Sampson, of the parish of Aldermanbury, vpon certaine articles, and specially for speaking against pilgrimage and adoration of Images, as the Image of our Lady at Willsdon, at Stantings at Crome, at Walsingham, and the image of saint Sauior, of Barmondsey, and against the Sacrament of the altar, and for that shee had spoken these or like words: that our Lady of Willsdon was but a burnt arse elfe, and a burnt arse stocke, and if shee might haue holpen men and women which go to her on pilgrimage, she would not haue suffered her taile to haue been burnt: and what should folke worship our Lady of Willsdone, or our Ladie of Crome, for the one is but a burnt arse stocke, and the other is but a puppit: and better it were for the people to giue their almes at home to poore people, then to goe on pilgrimage. Also she called the image of S. Sauiour, Sim Sauiour with kit lips, and that shee said shee could make as good bread, as that which the priest occupied, and that it was not the bodie of Christ but bread, for that Christ could not bee both in heauen and in earth at one time. For these and certaine other articles, she was compelled to abiure, before master William Horsey, chancellor, the day and yere aboue written. Ex Regist. Lond.

¶ Laurence Ghest.

LAmentable it is to remember, and a thing almost infinit to comprehend the names, times, and persons of all them which haue been slaine by the rigour of the popes clergie, for the true maintaining of Christs cause, and of his Sacraments. Whose memorie being registred in the booke of life, albeit, it need not the commemoration of our stories, yet for the more confirmation of the Church, I thought it not vnprofitable the suffering and martyrdome of them to be notified, which innocently haue giuen their blood to be shed in Christs quarrell.

Laurence Ghest martyr.

In the Catalogue of whom next in order commeth the memoriall of Laurence Ghest, who was burned in Salisbury for the matter of the sacrament, in the daies of king Henry the 7. he was of a comely and tall personage, and otherwise (as appeareth) not vnfriended, for the which the bishop and the close were the more loth to burne him: but kept him in prison the space of two yeeres. This Laurence had a wife and vii. children. Wherefore they thinking to expugne and perswade his mind by stirring of his fatherly affection toward his children, when the time came which they appointed for his burning, as he was at the stake, they brought before him his wife and his foresaid vii. children. At the sight whereof, although nature is commonly wont to worke in other, yet in him religion ouercomming nature, made his constancie to remaine vnmooueable, in such sort, as when his wife began to exhort and desire him to fauor himselfe, he againe desired her to be content, & not to be a blocke to his way, for he was in a good course, running forward the mark of his saluation: and so fire being put to him, he finished his life, renouncing not only wife and children, but also himselfe to follow Christ: As he was in burning, one of the bishops men threw a firebrand at his face: Wherat the brother of Laurence standing by, ranne at him with his dagger, and would haue slaine him, had he not beene otherwise staid.

Laurence would not be turned for wife nor children.

Laurence died a Martyr.

Testified and witnessed by the credible report of one William Russell, an aged man dwelling of late in Colmanstreete, who was there present the same time at the burning of Laurence, and was also himselfe burned in the cheeke, and one of the persecuted flocke in those daies, whose daughter is yet liuing: the same is confirmed also with the testimony of one Richard Web seruant sometime to M. Latymer, who soiourning in the house of the said William Russell, heard him many times declare the same.

Witnesse to the story.

A faithfull woman burned.

BVt amongst al the examples of them, whereof so many haue suffered from time to time for Christ and his truth, I can not tel if euer were any martyrdome more notable and admirable wherein the plaine demonstration of Gods mighty power and iudgement hath at any time bin more euident against the persecutors of his flocke, then at the burning of a certaine godly woman, put to death in Cheaping sadbery, about the same time, vnder the raigne of K. Henry the seuenth.

A notable storie of a faithfull woman burned in Cheaping. sadbery.

The constancie of which blessed woman, as it is glorious for all true godly Christians to behold: so against the example of the bishops Chauncellour, which cruelly condemned the innocent, may offer a terrible spectacle to the eies of all papisticall persecutours to consider, and to take example: which the liuing God grant they may, Amen. The name of the towne where she was martyred, was, as is said, Cheaping sadbery. The name of the woman is not as yet come to my knowledge The name of the Chancellor, who condemned her, was called D. Whittington. The time of her burning was in the raigne and time of K. Henry the 7. orderly therefore in this place and time to be inserted. Wherin is to be noted moreouer the opportunitie tunity of this present history brought to my hands, and that in such conuenient season, as I was drawing toward the end of the foresaid kings reigne: so that it may appeare to them, which behold ẏ opportunity of things, not to be without Gods holy will and prouidence, that this foresaid example should not lie hid and vnremembred, but should come to light and knowledge, and that in such order of placing, according as the due course of our story hitherto kept, requireth.

After this godly woman and manly martyr of Christ was condemned by the wretched chancellour aboue named D. Whittington, for the faithfull profession of the truth, which the papists then called heresie, and the time now come when she should be brought to the place and paines of her martyrdome, a great concourse of all the multitude both in the towne and countrie about (as the maner is in such times) was gathered to behold her end. Among whom was also the foresaid Doctor Whittington the chancellor, there present to see the execution done. Thus this faithfull woman, and true seruant of God constantly persisting in the testimony of the truth, committing her cause to the Lord, gaue ouer her life to the fire, refusing no paines nor torments to keepe her conscience cleere and vnreprooueable in the day of the Lord. The sacrifice being ended, the people began to returne homeward, comming from the burning of this blessed martyr. It happened in the meanetime, that as the catholike executioners were busie in slaying this sillie lambe at the townes side, a certaine Butcher within the towne was as busie in slaying of a bull, which bull he had fast bound in ropes, ready to knocke him on the head. But the Butcher (belike not so skilfull in his art of killing beasts, as the papists be in murthering Christians) as hee was lifting his axe to strike the bull, failed in his stroke, and smit a little too low, or else how hee smit, I know not: this was certaine, that the bull, although somewhat grieued at the stroke, but yet not stricken downe, put his strength to the ropes, and brake loose from the butcher into the streete, the very same time as the people were comming in great preasse from the burning. Who seeing the bull comming towards them, and supposing him to bee wild (as was no other like) gaue way for the beast, euery man shifting for himselfe, as well as he might. Thus the people giuing backe, and making a lane for the bull, he passed thorough the throng of them, touching neither man nor child, till hee came where as the chancellour was. Against whom the bull, as pricked with a sudden vehemencie, ran full butte with his hornes, and taking him vpon the paunch, gored him thorow and thorow, and so killed him immediatly, carying his guts, and trailing them with his hornes all the street ouer, to the great admiration and wonder of all them that saw it.

A faithfull Christian woman and martyr burned at Chippingsadbery.

A comparison betweene Butchers, and the popes murthering ministers.

A rare and speciall example of the iust punishment of God vpon a persecutour. D. Whittington slaine of a bull.

Although the carnall sense of man be blind in considering the workes of the Lord, imputing many times to blind chance the things which properly pertaine to Gods only praise and prouidence: yet in this so strange and so euident example, that man can be so dull or ignorant, which seeth not herein a plaine miracle of Gods mightie power and iudgement both in the punishing of this wretched chancellor, and also in admonishing all other like persecutors, by his example, to feare the Lord, and to abstaine from the like crueltie?

Now for the credit of this storie, lest I be said vpon mine owne head to commit to storie things rashly, which I cannot iustifie, therefore to stop such cauilling mouthes, I will discharge my selfe with authoritie I trust sufficient: that is, with the witnesse of him which both was a papist, and also present at the same time at the burning of the woman, whose name was Rowland Webbe: which Rowland dwelling then in Chippingsadbery, had a son named Richard Webbe, seruant sometime to maister Latimer, who also induring with him in time of his trouble sir yeeres together, was himselfe imprisoned and persecuted for the same cause. Vnto the which Richard Webbe, being now aged, then yong, the foresaid Rowland his father, to the intent to exhort him from the sect of heresie (as he then called it) recited to him many times the burning of this woman, and withall added the storie of the bull aforesaid, which he himselfe did see and testifie. This Richard Webbe is yet liuing, a witnesse of his owne fathers words and testimonie, which I trust may satisfie all indifferent Readers, except only such as thinke no truth to be beleeued, but that only which is in their Portues.

And thus much concerning the state of the Church. Wherein is to be vnderstood, what stormes and persecutions haue been raised vp in all quarters against the flocke and congregation of Christ, not only by the Turks, but also at home within our selues, by the bishop of Rome, and his retinue. Where also is to be noted in the daies and raigne of this king Henry the viij. how mightily the working of Gods Gospell hath multiplied and increased, and what great numbers of men and women haue suffered for the same, with vs in England, as by these stories aboue past, may be appparent.

Now these things declared, which to the Church matters be appertaining, consequently it remaineth something to intreat of the state likewise of the commonwealth, which commonlie doth follow the state of the Church. Where the church is quietlie and moderatelie gouerned, and the flocke of Christ defended by godly Princes in peace and safetie, from deuouring and violence of bloudie Wolues: the successe of ciuill estate, for the most part, there doth flourish, and the princes long continue through Gods preseruation, in prosperous rest and tranquillitie. Contrariwise, where the Church of Christ, either through the negligence of princes, or through their setting on, the poore members of Christ be persecuted and deuoured: shortly after ensueth some iust recompence of the Lord vpon those princes, that either their liues do not long continue, or else they find not that quiet in the common wealth, which they looke for. Examples hereof, as in all other ages be abundant, so in this present time be not lacking, whether we consider the state and condition of other countries farre off, or else of our owne countrie nere at home.

The state of the commonwealth, commonly followeth the state of the Church.

The dutie of princes to defend their subiects from the slaughter of the Church of Rome.

And here not to wander in our story, farther then to France only, let vs a little behold the example of king Charles the viij. who liuing in this kings time, died also not long before him. This Charles is commended of Philippus Cominæus, to bee a moderate, valiant and victorious prince, adorned with many speciall vertues to a prince appertaining. And yet the same king, because he was slacke and remisse in defence of Christs church, neither did vse his authority, nor take his occasion offered to him of God, to amend and reforme the state of the bishop and clergy of Rome when he might, he was therefore himselfe punished and cut off of the Lord, as by his story ensuing may right well appeare. For so it is of him recorded, that being maruellously excited and prouoked, of his owne minde (contrary to the counsell of most of his Nobles) he take his voiage into Italie, neither being furnished with money, nor the season of the yeare being conuenient thereunto. And that this may appeare the better to procéede of the Lords doing, to the intent he would haue the church and clergy of Rome reformed by the princes sword, which so vexed all Christendome at that time, we shall heare what is testified in the Commentaries of the foresaid Philip Cominæus Lib. 3. De bello Neapolit. writing in this wise.

Ex commentarijs Phil. Cominæi De bello Neapolitano, lib. 3.

There was (saith he) in the city of Florence the same time a Dominicke Frier, named Hieronymus Sauonarola (of whom mention was made before, pag. 672.) a man of a right godly and approoued life: who in the said city of Florence preached and prophecied long before, that the French King should come with an army into Italy, being stirred vp of God to suppresse the tyrants of Italy, and none should withstand him. He should also come to the city of Pisæ, and the state of Florence should be altered: al which happened true. He affirmed moreouer to be signified to him of the Lord, that the Ecclesiasticall state of the church must be redressed Per vim armorum. i. by the sword, or force of armes. Many things also he prophecied of the Venetians, and of the French king, saying that the king with some danger and difficulty, should passe that iourney, yet notwithstanding should ouercome it and escape, albeit his strength were neuer so slender: for God would safely conduct him in that iourney, and safely bring him home againe. But because he had not done his office, in amending the state of the church, and in defending his people from iniurie, and from deuouring, therefore it should come to passe (said he) and that shortly, that some incommoditie or detriment should happen to the king: or if he should escape that danger of his sickneese and recouer health, then if hee did resist the cruelty of the wicked, and procure the safety of the poore and miserable, God would shew mercy vnto him, &c. And this the said Hieronymus declared before to Cominæus one of the kings counsellours, which was the writer of the story, and required him to signifie the same vnto the king, which so did, and hee moreouer himselfe comming to the presence of the king, declared no lesse.

All which things, as he had foretold, came directly to effect. For the king being but easily accompanied with a small power, entred into Italie, where first he came to Asta, then to Genua, and to Pisæ, from thence proceeded to Florence, which also he obtained, displacing there Petrus Medicies the duke, who had vsed great tyrannie vpon the subiectes. From thence he remooued toward Rome, where a great part of the citie wall at the comming of the French king, fell downe.

Vide Phil. Cominæum de bello Neapol. lib. 5.

Afterward when the king was entred into the citie and the pope (who then toke part with Alphonsus king of Neapolis against the French king) had immured himselfe within the mount of Adrian, the wall of the Castell fell downe of it selfe, whereby, when the king was both occasioned, and erhorted also by his Captaines to inuade the Pope, and to depose him, and to reforme the Church of Rome, (which he might then easily haue done, as it hath pleased him) yet all these occasions offered so oportunely of God mooued not the king to doe his dutie, and to helpe the poore Church of Christ: wherefore shortly after, returning home into France from Neapolis, either the same yeare or the nert yeare following, he was stroken with a sodaine sickenesse at Amboise, as he was looking on them that plaied at tennis, & that in the stinckingest place in all the Castle, where he fell downe and died within 12. houres, according to the forewarning of Hieronimus, who wrote vnto him a little before, both of his sonnes death and of his owne, which was about the yeare of our Lord 1498. Ex Philip. Cominæo. Lib. 5.

De bello Neopol. lib. 5.

Like examples we haue many here also in this our realme of England. So long as king John kept out of the realme the popes authoritie and power, he continued safe and quiet with his nobles: but so soone as he brought the realme vnder tribute and subiection to that forreine Bishop, God stirred vp his nobles against him, whereby hee had much disquiet and trouble, and soone thereupon deceased.

Of all the kings of England, from William Conquerour, to this king Henry 7. were none which either longer continued, or more prosperously flourished, then king Henry the second, king Henry the third, king Edward the first, king Edward the third, of whom the first, how stout hee was in withstanding Thomas Becket and pope Alexander the 3. is sufficiently before comprehended, pag. 201.

Examples of kings of England, which were blessed of God with long prosperitie being enemies to the bishops of Rome.

The second, which was sonne of king John, albeit through the wretchednesse of that time his power was not sufficient to repulse the popes vsurped iurisdiction out of the realme, yet his will was good: at least he so defended and prouided for his subiects, that they tooke no great wrong at the popes hands: who reigned one yeare longer then Augustus Cæsar, which hath not commonly beene seene in any Prince.

Augustus reigned 55. yeares.

The third, which was king Edward the first, so vigilantly behaued himselfe for the publicke commoditie and safetie of his people, that hee defended them from all forraine power and hostilitie both of the Scottes (then our enemies, now our friendes) and also from the bishop of Rome, taking part with them against vs, as may appeare aboue, pag. 311. Furthermore of the same king, and of his worthy nobles and house of Parliament, how valiantly they stood in deniall of the popes subsidies, and also how the said king secluded out of his protection the Bishops, and especiallie the Archbishop Pecham for standing with the pope, reade pag. 320.

Vide supra pag. 311.

Vide supra pag. 320.

Now as touching king Edward the third, how little he regarded, how princely he with his nobles likewise resisted the popes reseruations and prouisions, how he bridled the Archbishop John Stratford, and reiected the vaine authoritie of the bishop of Rome, both in defence of his subiectes, and also in defence of claiming his right title in the realme of France, reade pag. 346.

Vide supra pag. 346.

Not that I doe here affirme or define, as in a general rule, that worldlie successe and prosperitie of life alwaies followeth the godlie, which we see rather to be giuen more often to the wicked sort: but speaking of the dutie of Princes, I note and obserue by examples of histories, that such Princes as haue most defended the church of Christ committed to their gouernance, from iniurie & violence of the Bishop of Rome, haue not lacked at Gods hand great blessing and felicitie: whereas contrariwise) they which either themselues haue been persecutors of Christes members, or haue not shielded them by their protection from forraine tyrannie and iniuries, haue lacked at Gods hand that protection, which the other had, as may appeare by king Edward the second, Richard the third, king Henry the fourth, king Henrie the fift, king Henry the first, &c. who because either negligently they haue suffered, or cruelly caused such persecuting lawes to be made, and so much Christian bloud iniuriously to be deuoured: therefore haue they been the lesse prospered of the Lord, so that either they were deposed, or if they flourished for a while, yet they did not long continue, almost not halfe the time of the other kinges before named.

What difference betweene moderate princes and them that were persecutors.

And therefore, as the state of the common wealth doth commonly follow the state of the Church, as ye heard before: so it had been to be wished, that this king Henry the vij. being otherwise a prudent and temperate Prince, had not permitted the intemperate rage of the popes clergie so much to haue their willes ouer the poore flocke of Christ, as then they had: according as by these persecutions aboue mentioned may appeare. The which king Henry vij. albeit he had a prudent continuance, who had now raigned 24. yeares, yet notwithstanding here commeth the same thing to be noted, whereof I spake before: that when the Church of Christ beginneth to be inured with violence, and to goe to wracke through misorder and negligence, the state of the common wealth cannot there long endure without some alteration, and stroke of Gods correction. But howsoeuer this marke is to be taken, thus lieth the storie: that after the burning and dieing of these poore seruants of Christ aboue recited, when the persecution began now in the Church to be hote, God calleth away the king, the same yeare aboue mentioned, which was 1509. after he had raigned the terme of yeares, 24. Who if he had adioyned a little more pitifull respect, in protecting Christes poore members, from the fire of the popes tyranny, to his other great vertues of singular wisedome, excellent temperance, and moderate frugalitie: so much had hee been comparable with the best of those Princes aboue comprehended, as he had been inferiour but to a fewe: but this defect which lacked in him, was supplied most luckily (blessed be the Lord) by his posteritie succeeding after him. Of whom in the nert volume following (Christ thereunto assisting vs) wee haue to speake more at large.

The death of K. Henry 7.

Among manie other things incident in the reigne of this king Henry 7. I haue ouerpassed the historie of certaine godly persons persecuted in the Diocelle of Couentry and Lichfield, as we finde them in the registers of the Diocesse recorded, here following.

Couentry men persecuted.

The yeare of our Lord 1485. March 9. amongst diuers and sundry other good men in Couentry, these xr. hereunder named were examined before John Bishop of Couentry and Lichfield, in S. Michaels Church, vpon these articles, following in order.

FIrst, John Blomkon was openly and publikely infamed, accused, reported, and appeached, that he was a very hereticke, because hee had preached, taught, holden and affirmed, that the power attributed to S. Peter in the Church of God, by our Sauiour Jesus Christ immediatly did not flit, or passe from him, to remaine with his successors.

J. Blomkins.

The power of Peter flitteth not to his successors.

Item, that there was as much vertue in an herbe as in the Image of the virgin Marie.

Item, that prayer and almes auaile not the dead, for incontinent after death, he goeth either to heauen or hell, whereupon he concludeth, there is no purgatorie.

Purgatorie denied.

Item, that it was foolishnesse to goe on pilgrimage to the image of our Ladie of Dancaster, Wallsingham, or of the tower of the citie of Couentrie: for a man might as well worship the blessed Virgin by the fire side in the kitchen, as in the foresaid places, and as well might a man worship the blessed Virgin, when he seeth his mother or sister, as in visiting the images, because they be no more but dead stocks and stones.

Images not to be worshipped.

Item, that hee said in English with a frowning countenance, as it appeared: a vengeance on all such horson priests, for they haue great enuie that a poore man should get his liuing among them.

RIchard Hegham of the same citie was accused, &c. to be a very hereticke, because he did hold that a Christian man being at the point of death, should renounce all his owne works good and ill, and submit him to the mercie of God.

Richard Hegham. Merites condemned.

Item, that it was fondnesse to worship the Images of our Ladie of tower in the foresaid citie, or of other Saints, for they are but stockes and stones.

Item, that if the image of our Ladie of tower were put into the fire, it would make a good fire.

Images serue rather to be burned, then be worshipped.

Item, that it were better to deale monie vnto poore folks then to offer to the images of Christ and other Saints, which are but dead stockes and stones.

RObert Crowther of the same citie was accused, that hee was an hereticke, because he did hold, that who so receiueth the Sacrament of the altar in deadly sinne, or out of charitie, receiueth nothing but bread and wine.

Robert Crowther.

Item, that neither bishop, nor priests or curats of Churches, haue power in the market of penance to bind and lose.

Item, that pilgrimage to the image of our Ladie of tower is foolishnesse, for it is but a stocke or a stone.

Against Pilgrimage.

IOhn Smith was accused to bee a very hereticke, because he did hold that euery man is bound to know the Lords prayer, and the Creed in English, if he might for these false priests.

John Smith.

Item, that who so beleeued as the Church then did beleeue, beleeued ill: and that a man had need to frequent the schooles a good while, ere that he can attaine to the knowledge of the true and right faith.

The Lordes prayer to be in English.

Digitized by Google

Item, that no Priest hath power to assoile a man in the market of penance, from his sinnes.

Roger Browne. ROger Brown of the same citie, was also accused to be an hereticke, because he did hold that no man ought to worship the Image of our Ladie of Walsingham, nor the bloud of Christ at Hailes, but rather God almightie, who would giue him whatsoeuer he would aske.

Against Pilgrimage. Item, that he held not vp his handes, nor looked vp, at the elecuation of the Eucharist.

Item, that he promised one to shew him certaine bookes of heresie, if he would sweare that hee would not vtter them, and if he would credite them.

Flesh eating in Lent. Item, that he did eate flesh in Lent, and was taken with the manner.

Item, if anie man were not shriuen his whole life long, and in the point of death would be confessed, and coulde not, if he had no more but contrition onlie, hee should passe to ioy without Purgatorie: And if hee were confessed of any sinne, and were enioyned onlie to say for Penance one Pater noster, if he thought he should haue any punishment in Purgatorie for that sinne, he would neuer be confessed for any sinne.

Against Purgatorie and confession auricular.

Against confession and satisfaction. Item, because hee said all is lost that is giuen to Priestes.

Item, that there was no Purgatorie, that would pardon all sinnes without confession and satisfaction.

Tho. Butler. THomas Butler of the same citie, was likewise openlie accused to be a very hereticke, because he did hold that there were but two waies, that is to say, to heauen, and to Hell.

Against Purgatorie. Item, that no faithfull man shoulde abide any paine after the death of Christ, for any sinne, because Christ died for our sinnes.

Item, that there was no purgatorie, for euery man immediatly after death passeth either to heauen, or hell.

Against merites. Item, that whosoeuer departeth in the faith of Christ and the church, howsoeuer he hath liued, shall be saued.

Item, that praiers and pilgrimages are nothing worth, and auaile not to purchase heauen.

John Falkes. IOhn Falkes was accused to be a very hereticke, because he did affirme that it was a foolish thing to offer to the Image of our Lady, saying, her head shall be hoare or I offer to her, what is it but a blocke? If it could speake to me, I would giue it an halfepenny worth of ale.

Against Images. Item, that when the Priest carrieth to the sicke the bodie of Christ, why carrieth he not also the bloud of Christ?

Item, that he did eate cow milke vpon the first Sunday of Lent.

Item, that as concerning the Sacrament of penance and absolution, no Priest hath power to assoile any man from his sinnes, when as he cannot make one haire of his head.

It is heresie to say a stone is a stone, and a blocke is a blocke. Item, that the Image of our Ladie was but a stone or a blocke.

Rich Hilmin. RIchard Hilmin was accused that hee was a verie hereticke, because he did say and maintaine that it was better to depart with money to the poore, then to giue tithes to Priestes, or to offer to the images of our Lady, and that it were better to offer to Images made by God, then to the Images of God painted.

Scripture in English. Item, that he had the Lords praier and the Salutation of the Angell and the Creed in English, and another booke did he see and had, which conteined the Epistles and Gospels in English, and according to them would he liue, and thereby beleeued to be saued.

Item, that no Priest speaketh better in the Pulpit then that booke.

Item, that the Sacrament of the aultar is but bread, and that the Priestes make it to blinde the people.

Item, that a Priest whiles he is at Masse, is a Priest, and after one masse done, till the beginning of another Masse, he is no more then a lay man, and hath no more power then a meere lay man.

¶ After they were enforced to recant, they were assoiled and put to penance.

Margery Goyt. IN the yeare of our Lord 1488. the third of Aprill, Margery Goyt, wife of James Goyt of Asburne, was brought before the foresaid John Bishop of Couentry and Lichfield, who was there accused that the saide, that that which the Priests lift ouer their heades at Masse, was not the true and very bodie of Christ: For if it were so, the Priestes could not breake it so lightly into foure partes, and swallow it as they doe: for the Lordes bodie hath flesh and bones, so hath not that which the Priestes receiue.

Against the Sacrament of the aultar.

Item, that Priestes buying rl. cakes for a halfepenny, and shewing them to the people and saying, that of euery of them they make the body of Christ, doe nothing but deceiue the people and enrich themselues.

Item, seeing God in the beginning did create and make man, how can it be that man should be able to make God?

¶ This woman also was constrained to recant, and so was she assoiled and did penance.

Thus much I thought here good to insert, touching these foresaid men of Couentry, especiallie for this purpose, because our cauilling aduersaries be wont to obiect against vs the newnesse of Christes old and ancient religion. To the intent therefore they may see this doctrine not to be so new as they report, I wish they would consider both the time and articles here obiected against these foresaid persons, as is aboue premised.

Picus Mirandula Earle. I should also in the same reigne of king Henry 7. haue introduced that historie of Ioannes Picus Earle of Mirandula, the mention of whose name partly is touched before, pag. 660. This Picus Earle of Mirandula being but a yong man, was so excellently witted, & so singularly learned in all sciences and in all tongues, both Latine, Greeke, Hebrew, Chaldey, and Araby, that comming to Rome booted & spurred, he set vp 90. conclusions, to dispute in the same with any in all Christendome, whosoeuer would come against him. Of which conclusions diuers were touching the matter of the Sacrament, &c. And when none was found in all Rome, nor in Europe, that openly would dispute with him, priuily and in corners certaine of the Popes Cleargie, Prelates, Lawyers and Friers, by the Pope appointed, consulted togither to enquire vpon his conclusions, whereupon they did articulate against him for suspition of heresie. And thus the vnlearned clergie of Rome priuily circumuented & intangled this learned Earle in their snares of heresie, against whom they neuer durst openly dispute. He died being of the age of 32. yeeres, of such wit and towardnesse, as is hard to say whether euer Italie bredde vp a better. In his sickenesse Charles the viij. the French king moued with the fame of his learning, came to visite him. The furniture of his bookes cost him 7000. florens. A little before his death his mind was to giue all away, and to take a coule, to go about and preach, but the Lord would not permit him. His storie requireth a long tractation, which if place doe serue, we will not peraduenture forget. With two Popes, that is, with Pope Innocent, and Alexander vj. hee had much veration.

A briefe note of Ecclesiasticall lawes ordained by ancient kings in this realme.

Ecclesiasticall lawes ordained by auncient kings of this Realme. FOrsomuch as it is, and hath bene a perswasion long gendered in the heades of many that the bishops of Rome be the vniuersall heades of the whole militant Church of Christ in earth, and haue alwaies so continued from the beginning of the primitiue time: And that no Prince, King, nor Emperour in his owne realme hath any interest to intermeddle with matters and lawes Ecclesiasticall, but onlie the said bishops of Rome: to refell and remoue that opinion out of the heades of all Englishmen, as a thing most false, and contrary both to histories of time, and examples of ancient kinges and gouernors of this realme, I thought to fill vp a little end of paper here left, with some such briefe rehearsall of lawes deuised and appointed by kinges and rulers of this land, for the ordering of the Church, and causes Ecclesiasticall, to the intent that all the world may see the gouernment of Christes Church here in earth vnder Christ, hath not depended onely of the Pope from ancient time, but hath beene rather directed by such kinges and princes as God here had placed vnder him to gouerne the people of this Realme of England, as followeth here in this present table to be noted.

A briefe recapitulation of ancient Ecclesiastical lawes, by sundrie kings of this Realme ordained, for gouernement of the Church, before the Conquest.

KIng Ethelrede alſo which ſucceeded after Edgar and Edward, appointed diuers lawes for publicke regiment, whereof we finde but fewe touching matters Eccleſiaſticall, for tithes, lightes, feaſtes and nothing els, and therefore we paſſe further to the lawes of Canutus.

Eccleſiaſticall lawes of King Canutus.

King Canutus lawes.

CAnutus the Dane king began to reigne in this land in the yeare of our Lord 1016. The ſaide Canutus (as Ethelrede had done before) diuided his lawes into Eccleſiaſticall and temporall.

1. That eccleſiaſticall perſons being accuſed of fighting, murder, or anie other offence; ſhould purge themſelues thereof.
2. That Prieſts ſhould be degraded for periury, and put in ſureties of good behauiour.
3. He praieth prieſtes, that they will liue chaſt, and commanded other Religious.
4. He limited the degrees of mariage.

6. He ordained eche chriſtian man to come to the houſell thriſe yearelie at the leaſt: That they ſearch and inquire after Gods law, and his commandements.
7. That euery chriſtian man vnderſtand the pointes of his faith, and that at the leaſt he learne perfectly the Lordes praier, and the Creede, and that whoſoeuer cannot the ſame, ſhall be excluded from the Euchariſt, and ſhall not be receiued to vndertake for others in Baptiſme.
8. That Biſhops and Prieſtes ſhould do their duties: that they cry out and warne their flocks, when the wolfe commeth.
9. That at the court of euerie ſhire, the biſhop of the Dioces ſhall be preſent with the ſheriffe, and that the one ſhal teach them Gods law, and the other mans lawe, as ye heard in king Edgars lawes before.

Many other lawes both Eccleſiaſticall and temporall beſides theſe were enacted by theſe and other kinges here in England before the Conqueſt: but theſe be ſufficient to giue the vnderſtanding reader to conſider, how the authoritie of the Biſhops of Rome, all this while, extended not ſo farre to preſcribe lawes for gouernment of the Church, but that kings and princes of the Realme, as they be now, ſo were then full gouernours here vnder Chriſt, as well in cauſes Eccleſiaſticall, as temporall, both in directing orders, inſtituting lawes, in calling of Synodes, and alſo in conferring Biſhoprickes and benefices, without any leaue of the Romiſh Biſhops. Thus Odo, Dunſtane, Oſwold, Ethelwold, Adelmus, and Lanckrancus, although they ſet their palles afterward from Rome, yet were they made biſhops and archbiſhops by kings onlie, not by popes.

Kings of England before the Conqueſt gouernours as well in cauſes Eccleſiaſticall as temporall.

When kinges of England came firſt vnder the popes ſubiection.

And thus ſtoode the gouernment of this Realme of England all the time before the conqueſt, til Pope Hildebrand through the ſetting on of the Saxons, began firſt to bring the Emperour (which was Henry 4.) vnder foot. Then followed the ſubduing of other Emperours, kings, and ſubiects after that, as namely here in England, when Lanckrancus, Anſelmus, and Becket, went to complaine of their kinges, and gouernours, then brought they the popes iudiciall authoritie firſt from Rome, ouer this land, both ouer kings and ſubiects: which euer ſince hath continued, till theſe latter yeares. Albeit the ſaid kings of this Realme of England being prudent Princes, and ſeeing right well the ambitious preſumption of thoſe Romiſh Biſhops, did what they coulde to ſhake off the yoke of their ſupremacie, as appeareth by the lawes and actes of their parliaments, both in K. Edward the thirds time, king Richard the 2. and king Henry the 4. aboue in their parliament notes ſpecified: yet for feare of other forreine princes, and the blinde opinion of their ſubiects, ſuch was then the calamitie of that time, that neither they could nor durſt compaſſe that, which faine they would: till at laſt, the time of their iniquitie being complete, through the Lords wonderfull working, their pride had a fall, as in the volume enſuing (the Lord ſo graunting) ſhall by proceſſe of hiſtorie be declared.

The proud primacie of Popes painted out in Tables, in order of their rising vp by little and little, from faithfull Bishops and Martyrs, to become Lords and gouernours ouer kings and kingdomes, exalting themselues in the Temple of God, aboue all that is called god, &c.

2. Thessal. 2.

The martyrdome of good bishops vnder wicked Emperours in the primitive Church.

IN the Table of the primitiue Church aboue described, hath beene (gentle Reader) set forth and exhibited before thine eies the greeuous afflictions and sorrowfull torments, which through Gods secret sufferance, fell vpon the true Saints and members of Christs Church in that time, especially vpon the good Bishops, Ministers, and Teachers of the flocke: of whom some were scourged, some beheaded, some crucified, some burned, some had their eies put out, some one way, some another, miserably consumed: which dayes of wofull calamitie continued (as is foreshewed) neere the space of CCC. yeares. During which time, the deare spouse and elect Church of God, being sharply assaulted on euery side, had small rest, no ioy, nor outward saftie in this present world, but in much bitternesse of heart, in continuall teares and mourning vnder the crosse passed ouer their dayes, being spoiled, imprisoned, contemned, reuiled, famished, tormented and martyred euerie where, who neither durst well tarrie at home for feare & dread, and much lesse durst come abroad for the enemies, but onelie by night, when they assembled as they might, sometime to sing Psalmes and Hymmes together. In all which their dreadfull dangers, and sorrowfull afflictions, notwithstanding the goodnesse of the Lord left them not desolate: but the more their outward tribulations did increase, the more their inward consolations did abound: and the farther off they seemed from the ioyes of this life, the more present was the Lord with them with grace and fortitude, to confirme and reioyce their soules. And though their possessions and riches in this world were lost and spoiled, yet were they enriched with heauenly gifts and treasures from aboue an hundreth fold. Then was true religion truely felt in heart. Then was Christianitie not in outward appearance shewed, but in inward affection receiued, and the true image of the Church not in outward shewe pretensed, but in her perfect state effectuall. Then was the name and feare of God true in heart, not in lips alone dwelling. Faith then was feruent, zeale ardent, praier not swimming in the lips but groned out to God from the bottome of the spirit. Then was no pride in the Church, nor leisure to seeke riches, nor time to keepe them. Contention for trifles was then so farre from Christians, that well were they when they could meete to praie together against the diuell, author of all dissension. Briefly, the whole church of Christ Jesus, with all the members therof, the farther it was from the type and shape of this world, the neerer it was to the blessed respect of Gods fauour and supportation.

The true riches of the church described.

¶ The first rising of the Bishops of Rome.

The first rising of the bishops of Rome.

AFter this long time of trouble, it pleased the Lord at length mercifully to looke vpon the Saints and seruants of his sonne, to release their captiuitie, to release their miserie, and to bind vp the old Dragon the Diuell, which so long vexed them, whereby the church began to aspire to some more libertie: and the Bishops, which before were as abiects, vtterly contemned of Emperours, through the prouidence of God (which disposeth all things in his time after his owne will) began now of Emperours to be esteemed and had in price. Furthermore, as Emperours grew more in deuotion, so the Bishops more and more were exalted, not onely in fauour, but also preferred vnto honour, insomuch that in short space they became not quarter masters, but rather halfe Emperours with Emperours.

The spirituall riches of the Church turned to worldly riches. Ex libro Serm. Discipuli.

After this in processe of time, as riches and worldly wealth crept into the clergie, and that the diuell had poured his venome into the Church (as the voice was heard the same time ouer Constantinople) so true humilitie began to decay, and pride to set in his foote, till at last they plaied as the Ivy doth with the Oke tree, which first beginning with a goodly greene shewe, imbraceth him so long, till at length it ouergroweth him, and so sucketh all his moisture from him, setting his roote fast in his barke, till at last it both stifleth the stocke and killeth the branches, and so commeth to be a nest for Owles and all vncleane birds. Not vntruely therefore it was said of Augustine: Religio peperit diuitias, & filia deuorauit matrem. i. Religion begat riches, and the daughter hath deuoured the mother. The veritie whereof notoriously may appeare aboue all other in the church of Rome, and the Bishops of the same. For after that the church of Rome, through fauour of Emperours, was indued with lands, donations, possessions, and patrimonies, so that the Bishops thereof feeling the smacke of wealth, ease, and prosperitie, began to swell in pompe and pride: the more they florished in this world, the more Gods holy spirit forsooke them, till at last the said Bishops, who at the first were poore, creeping low vpon the ground, and were persecuted long time, euery man treading vpon them in this world: now of persecuted people, beganne to be persecutors of others, and to treade vpon the necks euen of Emperours, and to bring the heads of kings and princes vnder their girdle. And not onely that, but furthermore through pride and and riches, they were so farre gone from all religion, that in the very end they became the great aduersary of God (whom we call Antichrist) prophecied of so long before by the spirit of God to come, sitting in the temple of God, &c. Of whom thus we reade in the Epistle of Paul, 2. Thess. 2. where he saith: We beseech you brethren, by the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ, & by our fellowship together in him, that ye be not suddenly moued in your minde, nor troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word nor letter, as it were from vs, as though the day of Christ were at hand. Let no man in any wise deceiue you, for that day shall not come except there come a departing first, and that man of sinne be reuealed, euen the sonne of perdition, that aduersarie which exalteth himselfe aboue all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he shall sit in the temple of God, as God, and set forth himselfe as hee were God, &c.

The great aduersarie called Antichrist described by S. Paul, 2. Thess. 2.

By which words of S. Paul we haue diuers things to vnderstand. First that the day of the Lords comming was not then neere at hand. Secondly, the Apostle giuing vs a token before, to know when that day shall approch, biddeth vs looke for an aduersarie first to be reuealed. Thirdly, to shew what aduersary this shalbe, he expresseth him not to be as a common aduersarie, such as were then in his time: For although Herode, Annas and Caiphas, the high Priests and Pharises, Tertullus, Alexander the Coppersmith, Elymas and Simon Magus, and Nero the Emperour in Pauls time were great aduersaries: yet here he meaneth another besides these, greater then all the rest, not such a one as should be like to Priest, King or Emperour, but such as farre exceeding the state of all kings, priests and emperours, should be the prince of priests, should make kings to stoope, and should tread vpon the necke of Emperours, and make them to kisse his feete. Moreouer, where the Apostle saith, that he shall sit in the temple of God, thereby is meant, not the personall sitting of the Pope in the citie onlie of Rome, but the authoritie and iurisdiction of his see exalted in the whole vniuersall Church, equall with God himselfe. For let men giue to the pope that which he in his lawes, decrees, and in his pontifficall requireth, and what difference is there betweene God and the pope? If God set lawes and ordinances, so doth he. If God haue his creatures, so hath he. If God require obedience, so doth he. If the breach of Gods commandements be punished, much more be his. God hath his Religion, the pope also hath his, yea for Gods one religion, he hath an hundred. God hath set vp one Aduocate, hee hath an hundred. God hath instituted but a few holydaies: for Gods one, he hath instituted xl. And if the holy day that God hath appointed be simplex, the feast that the pope appointeth is duplex & triplex. Christ is the head of the Church: so is the pope. Christ forgiueth sinne, the pope his bodie: so doth the pope. Christ expelleth euill spirits by his power: so doth no lesse. Christ expelleth the deuil by his power: so pretendeth the pope by his holy water. Furthermore, where Christ went barefoot vpon the bare ground: hee with his golden shoes is carried on mens shoulders. And where Christ was called Sanctus Sanctorum: he is called Sanctorum Sanctissimus. Christ neuer practise but only the spirituall sword: hee claimeth both spirituall and temporall. Christ bought the Church: he both buieth and selleth the Church. And if it be necessarie to beleeue Christ to be the Sauiour of the world: so is it necessarie to beleeue the pope to be the head of the Church. Christ paied tribute vnto Cæsar: hee maketh Cæsar pay tribute vnto him. Finally, the crowne of Christ was of sharpe thorne: the pope hath three crownes of golde vpon his head, so farre exceeding Christ the sonne of God in glorie of this world, as Christ exceedeth him in the glorie of heauen. The image and paterne of whose intollerable pride and exaltation, according as S. Paul doth describe him in his Epistle aforesaid, we haue here set forth, not onely in these tables to be seene, and by his owne facts to be noted, but also in his owne words and Registers, Clementines, Extrauagants, and Pontificals, expressed, as in order (the Lord willing) shall follow.

A declaration of S. Pauls words.

The pope matching himselfe euen with God.

¶ The exaltation of popes aboue kings and emperours out of histories.

First, after that Italie and the Citie of Rome were ouerrunne by the Gothes and Vandales, so that the seate of the Empire was remoued to Constantinople, then began Joannes Patriarch of Constantinople, to put forth himselfe and would needes be called vniuersall Bishop of the world: but the Bishop of Rome in no case would suffer that, and stopped it. After this came the Emperours deputie, and exarch of Rauenna to rule Italie; but the Bishop of Rome through aide of the king of Lombards soone quailed him.

John Patriarch of Constantinople subdued by the bishop of Rome.

The Emperors lieutenant of Rauenna subdued by the Lombards and Romane Bishops.

Not long after, about the yeare of our Lord 500. came Phocas the murderer, who slue the Emperour of Constantinople his maister Mauritius and his children. By which Phocas the bishops of old Rome aspired first to their preheminence, to be counted the headbishops ouer the whole Church, and so together with the Lombards began to rule the citie of Rome. Afterwards when the Lombards would not yeeld vnto him, in accomplishing his ambitious desire, but would needes require of the bishop the said citie of Rome; he stirred vp Pipinus, but first deposed Childericus the king of France, and so thrusting him into an Abbay, set vp his in place. Pipinus and his son Carolus Magnus to put downe the said king of Lombards called Aistulphus. And so translated the Empire from Constantinople into France, diuiding the spoile betweene him and them: so that the kings of France had all the possessions and lands which before belonged to the Empire, and he to receiue of them the quiet possessiō of the citie of Rome, with such donations and lordships, which now they challenge vnto them vnder the name of S. Peters patrimonie, which they falſly aſcribe to that donation of Conſtantinus the great.

It followeth then in proces of time, after the daies of Pipinus, Carolus and Ludouicus (who had indured theſe biſhops of Rome, called now popes, with large poſſeſſions) when the kings of France were not ſo appliable to their becke, to aid and maintaine them againſt the Princes of Italy, who began then to pinch the ſaid biſhops for their wrongfull vſurped goods, they practiſed with the Germaines to reduce the Empire to Otho firſt of that name Duke of Spaine, referring the election thereof to 7. princes Electours of Germanie, which was about an 1002. notwithſtanding reſeruing ſtill in his hands the negatitiue voyce, thinking thereby to enioy that they had, in quietneſſe and ſecuritie, and ſo did for a good ſpace.

Pope Gregorie 5. practiſeth with the Germaines to reduce the Empire to Germanie, an. 1002.

At length when ſome of theſe Germaine Emperours alſo after Otho began a little to ſpurne againſt the ſaid biſhops and popes of Rome, ſome of them they accurſed, ſome they ſubdued and brought to the kiſſing of their feet, ſome they depoſed, and placed other in their poſſeſſions.

Otho firſt Germaine Emperour.

So was Henricus 4. by theſe biſhops accurſed, the Emperour himſelfe forced with his wife and childe to wait attendance vpon the popes pleaſure three daies and three nights in winter at the gates of Canoſſus. Reade before pag. 162. Beſides all this the ſaid pope raiſed vp Rodulphus to be Emperour againſt him: who being ſlaine in warre, then the ſaid pope Gregorie 7. not reſting thus, ſtirred vp his owne ſonne Henricus 5. to fight againſt his owne naturall father and to depoſe him, which Henricus the 5. was alſo himſelfe afterward accurſed and excommunicated, and the Saxons at laſt ſet vp by the biſhops to fight againſt him.

Emperours brought to kiſſe the popes feete. Henricus 4. accurſed, waiteth at the popes gate 3. daies. Rodulphus, and at laſt his owne ſonne ſet vp to fight againſt him. Reade before pag. 162.

After this the Emperours began to be ſomewhat calmed and more quiet, ſuffering the biſhops to reigne as they liked: till Fredericke the firſt called Barbaroſſa came, and began to ſtirre coales againſt them. Howbeit they hampered both him, and his ſonne Henry in ſuch ſort, that they brought firſt the necke of Fredericke, in the church of Venice, vnder their feete to tread vpon: and after the ſaid biſhops crowning Henricus his ſonne in the Church of S. Peter, ſet his crowne on his head with their feete, and with their feete ſpurned it off againe, to make him know that the popes of Rome had power both to crowne Emperours, and depoſe them againe. Whereof read before pag. 000.

Pope Alexander 3. treadeth vpon the necke of Fredericke the Emperour. Pope Celeſtine crowneth Henrie 5. Emperor with his foote, and with his foote ſpurneth the crowne from his head againe.

Then followed Philippus brother to Henry aforeſaid, whom alſo the popes accurſed, about the yeare of our Lord 1198. and ſet vp Otho Duke of Saxonie. But when the ſaid Otho began to be ſo ſaucie to diſpoſſeſſe the biſhops of their cities and lands which they had incroched into their hands, they could not beare that, but incontinent they put him beſides the cuſhion. The like alſo fell vpon Otho the 4. that followed after Philip, who was ſuffered no longer then foure yeares to raigne, about the yeare of our Lord 1209.

At this time Fredericus 2. the ſonne of Fredericus Barbaroſſa aboue mentioned, was but young, whom the biſhops of Rome ſuppoſing to find more mortified and tamed to their hand, aduanced to be Emperour after his father. But that fell out much contrary to their expectation. For he perceiuing the immoderate pompe and pride of the Romane biſhops, which he could in no caſe abide, ſo netled them and cut their combs, and waxed ſo ſtout againſt them, intending to extirpe their tyrannie and to reduce their pompous riches to the ſtate and condition of the primitiue Church againe, putting ſome of them to flight, and priſoning ſome of their cardinals, that of three popes, one after another he was accurſed, circumuented by treaſon, at laſt depoſed, and after that poiſoned, and at laſt forſaken and died.

Honorius 3. Gregorie 9. Innocent 4. againſt Fredericus 2. Emperour.

After this Fredericke followed his ſonne Conradus, whom the aforeſaid biſhops for his diſobedience ſoone diſpatched, exciting againſt him in mortall warre the Lantgraue of Thuring, whereby he was at length driuen into his kingdome of Naples, and there deceaſed.

Warre raiſed againſt Conradus, by the Biſhops of Rome.

This Conradus had a ſonne called Conradinus duke and prince of Sueuia. When this Conradinus after the deceaſe of his father came to enioy his kingdome of Naples, the ſaid biſhops ſtirred vp againſt him Charles the French kings brother, in ſuch ſort, that through craftie conueiance, both Conradinus which deſcended of the bloud of ſo many Emperors, and alſo Fredericke Duke of Auſtria, were both taken, and after much wretched handling in their miſerable indurance vnſeeming to their ſtate, at length were both brought vnder the axe by the popes procurement, and ſo both beheaded. And thus ended the imperiall ſtocke of Fredericke the firſt, ſurnamed Barbaroſſa.

Ex Auentino.

The like as happened to Fredericke the Emperor, had almoſt alſo fallen vpon Philip the French king, by pope Boniface the 8. who becauſe he could not haue his commodities and reuenewes out of France after his will, ſent out his Bulles and letters patents to diſplace king Philip aforeſaid, and to poſſeſſe Albertus king of Romanes in his roome.

The inſolency of Pope Boniface 8. againſt Philip the French king.

And thus hitherto in forreins ſtories. Now touching our countrey Princes here in England, to ſpeake ſomewhat likewiſe of them: did not pope Alexander the third preſumptuouſly taking vpon him where he had nothing to doe to intermeddle with the kings ſubiects, for the death of Becket there-bell, albeit the king ſufficiently cleared himſelfe thereof; yet notwithſtanding did hee not wrongfully bring the ſaid king Henry 2. to ſuch penance as it pleaſed him to enioyne, and alſo violently conſtrained him to ſweare obedience to the ſee of Rome? pag. 206. The like alſo was ſhewed before in this ſtorie to happen to king John his ſonne. For when the ſaid king like a valiant prince had held out the tyrannie of thoſe Biſhops ſeuen yeares together, were not all the Churches in England barred vp, and his inheritance with all his dominions giuen away by pope Innocent the third, to Ludouicus the French king, and he afterward compelled to submit both himselfe, and to make his whole realme fedotarie to the bishops of Rome, and moreouer the king himselfe driuen also to surrender his crowne to Pandulphus the popes Legat, and so continued as a priuate person fiue daies, standing at the popes courtesie whether to receiue it againe at his hands or no. And when the nobles of the realme rose afterward against the king for the same, was not he then faine to seeke and sue to the foresaid pope for succour, as by his owne letter, taken out of the publike rolles, may appeare.

King Iohns supplication to pope Innocent the third.

Ex Rotulo patent. De an. Regni Reg. Ioannis 8.

King Iohns supplication to pope Innocent 3.

REuerendiſ. Domino ſuo & Patri ſanctiſ. Innocentio Dei gratia, Ioan. eadem gratia R. Angliæ, &c. Cum Comites & Barones Angliæ nobis deuoti eſſent, antequam nos & noſtram terram Dominio veſtro ſubiacere curaſſemus, ex tunc in nos ſpecialiter ob hoc, ſicut publice dicunt, violenter inſurgunt. Nos verò præter Deum, vos ſpecialem dominum & patronum habentes, defenſionem noſtram & totius Regni, quod veſtrum eſſe credimus, veſtræ paternitati commiſſam, & nos quantum in nobis eſt, curam & ſolicitudinem iſtam veſtræ reſignamus dominationi, deuotius ſupplicantes quatenus in negotijs noſtris, quæ veſtra ſunt, conſilium & auxilium efficax apponatis, prout melius videritis expedire, latores præſentium, &c. Teſte meipſo apud Dour. 18. Septemb. 6.

And yet all this notwithstanding that the said king John did so yeld to the pope, he was both pursued by his nobles, and also in the end was poisoned by a subiect of the popes owne religion, a monke of Swinked: As I haue sufficiently to proue, not only by William Caxton aboue in my story alleaged, pag. 233. but also haue testimonie of the most part of chronicles for the same (a few only excepted:) as of Thomas Gray in his French chronicle: Also of another French chronicle in meeter, of Ranulphus Cestrensis: Thomas Rudburne also doth witnesse the same: So doth Richard Rede in nouo Chronico ad tempora Henr. 6. The like also doth the chronicle called Eulogium Monachi Cant. The words of Walter Gisborne an ancient historiographer be plaine. No lesse is to be found in Ioan. Maior, De gestis Scotorum: Libr. 4. cap. 3. fol. 56. where he not only maketh mention of the monke and of the poyson, but also of the abbat, of his absolution, and of the three monkes euerie day singing for the said monkes soule. To these I could also annex diuers other writers both English and Latin, without name, which witnesse that king John was poysoned; one beginning thus: Heere beginneth a booke in the English tongue, called Brute, &c. another beginneth: Because this book is made to tell what time any thing notable, &c. The third in English beginneth: The reigne of Britaine that now is called England, &c. Of Latine bookes which haue no name, one beginneth thus: Britannia, quæ & Anglia dicitur, à Bruto nomen est sortita, &c. another hath this beginning: Adam pater generis humani, &c.

Paris. writeth by king Henrie the third) were faine to stoope and kisse their Legats knee.

Ex D. Paulo 2. Thess. 2.

1. FOr as much as it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation, for euery humane creature to be subiect vnto me the pope of Rome, it shall be therefore requisit and necessarie for all men that will be saued, to learne and know the dignitie of my see, and excellencie of my domination, as heere is set forth according to the truth and very words of mine owne lawes, in stile as followeth. 2. First my institution began in the old Testament, and was consummate and finished in the new, in that my priesthood was prefigured by Aaron: And other bishops vnder me were prefigured by the sons of Aaron that were vnder him. 3. Neither is it to be thought that my church of Rome hath bin preferred by any generall councell, but obtained the primacie only by the voice of the Gospell, and the mouth of the Sauiour. 4. And hath in it neither spot nor wrinkle, nor any such like thing. 5. Wherefore as other seats be all inferiour to me, and as they cannot absolue me: so haue they no power to bind me or to stand against me, no more then the are hath power to stand or presume aboue him that heweth with it, or the law to presume aboue him that ruleth it. 6. This is the holy and Apostolike mother church of all other churches of Christ. 7. From whose rules it is not meet that any person or persons should decline; but like as the Son of God came to do the wil of his Father, so must you do the will of your mother the church, the head whereof is the Church of Rome. 8. And if any other person or persons shall erre from the said church, either let them be admonished, or else their names taken, to be knowne who they be as much as the holy Church of Rome, whereof I am gouernour, is set vp to the whole world for a glasse or example, reason would what thing soeuer the said Church determineth, or ordaineth, that to be receiued of all men for a generall nerall and a perpetuall rule for euer. 10. Whereupon we see it now verified in this church, that was foreprophecied by Jeremie, saying: Behold I haue set thee vp ouer nations and kingdomes to plucke vp and to breake downe, to build and to plant, &c. 11. Who so vnderstandeth not the prerogatiue of this my priesthood, let him loke vp to the firmament, where he may see two great lights, the Sunne and the Moone: one ruling ouer the day, the other ouer the night. So in the firmament of the vniuersall church, 12. God hath set two great dignities, the authoritie of the Pope, and of the Emperour. Of the which two this our dignitie is so much more waighter, as we haue the greater charge to giue account to God for kings of the earth, and the lawes of men. 13. Wherefore be it knowne to you Emperours, which know it also right well, that you depend vpon the iudgement of vs: wee must not bee brought and reduced to your will. 14. For (as I said) looke what difference there is betwixt the Sunne and the Moone, so great is the power of the pope ruling ouer the day, that is, ouer the spiritualtie, aboue emperours and kings ruling ouer the night, that is, ouer the lattie. 15. Now seeing then the Earth is seuen times bigger then the Moone, and the Sunne eight times greater then the Earth, it followeth that the popes dignitie fiftie sir times doth surmount the estate of the emperours. 16. Upon consideration whereof, I say therefore and pronounce that Constantine the emperour did naught in setting the Patriarch of Constantinople at his feete on his left hand. 17. And although the said emperour wrote to mee, alleaging the words of Saint Peter, commanding vs to submit our selues to euerie humane creature, as to kings, dukes, and other for the cause of God, &c. 1. Peter 2. yet in answering againe in my Decretall, I expounded the mind and the words of Saint Peter to pertaine to his subiects, and not his successors, willing the said emperour to consider the person of the speaker, and to whom it was spoken. For if the mind of Peter had been there to debase the order of priesthood, and to make vs vnderlings to euerie humane creature, then euerie Jacke might haue dominion ouer prelats: which maketh against the example of Christ, setting vp the order of priesthood to beare dominion ouer kings, according to the saying of Jeremie: Behold I haue set thee vp ouer kings and nations, &c. 18. And as I feared not then to write this boldly vnto Constantine, so now I say to all other emperours, that they receiuing of me their approbation, vnction, consecration, and crowne imperiall, must not disdaine to submit their heads vnder me, and sweare vnto me their alleageance. 19. For so you read in the Decree of Pope John, how that princes heretofore haue been wont to bow and submit their heads vnto bishops, and not to proceed in iudgement against the heads of bishops. 20. If this reuerence and submission was wont to be giuen to bishops, how much more ought they to submit their heads to me being superiour, not onely to kings, but

Emperours: and that for two causes: First for my title of succession that I Pope of Rome haue to the Empire, the roome standing vacant: also for the fulnesse of power that Christ the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords hath giuen to me though vnworthie in the person of Peter. 21. By reason whereof, seeing my power is not of man but of God, who by his celestiall prouidence hath set me ouer his whole vniuersall Church master and gouernour, it belongeth therefore to my office to looke vpon euerie mortall sinne of euerie Christian man: 22. Whereby all criminall offences as well of kings as all other, be subiect to my censure, 23. in such sort, that in all manner of pleading, if any maner of person at any time either before the sentence giuen or after shall appeale to me, it shall be lawfull for him so to do. 24. Neither must kings and princes thinke it much to submit themselues to my iudgement: for so did Valentinianus the worthie emperour, so did Theodosius, and also Carolus. 25. Thus you see all must be iudged by me, and I of no man. Yea and though I pope of Rome, by my negligence or euill demeanour be found vnprofitable, or hurtfull, either to my selfe or others: yea if I should draw with me innumerable soules by heapes to hell, yet no mortall man be so hardie, so bold, or so presumptuous to reproue me, 26. or to say to me: Domine cur ita facis: that is, Sir why do you so? 27. For although you reade that Balaam was rebuked of his asse, by the which asse our subiects, by Balaam we prelats are signified: yet that ought to be no example to our subiects to rebuke vs. 28 And though we reade in the Scripture, that Peter, who receiued power of the kingdome, and being chiefe of the Apostles, might by vertue of his office controll all other, was content to come and giue answere before his inferiours, obiecting to him his going to the Gentiles, yet other inferiours must not learne by this example to be checkmate with their prelats, because that Peter so tooke it at their hands, shewing thereby rather a dispensation of humilitie, then the power of his office: by the which power he might haue said to them againe in this wise: It becommeth not sheep, nor belongeth to their office to accuse their shepheard, &c. 29. For else why was Dioscorus Patriarch of Alexandria condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedone? not for any cause of his faith, but only for that he durst stand against pope Leo, and durst excommunicate the bishop of Rome: for who is he that hath authoritie to accuse the seate of Saint Peter? 30 Albeit I am not ignorant what Saint Jerome writeth, that Paul would not haue reprehended Peter, vnlesse hee had thought himselfe equall vnto him. 31. Yet Hierome must thus bee expounded by my interpretation, that this equalitie betwixt Peter and Paul consisteth not in like office of dignitie, but in pureneſſe of conuersation. 32. For who gaue Paul his license to preach but Peter, and that by the authoritie of God, saying: Separate to me Paul and Barnabas? &c. 33. Wherefore be it knowen to all men, y my church of Rome is is prince and head of all nations, 34. the mother of the faith, 35. the foundation cardinall: whereupon all Churches do depend as the doore doth depend by the hinges, 36. the first of all other seats, without all spot or blemish, 37. Ladie, mistresse and instructour of all Churches, 38. a glasse and spectacle vnto all men, to bee followed in all whatsoeuer she obserueth, 39. Which was neuer found yet to slide or decline from the path of apostolicke tradition, or to bee intangled with any newnesse of heresie. 40. Against which Church of Rome whosoeuer speaketh any euill, is forthwith an heretike, 41. yea, a very Pagan, a witch, and an Idolater or Infidell. 42. hauing fulnesse of power onelie in her owne hands in ruling, 43. deciding, absoluing, condemning, casting out, or receiuing in, 44. albeit I denie not but other Churches be partakers with her in laboring & carying. 45. To the which Church of Rome it is lawfull to appeale for remedie, from all other Churches. Although it was otherwise concluded in the generall councell of Milleuitane, that no man should appeale ouer the sea vnder paine of excommunication, yet my glosse commeth in here with an exception: Nisi fortè Romanam sedem appellauerint: i. Except the appeale be to the sea of Rome, &c. 46. By the authoritie of which church of Rome, all synods, and decrees of councels stand confirmed. 47. And hath alwaies full authoritie in her hands to make new lawes and decreements: And to alter statutes, priuiledges, rights or documents of churches: To separate things ioyned, and to ioyne things separated vpon right consideration, either in whole or in part, either personally, or generally, 48. Of the which church of Rome, I am head as a king is ouer his iudges, 49. the vicar of S. Peter, 50. yea not the vicar of Peter properlie, but the vicar of Christ properly, and successour of Peter. 51. Vicar of Iesus Christ, 52. Rector of the vniuersall church: director of the Lords vniuersall flocke. 53. Chiefe magistrate of the whole world, 54. Cephas. i. caput, the head and chiefe of the apostolicke church, 55. vniuersall pope, and diocesan in all places exempt, as well as euery bishop is in places not exempt, 56. most mightie priest, 57. Lex animata in terris. i. 58. a liuing law in the earth iudged to haue al lawes in the chest of my breast, 59. bearing the rowne of no pure man, 60. being neither God nor man, but the admiration of the world, and a middle thing betwixt both, 61. Hauing both swords in my power, both of the spirituall and temporall iurisdiction, 62. so farre surmounting the authoritie of the emperour, that I of mine owne power alone without a councell haue authoritie to depose him, or to transferre his kingdome and to giue a new election, as I did to Fredericke and diuers other, 63. What power then or potestate in all the world is comparable to me: who haue authoritie to bind and lose both in heauen and earth? 64. That is, who haue power both of heauenly things, and also of temporall things, 65. To whom emperors and kings be more inferior, then lead is inferiour to gold, 66. For doe you not see the necks of great kings and princes bend vnder our knees, yea and thinke themselues happie and well defenced, if they may kisse our hands? 67. Wherefore the saucinesse of Hongrius the emperour is to be reprehended, and his constitution abolished, who with his lattie would take vpon him to intermeddle, not onlie with the temporall order, but also with matters ecclesiasticall and election of the pope, 68. But here perchance some will obiect the examples and words of Christ, saying, that his kingdome is not of this world, and where hee being required to diuide betwixt two brethren their heritage, did refuse it. But that ought to be no prejudice to my power, 69. For if Peter, and I in Peter, if we I say, haue power to bind and lose in heauen, how much more then is it to bee thought, that wee haue power in earth to lose and to take away empires, kingdoms, dukedoms, and what else so euer mortall men may haue, and to giue them where wee will? 70. And if wee haue authoritie ouer Angels, which bee the gouernors of princes, what then may we doe vpon their inferiors and seruants? 71. And for that you shall not maruell that I say, Angels be subiect to vs, you shall heare what my blessed clerke Antoninus writeth of the matter, saying, that our power, of Peter and me, is greater then the angels in foure things: In iurisdiction, 2. in administration of sacraments, 3. in knowledge, 4. and in reward, &c. 72. And againe in Bulla Clementis, doe I not there command in my bull, the Angels of Paradise to absolue the soule of man out of Purgatorie, and to bring it into the glorie of Paradise? 73. And now besides my heauenly power, to speake of mine earthlie iurisdiction, who did first translate the empire from the Greekes to the Almaines, but I? 74. And not onelie in the empire am I emperor, the place being emptie, but in all Ecclesiasticall benefices haue full right and power to giue, to translate, and to dispose after my arbitrement, 75. Did not I Zacharias put downe Childerick the old king of France, and set vp Pipinus? 76. Did not I Gregorius the 7. set vp Robert Wylard, and make him king of Sicilia and duke of Capua? &c. 77. Did not I the same Gregorius also set vp Rodulphus against Henry the 4. Emperour? 78. And though this Henricus was an emperour of most stout courage, who stood 62. times in open field against his enemies, 79. yet did not I Gregorius bring him coram nobis, and made him stand at my gate 3. daies and three nights barefoot and bareleg with his wife and child, in the deepe of winter, both in frost and snow, intreating for his absolution, and after did excommunicate him again, so that he was twice excommunicated in my daies? 80. Againe, did not I Paschalis after Gregorie, set vp the sonne of the said Henricus, against his father in warre, to possesse the empire, and to put downe his father, and so he did? 81. Item, did not I pope Alexander bring vnder Henrie the second king of England, for the

the death of Thomas Becket, and cause him to goe barefoot to his tombe at Canturburie with bleeding feet? 82. Did not I Innocentius the third, cause king John to kneele downe at the feet of Pandolphus my legat, and offer vp his crowne to his hands: also to kisse the feet of Stephen Langton bishop of Canturburie, and besides mearsed him in a thousand marks by yeere? 83. Did not I Urbanus the second, put downe Hugo earle in Italie, discharging his subiects from their oth and obedience to him? 84. Did not I Paschalis excommunicate also his sonne Henry 5. and get out of his hands all his right and title of elections and donations of spirituall promottons? Did not I Gelasius 2. bring the captaine Cintius vnder, vnto the kissing of my feet? And after Gelasius, did not I Calixtus 2. quaile the foresaid emperour Henricus 5. and also bring in subiection Gregorie, whom the said emperour had set vp against mee to be pope, bringing him into Rome vpon a Camell, his face to the horse taile, making him to hold the horse taile in his hand in stead of a bridle? 85. Further, did not I Innocentius 2. set vp and make Lotharius to bee emperour for driuing out pope Anacletus out of Rome? 86. Did not I the said Innocentius take the dukedome of Sicile from the empire, and make Roger to bee king thereof, whereby afterward the kingdome became the patrimonie of S. Peter? 87. Did not I Alexander 3. suspend all the realme and churches of England for the kings marriage? an. 1159. 88. But what doe I speake of kings? did not I the said Alexander bring the valiant emperour Fredericke the first to Venice, by reason of his sonne Otho there taken prisoner, and there in S. Marks Church made him fall downe flat vpon the ground while I set my foot vpon his necke, saying the verse of the Psalme; Super aspidem & basiliscum ambulabis? &c. 89. Did not I Adrianus pope, an Englishman borne, excommunicate W. king of Sicile, and refuse his peace, which he offered? and had not hee ouercome me in plaine field, I would haue shaken him out of his kingdome of Sicile, and dukedome of Apulia. 90. Also did not I the said Adrianus, controle and correct the foresaid Fredericus emperor, for holding the left stirrup of my horse when he should haue holden the right? 91. and afterward did not I excommunicate and curse him, for that he was so saucie to set his owne name in writing afore mine? 92. And although a poore flie afterward ouercame and strangled me, yet I made kings and emperors to stoope. 93. Did not I Innocentius 3. deiect Philippus, brother to Fredericus, from the Imperiall crowne, being elected without my leaue, and after set him vp againe? & also set vp Otho of Brunswicke, and after did excommunicate and also depose the same 4. yeeres, setting vp the French king to war against him. 94. Then was Fredericus 2. by me set vp and raigned 37. yeeres; and yet 5. yeeres before he died, 95. Did not I Honorius interdict him, for not restoring certain to their possessions at my request? 96. Whom also Gregorius 9. did excommunicate twice together, and raiset vp the Venetians against him. 97. And at length Innocentius spoiled him of his Empire: after that he caused him to bee poisoned, at length to be strangled by one Manfredus, and did excommunicate his sonne Conradus after him, not onely depriuing him of his right inheritance, but also caused him with Fredericke duke of Austria to be beheaded. 98. Thus then did not I excommunicate and depose all these emperours in order? Henricus 4. Henricus 5. Fredericus 1. Philippus Otho 4. Fredericus 2. and Conradus his son? 99. Did not I interdict king Henry the 8. 100. and all his kingdom of England? 101. And had not his prudence and power preuented my practise, I had displaced him from his kingdom also. Briefly, who is able to comprehend the greatnesse of my power and of my seat? 102. For by me onely generall councels take their force and confirmation, 103. and the interpretation of the said councels, and of all other causes hard and doubtfull, ought to be referred and stand to my determination; 104. By me the workes of all writers, whatsoeuer they bee, either bee reproued or allowed: 105. Then how much more ought my writings and decrees to be preferred before all other? 106. Insomuch that my letters and epistles decretall be equiualent with generall councels: 107. And where as God hath ordained all causes of men, to be iudged by men, he hath only reserued me, that is, the pope of Rome, without all question of men, vnto his owne iudgement: 108. And therefore where all other creatures be vnder their Judge, onely I which in earth am the iudge of all, can bee iudged of none, either of emperour, nor the whole clergie, nor of kings, nor of the people. 109. For who hath power to iudge vpon his iudge? 110. This iudge am I, and that alone, without any other assistance of any councel ioyned to mee. For I haue power vpon councels, councels haue no power vpon me. But if the councell determine amisse, it is in my authority alone to infringe it, or to condemn whom I list without any councell: 111. And all for the preheminence of my predecessour blessed Saint Peter, which by the voice of the Lord, hee received, and euer shall retaine. 112. Furthermore, and whereas all other sentences and iudgements both of councels, person or persons, may and ought to bee examined, 113. for that they may be corrupted foure waies, by feare, by gifts, by hatred, by fauour: onely my sentence and iudgement must stand, 114. as giuen out of heauen by the mouth of Peter himselfe, which no man must, 115. breake, nor retract, 116. No man must dispute or doubt of, 117. Yea, if my iudgement, statute, or yoke seeme scarsely tollerable, yet for remembrance of S. Peter it must be humbly obaied, 118. Yea and moreouer obedience is to be giuen, not onely to such decrees set forth by me in time of my popedome, but also to such as I doe foresee and commit to writing before I be pope, 119. And although it be thought by some writers, to be giuen to all men to erre, and to be deceiued, 120. yet neither am I a pure man, 121. and again, the sentence of my apostolicke seat is alwaies conceiued conceiued with such moderation, is concoct and digested with such patience and ripenesse, and deliuered out with such grauitie of deliberation, that nothing is thought in it necessarie to be altered or detracted, 122. Wherefore it is manifest, and testified by the voice of holie bishops, that the dignitie of this my seat is to be reuerenced thorough the whole world, in that all the faithfull submit themselues to it as to the head of the whole bodie, 123. Whereof it is spoken to mee by the Prophet, speaking of the arke: If this be humbled, whither shal you run for succour, and where shall your glorie become? Seeing then this is so, that so holy bishops and scriptures doe witnesse with me, what shall we say then to such as will take vpon them to iudge of my doings, to reprehend my proceedings, or to require homage and tribute of mee to whom all other are subiect? 124. Against the first sort the Scripture speaketh, Deut. Thou oughtest not to put thy sithe into another mans corne. thing to attempt against me, what is it but plaine sacrilege? Which 125. According to my canonists, which thus define sacrilege to consist in three things, either when a mã iudgeth of his princes iudgement: or when the holy day is prophaned, or when reuerence is not giuen to lawes and canons, 126. Against the second sort maketh the place of the booke of Kings, where we read the arke of God was brought from Gaba to Hierusalem, and in the way the arke inclining by reason of the vnrulie Oxen, Ozias the Leuit put to his hand to helpe, and therefore was strucken of the Lord. By this arke is signified the prelates: by the inclination thereof, the fall of prelats, 127. which also bee signified by the angels that Jacob did see going vp and comming downe the ladder: 128. Also by the Prophet where he saith: Hee bowed downe the heauens and came downe, &c. By Ozias, and by the vnrulie Oxen are meant our subiects, 129. Then like as Ozias was stricken for putting his hand to the arke inclining, no more must subiects rebuke their prelats going awry, 130. Albeit heere may be answered againe, that all be not prelates which so be called: for it is not the name that maketh a bishop, but his life, 131. Against the third sort of such as would bring vs vnder the tribute and exactions of secular men, maketh the new Testament, where Peter was bid to giue the groate in the fishes mouth, but not the head nor the bodie of the fish: No more is the head or bodie of the Church subdued to kings, but only that which is in the mouth, that is, the externe things of the Church. And yet not they neither, 132. For so wee read in the book of Gen. that Pharao in time of dearth subdued all the land of the Egyptians, but yet he ministred to the priests, so that he tooke neither their possessions from them, nor their libertie. If then the prelats of the Church must be neither iudged, nor reprehended, nor exacted, how much more ought I to be free from the same? 133. which am the bishop of bishops, and head of prelats, 134. For it is not to bee thought that the case betwixt mee and other prelates: betwixt my sea and other Churches, be-like, 135. Although the whole catholicke and apostolike church make one bride chamber of Christ: yet the catholike and apostolike Church of Rome, had the preheminence giuen ouer all other by the mouth of the lord himselfe saying to Peter: Thou art Peter, &c. 136. Thus a discretion and difference must be had in the Church as it was betwixt Aaron and his children, 137. betwixt the 72. disciples and the 12. Apostles: betwixt the other Apostles and Peter, 138. Wherefore it is to be concluded, that there must be an order and difference of degrees in the Church betwixt powers, superiour and inferiour: without which order, the vniuersitie of the whole cannot consist, 139. For as amongst the Angelicall creatures aboue in heauen, there is set a difference and inequalitie of powers and orders, some be angels, some archangels, some cherubins and seraphines, 140: So in the ecclesiasticall Hierarchie of the Church militant in the earth, priests must not be equall with bishops, bishops must not bee like in order with archbishops, with patriarches or primats, 141. Who containe vnder them 3. archbishops, as a king containeth three dukes vnder him. In the which number of patriarches, commeth in the state also of 142. cardinals or principals, so called, because as the doore turneth by his hinges, so the vniuersall church ought to bee ruled by them, 143. The next and highest order aboue these is mine, which am pope, differing in power and maiority, and honour reuerentiall, from these and all other degrees of men, 144. For the better declaration whereof, my canonists make three kinds of power in earth: Immediata, which is mine immediatly from God: Deriuata, which belongeth to other inferior prelates from me, 145. Ministralis, belonging to emperours and princes to minister for me. For the which cause the annointing of princes, and my consecration doth differ: for they are annointed onely in the armes or shoulders, and I in the head, to signifie the difference of power betwixt princes and me, 146. This order therefore of priests, bishops, archbishops, patriarches and other, as a thing most conuenient, my Church of Rome hath set and instituted through all Churches, following therein, not only the example of the Angelical army in heauen, but also of the Apostles, 147. For amongst them also there was not an vniforme equalitie or institution of one degree, 148. but a diuersitie or distinction of authoritie and power. Albeit they were all Apostles together, yet it was granted notwithstanding to Peter (themselues also agreeing to the same) that he should beare dominion and superioritie ouer all the other Apostles, 149. And therefore had his name giuen him Cephas, that is, head or beginning of the apostlehood 150. whereupon the order of priesthood first in the new Testament began in Peter, to whom it was said: Thou art Peter, and vpon thee I will build my Church, 151. And I will giue thee the keies of the kingdome of heauen. And thou being conuerted confirme thy brethren, 152. I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith shall not faile. Wherefore seeing such power is giuen to Peter, 153. and to me in Peter, being his successour, 154. who is he then in all the world that ought not to bee subiect to my decrees which haue such power, in heauen, in hell, in earth, with the quicke and also the dead? 155. commanding and granting in my bull of lead sent to Vienna, vnto all such as died in their peregrination to Rome, that the paine of hell should not touch them: And also that all such as take the holy crosse vpon them, should euery one at his request not only bee deliuered himselfe, but also deliuer three or foure soules whomsoeuer he would, out of purgatorie: 156. Againe, hauing such promise and assurance that my faith shall not faile, who then will not beleeue my doctrine? For did not Christ himselfe first pray for Peter that his faith should not faile? 157. Also haue I not a sure promise of Pauls owne mouth, writing to my Church by these words: God is my witnesse whom I serue in my spirit, in the Gospell of his sonne, that without ceasing I make mention of you alwaies in my prayers? Rom.1. 158. Wherefore as I condemne all such worthilie, which will not obay my decrees to be dispossessed of all their honour, without restitution, 159. So all they that beleeue not my doctrine, or stand against the priuiledge of the church, especially the church of Rome, I pronounce them heretickes: 160. And as the other before is to be called vniust, so this man is to bee called an hereticke: 161. For why, he goeth against the faith which goeth against her who is the mother of faith: 162. But here may rise percase a doubt or scruple, that if my faith and knowledge stand so sure by the promise of Christ, and by the continuall prayer of S. Paul: whether is it true, or is to be granted that any other should excell me in knowledge, or interpretation of holy scripture: 163. For looke whose knowledge is grounded on most reason, his words should seeme to be of more authoritie, 164. Wherunto I answer and grant, that many there be and haue been more abundantly indued with fuller grace of the holy Ghost, and greater excellencie of knowledge; and therefore that the tractations of Augustine, Hierome and others ought to be preferred before the constitutions of diuers popes: yet I say in determination of causes, because they haue not the vertue and height of that authoritie, which is giuen to mee; therefore in expounding of scriptures they are to be preferred, but in deciding of matters they stand inferiour to my authoritie. By vertue of which authoritie, 165. both they themselues bee allowed for doctors, and their workes approoued, and also al other matters be ruled, through the power of the keies which is giuen to me immediatlie of Christ. Although I denie not but the same keies bee also committed to other prelats, as they were to other apostles besides Peter, 166: yet it is one thing to haue the keies, another thing to haue the vse of the keies: 167. Wherefore here is to be noted a distinction of keies, after the minde of my schoole doctors: one key which is called Clauis ordinis, hauing authoritie to bind and loose, but not ouer the persons whom they bind and loose, and this authoritie they take not immediatlie of Christ, but mediatlie by me the vicar of Christ. The other key is called Clauis iurisdictionis, which I the vicar of Christ take immediately of him, hauing not onlie authoritie to bind and loose, but also dominion ouer them on whom this key is exercised. By the iurisdiction of which key, the fulnesse of my power is so great, that whereas all other are subiects, 168. yea and emperours themselues ought to subdue their executions to me: Onelie I am subiect to no creature, 169. no not to my selfe, except I list, In foro pœnitentiæ, to my ghostlie father submitting my selfe as a sinner, but not as pope: So that my papall maiestie euer remaineth vnminished. Superiour to all men, 170. whom all persons ought to obay, 171. and follow, 172. whom no man must iudge nor accuse of any crime, either of murder, adulterie, simonie, or such like, 173. No man depose, but I my selfe, 174. No man can excommunicate me, yea though I communicat with the excommunicate, for no canon bindeth me. Whom no man must lie to, 175. For he that lieth to me is a Church robber, 176. And who obayeth not me is an heretike, and an excommunicate person, 177. For like as all the Iewes were commanded to obay the high priest of the Leuiticall order, of what state or condition so euer they were; so are all Christian men more and lesse bound to obay mee Christs lieutenant in earth. Concerning the obedience or disobedience of whom, yee haue in Deu.17.178. Where the common Glosse saith, that he who denieth to the hie priest Obedientiam, lieth vnder the sentence of condemnation, as much as hee that denieth to God his Omnipotentiam. Thus then appeareth, that the greatnes of my priesthood, 179. begun in Melchisedech, solemnised in Aaron, continued in the children of Aaron, perfectionated in Christ, represented in Peter, exalted in the vniuersall iurisdiction, and manifested in Siluester, &c. So that through this Preheminence of my priesthood, hauing all things subiect to me, 180. it may seeme well verified in me that was spoken of Christ, Psal.8. Omnia subiecisti sub pedibus eius, oues & boues, & vniuersa pecora campi. Volucres cœli & pisces maris, &c.i. Thou hast subdued all things vnder his feet, sheepe and oxen, and all cattell of the field, the birds of heauen, and fish of the sea, &c. 181. Where it is to be noted, that by oxen, Iewes and heretikes, by cattell of the field, Pagans bee signified. For although as yet they bee out of the vse of my keies of binding and losing, yet they be not out of the iurisdiction of my keies, but if they returne I may absolue them, 182. By sheep and al cattell, are meant al Christian men both great and lesse, whether they bee emperours, princes, prelats or other. By birds of the aire you may vnderstand the angels and potestates of heauen, who be all subiect to me, in that I am greater then the angels, and that in foure things as is afore declared: and haue power to bind and lose in heauen, 183. and to giue heauen to them that fight in my warres, 184. Lastlie, by the fishes of the sea, are signified the soules departed in paine or in purgatorie, as Gregorie by his prayer deliuered the ſoule of Traianus out of hell, and I haue power to deliuer out of purgatorie whom I pleaſe, 185. Laſtly, by the fiſhes of the ſea, are ſignified ſuch as be in purgatorie: inſomuch that they ſtand in need and neceſſitie of other mens helpe, and yet bee in their iourney Viatores, & de foro Papæ. i. paſſengers and belonging to the court of the pope: therefore they may be releeued out of the storehouſe of the Church, by the participation of indulgence. And forasmuch as ſome doe obiect that my pardons cannot extend to them that be departed, for that it was ſaid to Peter: Whatſoeuer thou ſhalt looſe vpon earth; and therefore ſeeing they are not vpon earth, they cannot bee loſed of me: Here I anſwer againe by my doctors, that this word Super terram, &c. i. vpon the earth, may be referred two manner of waies: firſt to him that is the looſer, ſo that he which ſhall looſe ſhall be vpon the earth. And ſo I grant that the pope being dead can looſe no man. Alſo it may be referred to him that is looſed, ſo that whoſoeuer is looſed muſt be vpon the earth, or about the earth. And ſo the ſoules in purgatorie may be loſed, which albeit they are not vpon the earth, yet they are about the earth, at leaſt they be not in heauen. And becauſe oftentimes one queſtion may riſe vpon another, and the heads of men now adaies are curious, a man hearing now that I can deliuer out of purgatorie, will aske here a queſtion; Whether I be able alſo to emptie all purgatorie at once, or not. To whom my Canoniſt Auguſt. de Ancho. doth anſwere by a triple diſtinction: Quantum ad abſolutam meam iuriſdictionem, quantum ad ordinatam executionem, quantum ad diuinam acceptationem. Firſt, touching my abſolute iuriſdiction, he ſaith, I am able to rid out all purgatorie together, for as many as be vnder my iuriſdiction, as all be, except only infants vnbaptiſed, In Limbo, and men departed onely, Cum baptiſmo flaminis, that is, with the baptiſme of the ſpirit: and ſuch as haue no friends to doe for them that therefore pardons be giuen: theſe onely excepted. For all other beſides, the pope (he ſaith) hath power to releaſe all purgatorie at once, as touching his abſolute iuriſdiction. Albeit Thomas Aquine, part 4. denieth the ſame, forſomuch as Chriſt himſelfe (hee ſaith) when hee came downe, did not vtterly at once releaſe all purgatorie. As touching my ordinarie execution they hold, that I may if I will, but I ought not to doe it. Thirdly, as concerning the diuine acceptation, that is, how God would accept it if I did it, that (they ſay) is vnknowne vnto them, and to euery creature, yea, and to the pope himſelfe.

And to the intent I would all men to ſée and vnderſtand that I lacke not witneſſes moe beſides theſe, if I liſt to bring them out, you ſhall heare the whole quire of my diuine clergie brought out, with a full voice teſtifying in my behalfe, in their bookes, tractations, diſtinctions, titles, Gloſſes, and Summaries, as by their owne words here followeth. The pope (ſay they) being the vicar of Jeſus Chriſt thorough the whole world, in the ſtead of the liuing God, hath that dominion and Lordſhip which Chriſt here in earth would not haue, although he had it in habitu, but gaue it to Peter in actu, that is, the vniuerſall iuriſdiction both of ſpirituall things, and alſo of temporall, which double iuriſdiction was ſignified by the two ſwords in the Goſpell: And alſo by offering of the wiſe men, who offered not onely incenſe, but alſo gold, to ſignifie not onely the ſpirituall dominion, but alſo the temporall to belong to Chriſt and to his vicar. For as we reade, The earth is the Lords and the fulneſſe thereof; and as Chriſt ſaith: All power is giuen to him both in heauen and earth. So it is to be affirmed Incluſiuè, that the vicar of Chriſt hath power on things celeſtiall, terreſtriall, and infernall. Which hee tooke immediately of Chriſt: all other take it immediately by Peter and the pope. Wherefore ſuch as ſay that the pope hath dominion only on ſpirituall things in the world, and not of temporall, may be likened to the counſellors of the king of Syria 3. Reg. 20. which ſaid, That the gods of the mountaines be their gods, and therefore they haue ouercome vs; but let vs fight againſt them in the low medowes, and in vallies where they haue no power, and ſo we ſhall preuaile ouer them. So euill counſellours now a daies, through their peſtiferous flatterie deceiue kings and princes of the earth: ſaying, popes and prelats bee gods of mountaines, that is, of ſpirituall things onely, but they bee not gods of valleies, that is, they haue no dominion ouer temporall things, and therefore let vs fight with them in the vallies, that is, in the power of the temporall poſſeſſions, and ſo we ſhall preuaile ouer them. But what ſaith the ſentence of God to them, let vs heare. Becauſe (ſaith hee) the Syrians ſay that the god of mountaines is their god, and not the god of vallies, therefore I will giue all this multitude into your hand, and ye ſhall know that I am the Lord. What can bee more effectuallie ſpoken to ſet forth the maieſtie of my iuriſdiction, which I receiued immediatlie of the Lord, of the Lord I ſay, and of no man? For whereas Conſtantine the emperour gaue to Siluester, endowing him with this poſſeſſion and patrimonie; that is ſo to be expounded and taken not ſo much for a donation, as to be counted for a reſtitution made of that which tyrannoullie was taken from him before. And againe, whereas I haue giuen at ſundrie times to Ludouicus and other emperors, of my temporall lands and poſſeſſions, yet that was done not ſo much for any recogniſing of homage to them, as for keeping peace with them. For I owe to emperors no due obedience that they can claime: but they owe to me as to their ſuperior. And therefore for a diuerſitie betwixt their degree and mine, in their conſecration they take ỹ vnction on their arme, I on the head. And as I am ſuperior to them, ſo am I ſuperior to all lawes, & free frõ al conſtitutions. Which am able of my ſelf, & by my interpretation, to prefer equitie being not written, before ỹ law written: hauing all lawes within the cheſt of my breſt, as is aforeſaid. And whatſoeuer soeuer this my sée shall enact, approoue or disprooue, all men ought to approoue or reprooue the same, without either iudging, disputing, doubting or retracting. Such is the priuiledge giuen of Christ in the behalfe of Peter, to the Church of Rome, 186, that what countrie soeuer, kingdome or prouince, chusing to themselues bishops and ministers, although they agrée with all other Christs faithfull people in the name of Iesu, that is in faith and charitie, beléeuing in the same God, and in Christ his true son, and in the holy Ghost, hauing also the same Créed: the same Euangelists and Scriptures of the Apostles: yet notwithstanding vnlesse their bishops and ministers take their origine and ordination from this apostolicall seate, they are to bee counted not of the Church. So that succession of faith onlie is not sufficient to make a Church, except the ministers take their ordination by them which haue their succession from the Apostles. So their faith, supremacie, the chaire of Peter, keies of heauen, power to bind and loose, all these be inseparable to the Church of Rome: so that it is to be presumed, that God alwaies prouiding, and saint Peter helping the bishopricke and diocesse of Rome, shall neuer fall from the faith. And likewise it is to be presumed and presupposed that the bishop of that Church, is alwaies good and holy. Yea, and though he be not alwaies good, or be destitute of his owne merits, yet the merits of Saint Peter, predecessour of that place, be sufficient for him, who hath bequeathed and left a perpetuall dowrie of merits, with inheritance of innocencie to his posteritie, 187. yea, though hee fall into homicide or adulterie, hee may sinne, but yet he cannot be accused, but rather excused by the murders of Sampson, the thefts of the Hebrues, the adulterie of Jacob, 188. And likewise, if any of his clergie should be found embracing a woman, it must be expounded and presupposed that he doth it to blesse her. Furthermore, the pope (say they) hath all the dignities, and all power of al patriarches. In his primacie, hee is Abel: In gouernment, the arke of Noe: In patriarchdome, Abraham: In order, Melchisedech: In dignitie, Aaron: In authoritie, Moses: In seate iudiciall, Samuell: In zeale, Helias: In meekenesse, Dauid: In power, Peter: In vnction, Christ. (May thou art Antichrist) My power (they say) is greater then all the saints. For whom I confirme, no man may infirme: I may fauour and spare whom I please, 189. to take from one, and to giue to another. And if I be enemie to any man, all men ought to eschew that person forthwith, and not tarie and looke while I bid them so to do. All the earth is my diocesse, and I the Ordinarie of all men, hauing the authoritie of the king of all kings vpon subiects. I am all in all, and aboue all, 190. so that God himselfe and I the vicar of God haue both one Consistorie, 191. and am able to doe almost all that God can doe, Claue non errante, 192. Item it is said of me, that I haue an heauenly arbitrement, and therefore am able to change the nature of things, Substantialia vnius applicando alteri, and of nothing to make things to be: and of a sentence that is nothing to make it stand in effect: In all things that I list, my will to stand for reason. For I am able by the law to dispense aboue the law, and of wrong to make iustice, in correcting lawes and changing them. You haue heard hitherto sufficiently out of my doctors. Now you shall heare greater things out of mine owne decrées, 193. Reade there Dist. 96. Satis, 194. Also 12. Caus. 11. q. 1. cap. Sacerdotibus, 195. Also 12. q. 1. cap. Futuram. Doe you not find there expressed, how Constantinus the emperour sitting in the generall councell of Nice, called vs prelats of the Church, all Gods? 196. Againe, reade my canon Decretal. De transl. Episc. cap. Quanto. Do you not sée there manifestlie expressed, how not man, but God alone separateth that which the bishop of Rome doth dissolue and separate? Wherefore if those things that I doe be said to be done not of man, but of God: What can you make me but God? Againe, if prelates of the Church be called and counted of Constantinus for gods, I then being aboue all prelats, seeme by this reason to bee aboue all Gods. Wherefore no maruell, if it bee in my power to change time and times, to alter and abrogate lawes, to dispense with all things, yea with the precepts of Christ. For where Christ biddeth Peter put vp his sword, monished his disciples not to vse any outward force in reuenging themselues, 197. Do not I pope Nicolaus writing to the bishops of France, exhort them to draw out their materiall swords in pursuing their enemies, and recouering their possessions, setting against the precept of Christ, the prophet saying: Dissolue colligationes impietatis, &c? Item, where Christ was present himselfe at the marriage in Cana Galilea, 198. doe not I pope Martinus in my distinction inhibite the spirituall clergie to be present at mariage feasts, and also to marry themselues? Item where matrimonie by Christ, cannot bee losed but onlie for whordome, 199. do not I pope Gregorius Iunior, writing ad Bonifacium permit the same to bee broken for impotencie or infirmitie of bodie? 200. Item, against the expresse caution of the Gospel, doth not Innocentius the fourth, permit vim vi repellere? 201. Likewise against the old testament. I doe dispense in not giuing tithes, 202. Item, against the new testament in swearing and that in these 6. causes, 203. Pax, fama, fides, reuerentia, cautio damni, Defectus veri, possunt sibi magna caueri.

Wherein two kinds of othes are to bee noted. Whereof some be promissoria, some bee assertoria, &c. 204. Item, in vowes, and that ex toto voto, whereas other prelates cannot dispense ex toto à voto, I can deliuer ex toto à voto, like God himselfe, 205. Item in periurie if I absolue, my absolution standeth, 206. Where also note, that in all swearing alwaies the authoritie of the superiour is excepted, 207. Moreouer, where Christ biddeth to lend without hope of gaine, doe not nst Pope Martinus giue dispensation for the same: and notwithstanding the councell of Tharon enacted the contrarie, yet with two Buls I disannulled that decrement, 208. What should I speake of murder, making it no murder nor homicide to slay them that be excommunicate, 209. Likewise against the law of nature, 210. Item, against the apostle, 211. Also against the Canons of the Apostles: I can and doe dispense. For where they in their canon command a priest for fornication to be deposed, I through the authoritie of Silvester doe alter the rigour of that constitution, 212. considering the minds and bodies also of men now to be weaker then they were then, 213. Briefly, against the vniuersall state of the Church I haue dispensation, scilicet quando status ecclesiæ non decoloratur: And for marriage in the second degree of consanguinity and affinitie, In collateralibus æquali linea, that is, betweene the brethrens children: although not inæquali linia, so that the vncle may not marrie his neece, vnlesse for an vrgent and weightie cause. As for all such contracts betwixt partie and partie, where that matrimony is not yet consummat by carnall copulation, it is but a small matter for me to dispense withall. In summa, if yée list briefly to heare the whole nũber of al such cases as properlie do appertaine to my papall dispensation, which come to the number of one and fiftie points, that no man may meddle withall but onely I my selfe alone, I will recite them first in Latine, then in English, as they be set forth in my canonicall doctors.

These be the cases wherein I only haue power to dispense, and no man else, neither bishop, nor metropolitane, nor Legat, without a licence from me.

The riches and possessions of the pope.

After that I haue now sufficiently declared my power in earth, in heauen, and in purgatorie, how great it is, and what is the fulnesse thereof, in binding, loosing, commanding, permitting, electing, confirming, deposing, dispensing, doing, and vndoing, &c. I will intreat now a little of my riches likewise and great possessions, that euery man may see by my wealth and abundance of all things, rents, tithes, tributes, my silkes, my purple miters, crownes, gold, siluer, pearles and gemmes, lands and lordships, how God here prospereth and magnifieth his vicar on the earth. For to mee pertaineth first the imperiall citie of Rome, the pallace of Laterane, the kingdome of Cicile is proper to me, Apulia and Capua, bee mine. Also the kingdome of England and Ireland, bee they not or ought to be tributaries to me? 214. To these I adioyne also, besides other prouinces and countries both in the Occident and Orient, from the North to the South, these dominions by name, 215. as Surrianum, Montembordon, & Lunæ insulam, Corficæ regnum, Paruam Mantuam, Montenselete, Insulam Venetiarum, Ducatum Ferrariæ, Canellum, Caniodam, Ducatum Histriæ Dalmatiam, Exarchatum Rauennæ, Fauentiam, Cesenam, Castrum, Tiberiatus Roccam Mediolanum, Castrum Ceperianum, Castrum Cusianum, Terram Cornulariam, Ducatum Armini, Contam, Montum ferretum, Montem Capiniæ seu Olympicum, Castrum exforij. For in that I toke them of him, I toke them not as a gift as is afore mentioned) but as a restitution. And that I rendered them againe to Otho, I did it not for any dutie to him, but onlie for peace sake. What should I speake here of my dailie reuenues, of my first fruits, annats, palles, indulgences, bulles, confessionals, indults and rescripts, testaments, dispensations, priuiledges, elections, prebends, religious houses, and such like, which come to no small masse of money? Insomuch, that for one pall to the archbishop of Mentz, which was wont to be giuen for ten thousand 218. Florence, now it is growne to xxvij. thousand Florence, which I received of Jacobus the archbishop not long before Basill councell: Besides the fruits of other bishoprickes in Germany, comming to the number of fiftie, whereby what vantage commeth vnto my coffers, it may partly be coniectured. But what should I speak of Germany, 219. when the whole world is my diocelle, as my canonists doe say, and all men are bound to beléeue, 220. except they will imagine (as the Manichies doe) two beginnings, which is false and hereticall. For Moses saith: In the beginning God made heauen and earth, and not in the beginnings, 221. Wherefore as I begun, so I conclude, commanding, declaring, and pronouncing, to stand vpon necessitie of saluation, for euerie humane creature to bee subiect to me.
